30 die. Therefore, herefolued to iffue out into the field, and to let the enemies know, that his comming was to fend them away from the Towne; not to be befreged by them within it.

In executing this determination, it was very beneficiall to him, that the enemie lay encamped in fuch fort, as one quarter was not well able to relieue another in diffrelle. Hieron was now expocked to the fame danger, whereinto hee had wilfully calk his owne mutinous followers, not long before: only he was firong enough (or thought fo) to make good his owne quarter, without helpe of others. Againth him Ladium iffued forth, and (not attempting, by unexpected fallie, to furprize bistrenches) arranged his men in order of battaile, wherewith hee prefented him.

40 The Syracusian wanted not courage to fight; but surely, hee wanted good adnice: else would he not have hazarded all his power against an enemie, of whom he had made no triall; when it had been easie, and as much as was requisite, to defend his owne Campe. It may be, that he thought toget honour, wherewith to adorne the beginning of his raigne. But he was well beaten; and driven to save himselfe within his Trenches: by which losse, he learned a point of wisedome, that shood him and his Kingdome in good stead, all the daies of his life. It was a foolish desire of revenge, that had made the Syracusians so busie, in helping those of Carthage, against the Mamertines.

Had Messan beene taken by the Carthaginians, Syracuse it selfe must have sought 50 helpe from Rome, against those friends which it now so diligently assisted. Hieron had (in respect of those two mightic Cities) but a small stock, which it behooved him to governe well: such another losse would have made him almost bankrupt. Therefore he quietly brake vp his Camp, and retired home: intending to let them shand to their adventures, that had hope to be egainers by the bargaine. The next day, Claudius perceiuing the Sicilian Armic gone, did with great courage, and with much alacritic of his fouldiers, give charge vpon the Carthaginians: wherein he fped fo well, that the enemie for fooke both field and campe, leaving all the Countrie open to the Romans; who having spoiled all round, without relistance, intended to lay fiege vnto the great Citie of Syracuse.

These prosperous beginnings, how soeuer they animated the Romans, and filled them with hopes, of attaining to greater matters, than at first they had expected: Yet did they not imprint any forme of terrour in the Citie of Carehage, that had wel enough repaired greater losses than this, in which no more was lost, than what had beene prepared against the Mamertines alone, without any suspicion of warre 10 from Rome.

Now in this place I hold it seasonable, to consider of those grounds, whereupon the Romans entred into this warre; not how profitable they were, nor how agreeable to rules of honestie (for questionlesse the enterprize was much to their benefit, though as much to their shame) but how allowable in strict termes of lawfulnesse; whereupon they built all their allegations in maintenance thereof. That the Mamertines did yeeld themselues, and all that they had, into the Romans hands (as the Campanes, diffressed by the Samnites, had done I cannot finde : neither can I finde, how the messengers of those folke, wherof one part had alreadie admitted the Carthaginians, could be enabled to make any fuch furrendric, in the publike name of all 20

If therefore the Mamertines, by no lawfull furrendric of themselves and their possessions, were become subjectivato Rome, by what better title could the Romans affilt the Mamertines, against their most ancient friends the Carthaginians, than they might have aided the Campanes, against the Samnites, without the same condition? which was (as they themselues confessed) by none at all. But let it be supposed, that some point serving to cleare this doubt, is lost in all Histories. Doubtlesse it is, that no companie, of Pirates, Theeues, Outlawes, Murderers, or fuch other malefactours, can by any good successe of their vilanic, obtaine the priviledge of civill societies, to make league or truce, yea, or to require faire warre: but are by all meanes, 30 as most pernicious vermine, to be rooted out of the world. I will not take vpon me, to maintaine that opinion of some Civilians, that a Prince is not bound to hold his faith, with one of these; it were a Position of ill consequence: This I hold; that no one Prince, or State, can give protection to fuch as these, as long as any other is vling the fword of vengeance against them, without becomming accessarie to their crimes. Wherefore, we may efteemethis action of the Romans, To farre from being justifiable, by any pretence of Confederacie made with them; as that contrariwife, by admitting this nest of Murderers and Theeues, into their protection, they justly descrued to be warred vpon themselues, by the people of Sicil; yea, although Mesfana had beene taken, and the Mamertines all flaine, ere any newes of the Confede 40 racic had beene brought vnto the beliegers. The great Alexander was so farre perfwaded berein; that he did put to fword all the Branchiada (a people in Sogdiana) and razed their Citic, notwithstanding that they joyfully entertained him as their Lord and King , because they were descended from a Companie of Milesians, who to gratifie King Xerxes, had robbed a Temple, and were by him rewarded with the Towne and Countrie, which these of their posteritie enjoyed. Neuerthelesse, in course of humane justice, long and peaceable possession gives in acquisitum, a kinde of right by prescription, vnto that which was at first obtained by wicked meanes: and doth freethe descendants, from the crime of their Ancestors, whose vilanies they doe not exercise. But that the same generation of Theeues, which by a dete- 50 stable fact hath purchased a rich Towne, should be acknowledged a lawfull companie of Citizens, there is no shew of right. For euen the Conquerour, that by open warre obtaineth a Kingdome, doth not confirme his title, by those victories which gaue him first possession: but length of time is requisite, to establish him, vnlesse by fome alliance with the ancient inheritors, he can better the violence of his claime; as did our King Henrie the first, by his marriage with Maude, that was daughter of Malcolme, King of the Scots, by Margaret, the Neece of Edmund Ironfide, Wherefore I conclude, that the Romans had no better ground (if they had so good) of juflice, in this quarrell, than had the Gothes, Hunnes, Vandalls, and other Nations, of the warres that they made vpon the Roman Empire, wherein Rome her felfe, in the time of her visitation, was burnt to ground.

Of the Iland of Sicil.

t. I.

The qualitie of the Iland: and the first Inhabitants thereof.

CHAP.1. S.4. 1.1.

He defence of the Mamertines, or the possession of Messana, being now no longer, fince the first victories of Appius Claudius, the objects of the Roman hopes; but the Dominion of all Sicil being the prize, for which Rome and Carthage, are about to contend: it will bee agreeable vnto the order, which in the like cases we have observed, to make a briefe collection, of things, concerning that noble Iland, which hath beene the stage of many great acts, performed, as well before and after, as in this present

That Sicil was sometimes a Peninsula, or Demie-Isle, adjoyned to Italie, as a part of Brutium in Calabria, neare vnto Rhegium, and afterward by violence of tempest se-10 uered from the same: it is a generall opinion of all antiquitie. But at what certaine time this divilion happened, there is no memoriall remayning, in any ancient writer. Strabo, Plinie, and Dionysius, affirme, that it was caused by an earthquake; Si- Plinia, et a. lius, and Cassodorus, doe thinke it to have beene done by the rage and violence of sullis. the tide, and surges of the Sea. Either of these opinions may be true; for so was Eubwa scuered from Beotia; Atalante and Macris, from Eubwa; Sillie here in England, from the Cape of Cornewall; and Britaine it felfe (as may feeme by Verstegans arguments) from the opposite continent of Gaule. But for Sicil, they which lend their cares to fables, do attribute the cause of it to Neptune (as Eustathius witnesseth) who with his three-forked Mace, in fauour of Iscastus, the sonne of Aolus, divided it 40 from the maine land, and so made it an Iland, which before was but a Demie-Ille; that by that meanes, hee might the more fafely inhabite, and possesse fame. Diodorus Siculus, moued by the authoritie of Hesiodus, ascribeth the labour of sun-orion 1.4514. dring it from Italie, to Orion : who, that he might be compared to Hereales (cutting Diod.I.s. through the rocks and mountaines) first opened the Sicilian streights, as Hercules did Outd. de Fast. Ac thole of Gibralter.

They which value the Ilands of the mid-land Sea, according to their quantitie and content, doe make this the greatest, as Enstathins and Strabo, who affirme this. not only to excell the reft for bignesse, but also for goodnesse of soile. As concerning the forme of this Iland, Pomponius Mela faith, it is like that Capitall letter of 50 the Greeks, which they call Delta, namely, that it hath the figure of a triangle, which is generally knowne to be true. That the whole Iland was confecrated to Gives and Proferpina, all old writers with one consent affirme. To Ceres it was dedicated, because it first taught the rules of setting and sowing of Corne to Proserpina, not so much, for that shee was from hence violently taken by Pluto, as because (which Plu-tarch and Diodorus doe report for truth) that Pluto, as soone as shee, vncouering her selte, first shewed her selfe to be seene of him, gaue her the Dominion thereof.

Of the fertilitie and riches of this Countrie, there is a famous testimonie written by Cicero, in his second Oration against Verres, where he faith, that Marcus Cato did call it the Granarie, and Store-house of the Common-wealth, and the Nurse of the vulvar fort. The fame Cicero doth adde in that place; that it was not only the ftore-house of the people of Rome: but also that it was accounted for a well furnished treasurie. For without any cost or charge of ours (faith he) it hath vsually cloathed, maintained, and furnished, our greatest Armies, with leather, apparell, and corne. Strabo reporteth almost the same thing of it. Whatsoever Sicilie doth yeeld (faith Solinus) 10 whether by the Sunne, and temperature of the aire, or by the industrie and labour of man, it is accounted next vnto those things that are of best estimation: were it not, that such things, as the earth first putteth forth, are extremely ouer-growne with faffron. Diodorus Siculus faith, that in the fields, neere vnto Leontium, and in divers other places of this Iland, wheat doth grow of it selfe, without any labour, or looking to, of the husbandman. Martianus sheweth, that there were in it sixe Colonics, and fixtie Cities: there are that reckon more, whereof the names are found scatteringly in many good Authours.

Now besides many famous acts, done by the people of this Iland, as well in peace as warre; there be many other things, which have made it very renowned, as the 20 birth of Ceres; the rauishing of Proferpina; the Giant Enceladus; the mount Eina, Scylla and Charibdis, with other antiquities, and rarities; besides those learned men, the noble Mathematician Archimedes, the famous Geometrician Euclides; the painfull Historian Diodorus; and Empedocles the deepe Philosopher.

That Sitil was at first possessed and inhabited by Giants Lastriagones, and Cyclopes, barbarous people, and vnciuill; all histories and fables doe joyntly with one consent auerre. Yet Thucydides faith, that these sauage people dwelt onely in one part of the Hand. Afterward the Sicani, a people of Spaine, possessed it. That these Sicani were not bred in the Isle (although some doe so thinke,) Thuey dides and Diodorus doe constantly auouch.

Ofthese it was named Sicania. These Sicani were invaded by the Siculi; who, inhabiting that part of Latium, whereon Rome was afterward built, were driven by the Pelasgi from their owne seates, and finding no place vpon the continent, which they were able to master and inhabite, passed over into this Iland, three hundred yeares before the Greekes sent any Colonies thither: and (faith Philistus) eightic yeares before the fall of Troy. These Siculi gaue the name of Sicilia, to the Iland; and making warre vpon the Sicani, draue them from the East and Northerne part thereof, into the West and South. At their landing, they first built the Citie Zancle, afterward called Meffena; and after that, Catana, Leontium, and Syracufe it selfe, beating from thence the Etolians, who long before had fet vp a Towne in that place 40 As for the name of Syracule, it was not knowne, till fuch time as Archias of Corinth (long after) wonne that part of the Iland from the Siculi; Neither did the Siculi at their first arrivall dispossesse the Atolians thereof, but some hundred yeares after their descent, and after such time as they had founded the Cities before named, with Nea, Hybla, Trinacia, and divers others.

After these Siculi came another Nation out of Italy, called Morgetes; who were thence driven by the Oenotrians. These sate downe in that part of Sicil, where they afterward raised the Cities of Margentum, and Leontium. For at this time the Siculi were divided, and by a civill warre greatly infeebled. Among these ancient Rorles, sie finde the last voiage, and the death of Minos, King of Creet. Thucy dides, 50 an Historian of unquestionable finceritie, reports of Minos, that he made conquest of many Hands: and some such businesse, perhaps, drew him into Sieil. But the common report is, that he came thither in pursuit of Dedalus. The tale goes thus: Dadalus flecing the reuenge of Mines, came into Sicil to Cocalus, King of the Sicani, and during his aboade there, he built a place of great strength, necrevnto Megara, for Cocalus, to lay vp his treasure in; together with many notable works, for which he was greatly admired and honoured.

Among the reft, he cast a Ramme in gold, that was set up in the Temple of Fenus Erycina; which he did with fo great arte, as those that beheld it, thought it rather to be liuing, than counterfait.

Now Minos, hearing that Cocalus had entertained Dadalus, prepares to invade the Territorie of Cocalus; but when he was arrived, Cocalus doubting his own ftrength, promifeth to deliuer Dadalus. This he performes not, but in the meane while, kills 10 Minos by treason, and perswades the Cretans, Minos his followers, to inhabite a part of Sicil; the better (as it feemes) to strengthen himselfe against the Siculi. Hercunto the Cretans (their King being dead) gaue their consent, and builded for themselues the Citie of Minoa, after the name of their King Minos. After, they likewise built the Towne of Engyum, now called Gange: and these were the first Cities, built by the Greeks in Sicil, about two ages before the warre of Troy; for the grand children of Minos served with the Greeks at the siege thereof.

But after such time as the Cretans understood, that their King had by treason beene made away; they gathered together a great Armie, to invade Cocalus: and landing neere vnto Camicus, they belieged the same fine yeares, but in vaine. In the 20 end (being forced to returne, without any reuenge taken) they were wrackt on the coalt of Italie; and having no meanes to repaire their ships, nor the honor they had loft, they made good the place whereon they fell, and built Hyria, or Hyrium, betweene the two famous Ports of Brundusium, and Tarensum. Of these Cretans came those Nations, afterward called Japyges, and Messapi,

After the taking of Troy, Ageftus and Elymus, brought with them certaine troups into Sicil, and feated themselves among the Sicani; where they built the Cities of Agelta and Elyma.

Itis faid, that Aneas visited these places in hispassage into Italie: and that some of the Troianes, his followers, were left behinde him, in these Townes of Sicil: 30 whereof there want not good Authours, that make Aneas himselfe the founder.

About the same time, the Phanicians seised upon the Promontories of Pachinus, and Lilybeum, and vpon certaine small Isles adjoyning to the maine Iland: which they fortified, to fecure the trades that they had with the Sicilians; like as the Portugals have done in the East India, at Goa, Ormus, Mosambig, and other places. But the Phanicians staied not there; for after they had once assured their descents, they built the goodly Citie of Panormus, now called Paletma.

These we finde, were the Nations, that inhabited the Isle of sicil, before the watre of Troy, and cre the Greeks in any numbers began to straggle in those parts.

It may perchance feeme strange to the Reader, that in all ancient storie, he findes 40 one and the same beginning of Nations, after the floud; and that the first planters of all parts of the World, were faid to bee mightie and Giantlike men; and that, as Phanicia, Agypt, Lybia, and Greece, had Hercules, Orefles, Intens, Typhon, and the like; as Denmarke had Starchaterus, remembred by Saxo Grammaticus; as Scythia, Saxo Giapra-Britanie, and other Regions, had Giants for their first Inhabitants; so this Isle of Sicil had her Lestrigones and Cyclopes. This discourse I could also reject for fained and fabulous; did not Moses make vs know, that the Zamzummims, Emims, Anakims, and og of Basan, with others, which sometime inhabited the Mountaines and Delarts of Moab, Ammon, and Mount Seir, were men of exceeding strength and stature, and of the races of Giants : and were it not, that Tertullian, St. Augustine, Ni- fure. 50 cephorus, Procopius, Isidore, Plinie, Diodore, Herodotus, Solinus, Plutarch, and many O. Aug, de Civit.

ther Authours, haue confirmed the opinion. Yea, Vesputius, in his second Nauigation into America, hath reported, that himselfe hath seene the like men in those hieralians. parts. Againe, whereas the felfe-fame is written of all Nations, that is written of Procop. 1. 3. de any one ; as touching their simplicitie of life, their meane fare, their feeding on a- Bello Goth.

cornes and roots, their poore cottages, the couering of their bodies, with the skins of bealts, their hunting, their armes, and weapons, and their warfare, their first pasfages oner great Riners, and armes of the Sea, vpon rafts of trees tied together; and afterward, their making boats, first, of twigs and leather, then of wood; first, with Oares, and then with faile; that they esteemed as Gods, the first finders out of Arts: as of Husbandrie, of Lawes, and of Policie: it is a matter, that makes me neither to wonder at nor to doubt of it. For they all lived in the same newnesse of time, which we call old time, and had all the same want of his instruction, which (after the Creator of all things) hath by degrees taught all Mankinde. For other teaching had they none, that were removed far off from the Hebrewes, who inherited the knowledge 10 of the first Patriarchs, than that from variable effects they beganne, by time and degrees, to finde out the causes: from whence came Philosophie Naturall; as the Morall did from disorder and consusion; and the Law from crueltie and oppression.

But it is certaine, that the Age of Time hath brought forth stranger and more incredible things, than the Infancie. For we have now greater Giants, for vice and injustice, than the World had in those daies, for bodily strength; for cottages and houses of clay and timber, we have raised Palaces of stone; we carue them, we paint them, and adorne them with gold; infomuch as men are rather knowne by their houses, than their houses by them; we are fallen from two dishes, to two hundred; from water, to wine and drunkennesse; from the couering of our bodies with the 20 skinnes of beafts, not only to filke and gold, but to the very skinnes of men. But to conclude this digression, Time will also take revenge of the excesse, which it hath brought forth; Quamlonga dies peperit, longiorá, auxit, longissima subruit; Long time brought forth, longer time increased it, and a time, longer than the rest, shall overthrow it.

t. II.

The plantation of the Greeks in Sicil.

W Hen the first inhabitants had contended long enough about the Dominion of all side in happened, that one of the long of the nion of all Sicil: it happened, that one Theocles, a Greeke, being driven vpon that coast by an Easterly winde; and finding true the commendations thereof, which had beene thought fabulous, being delinered onely by Poets; gaue information to the Athenians of this his discouerie, and proposed vnto them the benefit of this casie conquest, offcring to become their guide. But Theocles was as little regarded by the Athenians, as Columbus, in our Grand-fathers times, was by the English. Wherefore hee tooke the same course, that Columbus afterwards did. 40 Hee ouer-laboured not himselfe in perswading the Noble Athenians (who thought themselucs to bee well enough alreadie) to their owne profit; but went to the Chalcidians, that were needie and industrious, by whom his project was gladly entertained. By these was built the Citie of Naxus, and a Colony planted

But the rest of the Greeks were wifer than our westerne Princes of Europe: for they " Syracuse, as had no Pope, that should forbid them, to occupie the voide places of the World. was the grea- Archias of Corinth followed the Eubwans, and landed in Sicil, neare vnto that Citie, telt, and most called afterward * Syracuse: of which, that part onely was then compassed with a goodly Citie of all that the

or an trust the Greeks possess, the fituation is both strong, and of an excellent prospect, from energy entrance, by Land, or Sea. The Port was stor the most part) enuironed with beautiful building; and that part which was without the Cities was en both sides bankt too, and suffained with beautiful walk of Marke. The Cities of the Citie on both fides bankt vp, and sustained with beautifull walls of Marble. The Citie it felse was one of the greatest of the World : for it had in compatic (as Strabo reporteth) without the treble wall thereof, 180, furlongs; which made of our miles about 18. It was compounded offoure Cities, (Strabolaith, of fine) to wit, Infula, Acradma, Tycha, and Neapolis: of which greatnesse, the ruines and foundations of the walls doe yet witnesse. wall wall, which the Etolians called Homothermon; the Greeks, Nasos; the Latines, Infala. He with his Corinthians having over-come the Sieuli, drawe them vp into the as the Dores of Countrie; and after a few yeares, their multitudes increaling, they added vnto the Peloponefiss had Citie of the lland, that of deradina, Tycha, and Nespolis. So as well by the commodity of the double Port, capable of as many ships, as any Hauen of that part of goodly Citie, Europe, as by the fertilitie of the foyle; Syracuje grew vp in great halte, to be one of for a long time the goodliest Townes of the World In short time the Greekes did possesse the bet-seat of Tyeants ter part of all the Sea-coast; forcing the Sicilians to withdraw themselves into the Thesist wherfall and mountainous parts of the Iland, making their Royall refidence in of was Gelo:

Some fenen yeares after the arrivall of Archias; the Chalcidians, encouraged by der The thid, effected for the Corimbians, did affaile, and obtains the Citic of Leaving built. Phosphalus: the successe of the Corinthians, did affaile, and obtaine the Citie of Leontum, built The south, and possest by the Siculi. In briefe, the Greekes winne from the Siculi, and their and fift, Diany-Affociates, the Cities of Catana, and Hybla, which, in honour of the Megarians that fins, the elder, family shows all of Megarians

About five and fortie yeares after Archias had taken Syracule; Antiphemus and The fewenth Entimus, the one from Rhodes, the other from Crete, brought an Armie into Sieil, Againstus: Ine and built Gela; whose Citizens, one hundred and eight yeares after, did erect that The ninth, magnificent and renowned Citic of Agrigentum, gouerned according to the Lawes ger. The tenta 20 of the Dorians.

The Syracufians also, in the feuentieth yeare after their plantation, did fet up the mount who be-Citie of Acra, in the Mountaines; and in the ninetieth yeare Casmena, in the Playnes Leonium, at adjoyning; and againe, in the hundred and thirtieth years of their dwelling in length the Ro-Syracufe, they built Camerina; and soone after that, Enna, in the very Center of the maniconquered it vader Iland. So did the Cumani, about the same time, recover from the Siculi the Citie of the conduction Zancle, which they had founded in the streight betweene Sicil and Italie. They of Marcellat. of Zancle had beene founders of Himera.

Not long after this Doriaus the Lacedamonian built Heraclia; which the Phanicians, and Carthaginians, fearing the Neighbourhood of the Spartans, soone after in-30 naded and ruined, though the same were againe ere long re-edified.

Selinus also was built by a Colonie of Megara: and Zanele was taken by the Messenians; who having lost their owne Countrie, gaue the name thereof vnto this their new purchase. Such were the beginnings of the greatest Cities in this

t. 11.

Of the government and affaires of Sicil, before DIONYSIVS his Tyrannie.

The most part of the Cities in Sicil, were gouerned by the rule of the people, till furth time as Phalaris began to vsurpe the state of Agrigentum, and to exercise all manner of tyrannie therein.

This was that Phalaris, to whom Perillus, the cunning Artificer of a detellable Engine, gaue an hollow Bull of braffe, wherein to enclose men, and scortch them to death: praying the denice with this commendation; That the noise of one tor-50 mented therein, should bee like vnto the bellowing of a Bull. The Tyrant gaue a due reward to the Inventour; by causing the first triall to be made upon himselfe. Heeraigned one and thirtie yeares, faith Eulebrus; others give him but sixteene: Howfoeuer it were, one Telemachus, in the end, fell vpon him with the whole multitude of Agrigentum, and stoned him to death; being thereto animated by Zeno, euen whilest the T yrant was tormenting the same Zeno, to make him confesse fome matter of conspiracie.

After the death of Phalaris, the Citizens recovered their libertic, and enjoyed it long, till There vsurped the gouernement of the Common-wealcat which time alfo Panatius made himselfe Lord of Leontium; and Cleander, of Gela: but Cleander, hauing ruled seuen yeares, was slaine by one of the Citizens. Cleander being dead. his brother Hippocrates succeeded in his roome, and greatly afflicted the people of Naxos, of Zancle or Messena, and of Leontium; whom with divers other of the ancient inhabitants, he forced to acknowledge him their Lord. Hee also made warre with the Syracustans, and, in the end, got from them, by composition, the Citie of to Camerina. But when he had raigned scuen yeares, he was slaine in a battell against the Siculi, before Hybla.

At this time did the Syracusians change their forme of Gouernement, from Papular to Aristocraticall; a preparation towards a Principalitie, whereinto it was soone after changed. After the death of Hippocrates, Gelon (descended from the Rhodians. which together with the Cretans had long before, among other of the Greeks, feated themselves in Sicil) that had commanded the forces of Hippocrates, in the former warre, with notable successe, became Lord of Gela. Hee, after his Masters death. breaking the trust committed vnto him by Hippocrates over his children, and being in possession of Gela, took the occasion and advantage of a contention in Syracule, 29 betweene the Magistrates and the People. For comming with a strong Armic to the succour of the Gouernours, driven out by the multitude, they elected him their Prince, being the first, and (indeede) the most famous, that ever governed the Syrae culians. This change hapned in the second yeare of the threescore and twelfth olympiad; wherein the better to establish himselfe, he tooke to wife the Daughter of There, who had also viurped the state of Agrigentum.

Now this Gelon, the sonne of Dinomenes, had three brethren; Hiero, Polyzelus, and Thrafibulus: to the first of which hee gaue vp the Citic of Gela, when hee had obtayned the Principalitie of Syracuse. For, after that time, all his thoughts trauelled in the strengthning, beautifying, and amplifying of Syracuse. He defaced 30 Camerina, that a little before was fallen from the obedience of the Syraculians who built it, and brought the Citizens to Syracufe. The Megarians that had moued a warre against him, he ouer-came; the richer fort he brought to Syracu/e; and the people he fold for flaues. In like manner dealt he with other places upon like occafion. Not long after this, There, a Prince of the Agrigentines, having dispossest Terillus, of his Citie Himera; the Carthaginians were drawne into the quarrell by Anaxilus, Lord of Messena, Father-in-law to Terillus: and Gelon was also sollicited by his Father-in-law, Thero. Gelon was content, and in fine, after divers conflicts, the Carthaginians, and other Africans, led by Amilear, were ouerthrowne by Ge-Hered. & Died. lon: and an hundred and fiftie thousand of them left their bodies in Sicil.

This Gelon it was, to whom the Athenians and Lacedemonians sent for succour, when Xerxes with his huge Armic past the Hellespont. Hee, for their reliefe having armed thirtie thousand Souldiers, and two hundred ships, refused neuerthelesse to fend them into Greece, because they refused him the commandement of one of their Armies, either by Sea, or by Land. So he vsed to their Embassadors onely this faying, That their Spring was withered; accompting the Armic, by him prepared, to be the flower of the Greeke Nations.

The Carthaginians, after this great losse received, fearing the invasion of their owne Countrie, sent to Gelon by their Embassadors, to desire peace; who grants it them on these conditions; That from thenceforth they should not facrifice their 50 children to Saturne; That they should pay him two thousand talents of filuer; and present him with two armed ships, in signe of amitie. These conditions the Carthaginians, not only willingly accepted, but with the two thousands talents, and the ships for warre, they fent vnto Demarata; Gelon's wife, a crowne, valued at an hundred hundred talents of gold, with other presents. Whereby we see, that some Nations, and some Natures, are much the better for being well beaten. The warres ended; and Sicil in peace; Gelon beautified the Temples of the gods, and erected others in honour of them. So being exceedingly beloued and honoured of his Subjects, he left the World, and left for his Successour his brother Hiero. Philistus and Plinie report, That, when his body was burnt, according to the custome of that Age, a Dogge of his, which alwaies waited on him, ranne into the fire, and fuffered himfelfe to be burnt with him.

To Gelon, Hiero his brother succeeded, a man rude, cruell, couetous, and so su-10 spicious of his brethren Polyzelus, and Thrasybulus, as hee sought by all meanes to destroy them. Notwithstanding all this; by the conversation which hee had with Simonides, he became of better condition, and greatly delighted with the studie of good Arts. Divers quarrells he had, as well with Theron of Agrigentum, as with other Cities: all which he shortly after compounded, and gaue a notable ouerthrow to the Carthaginians, whom Nerves had incited to inuade Sicil, fearing the fuccours which Gelon had prepared, to aide the Gracians, against him. Hee also overthrew in battaile Thrasydaus, the sonne of Theron, and thereby restored the Agrigentines, to their former libertie. But in the end, hee lost the love of the Spracustans; and after he had raigned cleuen yeares, he left the Kingdome to his brother Thrasphulus, who 20 became a most vnjust and bloudie Tyrant. Thrasybulus enjoyed his Principalitie no longer then ten moneths. For, not with flanding the force of mercinarie Souldiers, which he entertained for his guards, he was beaten out of Syracufe by the Citizens; to whom, being besieged in Acradina, hee restored the gouernement, and was banished the Hand. From whence he sailed into Greece, where he died a private man, among the Locrians.

And now had the Syracusians recovered agains their former libertie, as all the rest of the Cities did, after which they had never fought, had the Successiours of Gelon inherited his vertue, as they did the Principalitie of Syracufe. For in all changes of Estates, the preservation ought to answere the acquisition. Where a 30 liberall, valiant, and aduited Prince, hath obtained any new Signiorie, and added it to that of his owne or exalted himselfe from being a private man, to the dignitie of a Prince; it behough the Successour to maintaine it by the same way and arte. by which it was gotten.

To conclude, Syracule (though not without blowes, ere shee could clense her felfe of the creatures and louers of Gelon) was now againe become Mistreise of her felfe, and held her felfe free, well-neare threefcore yeares, to the time of Dionysius; though the were in the meane while greatly endangered by a Citizen of her owne, called Tindario.

Now, to preuent the greatnesse of any one among them, for the future, they 40 deuised a kind of banishment of such among them, as were suspected; taking patterne from the Athenian Oftracifme. They called this their new denifed judgement of exile, Petalismus, wherein enery one wrote vpon an Oliue leafe (as at Athens they wrote vpon (hells) the name of him, whom hee would have expelled the Citie. Hee that had most suffrages against him, was banished for fine yeares. Hereby, in ashort time, it came to passe, that those of judgement, and best able to goueme the Common-weale, were by the worst able, either suppress, or thrust out of the Citie. Yea, such as feared this Law, though they had not yet felt it, withdrew themselues as secretly as they could; seeking some place of more securitie, wherein to maintaine themselues. And good reason they had so to does Jo feeing there is nothing so terrible in any State, as a powerfull and authorized ignorance. But this Law lasted not long. For their necessitie taught them to abolishit, and restore againe the wifer fort to the Gouernment; from which, the Nobilitie having practifed to banish one another, the State became altogether Popular. Butafter a while, being inuaded by Ducetius, King of the Sicilians, that inhabited the inner part of the Iland (who had alreadie taken Enna, and some other of the Grasian Cities, and ouerthrowne the Armie of the Agregentines) the Syracustans sent forces against him, commanded by an unworthy Citizen of theirs called Bolcon. This their Captaine made nothing fo much hafte to finde Ducetius, against whom he was imployed, as he did to flee from the Armie he led, as foone as Ducetius presented him battaile. So for want of conduct, the greatest number of the Syracusians perished.

But making better choice among those, whom they had banished, they leuie other troups: by whom, in conclusion, Ducetius being beaten, submitteth himfelfe, and is conftrained to leave the Iland for a time. Yet it was not long, ere hee to returned againe, and built the Citie Collatina on the Sea-side.

Ducetius being dead; all the Greeke Cities did in a fort acknowledge Syracufe: Trinacia excepted; which also by force of armes, in the four clove and fift Olympiad,

they brought to reason.

But they doe not long enjoy this their Superintendencie. For the Citizens of Leontium, being opprest by them, seeke aide from the Athenians, about the sixt yeare of the Peloponnesian Warre. In this suite they prevailed by the eloquence of Gorgias their Orator; and got an hundred Athenian Gallies to succour them, vnder the leading of Laches, and Charades. To this fleet, the Leontines, and their Partners, added one hundred more; with which forces, and with some supplies brought 20 by Sophocles, Pythodorus, Eurymedon, and other Athenian Captaines, they inuaded the Territories of the Syracusians, and their Partisans; wanne and lost divers places; tooke Meffana; and, in the feuenth yeare of the Peloponnefian Warre, loft it againe. They also at the same time, attempted Himera, but in vaine. The fire of this quarrell tooke hold vpon many Cities, which inuaded each others Territorie with great violence. But when they had weatied themselves on all hands, and yet could fee none issue of the warre; the Leontines, without the aduice of the Athenians, came to an accord with the Syracusians, and were admitted into their focietie, with equall freedome. So the Athenians, who hoped to have greatned themselves in Sicil, by the division and civill warre, were disappointed of their expectation, by 30 the good agreement of the Sicilians, and faine to bee gone with the broken remainder of their fleet. This they knew not how to amend; but (according to the custome of popular Estates) by taking reuenge vpon their owne Commanders. So they banilhed Pythodorus, and Sophocles, and layd an heavy fine vpon Eurymedon. Shortly after this, followed the most memorable Warre, that euer was made by the Greekes in Sicil: which was that of the Athenians, against the Selinuntines, and Syracusians, in fauour of the Cities of Egesta, Leontium, and Catana. They of Selinus had oppress the Egestans; and they of Syracuse, the Leontines, and the Catanians: which was the ground of the warre. For, the Athenians undertooke the protection of their old friends: And, in hatred of the Athenians, aide from Lacedamon was fent 40 to the Syracufians. The Lacedamonians dealt plainely, having none other end, than that which they pretended, namely, to helpe a people of their owne Tribe, that craued their succour, being in distresse. The Athenians scarce knew what to pretend : for their preparations were so great, as discouered their intent to be none other, then the conquest of the whole Iland. Yet they which had called them in, were so blinded with their owne passions, that they would not beleeue their owne eies; which presented vnto them a Fleet, and Armie, farre greater, than the terrible report of fame had made it.

In this expedition, the Citic of Athens had engaged all her power; as regarding, not only the greatnesse of the enterprise, but the necessitic of finishing it in a short 50 space of time. For the Lacedamonians (as hath alreadic beene shewed in due place) food at that time in such broken termes of peace with Athens, as differed not much from open warre. Wherefore it was thought necessarie, either to spare cost in this great expeditio, or altogether to forbear it: which was likely to be hindred by wars at home, if their proceedings were flacke abroad. And furely, had not the defire of the Athenians beene over-paffionate, the arguments of Nicias had caused them to abstaine from so chargeable a businesse, and to reserve their forces for a more needfull vie. But yong counsailes prevailed against the authoritie of ancient men, that were more regardfull of fafetie than of honour.

Of this businesse, mention hath beene alreadie made, in that which wee have written of the Peloponnesian warre. But what was there delivered in general termes, as not concerning the affaires of Greece, otherwise than by consequece; doth in this place require a more perfect relation, as a matter, wherein the whole State of Sicil 10 was like to have felt a great conversion.

Though Alcibiades had prevailed against Nicias, in exhorting the people to this great voiage; yet Nicias, together with Alcibiades, and Lamachus, was appointed to be one of the chiefe Commanders therein.

These had commission and direction, as well to succour the Segestans, and to reestablish the Leontines, cast out of their places by the Syracustans, as also, by force of armes, to subject the Syracusians, and all their adherents, in Sicil, and compell them by tribute, to acknowledge the Athenians for their fupreme Lords. To effect which, the fore-named Captaines were fent off, with an hundred and thirtie Gallies, and fluethousand one hundred Souldiers, besides the thirtie ships of burden, which 20 transported their victualls, engines, and other munitions for the warre: and these were Athenians, Mantineans, Rhodians, and Candians: there were, besides these, sixe thousand Megarians light armed, with thirtie horse-men.

With these troups and fleets they arrive at Rhegium, where the Rhegiums refuse to giuethem entrie; but sell them victualls for their monie. From thence they sent to the Egestans, to know what treasure they would contribute towards the warre, seeing for their sakes, they had entred thereinto. But they found by their answeres; that these Egestans were poore, and that they had abused the Athenian Embassadors with falle shewes of gold, having in all but thirtie talents. The Athenians further were discouraged, when they found that the Rhegians, their ancient friends, and 30 allied vnto the Leontines, refuled to trust them within their walls. Hereupon Nicias aduleth to depart towards the Selinantines, and to force them, or perswade them, to an agreement with the Egestans; as likewise to see what disbursements the Egeflans could make; and so to returne againe into Greece, and not to waste Athens in a needlesse warre. Alcibiades, on the other side, would sollicite the Cities of Sitil to confederacie against the Syracusians and Selinuntines, whereby to force them vnto restitution of all that they had taken from the Leontines. Lamachus, hee perswades them to affaile Syracuse it selfe, before it were prepared against them. But in the end (being excluded out of divers Cities) they surprize Catana: & there they take new counfaile, how to proceede. Thence they imploied Nicias to those of Egista, who 40 received from them thirtie talents towards his charges; and one hundred & twentie talents more there were of the spoiles they had gotten in the Iland. Thus, the Summer being spent in idle consultations, & vaine attempts, the Athenians prepare to affaile Syracufe. But Alcibiades having been caccused at home, in his absence, was sent for backe by the Athenians, to make his answere: and the Armie was left to the conduct of Nicias and Lamachus. These Commanders obtaine a landing place very neare vnto Syracuse, by this deuice.

They imploy to Syracuse an inhabitant of Catana, whom they trust; and instruct him, to promife vnto the Syracusans, that he would deliuer into their hands all the Athenians, within Catana. Hereupon the Syracusians draw thitherward with their 50 best forces. But in the meane while, the Athenians, setting faile from Catana, arrive at Syracuse, where they land at faire ease, and fortifie themselves against the Town. Shortly after this, they fight, and the Syracustans had the losse: but the Ashenians, wanting horse, could not pursue their victorie to any great effect. They then retire themselues, with a resolutio to refresh their Armie at Catana, for the winter-season.

From

From thence they made an attempt vpon Messana, hoping to have taken it by an intelligence, but in vaine. For Alcibiades had discouered such as were Traitors within the Citie to the Meffenians. This he now did, in despight of his owne Citizens. the Athenians; because they had recalled him from his command, with a purpose either to have put him to death, or to have banished him: whereof heing affured by his friends, he tooke his way towards the Lacedemonians, and to them hee gaue mischieuous counsaile against his countrey. While this winter yet lasted, the syracustans send Embassadours to Lacedamon, and Corinth, for aide: as likewise the Athenian Captaines in Sicil, fend to Athens, for Supplies. Which both the one and the other obtained.

In the Spring following (which was the beginning of the eighteenth years of the Pelopennesian warre) the Athenians in Sicil, faile from the Port of Catana, to Megara, for faken of the Inhabitants; from whence for raging the Countrie, they obtaine fome small victories over the straggling Syracusians: and at their returne to Catana, they receive a supply of two hundred men at armes, but without horse, which they hoped to furnish in the Iland, from the Segestans, and other their adherents: they were also strengthened with a companie of Archers and with three hundred talents in monie.

Hereupon they take courage, and incampe neere Stracule, vpon the banks of the great Port, repelling the Syracufians, that fallied to impeach their intrenchments, 20 They also received from their Confederates foure hundred horse-men, with two hudred other horse to mount their men at armes. Syracuse was now in effect blockt vp, fo as hardly any fuccours could enter, but fuch as were able to force their paffage: yet the Athenians receive divers loffes; among which it was not the leaft, that Lamachus, one of their best Commanders, was slaine.

In the meane while, Gylyppus, and Python, with the Lacedamonian, and Corinthian forces arrive, and take land at Hymera. The Citizens of Hymera, and of Gela, together with the Selinuntines, joyne with them; fo that with these and his own troups, Gylippus aductived to march over-land towards Syracufe. The Syracufians fend a part of their forces to meet him, and conduct him. The athenians prepare to en- 30 counter them, expecting his arrival neere vnto the Citie, vpon a place of aduantage. At the first encounter, they had the better of their enemies, by reason that the Syracusian horse-men could not come to sight in those streights: but soone after, Gylippus charging them againe, brake them, and constrained Nicios to sortifie himselfe within his Campe. Whereupon Aicias made the state of his affaires knowne, by his letters, to the Athenians; shewing, that, without great supplies by Sea and Land, the enterprise would be lost, together with the small Armie remaining. These letters receiued, the Athenians appoint two other Generalls, Eurymedon, and Demosthenes, to joyne with Wicias: the one they dispatch presently with some supply; the other they fend after him in the Spring following.

In the meane while, Gylyppus at Syracuse, fights with the Athenians, both by Sca and Land, fomtimes with ill, and at other times with good fuccesse: but in conclufion, he tooke from them their Fort, neere vnto Syracufe, at the Promontorie, called Plymmyrium; wherein the Athenians lost their treasure, and a great past of all their prouisions. Not with standing which losse, and that the Athenians themselves, in Greece, were (in effect) belieged within Athens, by the Lacedamonians; yet were they most obstinate in profecuting the Warre in Sicil, and dispatched away Demosthenes with new fuccours. Demosthenes, in his way towards Sicil, encountred with Polyan. the sthe Cornethian, with his fleete; both the Captaines being bound for Sicil; the one to succour Nicias; the other, Gylippus. The losse betweene them was in effect e- 50 quall; and neither so broken, but that each of them prosecuted the enterprise they had in hand. But before the fuccours arrived to either, Gylippus and Ariflon had affailed the Athenians in the great Port of Syracufe, and in a Sea-fight put them to the worst, to the great discouragement of the Athenians. On the neck of this, Demosthenes arrived with three-score and thirteene Gallies, charged with foot-men; and (blaming the flouth of Nicias) he inuaded the Syracufians, the same day that he arrived. But he made more halte, than he had good speede, being shamefully beaten. and repulfed with great loffe. Hercupon Demosthenes and Enrymedon, determine to rife vo from before Syracufe, and returne to the fuccour of Athens: but Nicias difputed to the contrarie, pretending that hee had good intelligence within Syracule. whereby he learned, that the Towne could not long hold out.

of the Historie of the World.

Whatfocuer Meias his intelligence was; vpon the arrivall of a new supply into the Towne, the Athenians had all confented to depart, and to lodge at Catana: had 10 not an Eclipse of the Moone, boding (as was thought) ill successe, caused them to deferre their departure. But this superstition cost them deare. For the Syracustans. Lacedamonians, and Corinthians, with three score and seventeene faile of Gallies, entred the great Port of Syracuse, wherein the Athenians kept their fleet, and whereon they had fortified themselves. The Athenians, in the same Portencountred them with fourescore and fixe Gallies, commanded by Eurymedon; in which the Athenian fleet was beaten, by the leffer number, and Eurymedon flaine. Now, though it were fo, that the Syracufians received the more losse by Land (for the fight was generall) yet when the Athenians were beaten by Sea, in which kinde they thought themselucs inuincible, they were wonderfully cast downe. For it was well said of Gylip-20 pus, to the Syracusians; When any people doe finde themselves vanquished in that manner of fight, and with those weapons, in which they perswade themselves that they exceede all others, they not only loofe their reputation, but their courage. The Athenians, belides the Gallies funck and wrackt, bad feuenteene taken, and poffest by the enemie: and with great labour and loife they defended the rest from being fired, having drawne them within a Palifado, in one corner of the Port, vnaduifedly: for it is as contrarie to a Sea-warre, to thrust ships into a streight roome and corner, as it is to scatter soot in a plaine field against horse; the one subsisting, by being at large; the other, by

CHAP. I.S.4. 7.3.

The Syracustans, having now weakned the Athenian fleet, resolve to imprison 30 them within the Port. And to that purpose they range all their Gallies in the mouth of the Hauen, being about a mile ouer, and there they came to Anchor; filling the Out-let with all manner of Veffels, which they man most strongly, because the Athenians, being now made desperate, should not with double ranks of Gallies breake through the Syracufian fleet; which lay but fingle, because they were forst torange themselves over all the Out-let of the Port. They therefore, not onely mored themselves strongly by their Anchors, but chained the sides of their Gallies together, and layd behinde them againe certaine ships, which served in the former warre for victuallers: to the end, that if any of their Gallies were funke; or the chaine, which joined them to their fellowes, broken; the Athenians might yet finde 40 themselues, a second time, intangled and arrested. To disorder also those Athenian Gallies, which came on in forme of a wedge, to breake through, and force a paffage, the Syracustans had left within these Gallies and Ships, inchained together, a certaine number of loofe ones, to stop their course and furie. For where the way of any vesfell, vling oare or failes, is broken, and their speede fore-flowed, they cannot force with any weight and violence, the relistance opposing. On the other fide, the Athenians knew that they were veterly loft except with an inuincible resolution, they could make their way, and breake downe this great bridge of boats; or (at least) force a passage through them in some part or other: which they resolue to hazard, with all their shipping (to the number of one hun-Jo dred and ten, of all forts) and with all the strength of their Land-armic, in them imbarqued. But the Gallies, which were within the bridge of boats, did fo diforder the Athenian fleet, ere they came to force the bridge, as, albeit some few of them had broken through the chaines, yet being flopt by the ships without, and affailed by

they were either taken or sunke. Three great disaduantages the Athenians had: the first, that fighting within a Hauen, and (as it were) in a streight, they had no roome to turne themselves, nor to free themselves one from another, being intangled; the fecond, that having ouer-peftered their Gallies with Souldiers, who vied offenfine armes of darts and flings, they had not place vpon the decks to firetch their armes: the third was, the discomfortable end for which they fought, namely, to force a paffage, by which they might faue themselues by running away. To be short, the fight was no lesse terrible than the confusion; the slaughter great on all sides; and the noise, and the cries, so lowd and lamentable, as that no direction could be heard. But in the end, the Athenians, as many as survived, were beaten back to the Land, 10 with loffe of threescore of their Gallies, broken, sunke, or abandoned. The Syracusians did also loose twentie of theirs, with Python, Commander of the Corinthians. The rest of the Athenian Gallies, running themselves into the bottome of the Port. faued themselves by the helpe and countenance of the Land-armie, there fortified. In this desperate estate, the Athenian Commanders goe to counsell. Demosthenes perswades them, to furnish with fresh Souldiers those few Gallies which remained: and while the Syracusians were triumphing, and made secure by their present victorie, to fet vpon them, and forcing their way out of the Port, to returne to Athens. This was no ill counfaile. For, as we have heard of many great Captaines (yea, the greatest number of all that have beene victorious) that have neglected the speedie 20 profecution of a beaten enemie; fo might we produce many examples of those, who, having flept fecurely in the bosome of good successe, have beene suddenly awaked, by the re-allied Companies of a broken Armic, and haue therby loft againe all the honour, and advantage, formerly gotten. But Nisias opposeth the advice of Demostheres: Others fay, that the Sea-men were against it. Whereupon abandoming their Gallies, they all refolue to march over land to the Cities of their Confederates, till some more fauourable fortune should call them thence. On the other fide, Gylippus, and other the Lacedamonian and Corinthian Captaines, with Hermocrates, exhort the Syracusians to put themselves presently into the field, and to stop all the passages, leading to those Cities of their enemies, to which the Alberians 30 might make retrait. But many were weary and many were wounded, and many of them thought that they had done enough for the present. Which humour in fome of our Commanders at Cadez, loft vs both the Indian fleet, and the spoiles of many other Neighbour-places. Hermocrates, the Syracusan, finding it a lost labour. to perswade his Countrimen to any hastie prosecution, deuised this good stratagem, thereby to gaine time; not doubting, but that after a day or two, hee should draw them willingly out. He fent two or three horse-men out of Syracuse by night, willing them to finde Nicias, and (after they had affured him, that they were of the Athenians faction) to give him advice not to march away over-hastily from the place, wherein he was fortified; alleaging that the Syracusians had lodged their Ar- 40 mie, which could not long flay there, vpon the passages & places of advantage, leading towards the Cities of their Allies. These tidings 2 icias easily beleeved, and put off his journie to the third day. For men newly beaten, are (for the most part) more fearefull than wife; and to them, every thiftle in the field, appeares, by night,

The third day (leaving all their Gallies, and all their baggage) they remove: being pierced and purfued with the lamentable out-cries of those that were sick and hurt: whom they abandon to the cure of their enemies fwords. The rest march away, to the number of fortie thousand; and make their first passage by force, ouer the Riner of Anapus, notwithstanding the opposition of their enemies. But being 50 euery day charged in their marches, & by the Syracusian horse-men, beaten in from forraging, and provision of foode, they grow weake and heartleffe. The Syraculians also possesse the Mountaine Lepas, by which they were to passe towards Camerima, and thereby force them to fall back agains towards the Sea coast, and to take what way they could: being vnable to proceede in their journey intended. Many hard shifts they made, in difficult passages, and blinde marches by night; which they were faine to endure, as having none other meanes to escape from the enemie that purfued them, and held them waking with continuall skirmilhing. To keepe all in order, Nicias vndcr-tooke the leading of the Vantgard; and Demosthenes conducted the Reare. At the River Erineus, Nicias takes the nart of a whole nights march, leaving Demosthenes to make the retrait : who being incompassed, and overprest with numbers, in the end renders himselfe. The conditions he obtained, were farre better than he could have hoped for ; and the faith of his enemies farre worfe to than he suspected. For he was afterward, with Micias, murdered in prison. The Armie of Demosthenes being diffolued, they pursue Nicias with the greater courage: who being vtterly broken, vpon the passage of the River Assnarus, rendred himfelfe to Gylippus, vpon honest conditions. Gylippus fought to preserve him. and to have had the honour, to have brought these two to Sparta; Wicias, as a noble enemie to the Lacedemonians, and who, at the ouerthrow, which they received at Pylus by the Athenians, had faued the lives of the vanquished; Demosthenes, as one that had done to Lacedemon the greatest hurt. Hermocrates also, the Commander of the Syracusan Armic, disswaded the rest, by all the arte he had, from vsing any barbarous violence, after so noble a victorie. But the cruell, and the cowardly fort, (co-20 wardise and crueltie, being inseparable passions) prevailed, and caused these braue

Captaines to be miserably murdered; one part of their Souldiers to bee starued in lothfome prisons; and the rest, fold for slaves. This was the successe of the Sicilian warre; which tooke end at the river Asmarus, the foure and twentieth day of May. in the four escore and eleuenth Olympiad.

The Athenians being beaten out of Sicil; the Egestans (for whose defence, against the Selinuntines, this late warre had beene taken in hand) fearing the victorious Sya raculians, sought helpe from the Carthaginians; to whom they offered themselues. and their Citie, as their Vassals. The Carthaginians, though ambitious enough of enlarging their Dominion in Sicil, yet considering the prosperitie of the Syracustans, 30 and their late victories ouer the Athenians, they staied a while to dispute of the matter, whether they should refuse, or accept, the offer made vnto them: for the Selinuntines were streightly allied to the Syracusians, as may appeare by what is past. In the end, the Senators of Carthage resolue vpon the enterprise; and (by a trick of their Punick wit) to separate the Syracusians from the Selinuntines, they send Embaffadours to Syracuse: praying that Citie, as in the behalfe of the Egestans, to compell the Selinuntines to take reason, and to rest content with so much of the lands in question, as they of Syracuse should thinke meet to allow them. The Syracustans approved the motion; for it tended to their owne honour. But the Selinuntines would make no fuch appointment: rather they tooke it ill, that the Syracufians.

40 with whom they had run one course of fortune, in the Athenian war, should offer to trouble them, by interpoling as Arbitrators, in a bulines, that themselves could end by force. This was right as the Carthaginians would haue it. For now could they of Selinus with an ill grace craue aide of Syracuse; and the Syracusians as ill grant it vnto those, that had refused to stand to the Arbitrement, which the Carthaginians would have put into their hands. Hercupon, an Armie of three hundred thousand men is fet out from Carthage, vnder the conduct of Hannihal, Nephew to that Amilcar, who (as you have heard before) was overthrowne with the great Carthaginian Armie at Himera by Gelon. Hannibal was exceeding greedy of this imploiment, that he might take reuenge, as well of his Vncles, as of his Fathers death; the one of

50 them having beene staine by the Himerans; the other by those of Selinus. Both these Cities, Hannibal, in this warre, wonne by force of armes, sackt them, and burnt them; and having taken three thousand of the Himerans prisoners, he caused them to be led vnto the place, where Amilear was flaine, and buried them there.

After this followed some trouble at Syracuse, occasioned by the banishment of Hermocrates. Hermocrates, who had lately beene Generall of the Syracusian forces, against the Atherium. The malice of his enemies had so farre prevailed with the ingratefull must trude, that he was condemned to exile for his mere vertue, as fuch time, as he was aiding the Lacedemonians, in their warre against Atherns; wherein hee did great seruice. All the honester fort within Syracusia were sorie for the injurie done vnto him, and sought to have him repealed. Hermocrates himselfer, returning into Sichigathered an Armie of fixe thousand; with which he beganne to repaire Selimus; and by many noble actions laboured to winne the loue of his Citizens. But the faction that opposed him was the stronger. Wherefore, he was adulised to seize upon a Gate of Syracuse, with some strength of men; whereby his friends, within the Towne, might to have the better meanes to rise against the adverse partie. This he did: but presently the multitude sell to armes, and set upon him; in which consist hee was slaine. But his sonne-in-law, Dionysus, shall make them with Hermocrates alive againe.

Of Diony sivs the Tyrant: and others, following him, in Syracuf.

The Syracusians had enjoyed their libertic about threescore yeares, from the death of Thrasspalut, to the death of Itermocrates: at which time Dianysus was raised up by God, to take reuenge, as well of their crueltic towards strangers, as of their ingratitude towards their owne best Citizens. For before the time of Dianysius, they had made it their pastime, to reward the vertue of their worthiest Commanders with death, or disgrace: which custome they must now bee taught to amend

Dionysius obtained the Principalitie of Syracuse, by the same degrees, that many others, before him, had made themselues Masters of other Cities, and of Syracuse it felfe. For, being made Prator, and commanding their Armies against the Carthagi- 20 mians, and other their enemies, he behaued himselfe so well, that he got a generall loue among the people, and men of warr. Then begannehe to follow the example of Pilistratus, that made himselfe Lord of Athens; obtaining a band of fixe hundred men, to defend his person: vnder pretence, that his private enemies, being traiteroully affected to the State of Syracuse, had laied plots how to murder him, because of his good services. He doubled the pay of the Souldiers; alledging, that it would encourage them to fight manfully : but intending thereby to affure them to himselfe. He perswaded the Citizens, to call home, out of exile, those that had beene banished, which were the best men of Syracuse; and these were afterwards at his denotion, as obliged vnto him by so great a benefit. His first fauour, among 40 the Syracufians, grew from his acculation of the principall men. It is the delight of base peopleto raigne ouer their betters: wherefore, gladly did hee helpe them to breake downe, as fetters imprisoning their libertie, the barres that held it under safe custodie. Long it was not, ere the chiefe Citizens had found whereat hee aimed. But what they faw, the people would not fee: and fome that were needic, and knew not how to get Offices without his helpe, were willing to helpe him, though they knew his purposes to be such, as would make all the Citie to smart. He began early to huntafter the tyrannie; being but fine and twentie yeares of age when he obtained it: belike, it was his defire to raigne long. His first worke, of making himselfe absolute Lord in Syracuse, was, the possession of the Citadell; wherein was 50 much good prouision, and vnder it the Gallies were mored. This hee obtained by allowance of the people; and having obtained this, he cared for no more, but declared himselfe without all shame or feare; The Armie, the chiefe Citizens, restored by him from banishment; all the needie fort within Syracuse, that could not thrine by honest courses; and some neighbour-townes, bound vnto him, either for his helpe in warre, or for his establishing the faction, raigning at that present, were wholly affected to his affistance. Having therefore gotten the Citadell into his hands, he needed no more, saue to affire what hee had alreadie. Hee strengthned himselfe by diuers marriages; taking first to wife the daughter of Hermocrates; and after her, two at once; the one a Locrian, Doris, by whom he had Dionysius, his Successor; the other, Aristomache, the daughter of Hipparimus, and sister to Dion, honourable men in Syracuse, which bare vnto him many children, that serued to sortifie him with new alliances.

Yet it was not long, ere some of the Syracustans (enuying his prosperitie) incited the multitude, and tooke armes against him, even in the noveltie of his Rule. But their enterptife was more passionately, than wisely governed. He had shamefully been beaten by the Carthaginians at Gela: which, as it vexed the Sicilian men at armes, making them suffect that it was his purpose to let the Carthaginians wasteall, that hee might afterwards take possession of the desolate places 4 so it inflamed them with a delire to free themselues from his tyrannie. They departed therefore from him, and marched hastily to Syrasuse, where they found friends to helpe them: there they forced his Palace, ransaked his treasures, and so shamefully abused his wise, that for the griefe thereof shee poisoned her selfe. But hee followed their heeles a 20 pace; and firing a Gate of the Citic by night, entred foone enough to take reuenge, by making a speedie riddance of them. For he spared none of his knowne, no, not of his suspected enemies. After that, he grew so doubtfull of his life, as he never durst trust Barber to trim him, nor any person, no, not so much as his brother, to enter into his chamber, vnstript and searched. He was the greatest Robber of the people, that ever raigned in any State; and withall the most vnrespectively cruell.

After this, he separated with fortification that part of the Citie, called the lland, from the rest; like as the Spaniard did the Citadell of Antwerpe: therein he lodged his treasures, and his Guards.

He then beganne to make warre vpon the free Cities of Sieil: but while hee lay 30 before Herbeffe, an in-land Towne, the Syracustans rebelled against him; fo, as with great difficultie hee recouered his Citadell: from whence, having allured the old Souldiers of the Campanians, who forced their passage through the Citie, with one thousand and two hundred horse, hee againe recouered the masterie over the Syracustans. And when a multitude of them were bused in gathering in their Haruest, hedisarmed all the Townes-men remayning; and new strengthned the Fort of the Iland, with a double wall. He inclosed that part also, called Epipoles; which, with threescore thousand labourers, hee finished in three weekes; being two leagues in compasse. He then built two hundred new Gallies, and repaired one hundred and ten of the old; forged one hundred and fortie thousand Targets, with as many

40 fwords, and head-peeces, with fourteene thousand corflets, and all other sutable armes. Which done, he sent word to the Carthaginians, (greatly enseebled by the plague) That except they would abandon the Greeke Townes, which they held in Sitil, he would make warre upon them: and, not staying for answere, he tooke the spoile of all the Phemissan Ships, and merchandize, within his Ports; as King Philip the second did of our English, before the warre in our late Queenes time. He then goes to the field with sourescore thousand foot, and three thousand horse, and sends his brother Leptines to sea, with twohundred Gallies, and sue hundred ships of burden. Most of the Townes which held for Carthage yeelded unto him; saving Panormus, Segesta or Egesta, Aneyra, Motya, and Entella, Of the Se, he sirk wonne Motya yo by affault, and put all therein to the fword; but before Egesta hee lost a great part of his Armie, by a sallie of the Citizens. In the meane while Himileo arrives; but, ere he tooke land, he lost in a fight at Sea, with Leptines, fiftie ships of warre, and fine thousand Souldiers, besides many ships of burden. This notwithstanding, heerecoured againe Morya vpon his sirst descent. From thence marching towards Message in the same part of t

jenn,

Sena, he tooke Lypara, and (soone after) Messena, and rased it to the ground. Now beganne Dionylus greatly to doubt his estate. Hee therefore fortified all the places hee could, in the Territorie of the Leontines, by which hee supposed that Himileo would paffe toward Syracuse; and he himselfe tooke the field againe, with four and thirtie thousand foot, and one thousand horse. Now, hearing that Himileo had dinided his Armie into two parts, marching with the one halfe ouer land, and sending Mago with the other by Sca: he fent Leptines, his brother, to encounter Mago. But Leptines was vtterly beaten by the Carthaginians; twentie thousand of his men were flaine, and an hundred of his Gallies lost. It is very strange, and hardly credible, which yet good Authours tell vs; That one Citie should be able to fur- 10 nish fiue hundred saile of ships, and two hundred Gallies: (for, so many did Stracuse arme in this warre) and more strange it is, that in a battaile at Sea, without any great Artilleric, or Musket-shot, twentie thousand should be slaine in one fight. In all our fights against the Turkes, of which that at Lepanto was the most notable, we heare of no such number lost; nor in any other fight by Sea, that euer hapned in our age, nor before vs. When Charles the fift went to beliege Algier, hee had in all his fleet, transporters and others, but two hundred and fittie faile of flaips, and threescore and fine Gallies: for the furnishing of which fleet, he sought helpe from all the Cities and Ports of Spaine, Naples, and the rest of Italie. But in old times it was the manner to carrie into the field, vpon extremitie, as many as were needfull, 20 of all that could beare armes, giving them little wages, or other allowance: in our daies it is not fo; neither indeede, is it often requifite. Vpon this ouerthrow, Diony sus postes away to Syracuse, to strengthen it: Himileo followes him, and besiegeth the Towne by Land and Sea. But the Tyrant, having received aide from the Lacedamonians, under the conduct of Pharacidas, puts himselfe to Sea, to make pronision for his Citizens: who, in his absence, take twenty of the Carthaginian Gallies, and finke foure. Hereupon, finding their owne successe prosperous, and that of the Tyrant exceeding ill; having also at the present weapons in their hands; they confult how to recouer their libertic. And this they had done, had not Pharacidas the Lacedamonian resisted them. It also fell out, to his exceeding advantage, that the 30 plague was so increased, and so violent, among the Carthaginians; as it is said, that aboue an hundred thousand of them died thereof. Hee therefore, with the power that he could gather together, sets upon them both by Sea and Land; and having flaine great numbers of them, forceth Himileo to defire peace. This peace Dionyfius fold him for a great summe of monie; on condition that he should seale away with his Carthaginians only: which he basely accepted, betraying the rest of the Africans and Spaniards. Yet no faith was kept with him : for he was purfued, and left many of his Carthaginians behinde him. The rest of the Africans fell under the swords of their enemies; only the Spaniards, after they had a while brauely defended themsclues, were (after their submission) entertained, and served the Conquerour.

Many fuch examples of perfidious dealing haue I noted in other places, and can hardly forbeare to deliuer vnto memorie the like practifes, when they meete with their matches: That which hapned vnto Monstern delives, was very furable to this treacherie, wherewith Dienystus pursued Himileo. I was prefent, when De Pieterelated the injurie done vnto him. He had rendered St. John d'. Angelie, to the French King Charles the ninth, who belieged him therein. Hee rendred it, vpon promise made by the faith of a King, that he should be suffered to depart in safetie, with all his followers. Yet in presence of the King himselfe, of the Duke of Anies his brother, Generall of his Armie, of the Queene Mother, and of diuers Dukes and Marshalls of France, he was set ypon, and broken in his march, spoiled of all that he had; 30 and forced to saue his life by slight, leauing the most of his Souldiers dead ypon the place: the Kings hand and saith, warranting him to march away with ensignes displaid, and with all his goods and proussions, no whit auailing him. It needes not therefore seeme strange, that an Heathen Tyrant should thus break his faith, fince

Kings, profeffing Christianitie, are bold to doe the like, or command their Captaines to doe it for them.

Dianyfius, after this great victorie, tooke care to re-edifie Meffena. Mago, who finied in Sicil, to hold up the Carthagnians therein, is againe beaten by Dionyfius; who is also beaten by the Tauramenians. A new fupply of fourescore thousand Souldiers is sent from Carthage to Mago; but they take egges for their monie, and make peace with Dianyfius, leaving the Sicilians in Tauramenium, to shift for themselves whom Dianyfius, after a long siege, ouer-came, and gaue their Citie to his mercinaria Souldiers.

He then past into Italie, obtained divers victories there, brought the Rhegians on their knees, forced them to pay him one hundred & fourescore thousand crownes, to furnish him with threescore Gallies, and to put in an hundred pledges, for assurance of their future observance of covenants. This he did, not with any purpose to performe vnto them the peace that they had so dearely bought; but that having taken from them their Gallies, he might be fiege them, and ruine them wtterly, with the more case. Now to the ende hee might not, without some colour, salssife the faith that hee had given to them, he pretended to want victual for his Armie, at such time as hee seemed ready to depart out of Italie, and sent to them to surnish him the rewith 3 promising to returne them the like quantitie, at his comming 20 home to Strause.

Hisrefolution was, that if they refused to furnish him, hee would then make their refusall the cause of his quarrell: if they yeelded to aide him with the proportion which he desired, that then they should not be able, for want of food, to endure a lege any long time against him. For to ruine them hee had fully determined, at what price soeuer. And great reason he had to take reuenge of them, if he had done it fairely, and without breach of faith. For when in the beginning of hisraigne, he desired them to bestow a daughter of some of their Nobilitie vpon him, for a wise: they answered, That they had not any one fit for him, saue the Hang-mans daughter. Princes doerather pardon ill deedes, than villanous words.

30 Mexander the Great forgaue many sharpe swords, but neuer any sharpe tongues, no, though they told him but truely of his errours. And certainely, it belongs to those that haue warrant from God, to reprehend Princes: and to none else, especially in publique.

It is said, that Henrie the sourth of France, had his heart more inflamed against the Duke of Biron, for his ouer-bold and biting taunts, that hee vsed against him before Amieus, than for his conspiracie with the Spaniard, or Sanoyan: for he had pardoned tenne thousand of such as had gone farther, and drawne their swords against him. The contemptuous words that Sir Iohn Parted of our late Queene Elizabeth, were his ruine; and not the counterfair electro of the Romish Priest, produced against him. So sared it with some other, greater than hee, that thereby ranne the same, and a worse fortune, soone

To bee short, hee made them know new bread from old. Hee assaulted their Towns on al sides, which he continued to doe cleuen moneths, till he wonne it by force. He vsed his victorie without mercie; specially against Phyton, who had commanded within it.

Some other warres hee made with the Carthaginians, after the taking and rafing of this Citie; and thole with variable fuecesse. For as in one encounter hee slue Maga, with ten thousand Africans: so the some of Maga beat him, and so slue his brother Leptines, with sourceteene thousand of his Souldiers. After which hee bought his peace of the Carthaginians, as they had formerly done of him;
following therein the aduice of Prosperitie and Aducrstite, as all Kings and States doe.

When he had raigned eight and thirtie yeeres, he died: some say, in his bedde, peaceably; which is the most likely, though others report it otherwise. A cruell man he was, and a saithlesse; a great Poet, but a soolish one. He entertained Plato a while, but afterward, for speaking against his tyrannie, bee gaue order to have him slaine, or fold for a slaue. For he could endure no man, that flattered him not beyond measure. His Parasites therefore stiled his crueltie, The bate of easil men; and his laws less laughters, The variants and effects of his inslice. True it is, that statterers are a kinde of vermine, which poison all the Princes of the World; and yet they prosper better than the worthiest and valiantest men doe: and I wonder not at it; for it is a world: and as our Sauiour Christ stath told vs, The World willlose to world.

To this Dionyssus, his sonne of the same name succeeded; and inherited both his Kingdome, and his Vices. To winne the loue of the People, he pardoned, and released out of prison, a great number of persons, by his Father lockt vp, and condemned. Withall, hee remitted vnto his Citizens diuers payments, by his Father imposed vpon them. Which done, and thereby hoping, that hee had fastned vnto him selfe the peoples affections; he cash off the Sheepes shine, and put on that of the Woolse. For being jealous of his owne Brethren, as men of more vertue than himselfe, he caused them all to bee slaine; and all the Kindred that they had by their Mothers side. For Dionysius his Father (as hath beene said) had two Wines; 10 Doris of Loeris; and Arysomache a Syracusian, the sister of Dion, which Brother-inlay of his he greatly enriched.

By Doris hee had this Dienysius, who succeeded vnto him: and by Aristomache he had two Sonnes and two Daughters; of which the elder, called Sophrossyne, he gaue in marriage to his eldest Sonne, and her halfe brother, Dienysius; the yonger, called Arets, he bestowed on his Brother Theorides: after whose death, Dien tooke her to Wife, being his Neece.

This Dion, a just, and valiant man, finding that Dionysius had abandoned all exercife of vertue, and that hee was wholly given over to fenfualitie, prevailed fo much with Plate, whose Disciple he had beene, as he drew him into Sicil, to instruct 30 the youg King. And having perswaded the King to entertaine him, hee wrought fo well with him, as Diony lius beganne to change condition; to change Tyrannie, into Monarchie; and to hold the Principalitie, that he had, rather by the lone of his People, and his Nationall Lawes, than by the violence of his Guards and Garrifons. But this goodnesse of his lasted not long. For Philistus the Historian, and other his Paralites, that hated Dions scucritic, wrought him out of the Tyrants fauour; and caused him soone after to be banished out of Sicil, to the great griefe of the whole Nation. For whereas Dion had made offer to the King, either to compound the quarrels between him and the Carthaginians, of whom Dionylius flood in great feare, or (at least) if they refused it, to furnish him with fiftie Gal- 40 lies at his owne charge, during the warre against them : his enemies found meanes, by finister interpretation, to convert his good will into matter of treason. They told Dionysius, that al the great commendations, given of Plate, had tended to none other end, then to foften his minde, and to make him neglect his owne affaires, by the studie of Philosophie; whilest Dion, in the meane time having furnished fiftie Gallies, vnder colour of the Kings feruice, had it in his ownepower, either to deliuer to the Syracusians their former liberty, or to make himself Lord and Soueraigne of their State.

It is likely, that the honest and liberall offer which hee made, to serve the King with so great a preparation, at his owne charge, begot him many enemies. For 50 they that had served the King for none other ende, than to raise and entich them selves, and had already been eraised and entiched, though them selves bound to make the same offer, that Dion had made, if the King had had the grace to con-

cciue itaright. Butthese couetous and ignorant cowards, that had neither the knowledge, nor the daring, that Dion had, were bold to file his Lone and Liberalitie, Pride and Presumption; and heartned the yong King, in his oppressing, and eating vp his owne people, of whose spoiles they themseliues shared no small portion. I have heard it, That when Charles the fift had the repulse at Assier in Africa, Ferdinando Cortes, one of the brauest men that euer Spaine brought forth, offered vnto the Emperour, to continue the siege at his owne charge. But he had neuer good day after it. For they that enuied his victories, and his conquest of Mexico in the west Indies, persevaded the Emperour, that Cortes sought to value himselfe aboue hims and to to have it faid, That what the Emperour could not, Cortes had essected, and was therefore more worthy of the Empire, than be that had it.

When Dion was newly banished, the Tyrant was contented, at first, to send him the reuencews of his Lands, and permit him to dispose of his moueables, at his own pleasure: not without giuing hope, to recall him in short time. Had he continued in this good moode, like enought it is, that Dion would have beene well pleased to live well, as he did, at Athens. But after sometime, Dionysus made Port-sale of this Noble-mans goods; and thereby vrged him to take another course; cuent to seek the restriction of his Countrie to libertie. The vertues of Dion, especially his great liberalitie, had purchased much love in Greece. This love made him suspected and 20 hated of the Tyrant: but it sood him in good stead, when he sought to raise men, with whose helpe he might returne into Sieil. Ye the got not aboue eight hundred (for hee caried the matter closely) to follow him in this adventure. But many of them were men of quality, and fit to be Leaders. Neither did he doubt of finding in Synause, as many as should be needfull, that would readily affish him. Therefore he landed boldly in Sieil; marched to Synause; entred the Citie without resistance; armed the multitude; and wonne all, sauc the Citadess.

Dionysius was then absent in Italie; but hee quickely had aduertisement of this dangerous accident. Wherefore hee returned hashily to Syraus : whence, after many vaine treaties of peace, and some forceable attempts to recouer the Towne,

- 30 hewas faine to depart; leauing yet the Castle to the custodie of Apollocrates, his eldes one. Yet ere he went, his Minion Philissus, comming with a strength of men to assist him, was beaten, taken, and put to death by torment. But Dion, for the recourse of his Countries libertie, had the same reward, that all worthy men haue had from popular Estates. He was disgraced, assaulted, and forced to abandon the Citie. Hee retired himselfe to the Leontines, who receive him with greatioy. Soone after his departure from Syrassie, new troups enter the Castle: they sallie out, assaile, spoile, and burne a great part of the Citie. Dions is ent for, with humble request: yet, ere hee could arrive, Dions/sus its Souldiers were retired; and the Townessen, thinking themselves secure, shut the gates against Dion. But the pext
- 40 night they of the Caitle fallie againe, with greater forie then euer; they kill Man, Woman, and Child, and fet fire in all parts of the Towne. In this their extremitie Dion comes the fecond time to their fuccour; the love of his Countrie furmounting all the injuries that he had received. Hee fets you the Garrison of the Cassle, with the one part of his Armie; and quencheth the fire, every-where kindled, with the other part. In conclusion, after he had conquered both the fire and the sword, that had well-neere burnt to assess, and depopulated Synausse, after Dionysius his Father, into Italie. But their malice, of whom he had best descruted, and whom he had loud most, gaue an vntimely ende to his dayes. For he was soone after this 50 his victorie, murdered by Caspppus; who, after he had, with ill success, a while go-

50 his victorie, murdered by Calppus; who, after he had, with ill fuccette, a whitegouerned Syracuse, was flaine with the same Dagger, with which hee had murdered Dion.

Ten yeeres after the death of Dion, Dionyfus, with the affittance of his friends in Italie, recorders his estate, and returnes to Syracufe, driving Nyfaus thence, whom he Fffff 2 found found Gouernour therein. The better fort of the Citizens, fearing, more then euer, his crueltie, flee to Ietets, a Syracusan borne, and then ruling the Leontines. I eetet enters into confederacie with the Carthaginians, hoping by their affiltance, not onely to prevaile againft Dionysius; but by the hatred of the Syracusians towards Dionysius, to make him also Lord of their Citie. The Syracusians, being descruingly affilted on all sides, send to the Corinthians for succour. Ietets also lends thither, and dissipant descriptions, as well as he can, from intermeddling in the businesses, who were so through the had entred into league with the Carthaginians, who were so through by Sea, that it was not in the power of Corinth, to land any Armic in Sicil. But the Corinthians, being by this treason of Ietes, to more inraged then distinated, sent Timoleon with nineteene Gallies, to deliver syracuse from tyrannie. In the meane while, Ietets had entred Syracuse, and with the helpe of the Carthaginians, driven Dionysus into the Castle, where hee besteged

Icetes, being himselse a Tyrant in Leontium, rather sought how to enlarge his power, than, how to deliuer his Countrie. Therefore, hearing that Timoleon was arriued at Rhegium, he sent to perlwade him, to returne his sleet; for that all things were (in effect) established in Sieil. The Carthaginian Gallies were also in the same Portof Rhegium; whose Captaines aduised Timoleon, to get him gone in peace. They had farre more Gallies there, then he had, and were like to compell him, if 20 he would not be perswaded. Timoleon, sinding himselse ouer-mastered, makes request to the Carthaginian Captaines, that they would be pleased to enter into Rhegium, and there, in an open assembly of the people, to deliuer vnto him those arguments, for his returne, which they had vied to him in private; that he might, by publique testimonie, discharge himselse to the Senate of Corinth.

The Cartbaginians, perswading themselves, that a victorie, obtayned by a sew faire words, was without loffe, and farre more casie, than that of many blowes and wounds, yeelded to Timoleons desire. But while the Orations were deliuering, Timoleon, fauoured by the Rhegians, stole out of the presse; and having set saile, before the Gates were opened to the Carthaginians, he recovered the Port of Tauromenium, 30 where he was joyfully received by Andromachus the Governour. From thence he marched toward Adranum, were surpising Icetes his Armie, hee slue a part thereof, and put the rest to runne. It is the nature of victorie to beget friends. The Advantansion yned with him; and so did Mamercus, the Tyrant of Catana. Dionyfins also sent to Timoleon, offering to surrender the Castle of Syracuse into his hands, as thinking it better to yeeld up himfelf, and the places which he could not defend, vnto the Corinthians, than either to Icetes, whom he disdained, or to the Carthaginians, whom he hated. Now Timeleon, who within fiftie daies, after his arrivall, had recovered the Castle of Syracuse, and sent Dionysius to Corinth, to live there a private man, was fill inuaded by the Armies, and molested by the practices of Icetes. For 40 he belieged the Corinthians within the Castle of Syracuse, and attempted but in vaine) the murder of Timolcon.

The Covinthians fend vnto Timoleon a fupply of two thousand stops, and two hundred horse, which are staid in Italie by soule weather. Iteresis strengthned with threescore thousand Africans, brought vnto him by Mago (all which he lodgeth within Syraense) and vith an hundred and siftie Gallies, to keepe the Port. This was the sirst time, that cuer the Carthaginians had dominion within the walls of that Citie. With this great Armic, Iteresas all whether the Castle. Timoleon sends them victualls, and succour, in small boats, by night, from Catana. Mago and Iteres doe therefore resolve to besiege Catana; but they were no sooner on their way rowards 50 it, with part of their forces, than Leon, Captaine of the Corinthians, sallied out of the Castle, and tooke that part of Syraense, called Aerasina, which he fortised.

In the meane while, the two thousand Corinthians arriue: with whom, and two thousand other Souldiers, Timbleon marchetin towards Syracuse. Mago abandoneth Icetes, Icetes, being frighted out of Sicil (which he might easily haue conquered) with an idle rumour of treason. This made him returne to Carthage; where the generall exclamation against his cowardize, did so much affright him, that for scare of sarther punishment, he hanged himselfe. Timoleon enters the Citie, and beats downe the Castle (which he called the nest of Tyrants) to the ground. But he found the Citie when the strangers were sted, in effect desolate; so as their horses did seede on the grassife, growing in the market-place. Therefore, he writes to Corinth, for peopleto re-inhabite it. Tenthousand are sent out of Greece; many come from Italie; others, from other parts of the Iland.

But a new storme arifeth. Afdrubal and Amilear, Carthaginians, arrive about Lilybaum, with threescore and ten thousand Souldiers, transported (with all their prouitions) in a thousand ships of burden, and two hundred Gallies. Timoleon marcheth thither, and chargeth this great Armie vpon the passage of a River.

A tempest of raine, haile, and lightning, with boysterous windes, beating vponthe faces of the Carthaginians, they are vetterly broken: ten thousand slain; fine thousand that their carriages and prouisions: among which there were found athonsand corflets, gilt, and grauen. After this Timoleon, gaue an ouerthrowe to steets, and following his victorie, tooke him, with his sonne Eupoleoms, and the Ge. Flat, invitation, nerall of his horse, prisoners, whom he caused all to be slaine: and afterwards (which 20 was imputed to him for great crueltie)he fuffered Icetes his wives and daughters to be put to death. But this was the reuenge of God vpon Icetes, who (after the murder of Dion) had caused Arete, Dions wife and a yong child of his, with Aristomache his filter, to to be call into the Sea.

He againe prevailed against Mamercus, Tyrant of Catana, and wonne Catana it selfe. Mamercus fled to Lippon Tyrant of Messen: but Timeten, pursuing him, wonne the towne; deliucring Hippon, to his Citizens, who tormented him to death, The same end had Mamercus, and all other, the Tyrants in Sicil.

Finally, he made peace with the Carthaginians, on condition, That they should nor passe the River of Lycas. After this, he lived in great honour among the Syra-30 cassas, till his death; and was solemnely buried by them in the market-place of their Citie: the day of his Funeralls, being for ever ordained to bee kept holy among them.

After fuch time, as Timoleon had deliuered Syracuse, from the tyrannie of Dionyfus, and brought peace to the whole Iland; the inhabitants enjoyed their libertie inpeace, about twentie yeeres. The Cities and Temples were repaired; the Trade renewed; the Merchant failed in fafetie; and the Labouring man enjoyed the fruits of the earth in quiet. But it was impossible that a Nation which neither knew how to gouerne, nor how to obey, which could neither endure Kings, nor men worthie to be Kings, to gouerne them; should any long time substit.

Twentie yeares after the death of Timoleon, there flatted vp an Agathaelei among them, a man of base birth, and of baser condition; who from a Begger, to common Souldier; from a Souldier to a Captaine; and so from degree to degree, rifing to bee a Prator; finally became Lord and Soueraigne of the Syranafans.
Many fortunes he ranne, and vnder-went as many dangers, ere hee obtained the Principalitie. For he had more than once attempted it, and was therein both beaten and banisht. A passing valiant man he was, and did notable service, as well for those by whom he was imploited, as also for the Syranafans, and against them. For in their warres against those of Enna, and the Campane, he did them memorable serwice and on the contrarie, as memorable service for the Margantines, against the Sy-

50 recufians. For being entertained by the people of Murgantia, and made Generall of their forces, he fackt Leontium; and belieged Synaufe to Artightly, that the Citizens were driven to crave aide, even from their ancient and naturall enemies, the Cartbagnians. Amilear was fent by the Cartbagnians, to relieve Synaufe. With him Agaibacles wrought fo well, that he got him to make peace betweene him Telfe and the Syracustans; binding himselfe by promise and oath, to remaine a friend and seruant to the state of Carthage, for euer after. Amilear entertained the businesse, and compounded the quarrels betweene Agathoeles, and the Syracusians. Agathoeles is chosen Prator; he entertaines five thousand Africans, and divers old Souldiers of the Murgantines, under colour of a purpose to besiege Herbita. With these, and with the affiltance of the poore and discontented Syracusians (the Citie being also divided into many factions) he affailes the Senators, kills all his enemics and oppolites; divides the spoile of the rich, among the poore; and gives libertie to his Souldiers, to robbe, to rauish, and to murder, for two whole dayes and nights, without controlment: the third day, when they had blunted their barbarous appc- 10 tites, and strewed the streets with ten thousand dead carkasses, besides those that had broken their necks ouer the walls; their furie had no further subject to worke on.

deathocles, in an affembly of the people (being an eloquent knaue) perswaded them, that, for the violent ficknesse, by which the common-wealth was vtterly confumed, he found no better, than the violet remedies, which he had administred; & that he affected no other thing, than the reducing of the state from an Oligarchie, or the rule of a few tyrannous Magistrates, to the ancient & indifferent Democratie, by which it had been gouerned, from the first institution, with so great glorie and prosperitie. This he did, to have the crowne clapt on his head (as it were) per- 20 force. For as hee knew, that hee had left none living, within the Citie, fit, nor able, to exercise the office of a Magistrate: so knew he right well, that all they which had affilted, in the murder and spoile of their fellow-Citizens, had no other hope of defence, then the support of a lawlesse Lord, who had beene partaker with them, in their villanies and cruelties committed. So as this Rabble, his Oration ended, proclaimed him King : againe and againe, faluting, and adoring him, by that name, as if it had beene given to him by some lawfull election. Hence had our King Richard the third a peece of his patterne; but the one was of base; the other, of Kingly parents; the one tooke libertie from a Common-weale; the other fought only to succeede in a Monarchie; the one continued his cruelty to the end; the o- 30 ther, after he had obtayned the Crowne, fought, by making of good lawes, to recouer the loue of his people.

The life of this Tyrant, is briefly written by Justine; more largely and particularly by Diodorus Siculus: the fumme whereof is this. The fame Amilear that had brought him into Syracufe, and that had lent him five thousand men to helpe in the massacre of the Citizens, was also content to winke at many wrongs, that hee did vnto the Confederates of the Carthaginians. It was the purpose of Amilear, to settle Agathocles in his tyramic, and to let him vexe and waste the whole Iland; because it was thereby like to come to passe, that he should reduce all Sicil into such termes, as would make it become an easie prey to Carthage. But when the Citics, confe- 40 derate with the Carthaginians, sent their Embassadors, with complaint of this ill dealing to Carthages the Punick faith (fo much taunted by the Romans, as no better than meere fallhood) shewed it selfe very honourable, in taking order for the redreffe. Embassadours were sent to comfort the Sections, and to put Agathoeles in minde aff his couenants; Amilear was recalled home into Africke, and a new Captaing appointed to succeede in his charge, with such forces, as might compell Acathoclesto reason, if otherwische would not harken to it. All this tended, to saue their Confederates, from suffering such injuries in the future. For that which was past (fince it could not be recalled) they tooke order to haue it severely punished. Amilear was accused secretly, and by way of scrutinie: the suffrages being given, 50 but not calculated; and fo referred, until he should returne. This was not so close-.ly handled, but that Applear had some notice of it. In managing his businesse with Agatherles, it is likely that he had an eye to his owne profit, as well as to the publike benefit of his Countrie. For he had made fuch a composition with the Syracusian, as gaue him not onely meanes to weaken others, but to strengthen himselfe, both in power and authoritie, euen against the Carthaginians. Such is commonly the cunome of those, that hope to worke their owne ends by cunning practices; thinking to deale fubtilly, and finely, they spinne their threads so small, that they are broken with the very winde. Amilear faw, that his Carthaginians had a purpole to deale substantially; and that therefore it would bee hard for him, to make them follow his crooked degices; which if he could not doe, it was to be expected, that their anger would breake out into so much the greater extremitie, by how much the more they had concealed it. Therefore he followed the example, which fome of his fore-10 goers had taught him; and, for feare of fuch a death, as the Iudges might award him, he ended his owne life in what fort he thought best. This desperation of Amilear ferued to informe Agathoeles of the Carthaginians intent. He faw they would not be deluded with words, and therefore resoluted to get the start of them in action. Hedissembled no longer; but, in stead of spoile and robberie, made open warre vpon all their Adherents. He had made the better part of Steil his owne, ere the Carthaginian forces arrived: which thinking to have encountred an ill-established Tyrant, found him readic, as a King, to defend his owne, and give them sharpe entertainement. They were beaten by him; and their Nauie was fo Tempest-beaten, that they could neither doe good by Land, nor Sea, but were glad to leave their furnished, was broken by foule weather, and the best part of it cast away, cuen whilest it was yet within kenning of their Citie. But Amilear, the sonne of Gifco, gathering together the remainders of this ship-wrack, was bold to passe ouer into Sicil, and landed not farre from Gela; where Agathoeles was soone readie to examine the cause of their comming. Many skirmishes passed betweene them, in which (commonly) the Syracustan had the better. But his good successe begat presumption: whereby he lost a battaile, more important than all the other fights. One adverse chance is enough to ouerthrow the state of a Tyrant, if it be not up-held by great 30 circumspection. The warre was soone transferred to the walls of Syracuse; within which Agathocles was closed up, and driven to make his last defence by their helpe, who may be judged to have loved him not very greatly. But the Inhabitants of syracule, after that great massacre of the principall men, made in the beginning of this new tyrannie, were (for the most part) such, as had beene either mercinarie Souldiers, infranchifed flaues, or base and needie people; helpers in establishing the present Gouernement, and Executioners of the murders, and spoile, committed in that change. If there were any other ( as some there were ) they were so well obferued, and (withall) fo fearfull, that they durft not flirre. But it was not enough, that they all agreed in the common defence of themselves and their Citie; Famine 40 was likely to grow vpon them, and enforce them to change their resolution. In this necessitie, Agathacles aduentured vpon a strange course, which the event commended, as wife. He imbarqued as many as he thought meet, in those vessells that rode in the Hauen; and committing the government of the Citie to his brother Antander, willed the people to be of good courage, for that (as he told them) hee had bethought himselfe of a meane, both to raise the siege, and to repaire all other losses. A Carthaginian fleet lay in the mouth of the Hauen, both to hinder the entrance of victuallers, and to keepe the belieged from issuing forth. Now, at such time as Agathocles was readie to depart, aduertisement came, that many ships of burden; laden with corne, and other provisions, were drawing neere 50 vnto Syracufe. To intercept thefe, the Carthaginians hoife faile, and lanch forth into the deepe. They were not farre gone, when they might behold Agatheeles, iffuing forth of the Port, with purpole (as they thought) to give convoy vnto his victuallers. Hereupon they wheele about, and make amaine towards him as thinking him the better bootie. He neither abode their comming, nor fled back into the Citie, but made all speede towards Africk; and was pursued by the Carthaginians, as long as day would give them light. In the meane season, the victuallers were gotten into Syrasses; which was the more plentifully relieved by their comming, for that Agathocles had vnburdened the place of no small number. When the Carthaginian Admirall perceived; first, that by pursuing two sleets at once, he had missed of them both; and secondly, that Agathocles returned not againe, but was gone to seek his fortune essewhere; he thought it good to pursue those that were fled, and to attend so well vpon them, that they should not have leisure to doe mischiefe in some other part.

The Carthaginian Nauie followed Agathoeles (whether by chance, or by relation 10 of fuch as had met with him at Sea) directly towards Africk, and ouer-tooke him after fixe dayes. He had (atthe firft) a great flatt of them; fo that (belike) they rowed hard, and wearied themselues, in seeking their owne misfortune. For he fought with them, and beatthem; and, hauing funke, ortaken many, draue the rest to slie which way they could, laden with strange tidings of his voiage.

When Agathoeles had landed his men in Africk, then did he discouer vnto them his project; letting them understand, That there was no better way to divert the Carthaginians, not only from Syracuse, but from all the Ile of Sicil, than by bringing the warre to their owne dores. For here (faid hee) they have many that hate them, and that will readily take armes against them, as soone as they perceive that there 29 is an Armie on foot, which dares to looke vpon their walls. Their Townes are ill fortified; their people vntrained, and vnexperienced in dangers; the mercinarie forces, that they levie in these parts, will rather follow vs than them, if wee offer greater wages than they can give: which wee may better promise and make good. by letting them have some share with vs in all the wealth of the Carthaginians, than our enemies can doe, by making some addition to their stipends. Thus hee talked, as one already Master of all the riches in Africk; and with many braue wordes encouraged his men so well, that they were contented to set fire on all their ships (referuing one or two, to vie as Messengers) to the end that no hope should remaine. faue only in victorie. In this heat of resolution, they winne by force two Cities; 30 which after they had throughly facked, they burnt to the ground; as a marke of terrour to all that should make resistance. The Carthaginians, hearing this, are amazed; thinking that Amilear is broken, and his whole Armie destroied in Sicil. This impression so dismaies them, that when they know the truth of all, by such as had scaped in the late Sea fight, yet still they feare, and know not what. They suspect Amilears faith, who had suffered Agathoeles to land in Africk: they suspect their principall Citizens at home, of a meaning to betray Carthage, vnto the enemie; they raise a great Armie, and know not vnto whose charge they may safely commit it.

There were at that time two famous Captaines in the Citie, Hanno, and Bomil. 40 ear; great enemies, and therefore the more vnlikely to confpire against the Common-wealth. These are made Generalls of the Armie leuied, which farre exceeded the forces of Agathodes. But it seldome happens, that dissensible for the Commanders produceth any fortunate event. Necessitie drave Agathodes to sight: and the courage of his men, resolved to deale with the whole multitude of the Carthaginians, made easile the victorie against the one halfe of them. For Bomilear would not stirre: but suffered Hanno to be cut in peeces.

The reputation of this victorie, brought ouer a King of the Africans, from the Carthaginian societie, to take part with Agatholes: who pursuing his victorie, wins many Townes, and sends word to Syracife of his good success. The Carthaginians 50 also sends in danger to be lost, whilethee was trauailing in the conquest of Sicil. Amilear sends them sine danger to be lost, whilethee was trauailing in the conquest of Sicil. Amilear sends them sine thousand men: all his sorces he thought it not need full to transport; as hoping rather to draw Agatholes back into Sicil, than to be drawne home by one, that could scarce retaine his owne Kingdome. But these good hopes had a badissue: He spent some time in winning a few Townes, that adhered vnto the Syracustus: and hausing brought his matters to some good order, the conceived a student hope of taking Syracus by surprise. It was a pretic (though tragicall) accident, if it were true, as Tulke relates it. Amilian had a dreame, which told bim that he should suppe the next day within Syracus. His sancie begot this dreame, and he believed it. He made more haste, than good speede, toward the Citie: and comming upon it on the sudden, had good hope to carrie it. But his enemies were prepared for him, and had laied an ambush to intrap him, whereinto he fell. So he was so carried prisoner into the Citie; in which it was likely, that he had no great cheare to his supper: for they struck off his head, and sent it into Assistance where prefent) to Agathocles. This good successe of things at home, did put such courage into the Sicilian Armie, that Agathosies was bold to weare a Crowne, and stile himselfe King of Africk. He had allured Ophellas, King of the Cyrenians, to take his part, by promifes to deliuer the Countrie into his hands : for that (as he faid) it was sufficient vnto himselfe to have diverted the Carthaginians from Sicil, wherein (after this warre ended) he might raigne quietly. Ophellas came with a great Armie, and was friendly entertained. But the traiterous Sicilian, taking awaduantage, did murder this his affiftant; 20 and afterwards, by good words, and great promifes, drew all the Cyrenian Armie to follow him in his warres. Thus his villanic found good fuccesse; and he so preuailed in Africk, that he got leifure to make a step into Sicil. Many Townes in Sicil had imbraced a defire of recovering their libertie; thinking it high time to fight at length for their owne freedome, after that they had so long beene exposed, (as a reward of victorie) either vnto Aliens, or to Tyrants, of their owne Countrie. These had preuailed farre, and gotten many to take their parts, as in a common cause: when the comming of Azathoeles abated their high spirits, and his good successe in many fights, compelled them to obedience. Out of Sicil he returned into Africk, where his affaires flood in very bad termes. Archagathus, his sonne, had lost a bat-20 taile; and (which was worse) had ill meanes to help himselfe: his Armie being in mutinie for lack of pay. But Agathecles pacified the tumult, by the accustomed promises of great bootic and spoile. It had now been time for him, to offer peace to the Carthaginians which to obtaine, they would (questionlesse) have given to him, both monie enough to pay his Armie, and all that they then held in Sicil. For their Citie had beene diffrested, not only by this his warre, but by the treason of Bomilcar, who failed not much of making himselfe Tyrant ouer them. But ambition is blinde. Agathocles had all his thoughts fixed vpon the conquest of Carthage it selfe: out of which dreame he was awaked, by the loffe of a battaile, not fo memorable in regard of any accident therein, as of the strange events following it. The Cartha-40 ginians, after their great misfortunes in this warre, had renewed their old facrifices of children to Saturne: from which they had abstained, euer since they made peace with Gelon. And now they made choice of some, the good lieft of their prisoners, taken in the battaile, to offer vnto the faid Idoll, in way of thankefulnesse for their victorie. The fire, with which thefe vnhappie men were confumed, caught hold vpon the lodgings necrest vnto the Altar; and spreading it selfe farther through the Campe, with the destruction of many men, caused such a tumult, as is vivall in the like cases. At the same time, the like accident of fire burnt vp the Pauilion of Agathocles. Hereupon both the Armies fled away; each of them beleening, that the noise in the aduerse Campe, was a signe of the enemies comming to inuade it. 50 But the Carthaginians had a fafe retrait: Agathocles, by a second errour, fell into a new calamitie. In the beginning of this his flight in the darke, hee met with his owne African Souldiers; and thinking them to bee enemies, (as indeede the one halfeof them had revolted from him, to the Carthaginians, in the last battaile) hee beganne to assaile them, and was so stoutly resisted, that he lost, in this blinde fight, aboue fourethousand of his men. This did so discourage his proud heart; that being fallen from the neere hope of taking the Citie of Carthage, vnto some diffrust of his owne safetie, heeknew no more how to moderate his present weake seares. than lately he had knownehow to gouerne his ambition. Therefore he tooke the way that came next into his head; which was, to steale closely aboord his ships, with his yonger sonne (the elder he suspected of Incest, and of Ambition) and so to flic into Sicil; thinking it the best course, to shift for himselfe, as wanting vessells wherein to transport his Armie. His elder sonne, Archagathus, perceiued his drift, arrested him, and put him vnder custodie: but by meanes of a sudden tumult, hee was let loofe, escaped, and fled alone, leaning both his sonnes behinde him. His 10 flight being noised through the Armie, all was in vprore; and extremitie of rage caused not only the common Souldier, but even such as had beene friends to the Tyrant, to lay hold vpon his two sonnes, and kill them. That this flight of Agathocles was extremely base; I neede not vse wordes to proue: That his seare was truly, as all feare is faid to be, a passion, deprining him of the succours which reason offered, the sequele doth manifest. His forsaken Souldiers, being now a headlesse company, and no longer an Armie to be feared, obtained neuerthelesse a reasonable composition from the Carthaginians: to whom they sold those places, whereof they had possession, for ninetcenetalents. Likewise, Agathoeles himselfe, having lost his Armie, did neuerthelesse, by the reputation of this late warre, make peace 20 with Carthage vpon equall termes.

After this, the Tyrant, being deliuered from forraine enemies, discouered his bloudie nature, in most abominable cruelties, among the Sicilians. His wants, and his teares, vrged him so violently, that he was not satisfied with the spoiles of the rich, or the death of those whom he held suspected : but in a beastly rage depopulated whole Cities. Hee deuised new engines of torment; wherein striuing to exceede the Bull of Phalaris, he made a frame of braffe, that should serve to scortch mens bodies, and withall giue him leaue to behold them in their miserie. So denillish is the nature of man, when reason, that should be his guide, is become a slaue to his brutilh affections. In these mischieses he was so outragious, that he neither spared 30 Sexc, nor Age; especially, when he was informed of the flaughter of his children in Africk. But this was not the way to preserve his estate : it threw him into new dangers. They whom hee had chased out of their Countrie, tooke armes against him, and draue him into fuch feare, that hee was faine to feeke the loue at Carthage, which, by ruling well, he might have had in Sicil. He freely delivered into the Carthaginians hands, all those Townes of the Phanicians in Sicil, belonging vnto them, which were in his possession. They requited him honourably, with great store of corne, and with foure hundred talents of gold and filuer. So (though not without much trouble and hazard) he prenailed against the Rebells, and settled his estate. Hauing no further businesse left in Sieil, hee made a voiage into Italie. There hee 40 subdued the Brutians, rather by terrour of his name, than by any force, for they yeelded at his first comming. This done, he went to the Isle of Lipara, and made the Inhabitants buy peace with one hundred talents of gold. But when he had gotten this great summe, he would needs exact a greater; and finding plainly that they had no more left, he was bold to spoile the Temples of their gods. Herein (me thinks) he did well enough. For how could be believe those to be gods, that had continually given deafe earcs to his horrible perjuries? Then hee returned richly home, with eleuen ships loaden with gold: all which, and all the rest of his fleet, were cast away by foule weather at Sea; one Gallie excepted, in which he himselse escaped, to suffer a more miserable end. A grieuous sicknesse fell vpon him, that rot- 50 ted his whole bodie, spreading it selfe through all his veines and sinewes. Whilest helay in this case, all desiring his end, saue only Theogenia (a wife that hee had taken out of Agypt) and her small children : his Nephew, the sonne of Achagathus, beforementioned, and a yonger sonne of his owne, beganne to contend about the Kingdome. Neither did they seeke to end the controuers by the old Tyrants decision; they regarded him not so much. But each of them laied wait for the others life: wherein the Nephew sped so well, that he slue his Vncle, and got his Grandsthers Kingdome without asking any leave. The set didings wounded the heart of Agasbocles with seare and sorrow. He saw himselfe without helpe, like to become a prey to his yngracious Nephew, from whom hee knew that no sauour was to be expected, either by himselse, or by those, whom only hee now held deare, which were, Theogenia, and her children. Therefore hee aduised her and them to slie before they were surprifed: for that otherwise they could by no meanes auoid, eito ther death, or somewhat that would be worse. Hee gaue them all his treasures and goods, wherewith he euen compelled them (weeping to leave him desolate in so wretched a case) to imbarke themselues hastily, and make speede into **Egypt**. After their departure, whether he threw himselse into the fire, or whether his disease consumed him, there was none left that cared to attend him; but he ended his life as basely, as obscurely, and in as much want, as he first beganne it.

After the death of Agashoeles it was, that the Mamertines his Souldiers traiteroully occupied Messanain infelted a great part of the lland. Then also did the Carlsaginians beginne to renew their attempts of conquering all Sieil. What the Nephew of Agashoeles did, I cannot finde. Likely it is that hee quickly perished.
20 For the Sieilians were driven to send for Pyrrhus to helpe them, who had married with a daughter of Agashoeles. But Pyrrhus was soone wearie of the Countrie (as hath beene shewed before) and therefore left it; prophecying that it would become a goodly champaine field, wherein Rome and Carthage should fight for superioritie. In which businesse, how these two great Cities did speede, the order of our Storie will declare.

Arccontinuation of the Roman warre in Sicil. How HIERON, King of Syracufe, for sooke the Carthaginians; and made his peace with Rome.

Kingdome.

Hen Appius Clandius, following the advantage of his victoric gotten at Messara, brought the warre vnto the Gates of Syraeuse, and besieged that great Citie; Hieron found it high time for him to seek peace: knowing that the Carlhaginians had neither any reason to be offended with him, for helping himselse by what meanes he could, when they were not in case to give him assistance; and foreseeing withall, that when once hee to had purchased his quiet from the Romans, it would be free for him to sit shill, without leare of molestation, whilest Rome and Carthage were sighting for the masteric. In this good moode, the new Roman Consults, Maralerius, and C. Ostailius, found him, and readily embraced the offer of his friendship. Yet they made vie of their present advantage, and sold him peace for an hundred (some say two hundred) Talents.

These Confulls had brought a great Armie into Sicil; yet did they nothing else ineffect, than bring ouer Hiero to their side. If the Syramstan held them bused (which I sinde not, otherwise than by circumstances, as, by the summe of monie imposed upon him, and by their performing none other peece of seruice) all the 50 whole time of their abode in the Iland; then was his departure from the friendship of Carchage, no lesse to his honour, than it was to his commoditie. For by no reason could they require, that he should suffer his owne Kingdome to runne into manifest perill of subuersion, for their sakes, that should have received all the profit of the victorie: seeing they did expose him to the whole danger, without strayning themselves to give him reliefe. But the Carthaginians had lately made good proofe of the strength of Syracuse, in the daies of Agathocles: and therefore knew, that it was able to beare out a very strong siege. And hereupon it is like that they were the more flack, in fending helpe : if (perhaps) it were not fome part of their defire, that both Rome and Syracuse should weaken one the other, whereby their owne worke might be the easier against them both. Yet indeede, the case of the besieged Citie was not the same, when the Romans lay before it, as it had beene, when the Carthaginians attempted it. For there was great reason, to trie the vttermost hazard of warre against the Carthaginians, who sought no other thing than to bring it into flauerie: not so against the Romans, who thought it sufficient, if they could withdraw it from the partie of their enemies. Belides, it was not all one to be gouerned by Agathoeles, or by Hiero. The former of these cared not what the citizens endured, folong as he might preserve his owne tyranie: the later, as a just and good Prince. had no greater desire than to winne the loue of his people, by seeking their commoditie; but including his owne felicitie within the publique, laboured to vohold both, by honest and faithfull dealing. Hereby it came to passe, that hee enjoyed a long and happic raigne, living deare to his owne Subjects, beloved of the Romans, and not greatly molested by the Carthaginians; whom, either the consideration, That they had left him to himselfe, ere he left their societie, made vnwilling to seeke his ruine; or their more carnelt businesse with the Romans, made vnable to compasse it. 20

How the Romans besiege and winne Agrigentum. Their beginning to maintaine a fleet. Their first losse, and first victorie by Sea. Of Seafight in generall.

The belieged fend for fuccour to Carthage: after they had beene in this fort pent up fine moneths. The Carthagmians imbarke an Armie, with certaine Elephants, under the command of Hanno; who arrives with it at Herac'es, to the Well of Agricentum. Hanno puts himselfe into the field, and surpriseth Erbesia, a Citie wherein the Ro-10 mans had bestowed all their provision. By meanes hereof, the famine without grew to be as great, as it was within Agrigentum, and the Roman campe no leffe streightly affreged by Hanno, than the Citie was by the Romans : infomuch, as if Hieron had not supplied them, they had beene forced to abandon the siege. But seeing that this diffresse was not enough to make them rise; Hanno determined to give them battaile. To which end departing from Heraclia, hee makes approch vnto the Romin campe. The Romans resolute to sustaine him, and put themselves in order. Hanno directs the Numidian horse-men to charge their Vantguard, to the ende to draw them further on; which done, he commands them to returne as broken, till they came to the body of the Army, that lay shadowed behind some rising ground. 20 The Numidians performe is accordingly; and while the Romans purfued the Nu-midians, Hannogiues vpon them, and having flaughtered many, beats the rest into their Trenches.

After this encounter, the Carthaginians made no other attempt for two moneths, burlay strongly incamped, waiting vntill some oportunitie should inuite them. But Annibal, that was belieged in Agrizentum, as well by fignes as mellengers, made Hanno know, how ill the extremitie which he endured, was able to brooke fuch dilatoric courses. Hanno thereupon, a second time, prouoked the Confulls to fight; But his Elephants being disordered by his owne Vantguard, which was broken by the Romans, he lost the day: and with such as escaped, he recoursed Heraclea. Annibal 30 perceiuing this, and remayning hopeleffe of fuccour, refolued to make his owne way. Finding therefore that the Romans, after this daies victorie, wearied with labour, and secured by their good fortune, kept negligent watch in the night; hee rutht out of the Towne, with all the remainder of his armie, and past by the Roman campe without relistance. The Confulls pursue him in the morning, but in vaine: fure they were, that he could not carrie the Citie with him, which with little a doe the Romans entred, and pittifully spoiled. The Romans, proud of this victorie, purpose henceforth rather to follow the direction of their present good fortunes, than their first determinations. They had resolved in the beginning of this Warre, only to succour the Mamertines, and to keepe the Carthaginians from their owne coasts:

40 but now they determine, to make themselves Lords of all Sicil; and from thence, being favoured with the winde of good successe, to faile over into Africke. Itis the disease of Kings, of States, and of private men, to cover the greatest things, but not to enjoy the least; the defire of that which wee neither have nor neede, taking from vs the true vse and fruition of what wee have alreadie. This curse vpon mortall men, was never taken from them since the beginning of the World to this day.

To profecute this Warre, Lucius Valerius and Titus Octacilius, two new Confuls, are fent into Sicil. Whereupon, the Romans being Masters of the field, many inland Townes gave themselves vnto them. On the contrarie, the Carthaginians 50 keeping still the Lordship of the Sea, many maritimate places became theirs. The Romans therefore, as well to fecure their owne coasts, often inuaded by the African fleets, as also to equall themselues in euery kinde of warfare with their enemies, determine to make a fleet. And herein fortune fauoured them with this accident, that being altogether ignorant in shipwrights-craft, a storme of winde thrust one of the Carthaginian Gallies, of fine bankes, to the shore.

Now had the Romans a patterne, and by it they beganne to fet vp an hundred Quinqueremes, which were Gallies, rowed by fine on enery banke, and twentie, of three on a banke: and while these were in preparing, they exercised their men in the feat of rowing. This they did after a strange fashion. They placed vpon the Sea-fands many leates, in order of the bankes in Gallies, whereon they placed their water-men, and taught them to beat the fand with long poles, orderly, and as they were directed by the Master, that so they might learne the stroke of the Gallie, and how to mount and draw their Oares.

When their fleet was finished, some rigging and other implements excepted, to C.Cornelius, one of the new Confuls (for they changed enery yere) was made Admirall: who being more in loue with this new kind of warfare, then well aduised, past ouer to Meffena with scuenteene Gallies, leaving the rest to follow him. There hee staid not, but would needs row alongst the cost to Lipara, hoping to doe some piece of service. Hannibal, a Carthaginian, was at the same time Gouernour in Panormus; who being advertised of this new Sca-mans arrivall, sent footh one Boodes, a Scnatour of Carthage, with twentie Gallies to entertaine him. Boodes, falling vpon the Consull vnawares, tooke both him and the fleet he commanded. When Hannibal received this good newes, together with the Roman Gallies, and their Confull; he grew no leffe foolish hardie than Cornelius had beene. For hee, fancying to him- 20 felfe to surprise the rest of the Roman fleet, on their owne coast, ere they were yet in all points prouided; fought them out with a fleet of fiftie faile: wherewith falling among them, hee was well beaten, and leaving the greater number of his own behind him, made an hard escape with the rest : for of one hundred and twentie Gallies, the Romans under Cornelins had lost but seuenteene, so as one hundred and three remained, which were not eafily beaten by fiftie.

The Romans, being advertised of Cornelius his overthrow, make haste to redeeme him, but give the charge of their fleet to his Colleague, Duilius, Duilius, confidering that the Roman veffels were heavie and flow, the African Gallies having the speede of them, denised a certaine engine in the prow of his Gallies, whereby 30 they might fasten or grapple themselves with their enemies, when they were (as we call it) boord and boord, that is, when they brought the Gallies sides together. This done, the waightier ships had gotten the advantage, and the Africans lost it. For neither did their swiftnesse serue them, nor their Mariners craft ; the Vessells, wherin both Nations fought, being open: so that al was to be carried by the aduantage of weapon, and valour of the men. Besides this, as the heavier Gallies were likely to crush and crack the sides of the lighter and weaker, so were they by reafon of their breadth, more steadie; and those that best kept their feet, could also best vse their hands. The example may bee given betweene one of the long boates of his Maiesties great ships, and a London barge. Certainly, hee that will happily performe a fight at Sea, must bee skilfull in making choice of Vessels to fight in: hee must beleeue, that there is more belonging to a good man of warre, vpon the waters, than great during; and must know, that there is a great deale of difference, betweene fighting loofe or at large, and grapling. The Gunnes of a flow ship pierce as well, and make as great holes, as those in a swift. To clap ships together, without consideration, belongs rather to a mad man, than to a man of warre: for by such an ignorant brauerie was Peter Stroßic, loft at the Azores, when hee fought against the Marquesse of Santa Cruz. In like fort had the Lord Charles Howard, Admirall of England, been lost in the yeare 1588. if he had not beene better aduised, than a great many malignant fooles were, that 50 found fault with his demeanour. The Spaniards had an Armie aboord them; and he had none: they had more ships than he had, and of higher building and charging; so that, had he intangled himselfe with thosegreat and powerfull Vessells, he had greatly endangered this Kingdome of England. For twentie men vpon the defences, are equall to an hundred that boord and enter, whereas then, contrariwife, the Spaniards had an hundred, for twentie of ours, to defend themselves withall. But our Admirall knew his advantage, and held it : which had he not done, hee had not beene worthie to have held his head. Hecre to speake in generall of Scafight (for particulars are fitter for private hands, then for the Presse) I say, That a fleet of twenty ships, all good failers, and good ships, hauethe advantage, on the open Sea, of an hundred as good ships, and of slower sayling. For if the fleet of an hundred faile keepe themselues neere together, in a grosse squadron; the twentie ships, charging them vpon any angle, shall force them to give ground, and to fall 10 back vpon their next fellowes: of which fo many as intangle, are made unferuiceable, or loft. Force them they may easily, because the twentie ships, which give themsclues scope, after they have given one broad side of Artillerie, by clapping into the winde, and staying, they may give them the other; and so the twentie ships batter them in pieces with a perpetuall vollie; whereas those, that fight in a troupe, haue no roome to turne, and can alwaies vse but one and the same beaten side. If the fleet of an hundred faile give themselves any distance, then shall the leffer fleet prevaile, either against those that are a-rearc and hindmost, or against those, that by advantage of ouer-failing their fellowes keepe the winde: and if vpon a Leeshore, the ships next the winde be constrained to fall back into their own squadron, 20 then it is all to nothing, that the whole fleet must suffer ship wrack, or render it selfe. That fuch advantage may be taken vpon a fleet of vnequal speed, it hath been wel enough conceived in old time; as by that Oration of Hermocrates, in Thucydides, Toucidales, which he made to the Syracusians, when the Athenians invaded them, it may casily be obserued. Of the Art of Warre by Sca, I had written a Treatife, for the Lord HENRIE, Prince of Wales; a subject, to my knowledge, neuer handled by any man, ancient ormoderne: but God hath spared me the labour of finishing it, by his losse; by the losse of that braue Prince; of which, like an Eclypse of the Sunne, wee shall finde the effects hereafter. Impossible it is to equal words and sorrowes; I will 30 therefore leave him in the hands of God that hath him. Cura leues loquuntur, ingen-

But it is now time to returne to the beaten Carthaginians, who by looling their aduantage of swift boats, and boording the Romans, have lost fiftie saile of their Gallies: as on the other fide, their enemies by commanding the Seas, haue gotten libertieto saile about the West part of Sicil; where they raised the siege layed vnto Segesta, by the Carthaginians, and wonne the Towne of Macella, with some other places.

Diversenter feats of warre, betweene the Romans and Carthaginians, with variable successe. The Romans prepare to inuade Africk: and obtaine a great victorie at Sea.

they fent a fleet for that purpose. On the contrary side, Amilear the Carthaginian, lying in Panormus, carefully waited for all occasions, that might helpe to recompence the late misfortune : and being aduertifed, that some quarrell Ggggg 2 was growne betweene the Roman Souldiers, and their Auxiliaries, being such as caused them to incampe a-part, he sent forth Hanno to set vpon them; who taking them ynawares, buried foure thousand of them in the place. Now during the continuance of the Land-warre in Sicil, Hannibal, who had lately beene beaten by Sea, but cscaped vnto Carthage, meaning to make amends for his former errour, obtayned the trust of a new fleet, wherewith hee arrived at Sardinia: the conquest of which Iland, the Romans had entertayned for their next enterprise. Now it so fell out, that the Romans, croffing the Seas from Sicil, arrived in the Port where Hannibal with his new fleet anchored. They fet vpon him vnawares, and tooke the better part of the fleet which he conducted; himfelfe hardly cscaping their danger. But 10 it little availed him to have escaped from the Romans. His good friends the Carthaginians, were so ill pleased with this his second vnfortunate voiage, that they hanged him up for his diligence : for (as it hath beene faid of old) Non eft bis in beliepeccare : In warre it is too much to offend twice.

After this, it was long ere any thing of importance was done by the Confuls, till * Panormus was belieged: where, when the Romans had fought in vaine to draw Antiquities: the Carthaginians into the field; being vnable to force that great Citie, because of wmen Fareture, the strong Garrison therein bestowed: they departed thence, and tooke certaine

The numbers, with which each of them filled their todrawit: the fleet, was (perhaps) the greatest that euer fought on the waters. By Polybins his had foure to estimation, there were in the Romane Gallies an hundred and forty thousand men; an Oare: and and in those of Carthage, an hundred and fifty thousand : reckoning one hundred the Trerent, Some and twenty Souldiers, and three hundred Rowers, to every Gallie, one with the 50 three. Some and twenty Souldiers and three hundred Rowers, to every Gallie, one with the 50 haue thought, other. The Roman fleet was divided into foure parts, of which the three first made naue moughts, Outer: 10th Modge or Triangle; the two first squadrons making the Flancks, operants had fine ranks of Oares, one ouer another; and the other Gallies (rateably) sewer. But had this been so, they must then have had fine ranks of Oares, one ouer another; and the other Gallies (rateably) sewer. and the third fquadron, the Base : the point thereof (wherein were the two Confulls as Admirails) look ng toward the enemie; and the middle space lying emptie. Their Veffels of carriage were towed by the third fquadron. After all came up the fourth, in forme of a Crefcent; very well manned, but exceeding thinne: fo that the hornes of it inclosed all the third squadron, together with the corners of the first and second. The order of the Carthaginian fleet I cannot conccine by the relation; but, by the manner of the fight afterwards, I coniecture, that the front of their fleet was thinne, and stretched in a great length, much like to that which the French call Cembat en hij; a long front of horse, and thinne: which torme, since the Pistoll to preual ed ouer the Lance, they have changed. Behind this first out-stretched front, their Battalions were more folide: for Amilear, Admirall of the Cathaginians, had thus ordered them, of purpose, (his Gallies having the speed of the Romans) that, when the first flect of the Romans hasted to breake through the first Gallies, they should all turne taile, and the Romans pursuing them (as after a victorie) diforder themselves, and, for eagernesse of taking the Runn awaies, leave their other three fquadrons farre behinde them. For fo it must needes fall out; seeing that the third fquadron towed their horse-boats, and victuallers; and the fourth had the Rearcward of ali. According to Amilears direction it succeeded. For when the Romans had charged, and broken, the thinne front of the Carthaginian field fleet, which ran 20 away they forthwith gaue after them with all speeds possible, not so much as looking behinde them for the tecond fquadron. Hereby the komans were drawne neare vinto the bodie of the Casthaginian fleet, led by Amiliar, and by him (at the first) received great lose, tultheir lecond squadron came vp, which for ced Amilear to betake him to his Oares. Hinno also, who commanded the right wing of the Carthaginian fleet, invaded the Koman Reareward, and prevailed against them. But Amicar being beaten oif, Mireus A thus fell backeto their fuccour, and put the Carthazinians to their heeles; as not able to fullaine both squadrons. The Reare being relieued, the Contuliscame to the aide of their third Battalion, which towed their victualers, which was also in great danger of being beaten by the Africans: 30 but the Confulls, joyning their squadrons to it, but the Carthaginians on that part allo to running. I his victorie fell to the Romans, partly by the hardineffe of their Souldiers; but principally, for that Amilear, being first beaten, could neuer after joyne himselfe to any of his other quadrons, that remained as yet in faire likelihood of prevailing, to long as they fought vpon even termes, and but squadron to fquadron. But Amilear, forfaking the hight, thereby left a full fourth part of the Roman fleet vningaged, and readie to give fuccour to any of the other parts that were opprest. So as in conclusion, the Romans got the honour of the day : for they loft but foure and twentie of theirs, whereas the Africans loft thertie that were funk, and threescore and three that were taken. 40 Now, if amilear, who had more Gallies than the Romans, had also divided his fleet into foure (quadrons, (belides those that he ranged in the front to draw on the enemies, and to ingage them) and that, while hee himfelfe fought with one squadron that charged him, all the rest of the enemies fleet had been at the same time entertained, he had prevailed: But the second squadron, being free, came to the rescue of the first, by which Amilear was opprest: and Amilear, being opprest and scattered, the Confuls had good leifure to relieue both their third and fourth squadron and got the victorie.

Charles the fift, among other his Precepts to Philip the second his sonne, where he aduiseth him concerning Warre against the Turkes, tells him, that in all battailes 50 betweene them and the Christians, he should never faile to charge the Ianifars in the beginning of the fight, and to ingage them at once with the relt. For (faith he) the lanifars, who are alwaics reserved intire in the Reare of the battaile, and in whom the Turke reposeth his greatest confidence; come vp in a grosse body, when all the troups, on both sides are disbanded and in confusion; whereby they carie the victoric before them without reliftance. By the same order of fight, and reservation, did the Romans also prevaile against other Nations. For they kept their Triari in store (who were the choice of their Armie) for the vp-shot and last blow. A great and a victorious advantage it hath ever beene found, to keepe fome one or two good troupes to looke on, when all else are disbanded and ingaged.

d. VIII.

The Romans preuaile in Africk. ATILIVS the Consull propoundeth intolerable conditions of peace to the Carthaginians. He is vtterly beaten, and made prisoner.

Ow the Roman, according to their former resolution, after they had repaired and re-victualled their floor for fails for the fail at the Promontorie of Hercules, a great Head-land, somewhat to the East of the Port of Carthage, and some fortie leagues from Heraclea in Sicil, where Amilear himselfe as yet staid. From this Head-land (leauing the entrance into Carthage) they coasted the East-side of the Promontorie, till they came to Clypea, a Towne, about fiftie English mile from it. There they dif- 20 imbarked, and prepared to beliege Clypea; which, to ease them of labour, was yeelded vnto them. Now had they a Port of their owne on Africa side; without which all inualions are foolish. By this time were the Africans also arrived at their owne Carthage; fearing that the Roman fleet and armie had directed themselues thither: but being aduertifed, that they had taken Clypea, they made prouisions of all forts: both by Sea and Land, for their defence. The Romans fend to Rome for directions, and in the meane while waste all round about them. The order given from the Senate, was, that one of the Confulls should remaine with the Armie, and that the other should returne, with the fleet into Italie. According to this directiou, Manlises the Conful is fent home to Rome; whither he carried with him twentie thousand 30 African captaines, with all the Roman fleet and armie; except fortie ships, fifteene thousand foot, and five hundred horse, that were left with Atilius.

With these forces, Regulus easily wanne some Townes and Places, that were vnwalled, and laid fiege to others. But he performed no great matter, before he came vnto Adis. Yet I hold it worthy of relation, that neere vnto the River of Bagrada, * This Citie he encountred with a Serpent of one hundred and twentie foot long, which he flue, was takenfrom not without loffe of many Souldiers, being driven to vse against it such engines of the Inner of Townes. At Adis he met with the in the yeere Carthaginian Armic, whereof the Captaines were Hanno and Boffar, together with Amilear, who had brought ouer out of Sieil fine thousand foot, and fine hundred 40 horse to succour his Countrie. These (belike) had an intent, rather to wearie him which he gaue out of Africa, by warie protraction of time, than to vndergoe the hazard of a maine fight. They were carefull to hold themselues free, from necessitie of comming to cond his sonne blowes: yet had they a great desire, to saue the Towne of Adis out of his hands. Into keepe fafe; tending therefore to follow their generall purpose, and yet to disturbe him in the to wit, tims 112-nis, the Key of fiege of Adis, they incampe neere vnto him, and ftrongly (as they thinke) on the Africa: Flight top of an hill: but thereby they loofe the feruices, both of their Elephants, and of ing, the Key of their horse-men. them againe; the third, our English were bold, in the time of the renowned Queene Elizabeth, to wring out of his hands: where we staid not to pick any locke, but brake open the dores, and having rifled all, threw it into the fire. Ву

By the loffe of this battaile at Adis, and more especially by the loffe of Tunis, the Carthaginians were greatly diffusied. The Numidians, their next Neighbours towards the West, infult vpon their misfortunes; inuade, and spoile their Territory, and force those that inhabite abroad, to for sake their villages and fields, and to hide themselues within the walls of Carthage. By reason hereof, a great famine at hand threatens the Citizens. Atilius findes his owne advantage, and affures himfelfe that the Citie could not long hold out yet he feared left it might defend it felfe, untill his time of Office, that was neere expired, should be quite runne out, whereby the new Confulls were like to reape the honor of obtaining it. Ambition there-10 fore, that hath no respect but to it selfe, perswades him to treat of peace with the Carthaginians. But he propounded vnto them so vnworthy and base conditions, as thereby their hearts, formerly possessed with seare, became now so couragious and disdainefull, that they resolved, either to desend their libertie, or to die to the last man. To strengthen this their resolution, there arrived at the same time a great troupe of Greekes, whom they had formerly fent to entertaine. Among these was a very expert Souldier, named Xantippus, a Spartan: who being informed of what had paffed, and of the ouerthrow which the Carthaginians received necre vnto Adis. gaue it out publiquely, that the same was occasioned by default of the Commanders, and not of the Nation. This bruit ranne, till it came to the Senate : Xantippus 20 is sent for ; gives the reason of his opinion ; and in conclusion, being made Generall of the African forces, he puts himselfe into the field. The Armie which he led, confifted of no more than twelue thousand foot, and soure thousand horse, with an hundred Elephants. No greater were the forces, wher with the Carthaginians fought for all that they had, Libertic, Liues, Goods, Wines, and Children: which might well make it suspected, that the Armies by Sea, before spoken of, were misse numbred; the one confisting of an hundred and fortie thousand, and the other of an hundred and fiftie thou fand; were it not commonly found, that they which vie the service of mercinarie Souldiers, are stronger abroad, than at their owne dores.

Xantippus, taking the field with this Armie, marched directly towards the Ro-30 mans; and ranging his troups vpon faire and levell ground, fittelt both for his Elephants and Horse, presented them battaile. The Romans wondred, whence this new courage of their enemies might grow: but confident they were that it should be soone abated. Their chiefe care was, how to resist the violence of the Elephants. Against them they placed the Velites, or light-armed Souldiers, as a fortorne hope; that these might, either with darts and other casting weapons, drive back the beasts vpon the enemies, or at least breake their violence, and hinder them from rushing freely vpon the Legions. To the same end, they made their battailes deeper in file, than they had been accustomed to doe. By which meanes, as they were the lesse subject vinto the impression of the Elephants; so were they the more exposed vinto 40 the violence of horse, wherein the enemie did farre exceede them. The Elephants were placed by Xantippus, all in one ranke, before his Armie; which followed them at a reasonable distance: his horse-men, and some light-armed soot, of the Carthaginians Auxiliaries, were in the wings. The first onset was given by the Elephants. against which the Velites were so vnable to make resistance, that they brake into the battalions following, and put them into some disorder. In this case, the depth of the Roman battaile was helpfull. For when the beafts had spent their force, in piercing through a few of the first ranks; the squadrons neuerthelesse persisted in their order, without opening. But the Carthaginian horse, having at the first encounter, by reason of their advantage in number, driven those of Atilius out of the field, 30 beganne to charge the Roman battalions in flanke, and put them in great diffresse who being forced to turne face every way, could neither passe forward, nor yet retire; but had much adoe to make good the ground whereon they flood. In the meane while, fuch of the Romans, as had escaped the furie of the Elephants, and left them at their backes, fell vpon the Carthaginian Armic, that met them in very good array. It was no euen match. The one were a difordred Companie, wearied with labour, and hurt; the other, tresh, and well prepared, to have dealt with the enemic vpon equal termes. Here was therefore a greater flaughter with little fight. the Romans halfuly recoiling to the bodic of their Armic, which being surrounded with the enemie, and spent with trauaile, fell all to rout, vpon the deseat of these troups, that open the way to a generall overthrow. So the Carthaginians obtayned a fuil victorie; destroying the whole Roman Armic, faue two thousand, and taking fine hundred prisoners, together with Atlies the Confull. Of their owne they lost no more than eight hundred mercinaries, which were flaine, when the fight began, by two thousand of the Romans: that wheeling about, to avoide the Elephants, bare 10 downe all before them, and made way even to the Carthaginian trenches. These were the two thousand that escaped, when the whole Armic behinds them was routed. All the rest were either taken or slaine. Hereby fortune made the Romans know, that they were no leffe her vaffalls, than were the Carthaginians: how infolent focuer they had beene in their proposition of peace; as if they had purchased from her the inheritance of their prosperitie, which she never gave nor fold to any mortall man. With what ioy these newes were welcommed, when they came to Carthage, wee may easily consecture; and what great things the vertue of one man hath often brought to passe in the World, there are many examples to proue, no leffe then this of Xantippus: all of them confirming that sentence of EVRYPI- 20 DES, Mens una sapiens, plurium vincit manus; Many mens hands equal not one wife minde. After this great service done to the Carthaginians, Xantippus returned into Greece; whether for that he was more enuied then honoured, or for what other cause it is

The death of Atilius Regulus the Confull, was very memorable. Hee was fent from Carthage to Rome, about the exchange and ranfome of prisoners on both sides: giuing his faith to returne it the builinesse were not effected. When he came to Rome, and plainely faw that his Countrie should loose by the bargaine: so far was he from vrging the Senate vnto compassion of his owne miserie, that he earnessly 30 perswaded to have the prisoners in Africk lest to their ill destinies. This done, hee returned to Carthage: where for his pames taken, he was rewarded with an horrible death. For this his constancie and faith, all Writers highly extoll him. But the Carthaginians sceme to have judged him an obstinate and malicious enemie; that neither in his prosperitie would harken to reason, nor yet in his calamitie would haue the naturall care, to perferue himselfe and others, by yeelding to such an office of humanitic, as is common in all warres (not grounded vpon deadly hatred) only in regard of fome small advantage. What societ the Carthaginians thought of him; fureit is, that his faithfull observance of his word given, cannot be too much commended. But that graue speech, which he made in the Senate, against the exchange 49 of prisoners, appeares, in all reason, to have proceeded from a vaine-glorious fiowardnesse, rather than from any necessitie of state. For the exchange was made foone after his death; wherein the Romans had the worse bargaine, by so much as Regulus himselfe was worth. As for the authoritie of all Historians, that magnific him in this point; we are to confider that they lived vnder the Roman Empire: Philinus, the Carthiginian, perhaps did censure it otherwise. Yet the death which he fuffered with extreme torments, could not be more greenous to him than it was dilhonourable to Carthage. Neither doe I think that the Carthaginians could excufe themselues herein; otherwise than by recrimination : faying, That the Romans descrued to be no better intreated for as much as it was their ordinary practice 50 to vie others in the like fort. Crueltie doth not become more warrantable, but rather more odious, by being customarie. It was the Roman fashon, to whip almost todeath, and then to behead, the Captaines of their enemies whom they tooke, yea although they were fuch, as had alwaies made faire warres with them. Whereforeit feemes not meet, in reason, that they should crie out against the like tyrannicall infolence in others, as if it were lawfull only in themselves.

The consideration both of this misfortune, that rewarded the pride of Atilius his intolerable demands; and of the fudden valour, whereinto the Carthaginians feare was changed by meere desperation; calls to remembrance the like insolencie of others in prosperitie, that hath bred the like resolution in those, to whom all reafonable grace bath beene denied. In such cases I neuer hold it impertinent, to adde vnto one, more testimonies; approuing the true rules, from which our passions

In the yeere 1378, the Genowaies wonne fo fast upon the Fenetians, as they not only draue their Gallies out of the Sea, but they brought their owne fleet within two miles of Venice it felfe. This bred fuch an amazement in the Citizens of Venice, that they offered vnto the Genowaies (their flate referred) what focuer they would demand. But Peter Doria, blowne vp with many former victories, would harken to no composition; saue the yeelding of their Citie and State to his discretion. Hereupon, the Venetians, being filled with disdaine, thrust out to Sea with all their remaining power, and affaile Doris with fuch desperate surie, that they breake his fleet; kill Doria himselfe; take nineteene of his Gallies, fourescore boats of Padoa, and foure thousand prisoners; recover Chiozza, and all the places taken 20 from them; and following their victoric, enter the Port of Genoa, enforcing the Genowaies, basely to begge peace, to their extreme dishonour and disaduantage, being beaten; which, being victorious, they might have commanded, to their greatest honour and advantage. The like hapned to the Earle of Flanders, in the yeere 1380. when having taken a notable, and withall an ouer-cruell revenge vpon the Gantois, herefuled mercy to the rest, who in all humilitie, submitting themselves to his obedience, offered their Citie, goods, and estates, to be disposed at his pleasure. This when he had vnaduifedly refused, and was resoluted to extinguish them vtterly; they iffue out of their Citie with five thousand chosen men, and armed with a desperate resolution, they charge the Earle, breake his Armie, enter Bruges (pell-mell) 30 with his vanquished followers; and enforce him to hide himselfe under an heape of straw, in a poore cottage, out of which with great difficultie he escaped, and faued himselfe. Such are the fruits of insolencie.

How the affaires of Carthage profesed after the victorie against ATILIVS: How the Romans having lost their fleet by tempest, resolve to for sake the Seas: The great aduantages of a good fleet in warre, betweene Nations divided by the Sea.

Y the reputation of this late victory, all places that had beene lost in Africk, returne to the obedience of Carthage. Onely Clypea stands out; before which the Carthaginians fit downe, and assaile it, but in vaine : For the Romans, hearing of the losse of Atilius with their forces in Africk, and withall, that Clypea was belieged, make ready a groffe Armie, and transport it in a fleet of three hundred and fiftie Gallies, commanded by M. Amilius, and Ser. Fuluius, their Confulls. At the Promontory of Mercurie, two hundred Carthaginian Gallies, set out of purpose, vpon the bruit of their comming, encounter them: but greatly to their coft. For the Romans tooke by force an hundred and fourteene of their fleet, and drew them after them to Clypea; where they staid no longer, than to take in their owne men that had beene befieged : and this done, they made amaine toward Sicil, in hope to recour all that the Carthaginians held therein. In this hasty voyage they despise the addice of the Pilots, who pray them to finde harbour in time, for that the feafon threatned some great victorie was deuoured by the Seas, before the fame thereof recoureed Rome; The Carthaginians, hearing what had hapned, repaire all their warlike Veffells, hoping once againe to command the Seas: they are also as confident of their land- 20 forces fince the overthrow of Atilius. They fend Afdrubal into Sicil with all their old Souldiers, and an hundred and fortic Elephants, imbarqued in two hundred Gallies. With this Armic and fleet he arrives at Lilybeum; where hee beginnes to vexe the Partifans of Rome. But advertitie doth not discourage the Romanes: They build in three moneths (a matter of great note) one hundred and twentie ships; with which, and the remainder of their late shipwracke, they row to Panormus, or Palerma, the chiefe Citie of the Africans in Sicil, and furround it by Land and Water: after a while they take it, and leaving a Garrison therein, returne to Rome.

Very desirous the Romans were to bee doing in Africk: to which purpose they imploied C. Seruilius, and C. Sempronius, their Confulls. But these wrought no won- 30 ders. Some spoile they made upon the coasts of Africa: but Fortune robbed them of all their gettings. For in their returne, they were first set voon the sands, and like to have perished, neere vnto the leffer syrtes, where they were faine to heauc all ouer-boord, that so they might get off: then, having with much a-doe doubled the Cape of Lilybaum, in their passage from Panormus towards Italie, they lost an hundred and fiftie of their ships by foule weather. A greater discouragement neuer Nation had; the God of the warres fauoured them no more, than the God of the waters afflicted them. Of all that Mars enricht them with vpon the Land, Neptune robbed them vpon the Seas. For they had now loft, befides what they loft in fight, foure hundred & fixe ships and Gallies, with all the munition and 40 Souldiers transported in them.

The exceeding damage hereby received, perfwaded them to give over their Nauigation, and their fight by Sca, and to fend only a Land armie into Sicil, vnder L. Cacilius, and F. Furius, their Consulls. These they transported in some threefcore ordinarie passage-boats, by the straights of Messana, that are not aboue a mile and an halfe broad from land to land. In like fort, the ouerthrow which Atilius receiued in Africa, occasioned chiefly by the Elephants, made them leffe cholericke against the Carthaginians, than before; so that for two yeeres after, they kept the high and woodie grounds, not daring to fight in the faire and champian Countries. But this late resolution of for saking the Seas lasted not long. For it was impossible for 50 them to succour those places which they held in Sicil, without a Nauie, much leffe to maintaine the warre in Africa. For whereas the Romans were to fend forces from Messana to Egesta, to Lilybeum, and to other places in the extreme West parts of Si-, sil, making fometimes a march of aboue an hundred and forty English mile by land, which could not be performed with an Armie, and the provisions that follow it, in lesse than fourteene daies; the Carthaginians would passe it with their Gallies; in eight and fortie houres.

Снар.1.5.9.

An old example we have, of that great advantage of transporting Armies by water, betweene Canutus, and Edmond Ironside. For Canutus, when he had entred the Thames with his Nauie and Armie, and could not prevaile against London, suddenly imbarqued; and failing to the West, landed in Dorfet shire, to drawing Edmond and his Armie thither. There finding ill entertainement, he againe shipt his men, and entred the Seuerne, making Edmond to march after him, to the succour of Worcester-10 fbire, by him greatly spoiled. But when he had Edmond there, he sailed back againe to London: by meanes whereof, he both wearied the King, and spoiled where hee pleased, ere succour could arrive. And this was not the least helpe, which the Netherlands have had against the Spaniards, in the defence of their libertie, that being Masters of the Sea, they could passe their Armie from place to place, vnwearied, and entire, with all the Munition and Artilerie belonging vnto it, in the tenth part of the time, wherein their enemies have been eable to doe it. Of this, an instance or two. The Count Maurice of Nassau, now living, one of the greatest Captaines, and of the worthiest Princes, that either the present or preceding Ages haue brought forth, in the yeare 1590. carried his Armie by Sea, with fortie Canons, to Breda: 20 making countenance either to beliege Boifledue, or Gertreuiden Berg; which the enemic (in preuention) filled with Souldiers, and victualls. But as soone as the winde ferued, he fuddenly fet faile, and arriving in the mouth of the Menze, turned vpthe Rhine, and thence to Yffel, and fate downe before Zutphen. So before the Spaniards could march ouer land round about Holland, aboue fourescore mile, and ouer many great Rivers, with their Cannon and carriage, Zutphen was taken. Againe, when the Spanish Armic had ouercome this wearisome march, and were now farre from home, the Prince Maurice, making countenance to faile vp the Rhine. changed his course in the night; and sailing downe the streame, he was set downe before Hulft in Brabant, ere the Spaniards had knowledge what was become of him. 30 So this Towne he also tooke, before the Spanif armie could returne. Lastly, the Spanish armie was no fooner arrived in Brabant, than the Prince Maurice, well attended by his good fleet, having fortified Hulf, fet faile againe, and prefented himfelfe before Nymegen in Gelders, a Citic of notable importance, and mastred it.

And to fay the trut's, it is impossible for any maritime Countrie, not having the coasts admirably fortified, to defend it selfe against a powerfull enemie, that is mafter of the Sea. Hereof I had rather, that Spaine than England should bee an example. Let it therefore be supposed, that King Philip the second had fully resolued to hinder Sir John Worris in the yeare 1589. from presenting Don Intenio, King of Portugula, before the gates of Lysborne; and that he would have kept off the Enin clift, by power of his land-forces; as being too weakeat Sea, through the great onerthrow of his mighty Armada, by the fleet of Queene Elizabeth, in the vecre foregoing. Surely, it had not beene hard for him, to prepare an Armie, that should be able to resist our eleventhousand. But where should this his Armie have beene bestowed? If about Lysborne; then would it have been easie vnto the English, to take, ranfack, and burne the Towne of Groine, and to waste the Countrie round about it. For the great and threatning preparations, of the Earle of Altemira, the Marquesse of Seralba, and others, did not hinder them from performing all this. Neither did the hastie leauie of eight thousand, under the Earle of Andrada, serue to more effect, than the increase of honour to Sr John Norris, and his Affociates: 30 confidering, that the English charged these, at Puente de Burgos, and passing the great Bridge, behinde which they lay, that was flanked with fliot, and barricadoed at the further end, routed them; tooke their campe; tooke their Generalls standard with the Kings Armes, and pursued them over all the Countrie, which they fired. If a roiall Armie, and not (as this was) a Companie of private adventurers, had thus

begunne the warre in Galicia; I thinke it would have made the Spaniards to quit the guard of Portugale, and make hafte to the defence of their St. Iago, whose Temple was not farre from the danger. But, had they held their first resolution; as knowing, that Sir Iohn Norris his maine intent was, to bring Don Antonio, with an Armic. into his Kingdome, whither comming strong, he expected to bee readily and joyfully welcomed : could they have hindred his landing in Portugale? Did not he land at Penicha, and march ouer the Countrie to Lysborne, fixe daies iournie? Did not hee (when all Don Antonio his promifes failed) paffe along by the River of Lysborne to Cascaliz, and there, having wonne the Fort, quietly imbarque his men, and depart? But these, though no more than an handfull, yet were they Englishmen. Let 10 vs confider of the matter it selfe; what an other Nation might doe, euen against England, in landing an Armie, by advantage of a fleet, if wee had none. This que-Rion, Whether an inuading Armie may be refifted at their landing upon the coast of England, were there no fleete of ours at the Sea to impeach it; is alreadic handled by a learned Gentleman of our Nation, in his observations upon Casars Commentaries, that maintaines the affirmative. This he holds only vpon supposition; in absence of our shipping: and comparatively; as, that it is a more safe and easie course, to defend all the coast of England, than to suffer an enemie to land, and afterwards to fight with him. Surely I hold with him, that it is the best way, to keepe our enemic from treading vpon our ground: wherein, if wee faile, then must wee seeke to make him 20 with, that he had staicd at his owne home. In such a case, if it should happen, our judgements are to weigh many particular circumstances, that belong not vnto this discourse. But making the question generall, and positive, whether England, without helpe of her fleet, be able to debarre an enemie from landing; I hold that it is vnable foto doe: and therefore I thinke it most dangerous to make the aduenture. For the incouragement of a first victorie to an enemie, and the discouragement of being beaten to the inuaded, may draw after it a most perilous consequence.

It is true, that the Marshall Monlue, in his Commentaries, doth greatly complaine, that by his wanting forces, wherewith to hane kept the frontier of Guienne, they of the Protestant religion, after the battaile of Moncounter, entred that Coun. 30 trie, and gathered great firength and reliefe thence; for if the King (faith he) would haue given me but reasonable meanes, jeuse bien garde a Monsieur l'Admiral, de faire boire (es Cheuaux en la Garonne; I would have kept the Admiral from watering his horses in the River of Garonne. Monsieur de Langer, on the contrarie side, preferres the not fighting vpon a frontier with an inuading enemie, and commends the delay; which course the Constable of France held, against the Emperour Charles, when hee inuaded Prouence. Great difference I know there is, and a diverse consideration to be had, betweene fuch a Countrie as France is, strengthned with many fortified places; and this of ours, where our Rampars are but of the bodies of men. And it was of inualions vpon firme land, that these great Captaines spake: whose entran-40 ces cannot be vincertaine. But our question is, of an Armic to be transported ouer Sea, and to be landed againe in an enemies Country, and the place left to the choice of the Inuader. Hereunto I say, That such an Armie cannot be resisted on the coast of England, without a fleet to impeachit; no, nor on the coast of France, or any other Countrie: except euery Creeke, Port, or sandie Bay, had a powerfull Armic, in each of them, to make opposition. For let his whole supposition be granted; That Kent is able to furnish twelve thousand foot; and that those twelve thousand be laied in the three best landing places within that Countie, to wit, three thousand at Margat, three thousand at the Nelle, and fixe thousand at Foulkflon, that is somewhat equally distant from them both; as also that two of these 50 troups (vnleffe some other order be thought more fit) bee directed to strengthen the third, when they shall see the enemies fleet to bend towards it : I say, that notwithstanding this prouision, if the enemie, setting faile from the Isle of Wight, in the first watch of the night, and towing their long boates at their sternes, shall arrive by dawne of day at the Neffe, and thrust their Armic on shore there; it will be hard for those three thousand that are at Margat, (twentie and foure long miles from thence) to come time enough to re-enforce their fellowes at the Neffe. Nay, how thall they at Foulkston bee able to doe it, who are necrer by more than halfe the way? seeing that the enemie, at his first arrivall, will cyther make his entrance by force, with three or foure hundred that of great Artillery, and quickly put the first three thoufand, that were intrenched at the Neffe, to runne; or elfe give them so much to doe, that they shall be glad to fend for helpe to Foulkston; and perhaps to Margat: where-10 by those places will bee left bare. Now let vs suppose, that all the twelue thousand Kentifo Souldiers arrive at the Neffe, ere the enemic can be ready to disimbarque his Armie, so that hee shall finde it vnsafe, to land in the face of so many, prepared to withfland him; yet must we believe, that he will play the best of his owne game; and (having liberty to goe which way he lift) under couert of the night, fet fayle towards the East, where what shall hinder him to take ground, eyther at Margat, the Donnes, or elsewhere, before they at the Nesse can be well aware of his departure? Certainly, there is nothing more easie than to doe it. Yea the like may bee fayd of Waymouth, Purbeck, Poole, and of all landing places on the South Coaft. For there is no man ignorant, that Ships, without putting themselues out of breath, will easily 20 out runne the Souldiers that coult them Les Armees ne volent point en poste; Armiesneyther flye, nor runne post, sayth a Marthall of France. And I know it to be true, that a fleet of Ships may be seene at Sunne-set, and after it, at the Lisard, wet by the next morning they may recouct Portland, whereas an Armie of foot shall not bee able to march it in fixe dayes. Againe, when those troupes, lodged on the Sea-shores, shall be forced to runne from place to place in vaine, after a fleet of Ships; they will at length fit downe in the mid-way, and leave all at adventure. But fay it were otherwife; That the inuading enemie will offer to land in some such place, where there shall be an Armie of our sreadie to receiue him, yet it cannot be doubted, but that when the choice of all our trained bands, and the choice of our Commanders 30 and Captaines, shal be drawn together (as they were at Tilburie in the yeare 1588.) to attend the person of the Prince, and for the defence of the Citie of London: they that remaine to guard the coast, can be of no such force, as to encounter an Armie likevnto that, wherewith it was intended that the Prince of Parma should have landed in England.

The Ile of Tercera hath taught vs by experience, what to thinke in fuch a cafe.
There are not many lands in the world, better fenced by nature, and ftrengthned by art: it being every where hard of accesse, having no good harbour wherein to shelter a Nauie of friends; and vpon every coue or watering place a Fort erected, to forbid the approch of an enemies boat. Yet when Emanuel de Sylua, and Monfieur 15 82.

42 de Chattes, that held it to the vie of Don Intonie, with flue or fixe thou fand men, thought to have kept the Marquesse of Santa Cruz, from setting foot on ground theringthe Marquesse having shewed himselfe in the Roade of Angra, did set faile, treany was aware of it, and arrived at the Port des Moles farre distant from thence, where hee wanne a Fort, and landed, ere Monsser, the Chattes, running thither in vaine, could come to hinder him. The example of Philip Stroßte, slaine the yeere before, without all regard of his worth, and of three hundred French prisoners murdered in cold blood, had instructed de Chattes and his followers, what they might expect at that Marquesse his hands: Therefore it is not like, that they were flow in carrying reliefe to Port des Moles. Whether our Engels would bee perswaded to

50 make such diligent haste, from Margatto the Nesse, and backe againe, it may bee doubted. Sure I am, that it were a greater march than all the length of Torcers; whereof the French-men had not measured the one haste when they found themselues preuented by the more nimble ships of Spaine.

This may suffice to proue, that a strong Armie, in a good sleet, which neither foot, nor horse, is able to follow, cannot be denied to land where it list, in England,

Hhhhh h France,

France, or elsewhere, vnlesse it be hindred, encountred, and shuffled together, by a flect of equall, or answerable strength.

The difficult landing of our English, at Fayal, in the yeere 1597. is alleaged against this: which example moues me no way to thinke, that a large coast may be defended against a strong fleet. I landed those Engsh in Fayal, my selle, and therefore ought to take notice of this instance. For whereas I finde an action of mine cited, with omiffion of my name; I may by a civill interpretation, thinke, that there was no purpose to defraud me of any honour; but rather an opinion, that the enterprise was such, or so ill managed, as that no honour could be due vnto in There were indeed some which were in that voiage, who admised me not to undertake it: 10 and I harkened vnto them, somewhat longer than was requisite, especially, whilest they defired mee, to referue the title of fuch an exploit (though it were not great) for a greater person. But when they began to tell me of difficultie: I gaue them to understand, the same which I now maintaine, that it was more difficult to defend a coast, then to inuade it. The truth is, that I could have landed my men with more ease then I did; yea without finding any relistance, if I would have rowed to another place, yea even there where I landed, if I would have taken more companie to helpe me. But, without fearing any imputation of rashnesse, I may say, that I had more regard of reputation, in that buline sie, than of safetie. For I thought it to belong vnto the honour of our Prince & Nation, that a few Ilanders should not think 20 any aduantage great enough, against a fleet for forth by Q. Elizabeth: and further, I was vnwilling, that some Low-Countrie Captaines, and others, not of mine owne fquadron, whose affishance I had refused, should please themselves with a sweet conceipt (though it would have bin short, when I had landed in some other place) That for want of their helpe I was driven to turne taile. Therfore I tooke with me none, but men affured, Comanders of mine own squadron, with some of their followers, and a few other Gentlemen, voluntaries, whom I could not refule; as, Sir William Brooke, Sir William Harney, Sir Arthur Gorges, Sir Iohn Skot, Sir Thomas Redgeway. Sir Henrie Thinne, Sir Charles Morgan, Sir Walter Chute, Marcellus Throckmorton, Captaine Laurence Kemis, Captaine William Morgan, and others, such as well vnder- 30 flood themselues and the enemie: by whose helpe, with Gods fauour, I made good the enterprise I undertooke. As for the working of the Sea, the sleepenesse of the Cliffes, and other troubles, that were not new to vs, we ouercame them well enough. And these (not withstanding) made fine or fixe Companies of the enemies, that sought to impeach our landing, abandon the wal, whereon their Musketiers lay on the rest for vs, and wonne the place of them without any great loffe. This I could have done with leffe danger, so that it should not have served for example of a rule, that failed euen in this example: but the reasons before alleaged, (together with other reasons well knowne to some of the Gentlemen about named, though more priuate, then to be here laid downe) made me rather follow the way of brauerie, and 40 take the shorter course; having it still in mine owne power to fall off when I should thinke it meet. It is eafily faid, that the Enemie was more then a Coward; (which yet was more then we knew) neither will I magnifie such a small peece of seruice, by feeking to proue him better: whom had I thought equal to mine owne followers, I would otherwise have dealt with. But for so much as concernes the Proposition in hand; he that beheld this, may well remember that the same enemic troubled vs more in our march towards Fayal, than in our taking the shore; that he sought how to ftop vs in place of his advantage; that many of our men were flayne or hurt by him, among whom Sir Arthur Gorges was shot in that march; and that such, as (thinking all danger to bee past, when we had wonne good footing) would needes 50 follow vs to the Town were driven by him to for fake the pace of a man of warre, and betake themselves to an hastie trot.

For end of this digreffion. I hope that this question shall neuer come to triall; his Majesties many moueable Forts will forbid the experience. And although the English will no lesse disdaine, than any Nation under heaten can doe, to be beaten vpon their owne ground, or elfewhere by a forraigne enemie; yet to entertaine those that shall assail evs, with their owne beefe in their bellies, and before they eate of our Kentish Capons, I take it to be the wisest way. To doe which, his Maieslie, after God, will imploy his good ships on the Sea, and not trust to any intrenchment upon the shore.

Hen, without a strong Nauie, the Romans found it altogether impossible, either to keepe what they had alreadie gotten in Siel, or to englarge their Dominions in Africa or essentie, they resoluted once againe, notwithstanding their late misaduentures, to strengthen their steet and ships of warre. So causing fiftie new Gallies to be built, and the old to be repaired, they gave them in charge (together with certaine Legions of Souldiers) to the new Consulls, C. Atilius, and L. Manlius. On the other side, Afdrubal perceiuing that the Romans, partly by reason of the shipwarke which they had lately suffered, partly by reason of the ouerthrow which they received by Xantippus in Africa, were leffe daring than they had beene in the beginning of the warre; and withall, that one of the Confulls was returned into Italie, with the one halfe of the Armie; and that Cacilius, with onely the other halfe, remained at Pa-30 normus: he removed with the Carthaginian forces from Lilybaum towards it, hoping to pronoke Cecilius to fight. But the Confull was better aduised. For when Afdrubalhad made his approches somewhat neere the Towne, Cacilius caused a deepe trench to be cut, agood distance without the ditch of the Citie: betweene which and his trench he left ground sufficient, to embattaile a Legion of his Souldiers. To these he gaue order that they should advance themselves, and passe over the new trench, till such time as the African Elephants were thrust vpon them. From those bealts he commanded them to retire, by flow degrees, till they had drawne on the Elephants to the brinke of the new trench, which they could by no meanes paffe. This they performed accordingly. For when the Elephants were at a stand, they 40 were fo gawled and beaten, both by those Souldiers that were on the inside of the trench, and by those that lay in the trench it selfe, that being inraged by their many wounds, they brake back furioufly vpontheir owne foot men, and vtterly diforderedthem. Cacilius, espying this advantage, sallied with all the force hee had; and charging the other troups, that flood embattailed, he vtterly brake them, and put them to their heels, making a great flaughter of them, and taking al their Elephants. The report of this victoric being brought to Rome, the Whole late, index with courage, prepared a new fleet of two hundred faile, which they fent into Sisih, to giue end to that warre, that had now latted four teene yeeres. With this fleet and armie the Romans refolue to attempt Lilybeam, the only place of importance which 50 the Carthaginians held in Sisil, and all (indeed) faue Drepanum, that was neere adjoyning. They fet downe before it, and poffesse themselues of all the places of advantage neere wnto it, especially of such as comand the hauen, which had a very difficult entrance. They also beat to the ground fixe towres of desence, & by for cible engines weaken so many other parts of the city, as the desendants begin to despaire.

His has a Yet

Yet Himileo, Commander of the Place, faileth not in all that belongs to a man of Warre, All that is broken, he repaireth with admirable diligences he maketh many furious fallies, and giucth to the Romans all the affronts that possibly could bee made. He hath in Garrison (besides the Citizens) ten thousand Souldiers; among which there are certaine Lieutenants, and other pettie Officers, that conspire to render and betray the Towne. But the matter is reuealed by an Achean, called alexon, who had formerly, in danger of the like treason, faued Agrigentum. Himiles yfeth the helpe of Alexon, to affure the hired Souldiers; and imployeth Hannibal to appeare the troups of the Gaules, which did waver, and had fent their agents to the enemie. All promise constancie and truth; so that the Traitors, being vn- 10 able to performe what they had undertaken, are faine to live in the Roman campe as fugitiues, that had wrought no good whereby to deserue their bread. In the meane while, a supply of ten thousand Souldiers is sent from Carthage to their reliefe, having Hannibal the sonne of Amilear, for their Conductor: who, in despight of all refistance, entred the Port and Citic, to the incredible ioy of the belieged. The old Souldiers, together with the new Companies, (thereto perswaded by Himileo with hope of great reward) resolute to set vpon the Romans in their Trenches, and either force them to abandon the fiege, or (at least) to take from them, or fet on fire, their engines of batterie. The attempt is presently made, and pursued to the vttermost, with great slaughter on both sides. But the Romans being more in number, 20 and having the advantage of the ground, hold still their places, and with extreme difficultie defend their engines.

They of Carthage defire greatly to understand the state of things at Lilyheum; but know not how to send into the Towne. A certaine Rhodium undertakes the service, and having received his dispatch, sailes with one Gallie to Legula, a little stand neere Lilyheum. Thence, taking his time, he steered directly with the Port; and having a passing swift Gallie, he past through the best of the Channel, and recovered the water gate, ereany of those, which the Romans had to guard the Port, could thrust from the thores on either side.

The next day, neither attending the couert of the darke night, nor dreading to 30 be borded by the Roman Gallies, who waited his returne, he fet faite, and finpping his Oares (his Gallie being exceeding quick of fleerage, and himfelfe expert in all parts of the channell) recovered the Hauens mouth, and the Sea, in defigight of all the purfuit made after him. Then, finding himfelfe out of danger of being incompaffed by many, he turned againe towards the mouth of the Hauen, challenging any one, if any one durft come forth, to vndertake him. This enterprife, and the well performing of it, was very remarkeable, and much wondred at in those dayes: and yet, where there was no great Artillerie, nor any other weapons of fire, to kill a-farre-off, the aduenture which this Rhodian made, was not greatly hazardous. For in this Age, a valiant and indicious man of warre will not feare to passe by the 40 belt appointed Fort of Europe, with the helpe of a good Tide, and a leading gale of wind: no, though fortie pecces of great Artillerie open their mouthes against him, and threaten to teare him in pieces.

In the beginning of our late Queenes time, when Denmarke and Sweden were at Warre; our East-Land fleet, bound for Leist-Land, was forbidden by the King of Denmarke to trade with the fubicets of his enemies, and he threatned to finke their flips if they came through the streights of Elsenan. Notwithstanding this, our Merchants (hauing a ship of her Maiessies, called the Minion, to defend them) made the adventure; and sustaining some Vollies of shot, kept on their course. The King made all the provision he could, to stop them, or finke them, at their returne. But so the Minion, commanded (as I take it) by William Burrough, leading the way, did not only passe out with little losse, but did beat downe, with attillerie, a great part of the Fort of Elsenans; which at that time was not fo well rampard, as now perhaps it is and the sleet of Merchants that followed him, wentthrough without any wound receiued. Neither was it long fince, that the Duke of Parma besseging Antwerp, and finding no possibilities to master it, otherwise then by samine, laid his Cannon on the bancke of the River, so well to purpose, and so even with the face of the water, that he thought it impossible for the least boat to passe by. Yet the Holsonders and Zelanders, not blowne up by any winde of glorie, but comming to finde agood market for their Butter and Checke, even the poore men, attending their profit when all things were extreme deare in Answerp, passed in boats of ten or twelve Tonce, by the mouth of the Dukes Cannon, in despish to sit, when a strong Wetherly winde, and a Tide of floud savoured them; as also with a contrarie to winde, and an obbing water, they turned backe againe: so as he was forced, in the ends, to build his Stockado overthwart the River, to his marvailous trouble and charge.

CHAP. 1. S. 10.

The Fort St. Philip terrified not vs in the yeere 1596, when we ented the Port of Caliz, neither did the Fort at Puntal, when we were entred, beat vs from our anthoring by it; though it plaied your swith foure Demi-cannons within point blanque, from fixe in the morning till twelue at noone. The fiege of Oftend, and of many other places, may be given for proofe, how hard a matter it is to flop the paffage of a good fhip, without another as good to encounter it, Yet this is true, that where a Fort is 60 fet, as that of Angra in Tercera, that there is no paffage along besto fide it, or that the fhips are driven to turne youn abow line towards it, wanting all helpe of winde and tide; there, and in fuch places, is it of great vse, and fearefull: otherwise not.

But to returne to our aduenturous Rhodian: Hee arriues in fafetic at Carthage, and makes them know the effate of Lihybaum. Others alfo, after this take vpon them to doe the like, and performe it with the fame fuccess. He Romans ther fore labour to choke the channell; and, for that purpose, fill many Merchants ships with great stones, and sinke them therein. The force of the Tides cleares it againe inpart: but they grounded so many of those great-bellied boats in the best of the entrance, as at last it made a manifest rising and heape, like a range of land, in the past 30 fage. Hereby it came to paffe, that a Carthaginian Gallie, taking her course by night, and not suspecting any such impediment, ranne her selse a ground thereon, and was taken. Now comes the brane Rhodian, thinking to enter, as he had done before but this Carthaginian Gallie, a little before taken, gaue him chace, and gathered vponbim; he findes what sheets, both by her forme and by her swiftinesse; and being not able to runne from herzesowed to sight with her. But she is too well manned for him, so that he is beaten and taken.

Liffseam, after this, is greatly diffressed the Souldiers being worne with labour and watching. But in this despaire there rose so violent a tempess, as some of the Romans woodden Towers, by which they ouer-topt the walls of Liffseam, were 40 ouer-turned. A Greeke Souldier undertakes to fire those that were fallen, and performes it: for the fire was no sooner kindled, but being blowne vnto by the bellowes of a tempess, it increased so fallen, and in the end burned all to affees, and melted the brasen heads of the battering Rammes. Hereupon, despaire and wearinesse histories from repairing their Engines: so that they telolue, by a long siege, to starue the desendants.

Vponrelation of what had past, a supply often thousand Souldiers is sent from **Rome, under **McLeadius*, the Confull. He arrives at **Mellam*, and marcheth ouer land to **Lilybeam*: where having re-inforced the Armie, and supplied the Gallies with new Rowers, he propounds the surprise of **Drepanum*, a Citie on the other young to the Bay of **Lilybeam*. This service the Captaines and Souldiers willingly embrace. So the Consult mbarques his troups, and arrives on the sudden in the mouth of the Port. **Alberbalis Governour of the Towne, a valiant and prudent man of warre, who being ignorant of the new supply arrived at **Lilybeam*, was at first amazed at their sudden approch; but having recovered his spirits, hee per-fwades.

fwades the Souldiers, rather to fight abroad, than to be inclosed. Herewithall hee promifeth great rewards to fuch, as by their valour shall deserue them; offering to leade them himselfe, and to fight in the head of his fleete. Having sufficiently encouraged his men, he thrufts into the Sea towards the Romans. The Confull, deceived of his expectation, calls back the foremost Gallies, that he might now marshall them for defence. Hercupon some row backward, some forward, in great confusion. Adherbal findes and followes his advantage, and forceth the Conjull into a Bay at hand, wherein he rangeth himselfe, having the land on his back : hoping thereby to keepe himselfe from being incompassed. But he was thereby, and for want of Sea-roome, so streightned, as hee could not turne himselfeany way to from his enemies, nor range himfelfe in any order. Therefore when hee found no hope of relistance, keeping the shore on his left hand, he thrust out of the Bay with thirtie Gallies, besides his owne, and so fled away: all the rest of his fleete, to the number of ninetic and foure ships, were taken or funke by the Carthaginians, Adherbal for this feruice is greatly honoured at Carthage; and Claudius, for his indifcretion and flight, as much difgraced at Rome.

The Romans, notwithstanding this great losse, arme threescore Gallies, with which they fend away L. Junius, their Confull, to take charge of their businessein Sicil. Junius arrives at Messana, where he meets with the whole remainder of the Roman fleet, those excepted which rode in the Port of Lilybaum. One hundred and 20 twentie Gallies he had; and belides thefe, hee had gotten together almost eight hundred thips of burthen, which were laden with all necessarie provisions for the Armie. With this great fleet he arrives at Syracuse, where he staies a while; partly to take in corne; partly, to wait for some, that were too slow of faile, to keepe companie with him along from Messana. In the meane time, hee dispatcheth away to wards Lilybaum, his Quaffors or Treasurers; to whom he commits the one halfe of his victuallers, with some Gallies for their conuoy.

Abherbal was not carclesse, after his late victorie : but studied how to vse it to the best advantage. The ships and prisoners that he had taken, he sent to Carthage. Of his owne Gallies hee deliuered thirtie to Carthalo, who had threefcore and ten 29 more under his owne charge; and fent him to trie, what good might be done against the Roman fleet, in the Hauen of Lilybaum. According to this direction, Carthalo fuddenly enters the mouth of that Hauen, where he findes the Romans, more attentine to the keeping in of the belieged Carthaginians, than to the defence of their owne against another fleet. So hee chargeth them, boards and takes some, and fires the rest. The Roman Campetakes alarme, and hastens to the rescue. But Himileo. Gouernour of the Towne, is not behinde hand; who fallies out at the fame time, and putting the Romans in great diffresse, gives Carthalo good leifure to go through with his enterprise.

After this exploit, Carthalo ranne all along the South coast of Sicil, deuising how 40 to worke mischiefe to the enemie: wherein Fortune presented him with a faire occasion, which he wisely managed. He was advertised by his Scouts, that they had descried, necre at hand, a great fleet, confisting of all manner of Vessells. These were the victuallers, which the Confull Junius, more hastily than providently, had fent before him towards Lilybaum, Carthalo was glad to heare of their comming: for hee and his men were full of courage, by reason of their late victories. Accompting therefore the great multitude of Roman Hulks approching to be rather a prey, than a fleet, likely to make frong opposition, he hastens to encounter them. It fell out according to his expectation. The Romans had no minde to fight: but were glad to feeke shelter in an open Road, full of rocks, vnder couert of a poore Towne, 50 belonging to their partie; that could helpe to faue them only from the prefent danger, by lending them engines and other aide, wherewith to beat off the Carthaginians that affailed them. Cartbalo therefore, having taken a few of them, lay waiting for the rest, that could not long ride under those rocks, but would be forced, by any great change of winde, either to put out into the deepe, or to faue their men, how they could, by taking land, with the loffe of all their shipping. Whilest he was bulied in this care; the Confull Innius drew neere, and was discoucred. Against him Carthalo makes out, and findes him altogether vnprepared to fight, as being whollyignorant of that which had hapned. The Confull had neither meanes to flie, nor abilitie to fight. Therefore he likewise ran into a very dangerous Creeke; thinking no danger fo great, as that of the enemie. The Carthagman, feeing this, betakes himselfeto a Station betweene the two Roman fleets; where hee watcheth. to fee which of them would first stirre, with a resolution to affault that, which

10 (hould first dare to put it selfe into the Sea. So as now all the three fleets were on the South coast of Sicil, betweene the Promontorie of Pachinus and Lilybeum; a Trast exceeding dangerous, when the winde stormed at South. The Carthaginians, who knew the times of tempest, and their fignes, finding (belike) some swelling billow (for so we doe in the West of England, before a Southerly storme) hasted to double the Cape of Pachinus, thereby to couer themselves from the rage at hand. But the Romans, who knew better how to fight, than how to Nauigate, and neuer found any foule weather in the entrailes of their beafts, their Soothfayers being all land prophets, were suddenly ouer-taken with a boisterous South winde, and all their Gallies forced against the rocks, and veterly wrackt.

CHAP.I. S.10.

20 This calamitie so discouraged the Romans, that they resolved agains to forsake the Seas, and trust onely to the service of their Legions vpon firme ground. But fuch a refolution cannot long hold. Either they must be strong at Sea, or else they mult not make warre in an Hand, against those that have a mightier fleet. Yet are they to Leexcused, in regard of the many great calamities which they had suffered, through their want of skill. Here I cannot forbeare to commend the patient vertueof the Spaniards. We seldome or neuer finde, that any Nation hath endured so many misaduentures and miseries, as the Spaniards haue done, in their Indian Discoueries. Yet perfishing in their enterprises, with an inuincible constancie, they have annexed to their Kingdome so many goodly Provinces, as buriethe remembrance

30 of all dangers past. Tempests and shipwracks, famine, ouerthrowes, mutinies, heat and cold,pcftilence, and all manner of diseases, both old and new, together with extreme pouertie, and want of all things needfull, have beene the enemies, wherewith enery one of their most noble Discouerers, at one time or other, bath encountred. Many yeeres have passed over some of their heads, in the search of not so many leagues: yea more then one or two, haue spent their labour, their wealth, and their lines, in search of a golden Kingdome, without getting further notice of it, than what they had at their first setting forth. All which notwithstanding, the third, fourth, and fift undertakers, have not beene disheartned. Surely, they are worthily rewarded with those Treasuries, and Paradises, which they enjoy; and

CHAP. 1. S. 11.

HE Romans were carefull, to supply with all industrie, by land, the want of strength at Sea. Therefore they continue the slege of Lity-baum, and seeketo make sure to themselves all places, whither the enemies ships could not bring reliefe. The Consul lunius, to cure the wound of dishonour, which hee had received, bethought him what enterprise to vndertake. In the end hee resolued to attempt the Mountaine and Citie of Eryx, with the Temple of Venus Erycina: which was the fairest and richest of all the Iland; and of these, by cunning or treason, hee got possession. Eryz was commodiously seated betweene Drepanum and Panormus; so that it seemed a fit place for a Garrison, that should restraine the Carthaginians from making roads 20 into the Countrie. Wherefore Junius fortified both the top of the Mountaine, and the first entrance of the passage from the bottome, ( both which places were verie defencible) with a good strength of men. But shortly after, in the eighteenth yeere of this warre, the Carthaginians sent forth Amilear, surnamed Bareas, Father of the great Hannibal, with a flect and armie, who failing to the coasts of Italie, did throughly repay the spoiles which the Romans made in Africa. For hee first of all wasted and destroied the Territories of the Locrines, and of the Brutians, that were dependants of Rome. Then entred hee into Sicil; and finding there no walled Citie in the Carthaginians power, that ferued fitly to infest the Romans, hee occupied a peece of ground of great aduantage, and lodged his Armie thereon; to 30 confront as well the Romans, that were in Panormus, as those that kept about Ergx, putting himselfe betweene both Armies with admirable resolution.

The place that Amilear had seized upon, was not only very strong by situation, but had the command of a Port: whereby it gaue him oportunitie, to scourcall the coast of Italie with his fleet, wasting all along as farre as to Cuma. In the Isle of Sicil hee held the Romans to hard worke: lying neere vnto Panormus, where in three yeares abode hee did many notable acts, though not of much confequence, for that the enemic could neuer bee drawne to hazard the maine chance. Having wearied himselfe and the Romans long enough about Panormus, hee vndertooke a strange pecce of worke at Eryx. The Roman Garrisons, placed there by Iunius, on 40 the top, and at the bottome of the Mountaine, were very strongly lodged. Neuerthelesse Amilear found a way, lying towards the Sea-side, by which heeconueighed his men into the Citie of Eryx, that was about the middest of the ascent, ere the enemie knew of it. By this it came to passe, that the Romans which kept the top of the Mountaine, were streightly held (as it were) befreged. And no leffe was Amilear himselfe restrained, by both of these Garrisons, and such as came to relieue them. There he found them pastime about two yeeres more; hoping still to wearie out those that lay ouer his head, as they on the contrarie did their best, to thrust him out of those quarters.

At this time, all the care, both of the Romans and of the Carthaginians, was bent 50 vnto the profequating of this bufineffe at Errx. Wherein it feemes true (as Hanni-Ein.Det.3. Lio. bal, in Liuie, Spake vnto Scipio) that the affaires of Carthage neuer stood in better termes, fince the beginning of the warre, than now they did. For whereas the Romans had veterly for fakenthe Seas, partly by reason of their great losses; partly voon confidence of their land-forces, which they held reliftleffe; smilear, with a small Armie, had so well acquited himselfe, to the honour of his Countrie, that by the triall of fine yeares warre, the Carthaginian Souldier was judged equal, if not fuperiour to the Roman. Finally, when all, that might be, had been deuised and gone, for the dislodging of this obstinate Warriour: no way seemed better to the Senate of Rome, than once againe to build a fleet; whereby, if the mastrie of the Sca could once be gotten, it was likely that Amilear, for lack of supply, should not long beable to hold out. But in performing this, extreme difficultie was found. The o common treasurie was exhausted : and the cost was not little, that was requisite vnto such an enterprise. Wherefore there was none other way left, than to lay the burden vpon private purses. Divers of the principall Citizens vndertooke to build (each at his owne charges) one Quinquereme, which example wrought fo well, that they, whose abilitic would not serue to doe the like, joyned with some others and laying their monie together, cocurred two or three of them, in building of another; with condition to be repaied, when the warre was finished. By this voluntarie contribution, they made and furnished two hundred new Quinqueremes: taking for their patterne that excellent fwift-rowing Gallie which they had gotten from the Rhadien, in the Port of Lilybeum, as was shewed before. The charge of this fleet was 20 committed to C. Luctatius Catalus; who past with the same into Sicil, the Spring following, and entred the Port of Drepanum, indeuouring by all meanes to haue forced the Citie. But being advertised that the Carthaginian fleet was at hand, and being mindfull of the late loffes which his Predeceffours had received; he was care.

full to put him felfe in order, against their arrivall. Hanno was Admiral of the Carthaginian fleet; a man (as his actions declare him) wise in picture, exceedingly formall, and skilfull in the arte of seeming reverend. How his reputation was first bred, I doe not finde; but it was vp-held by a factious contradiction, of things undertaken by men more worthie than himfelfe. This qualitic procured vnto him (as it hath done to many others) both good liking a-20 mong the ancient fort, whose cold temper is auerse from new enterprises, and therewithall an opinion of great fore-fight, confirmed by enery loffe received. More particularly, hee was gracious among the people, for that hee was one of the most grieuous oppressours of their subject Prouinces; whereby he procured vnto the Carthaginians much wealth, but there with all fuch hatred, as turned it al to their great loffe. Hee had ere this beene imployed againft the Numidians, and wilde Africans, that were more like to Rouers, than to Souldiers, in making Warre. Of those fugitine Nations, hee learned to neglect more manly enemies, to his owne great dilhonour, and to the great hurt of Carthage; which loft not more by his bad conduct, then by his malicious counfaile, when, having shewed himselfe an 40 vnworthie Captaine he betooke himfelfe to the long Robe. Yet is hee much commended in Roman Histories, as a temperate man, and one that studied how to preferue the League betweene Carthage and Rome. In which regard, how well hee descrued of his owne Countrie, it will appeare hereafter: how beneficiall bee was to the Romans, it will appeare, both hereafter, and in his present voyage; wherein hereduced the Carthaginians to a milerable necessitie of accepting, vpon hard conditions, that peace which he thence-forth commended.

Hanno had very well furnished his Nauie, with all needfull prouisions for the Souldiers at Errx: (for dexteritie in making preparation was the best of his qualities) but hee had neither beene carefull in trayning his Mariners, to the practice of 50 Sea fight, nor in manning his Gallies with front fellowes. Hee thought, that the fame of a Carthaginian fleet was enough; to make the vnexpert Romans give way: forgetting, that rather the reliftleffe force of tempelts, than any other strength of opposition, had made them to for sake the Seas. Yet in one thing hee had either conceined a right, or else was sent forth well instructed. It was his purpose, first of all to faile to Eryx, and there to discharge his ships of their lading: and having thus lightned himselfe, he meant to take aboord some part of the Land-armie, together with Amilear himselfe, by whose helpe he doubted not, but that he should be able to make the enemie repent of his new aduenture to Sea. This was a good course. if it could have beene performed. But Catulus vied all possible diligence, to preuent the execution of this deligne: not because hee was informed of the enemies purpole, but for that he knew it to be the best for them, and for that feared no danger fo greatly, as to encounter with Amilear. Wherefore although the weather was very rough, and the Seas went high, when the Carthaginian fleet was descried; 10 vet he rather chose to fight with the enemie, that had the winde of him, than to fuffer this convoy to paffe along to Eryz, vpon vnlikely hope of better oportunitie in the future. All that Hanno should have done, Catulus had performed. Heehad carefully exercised his men in Rowing; hee had lightned his Gallies of all unnecessarie burthen; and hee had taken abourd the choice men of the Roman Land fouldiers. The Carthaginians therefore, at the first encounter. were veterly broken and defeated; having fiftie of their Gallies stemmed and funke, and seventie taken, wherein were sew lesse than ten thousand men, that were all made prisoners: the rest, by a sudden change of winde, escaping to the Ile

The flate of Garthage, vtterly discouraged by this change of fortune, knew not whereon to resolve. Meanes to repaire their steete in any time there were none left; their best men of warre by Sea were conssimed; and Amslear, vpon whose valour and judgement the honour and safetic of the Common weale rested, was now surrounded by his enemies in Sisis, where hee could not bee relieved. In this extremitie, they make dispatch vnto Amslear himselfe, and authorize him to take what cour se should seeme best vnto his excellent wisedome; leauing all conclusions

Amilian, whom no aduerfitie, accompanied with the leaft hope or possibilitie of recouerie, had euer vanquished, looking ouer euery promise, true or talie, that 30 the present time could make him, (for to attend any thing from the surrenee was not able) resoluted to make triall, whether his necessite might bee compounded vpon any reasonable termes. He therefore sent to Lusstanian the Consull an Ouer-ture of peace: who considering it well, gathered so many arguments from the present powertie of the Roman State, wasted beyond expectation in the former warre, that he willingly harkened vnto it. So, in conclusion, an accord was made, but with prouision, T hat it should hold none otherwise, than if the Senate and People of Rome would ratifie it with their allowance.

The conditions were: First, that the Carthaginians should clearely abandon the Isle of Sicil. Secondly, that they should neuer under-take upon Hieron King 40 of Syracu?, nor inuade any part of his Teritories, nor the Territories of any of his Friends and Allies. Thirdly, that they should set at libertie, and send back into Italie., all the Remans, whom they hold prisoners, without ransome. Lastly, that they should pay unto the Romanstwo thousand and two hundred talents; which make, as the French reckon the talent, thirteene hundred and twentie thousand crownes: the same to be delivered within twentie yeeres next

These Articles were sent to Rome, where they were not throughly approued but ten Commissioners were sent into Sieil, to make perfect the agreement. These Commissioners added a thousand talents to the former summe; and required a 50 shorter time of payment. Further also, they tooke order, that the Carthaginians should not onely depart out of Sieil it selfe, but should also with draw their Companies out of all the other Ilands betweeneit and Italie, renouncing their whole interest therein.

Such was the end of the first Punish Warre, that had lasted about twentie foure yeares without intermission; in which time the Romans had lost, by fight or shipwrack, about seven hundred Quinqueremes; and the Carthaginians, about seven hundred: the greatness of which losses, doth serve to prove the greatness both of the two Cities, and of the Warreit selfe; wherein I hold good the judgement of Poylins, That the Romans, in generall, did show themselves the brauer Nation; and Amilew, the most worthic Captains,

CHAP.2. S.I.

HE Romans, having partly by force, and partly by compolition, thrust the Carthaginians out of sind, and all the little llands thereuntoadjacent, gaue them rather meanes and leifure to helpe themselves contented with the present peace. It is a true rule, Qué dlages à vissoribus dieuntur, accipantur à vissi ; That lawes & Cural, si ar guendy the Conqueron, and received of the conquered, But the Romans had either forgotten the answer that was made vuto them, by one of the Primr paste; or nesse. For when one of Privernam, after a rebellion, desending in the Senate the cause of his Catic, was demanded by a Senator, Whit peace the Remain might hope for, or assert themselves of its catic, which they quitted their present advantage over them; he answered in 9 these words. St boarm deserties, & Felam & perpetuan; is mulam, have dusturnam; if the peace be good and faithfull that you gine vs. it will be perpetual; if it be ill, then of hitle continuance. To this answere, the Senate, at that time, gave such approbation, that it was said. First & their warm and the many mineral, duiting nature energis it manssum? That it was said, which continues, evince cumpentical, duiting nature energis it manssum? That it was the speech of amonty, and a free man, for who could beleeue, that any people, or indeed any one man, would continue longer in an oner-burdened estate, than meere necessitie did engree? Now the Romans themselves could make this judgement, of those Mations, who had little else, besides their manly resolution, to desend their libertie; surely, they grossly flattered themselves, in presuming, that the Carthaginians, 39 who neither in power nor in pride, were any way inseriour vnto themselves, would be such as a proper way longer by the losse and dibnonvergency in each of the surface.

fitdowne any longer by the loffe and dishonour received, than untill they could recouer their legs, and the strength, which had a while failed them, to take reuenge. But Occasion, by whom (while well entertained) not only private men, but Kings and publique States, haue more prevailed, than by any proper prowesse or vertue;

with-held the tempest from the Romans for a time, and turned it most fearefully vpon Africa, and the Carthaginians themselues.

For after that the first Punick Warre was ended; Amilear, Icauing Eryx, went to Lilybeum, from whence most conveniently the Armie might be transported into Africk: the care of which businesse he committed vnto Gesco, to whom, as to a man of approved sufficiencie, he delivered over his charge. Gefco had an especiall consideration of the great summes, wherein Carthage was indebted vnto these Mercinaries; and, withall, of the great disabilitie to make paiment. Therefore he thought it the wifest way, to send them ouer (as it were) by handfulls, a few at a time; that fo the first might haue their dispatch, and be gone, ere the second or third Com- 10 panies arrived. Herein hee dealt providently. For it had not beene hard to perfwade any small number, lodged within so great a Citic as Carthage, vnto some such reasonable composition, as the present emptinesse of the common T reasurie did require : so that the first might have beene friendly discharged, and a good president left vnto the second and third, whilest their desiunction had made them vnableto recouer their whole due by force. But the Carthaginians were of a contrarie opinion. They thought to finde, in the whole Armic, some that would be contented to gratifie the Publique state, by remitting a great part of their owne due: and hoped by fuch an example, todraw all the multitude to the like agreement and capitulation. So they detayned the first and second commers; telling them, that they 20 would make an euen reckoning with all together. Thus euery day the number increased, and many disorders (a thing incident among Souldiers) were committed; which much disquieted the Citie, not accustomed vnto the like. In this regard it was thought fit, to remove them all to some other place where they might be lesse troublesome. This must be done by some colourable words of perswasion : for their number was alreadic fo great, that it was not fafe to offend them too farre. Wherefore it is deuised, that they should all attend the comming of their fellowes, at Sieca: receiving every one a peece of gold, to beare his charges in the meane while. This motion is accepted, and the Souldiers beginne to diflodge; leaning behinde them their wives, their children, and all their baggage, as meaning shortly 30 to fetch away all, when they came back for their pay. But the Carthaginians have no fancie to their returning into the Townes and therefore compell them to truffe vp their fardells, that they might have none occasion left, to make any errands thither. So to Sicca they removed, with all their goods; and there lay waiting for newes of their fellowes arrivall, and their owne pay. Businesse they had none to doe, and therfore might eafily be drawne to mutinie: the whole argument of their discourse inclining them to nothing else. Their daily talke was, how rich they should be, when all their mony came in how much would fall to every single share; and for how long time the Citie was behinde hand with them in reckoning. They were all growne Arithmeticians; and hee was thought a man of worth, that could 40 finde most reason to increase their demands, to the very highest, even beyond their due. No part of their long seruice was forgotten; but the comfortable words and promifes of their Captaines, leading them forth to any dangerous fight, were called to minde, as so many obligations, not to be cancelled, without satisfying their expectation by some vnordinarie largesse.

Thus the time paffeth away; vntill the whole Armie being arrived, and lodged in Sicea, Hanne comes thither to cleare the accompt. Now is the day come, wherein they shall all be made rich; especially if they can hold together, in maintaining stoutly the common cause. So thinke they all; and affemble themselves to heare what good newes this messenger had brought: with a a full resolution to help his 50 memorie, in case he should happen to forget any part of the many promises made vnto them; all which were to be considered in their Donatiue. Hanne begins a verie formall Oration; wherein he bewailes the powertie of Carthage; tells them, how great a summe of mony is to be paid vnto the Roman; reckons vy the excessive charges, whereat the common-wealth had beene in the late warre; and finally defires them to hold themselues contented with part of their pay, and out of the loue which they bare vnto the Citie, to remit the rest. Few of them understood his discourse: for the Carthaginian Armic was composed of fundry Nations, as Greekes, Africans, Gaules, Ligurians, Spaniards, and others, all of different languages. Yetthey stared vpon him, and were (as I thinke) little pleased with his very gesture. But when such, as conceived the whole tenour of his speech, had informed the rest what cold comfort he brought; they were all enraged, and fared like mad men, fo that nothing would ferue to appeale them. Hanno would faine have affwaged their 10 furie, but he knew not how: for hee leffe vnderstood their dissonant lowde noises, than they did his Oration. An Armie collected out of many countries, that have no one language common to all, or to the greater part of them, is neither easily stirred vp to mutinic, nor cassly pacified, when once it is broken into outrage. The best that Hanno can doe, is to vie the helpe of Interpreters, and messengers. But these Interpreters miltake his meaning; some, for want of skill; others, of set purpose; and such as deliuer his errandes in the worst sense, are best beleeued. Finally, they thinke themselues much abused by the Carthaginians, and resolue to demand their owne in peremptorie termes, at a neerer distance. In this moode they leave Sicea, and march as farre as Tunis, that is within a little of Carthage, and there they

Now begin the Carthaginians to find their one errour. It is a good rule,

Haue speciall care, that valiant ponertie Be not oppress with too great injurie.

But this proud citie, having neglected the rule, hath also beene carelesse in proud-30 ding to secure her selfe against the inconvenience that might followe. She had suffered the whole multitude, whereunto shee was like to give cause of discontent, to ioyne it selfe into one bodie, when the seuerall troupes might easily have beene dispersed : shee hath turned out of her gates the wives, children, and goods of these pooremen, which had shee retained in shew of kindnesse, shee might have vsed them as Hostages, for her owne safetie; and by imploying a miserable pennie-father, in her negotiation with men of warre, shee bath weakened the reputation of her brauest Captaines, that might best haue scrued to free her from the threatning danger. Yet likely enough it is, that Amilear had no defire to be vsed as an instrumet indefrauding his owne fouldiours of their wages: epecially confidering, that as he to best could beare witnesse of their merits, so was hee not ignorant, that meanes to content them were not wanting, if the Citizens had beene willing thereunto. Hereto may be added a probable coniecture, that Hanno, with his complices, who at this very time was a bitter enemie to Amilear, had the boldneffe to impose the blame of his owne wretched counsaile, vpon the liberall promises made by the Captaines. Amilear therefore did wifely, in suffering those that maligned him, to haue the managing of their own plot, and to deale the cards which themselues had shuffled. This they continue to doe as foolishly, as they had at first begun. They furnish a market at Tunis, for the soul diours; whom they suffer to buy what they lift, and at what price they lift. They fend euer and anon some of their Senatours 30 into the Campe, who promise to satisfie all demands, as farre forth as it should be possible. And thus by shifting from one extreme to another, they make the souldiours understand, into what feare the City was driven; which cannot but adde much insolency to the passions alreadie stirred vp.

This sudden change of weather, and the true cause of it, is quickly found by the

CHAP.2. S.I.

Armie, which thereupon growes wife, and finding the feafon fit, labours to make a great haruest. Monie must be had, and without any abatement. This is granted. Many haue lost their horses, in publique service of the state. The state shall pay for them. They had lived some yeares, by making hard shift, without receiving their allowance of victualls from Carthage. If they had lived, they wanted not meat; therefore what was this to the Carthaginians? Was it not all one, whether the thips did bring in prouision; or their Captaine direct them where to fetch it? But this would not ferue. They faid that they had beene sometimes driven to buy; and that (fince they could not remember, how much, or at what rate they bought) they would be paid for their prouision, during the whole time, and according to the 10 dearest price that wheat had borne, whilest the warre lasted. Such are now the demands of these Mutiners; who might easily have beene satisfied with farre lesse charges, and farre more honour, by receiving their due at the first. But now they make none end of craving. For whileft the Carthaginians are perplexed about this corne-monie; the Souldiers have deuised many more tricks, whereby to extort a greater fumme of monie, without all regard of shame. Since therefore no good end could bee found of the secontrouersies which daily did multiply, it was thought convenient, that one of the Carthaginians, which had commanded in Sicil, should be chosen by the Souldiers, to reconcile all differences. Hereunto the Armie condescended, and made choise of Geseo: partly out of good liking to him, who had 20 shewed himselfe at all times a friendly man to them, and careful of their good, especially when they were to be transported into Africk : partly out of a diflike which they had conceined of similear; for that he had not visited them in all this busic time. So Ge/co comes among them; and, to please them the better, comes not without monie: which might give better countenance to his proceedings, than barren cloquence had done to the negotiation of Hanno. Hee calles vnto him first of all, the Captaines, and then, the feuerall Nations apart; rebuking them gently for that which had passed; adming them temperatly concerning the present; and exhorting them to continue their love vnto the State, which had long entertained them, and would alwaics be mindfull of their good services. After this he beganne to put 30 hand to his purse: offering to give them their whole paie in hand; and then after to confider of other recknonings at a more convenient time. This had beene well accepted, and might have served to bring all to a quiet passe; if two seditious ringleaders of the multitude had not flood against it.

There was in the Campe one Spendius, a sturdie fellowe, and audacious, but a flaue; that in the late warre had fled from a Roman whom hee ferued, and therefore flood in feare, left he should be deliuered backe to his Master; at whole hands he could expect no leffe, than to be whipt and crucified. This wretch could finde no better way to prolong his owne life, than by raifing fuch troubles as might ferue to withdraw men from care of private matters, and make his owne resti- 40 tution impossible, were his Master neuer so importunate. With Spendius there affociated himselfe one Matho; an hote-headed man, that had beene so forward in stirring up the tumult, as hee could not choose but feare, lest his owne death should bee made an example, to deterre others from the like seditious behauiour. This Matho deales with his Countrimen, the Africans; telling them, that they were in farre worse condition, than either the Gaules, the Greekes, the Spaniards, or any forreyne mercinaries. For (faith he) thefe our companions have no more to doe, than to receive their wages, and so get them gone: but wee, that are to stay behinde in Africa, shall be called to another manner of accompt, when wee are left alone; so that we shall have cause to wish, that wee had returned home beggers, rather than loaden with 50 the monie, which (little though it be) shall breake our backes. Tee are not ignorant, how tyrannically the feour haughtie Masters of CARTHAGE doe reigne over vs. They thinke it reasonable, that our lines and goods should be at their disposition; which they have at other times beene accustomed to take away from vs, even without apparent cause, as it were to declare their Sourreigntie: what will they now doe, seeing that we have demeaned our selves as free men, and beene bold to fet a good face on the matter, demanding our owne, as others have done? Ye all doe know, that it were a very shame for vs. if having beene as forward in cuerie danger of warre, as any other men, we should now fland quaking like slaves, and nut dare to open our mouthes, when others take libertie to require their due. This not with standing see may affure your felues, that we are like to be taugh; better manners, as foone as our fellowes are gone: in regard of whom they are contented to hadow their indignation with a good, but a forced countemance. Let vs therefore be wife; and confider, that they have and teare us. Their hatred will shew it selfe, when their feare is once past: unlesse wee now take 10 our time, and, whileft we are the stronger, enfeeble them so greatlie, that their hatred shal not be able to doe vs wrong. All their strength consisteth in monie, wherewithall they have bired others against vs, and vs against others. At the present they have neither monte nor friends. The best A mie that ever served them, whereof wee are no small part, lies at their gates, readie to helpe vs if we be men. A better opportunitie cannot be expected: for were our swords once drawne, all A FRICK would rife on our side. As for the CART HAGI-NIANS, whither can they fend for helpe? The case it selfe is plaine: but we must quickely resolue. Either we must prevent the diligence of GESCO, by incensing these GAVLES and SPANIAR DEs, and procuring them to drawe bloud, or elfeit behoueth vs to please our goodmasters, by toyning with them against our fellowes, yea by offering to jorgine waso 20 them all our wages, if fo (peraduenture) they may be wonne to forgine vs, or not overcruelly topunish our faults already committed. Hee is worthily a wretched laue, that neither hathcare to winne his Masters love, nor courage to attempt his owne libertie.

By fuch perfwasions Maths winnes the African fouldiers to his owne purpose. They are not now fo greedie of monie, as of qurraell; which hee that seekes, will not mille to finde. When Gefes therefore offered to pay them their whole stipend presently, but referred their other demandes, for horses and victualles to some other more convenient time; they breake into great outrage, and say that they will have all, even all at once, and that out of hand. In this tumult, the whole Armie flocketogether about Okatho and Spendius; whose diligence is not wanting, to adde 30 more fuell to the fire alreadie blazing. Matho and Spendius are the onely men to whom the souldours will hearken; if any other stand up to make a speech, as showed of slones, stying about his eares, puts him to slience, that hee shall never a sterwards speake word more. Neither shay they to consider what it is that any man would say: enough hath beene said alreadie by these good spokesmen; so that no other word (though perhaps to the same purpose) can bee heard, saw onely throwe, throwe. Now the Rebellion beginnes to take forme. Matho and Spendius are chosen Captaines; who, followed by a desperate crue of Russians, will suffer no man to make his owne peace, but pursue their owne ends, under faire pretence of the com-40 mon cause. All which notwithstanding, Gesco is not wanting to the good of his countrie, but aduentures himselfe vpon their furie. One while hee deales with the Captaines, and other principall men; taking them by the hand, and giving gentle words: another while hee workes with the feuerall Nations; putting them all in hope of their owne hearts desire, if any reason would content them. None of them are so fullen as the Africans: indeed none of them had so good cause. They require him peremptorilie, to give them their owne, and not to feed them with wordes. The truth is, that they are not so couctous as they seeme: but will be more glad of anillanswere, then of a good payment. This is more then Gesco knowes: he sees not that Matho hath, any more then bare words, to bestow vpon them. Wherefore, as 30 rebuking their inconsiderate heat, he telles them, That they may doe well, if they stand in want of monie, to seeke it of their Captaine, Mathe. This is enough. Shall he both defraud them & deride them? They stay no longer, but lay violent hands vpon the treasure that he had brought; yea vpon him also, and al that are with him: as intending to take this in part of paiment, and, for the rest, to take another course. Matho and Spendius are glad of this. It had little pleased them to see their fellowes beginne to grow calme, by his faire language: wherefore they cast into bonds both him, and all the Carthaginians that they can finde; that fo the Armie may be freed from danger of good admonition, which they call Treason. After this followes open warre. Matho follicites all Africk; and his Embassadours are euerie where wellentertained. Neither is it needefull to vse perswasion: the very fame of this rebellion sufficeth to drawe the whole countrie into it. Now must the Carthaginians bee plagued for those oppressions, with which they have plagued others. It is true that aduersitie hath neuer beene vntold of her errours: and as she is euer assu- to red to heare her owne, so commonly with her owne shee vndergoes those of other men. The Africans, finding the Carthaginians hang under the wheele, tell them boldly, that their Impolitions were mercileffe; that they tooke from them the one halfe of their corne; that they doubled their tributes in al things else; and that they inflicted vpon their vaffals the greatest punishments for the least offences. These cruelties the Carthaginians themselves have forgotten: but the people, that have fuffered so much, retaine all in perfect memorie. Wherefore not onely such as can beare armes, are ready to doe service in this great Commotion; but the very women bring forth their iewels, and other ornaments, offering all to sale for maintenance of so iusta quarrell. By this great forwardnesse, and liberall contribution, 20 Matho and Spendius are supplied with a strong aide of threescore and tenne thoufand Africans : and are moreover furnished with monie, not onely to satisfie the present appetite of their men, but sufficient to continue the warre begun, though it should be of long endurance.

à. II.

Diners observations upon this warre with the mercinaries.

Of Tyrannie, and how tyrants are driven to whe helpe of mercinaries.

Ere let vs rest awhile, as in a convenient breathing place: whence wee may take prospect of the subject; ouer which we trauaile. Behold a 40 styrannical Citie, persecuted by her owne mercinaries with a deadly warre. It is a common thing, as being almost necessarie, that a tyrannie should bee vpheld by mercinarie forces: it is common that mercina-

ries should be false: and it is common that all warre made against T yrants, should be exceeding full of hate and crueltie. Yet wee feldome heare, that the ruine of a Tyrannic is procured or fought, by those that were hired to maintaine the power of it: and seldome or neuer doe we reade of any warre, that hath beene prosecuted with fuch inexpiable hatred, as this that is now in hand.

That which we properly call Tyrannie, is A violent forme of government, not respecting the good of the subject, but onely the pleasure of the Commander. I purposely 50 forbeare to fay, that it is the vniust rule of one ouer many : for verie truely doth Clean in Thurydides tell the Atbenians, that their dominion over their subjects, was none other than a meere tyranny; though it were fo, that they themselues were

were a great Citie, and a popular estate. Neither is it peraduenture greatly needefull, that I should call this forme of commanding, violent: tince it may well and casily bee conceiued, that no man willingly performes obedience, to one regardleffe of his life and welfare; vnleffe himfelte bee either a mad man, or (which is little better) wholly possessed with some extreme passion of loue. The practice of tyrannie, is not alwaies of a like extremitie: for fome Lords are more gentle, than others, to their very flaues; and he that is most cruell to some, is milde enough towards others, though it be but for his owne advantage. Neuertheleffe, in large Dominions, wherein the Rulers discretion cannot extend it selfe, vnto notice of the difference which might bee found betweene the worth of feuerall men; it is commonly seene, that the taste of sweetnesse, drawne out of oppression, hath sogood a rellilly as continually inflames the Tyrants appetite, and will not fuffer it to bee refirained with any limits of respect. Why should he seeke out bounds, to prescribe vnto his defires, who cannot endure the face of one fo honeit, as may put him in remembrance of any moderation? It is much that hee hath gotten, by extorting from some few: by sparing none, hee should have riches in goodly aboundance. He hath taken a great deale from enery one: but enery one could have spared more. He hath wrung all their purses, and now he hath enough: but (as Couctousnesse is neuer fatisfied) he thinkes that all this is too little for a stock, though 20 it were indeede a good yearely Income. Therefore he denifeth new tricks of robberie, and is not better pleased with the gaines, then with the Art of getting. He is hated for this , and he knowes it well . but hee thinkes by crueltie to change hatred into feare. So he makes it his exercise, to torment and murder all, whom he suspeeteth : in which course, if he suspect none vnjustly, he may be said to dealecrastily; but if Innocency be not fafe, how can all this make any Conspiratour to stand in feare, fince the Traitor is no worse rewarded, than the quiet man? Whereforehee can thinke vpon none other securitie, than to disarme all his Subjects; to fortific himselfe within some strong place; and for defence of his Person and state, to hire as many luttie Souldiers as shall be thought sufficient. These must not beeof his 20 owne Countrie: for if not every one, yet fome one or other might chance to have afeeling of the publique miscrie. This considered, he allures vnto him a desperate rabble of strangers, the most vnhonest that can bee found; such as have neither wealth nor credit at home, and will therefore be careful to support him, by whose onely fauour they are maintained Now left any of these, either by detestation of his wickednesse, or (which in wicked men is most likely) by promise of greater reward, than he doth gine. should be drawne to turne his sword against the Tyrant himselfe: they shall all be permitted to doe as he doth; to robbe, to rauish, to murder, and to satisfic their owncapperites, in most outragious manner; being thought so much the more affured to their Master, by how much the more he sees

40 them grow hatefull to all men elfe. Considering in what Age, and in what Language I write; I must be faine to say, that these are not dreames: though some Englift-man perhaps that were vnacquainted with Historie, lighting vpon this leafe, might suppose this discourse to be little better. This is to shew, both how tyrannie growes to stand in need of mercinarie Souldiers, and how those Mercinaries are, by mutuall obligation, firmely assured vnto the Tyrant.

That the tyrannie of a Citie ouer her Subjects is worse, than the tyrannie of one man: and that a tyrannicall Citie must likewise vse mercinary

 $N_{\rm jects}^{\rm Ow}$  concerning the tyrannie, wherewith a Citic or State oppresses the Cubjects; it may appear esome waies to be more moderate, then that of one man but in many things it is more intolerable. A Citie is jelous of her Dominion; but not (as is one man) fearefull of her life : the leffe neede hath shee therefore, to fe. 10 cure her selfe by crueltie. A Citie is not luxurious in consuming her treasures; and therefore needes the leffe, to pluck from her Subjects. If warre, or any other great occasion, driue her to necessitie, of taking from her Subjects more than ordinarie fummes of monie: the same necessitie makes either the contribution casie, or the taking excusable. Indeede, no wrongs are so gricuous and hatefull, as those that are infolent. Remember (faith Caligula the Emperor, to his Grand-mother Antonia) that I may doe what I list, and to whom I list : these wordes were accounted horrible, though he did her no harme. And Innenal reckons it, as the complement of all torments, inflicted by a cruell Roman Dame vpon her flaues; that whilest shee was whipping them, she painted her face, talked with her Gossips, and vsed all signes of 20 neglecting what those wretches felt. Now sceing that the greatest grieuances wherwith a domineering State offendeth her Subjects, are free from all sence of indignitie: likely it is, that they will not extremely hate her, although defire of libertie make them wearie of her Empire. In these respects it is not needefull, that shee should keepe a Guard of licentious cut-throtes, and maintaine them in all villanic, as a Diony fus or Agathocles must doe : her owne Citizens are able to terrifie, and to hold perforce in obedience, all male-contents. These things, considered alone by themselues, may serue to proue, That a Citic is scarce able to deserue the name of a Tyrannesse, in the proper signification.

All this notwithstanding, it shall appeare, That the miseries, wherewith a Ty- 30 rant lodeth his people, are not so heavie, as the burdens imposed by a cruel Citie. Not without some apparance of truth, it may be said, that Lust, and many other private paffions, are no way incident to a Citie or Corporation. But to make this good, wee shall have neede to vie the helpe of such distinctions, as the Argument in hand doth not require. Was not Rome lasciuious, when Cato was faine to rise and leaue the Theater, to the end, that the reuerend regard of his gravitie, might nothinder the people, from calling for a shew of naked Courtisans, that were to be brought vpon the open stage? By common practice, & generall approued custome, we are to censure the quality of a whole State; not by the private vertue or vice of any one man ; nor by metaphyficall abstraction of the universall from the singular ; 40 or of the Corporation, from those of whom it is compounded. I say therefore (as I hauc said elsewhere) That it were better to liue vnder one pernicious Tyrant, then vnder many thousands. The reasons, prouing this, are too many to set downe: but few may fuffice. The defires of one man, how inordinate foeuer, if they cannot be fatisfied, yet they may be wearied; he is not able to fearch all corners; his humour may be found, and foothed; age or good aduice, yea, or fome vnexpected accident, may reforme him : all which failing, yet is there hope, that his fucceffour may proue better. Many Tyrants have beene changed into worthie Kings: and many haue ill vsed their ill-gotten Dominion, which becomming hereditarie to their posteritie, hath growne into the most excellent forme of Gouernment, euen 50 a lawfull Monarchie. But they that line under a tyrannicall Citie, haue no such hope their Mistresse is immortall, and will not slacken the reines, vntill they bee pulled out of her hands; and her owne mouth receive the bridle of a more mightic Chariotier. This is wofull : yet their present sufferings make them leffe mindefull

of the future. New flies, and hungrie ones, fall vpon the same sore, out of which, others had alreadie sucked their fill. A new Gouernour comes yearly among them, attended by all his poore kindred and friends, who meane not to returne home emptie to their hiues, without a good lading of waxe and honie. These flie into all quarters, and are quickly acquainted with enery mans wealth, or what soener else, in all the Province, is worthie to be defired. They know all a mans enemies, and all his feares: becomming themselves, within a little space, the enemies that he feareth most. To grow into acquaintance with these masterfull guests, in hope to win their friendship, were an endlesse labour (yet it must be vnder-gone) and such as euery one hath not meanes to goe about: but were this effected, what auaileth it?

The love of one Governour is purchased with gifts: the Succession of this man, he is more loving than could be withed, in respect of a faire Wife or Daughter: then comes the third, perhaps of the contrarie faction at home, a bitter enemie to both his fore-goers, who feekes the ruine of all that have beene inward with them. So the miferies of this tyrannie are not fimple; but interlaced (as it were) with the calamities of civill warre. The Romans had a Law De Repetundis, or Of Recoverie, against extorting Magistrates: yet wee finde, that it served not wholly to restraine their Provinciall Governours; who prefuming on the favour of their owne Citizens, and of their kindred and friends at home, were bold in their Proninces, to 20 worke all these enormities rehearsed; though somewhat the more sparingly, for feare of judgement. If the subjects of Rome groned under such oppressions; what must we thinke of those, that were vasfalls vnto Carthage? The Romans imposed no burthenfome tributes; they loued not to heare, that their Empire was grieuous; they condemned many noble Citizens, for having beene ill Gouernours. At Carthage all went quite contrarie: the rapines newly denifed by one Magistrate, serued aspresidents to instruct another; every man resolved to doe the like, when it should fall to his turne; and he was held a notable Statesman, whose robberies had beene fuch, as might affoord a good share to the common treasure. Particular examples of this Carthaginian practice, are not extant: the gouernement of Verres the Roman, 20 in Skil, that is lively let out by Tullie, may serve to informe vs, what was the demea-

nour of these Punick Rulers, who stood in seare of no such condemnation, as Verres vnder-went. By profequating this discourse, I might inferre a more generall Proposition; That a Citie cannot gouerne her subject Provinces so mildly, as a King: but it is enough to have showed, That the tyrannic of a Citic is farre more intolerable, than that of any one most wicked man.

Suteable to the crueltie of fuch Lords, is the hatred of their subjects: and againe, futeable to the hatred of the subjects, is the jealousie of their Lords. Hence it followed, that, in warres abroad, the Carthaginians durst vie the service of African souldiers; in Africk it felfe, they had rather bee beholding to others, that were farther 40 fetcht. For the same purpose did Hannibal, in the second Punick Warre, shift his mercinaries out of their owne Countries; Vt Afri in Hispania, Hispani in Africa, melior Liu. Dec. 3.1.1. procul ab domo futurus vterá, miles, velut mutuis pignoribus obligati stipendia facerent; That the Africans might ferue in Spaine, the Spaniards in Africk, being each of them like to proue the better Souldiers, the farther they were from home, as if they were obliged by mutuall pledges. It is disputable, I confesse, whether these African, and Spanish hirelings, could properly be termed Mercinaries: for they were subject vnto Carthage, and carried into the field, not only by reward, but by dutie. Yet feeing their dutie was no better than enforced, and that it was not any lone to the State, but meere defire of gaine, that made them fight; I will not nicely stand vpon proprietic of a word, but 50 hold them, as Polybius also doth, no better than Mercinaries.

He extreme danger, growing from the imploiment of fuch Souldiers, is well The extreme danger, growing from the improvement of the extreme danger, growing from the improvement of the extreme danger, growing from the improvement of the extreme danger, growing from the improvement of the extreme danger, growing from the improvement of the extreme danger, growing from the improvement of the extreme danger, growing from the improvement of the extreme danger, growing from the improvement of the extreme danger, growing from the improvement of the extreme danger and the extreme da whom they ferue, than to those against whom they serue. They are seditious, vnfaithfull, disobedient, denourers, and destroiers of all places and countries, whereinto they are drawne; as being held by no other bond, than their owne commo- 10 ditie. Yea, that which is most fearefull among such hirelings, is, that they have often, and in time of greatest extremitie, not only refused to fight, in their defence, who have entertained them, but revolted vnto the contrarie part; to the vtter ruine of those Princes and States, that have trusted them. These Mercinaries (faith Machiauel) which filled all Italie, when Charles the eighth of France did passe the Alpes, were the cause that the said French King wonne the Realme of Naples, with his Buckler without a fword. Notable was the example of Sforza, the Father of Francis Sforza, Duke of Millan; who being entertained by Queene Ioane of Naples, abandoned her service on the sudden ; and forced her to put her selfe into the hands of the King of Arragon. Like vnto his father was Francis Sforza, the first 20 of that race Duke of Millan: who, being entertained by the Millanois, forced them to become his flaues; euen with the same Armie which themselues had leuied for their owne defence. But Lodonick Sforza, the sonne of this Francis, by the just judgement of God, was made a memorable example vnto posteritie, in loosing his whole cltate by the trecherie of fuch faithlesse Mercinaries, as his owne father had beene. For, having waged an Armic of Switzers, and committed his Duchic, together with his person, into their hands; he was by them delinered up vnto his enemie the French King, by whom he was inclosed in the Castle of Loches to his dying day.

The like inconvenience is found, in vfing the helpe of forraigne Auxiliaries. We 30 fee, that when the Emperor of conflantinople had hired ten thousand Turkes, against his neighbour Princes; he could neuer, either by perswalfon or force, bet them againe over Sea ypon Assa fide: which gave beginning to the Christian servitude, that soone after followed. Alexander, the sonne of Cassander, sought aide of the great Demetrius: but Demetrius, being entred into his Kingdome, slue the same Alexander, who had invited him, and made himselfe King of Macedon. Syracon the Turke was called into Agypt by Sanar the Soldan, against his Opposite: but this Turke did settle himselfe for surely in Agypt, that Saladine his Succession but this Turke did settle himselfe for surely in Agypt, that Saladine his Succession became Lord thereof; and of all the high Land, soone after. What neede we looke about for examples of this kinde? Every Kingdome, in essential can furnish vs. The Brit 10 taines drew the Saxons into this our Countrie; and Mac Murrangh drew the English into Ireland: but the one and the other soone became Lords of those two Againft all this may be alleadged, the good fucceffe of the vnited Prouinces of the Netherlands, vling none other than fuch kinde of Souldiers, in their late warre. Indeeded these Low Countries have many goodly and strong Cities, filled with Inhabitants that are wealthie, industrious, and valiant in their kinde. They are stour Seamen and therein is their excellencie; neither are they bad, at the defence of a place well fortissed: but in open field they have soldome beene able to stand against the Spaniard. Nocessite interferore compelled them to seek helpe abroad: and the like so necessities made them for beare to arme any great numbers of their owne. For, with monite raised by their Trade, they maintained the warre: and therefore could ill spare, vnto the Pike and Musket, those hands, that were of more vse in helping to fill the common purse. Yet what of this? they speed well, Surely they speed as ill as might be, whileft they had none other than mercinarie Souldiers. Many finitlesse attemps, made by the Prince of Orange, can witnesse it: and that brane Commander, Count Leadonich of Nassau, selt it to his griefe, in his retrait from Groeninghen, when in the very instant, that required their service in fight, his mercinaries cried out aloud for monie, and so ranne away. This was not the only time, when the hirred souldiers of the States, have either fought to hide their cowardize under a shew of greedinesse; or at least, by mecre conctousnesse, he uruined in one houre the labour of many moneths. I will not stand to proue this by many examples: for they themselues will not deny it. Neither would I touch the honour of Manssaur to the Duke of Anica, brother to the French King, saue that it is sollie to conceale

o the Duke of Ames, Fortiset of the Frence Ning; slaue that it is folie to conceale what all the world knowes. He that would lay open the danger of forraine Auxiliaries, needeth no better patterne. It is commonly found, that such Aiders make themselues Lordsouerthose, to whom they lend their succeur; but where shall we meet with such another as this Monsser, who, for his protection promised, being rewarded with the Lordship of the Countrie, made it his first worke, to thrust by violence a galling yoke vpon the peoples neck? Well, here lived to repent it, with griefe enough. Euen whilest he was countersteiting vnto those about him, that were ignorant of his plot, an imaginarie forrow for the poore Burghers of Antwerpe, as verily beleeuing the Towneto bee surprised and wonne; the death of the Count of St. Airman, who fell over the wall, and the Cannon of the Citie, discharged against

20 St. Aignan, who fell ouer the wall, and the Cannon of the Citie, difcharged against his owne troupes, informed him better what had hapned; shewing that they were his owne French, who stood in neede of pittie. Then was his fained passion changed, into a very bitter anguish of minde; wherein, smiting his brest, and wringing his hands, he exclaimed, Helas, mon Dien, que veuls tu saire de moy; Alas, my God, what wilt thou doe with me? So the affaires of the Netherlands will not serve to proue, that there is litle danger in vsing mercinarie souldiers, or the help offorraine Auxiliaries. This not withstanding they were obedient who necessities and sought helpe of the English, Scots, and French: wherein they did wisely, and prospered, For when there was in Frence a King, pattaker with them in the same danger; when the Queen

30 of England refused to accept the Soucraignite of their Countrie, which they offered, yet being prouoked by the Spaniard their enemie, purfued him with continual warre; when the heire of England raigned in Scotland, a King too just and wife (though not ingaged in any quarrell) either to make profit of his Neighbours miferies, or to helpe those that had attempted the conquest of his owne inheritance: then might the Netherlanders very safely repose considence, in the forces of these their Neighbour-Countries. The souldiers that came vnto them from hence, were (to omit many other commendations) not onely regardfull of the pay that they should receive; but well affected vnto the cause that they tooke in hand: or if any were cold in his denotion, to the side whereon he sought, yet was he kept in order.

40 by remembrance of his owne home, where the English would have rewarded him with death, if his faith had been corrupted by the Spaniard. They were therefore trufted with the cuftodic of Cities; they were held as friends, and patrons; the necessaries of the poorer fort was relieved, before the pay-day came, with lendings, and other helps, as well as the abilitie of the States could permit. When three such Princes, raigning at one time, shall agree so well, to omaintaine against the power of a fourth, injurious sort least so seems, the same religion, and to which they all are soundly affected: then may such a Countrie be secure of her Auxiliaries, and quietly intend her Trade, or other business.

50 well hold true in generall: That mercinarie, and forraigne auxiliarie forces, are no lesse dangerous, than the enemie, against whom they are entertained.

CHAP.2.1.4.

†. IIII.

That the moderate government of the Romans gave them affurance to wee the service of their owne subjects in their warres. That in mans nature there is an affection breeding tyrannie, which hindreth the vse and benefit of the like moderation.

TEre may it be demanded, whether also the Romans were not compelled to vie In the may it be demanded, whether the ferring of the foundations in their many great warres, but performed all by their owne citizens? for if it were their manner to arme their owne subjects; how 10 happenedit, that they feared no rebellion? if strangers; how then could they anoide the inconveniences aboue rehearfed? The answere is; That their Armies were compounded viually of their owne citizens, and of the Latines, in equal number : to which they added, as occasion required, some companies of the Campanes, Hetrurians, Samuites, or other of their subjects, as were either interessed in the quarrell, or might best be truited. They had, about these times, (though seldomethey did imploy so many,) ten Roman Legions; a good strength, if all other helpchad beene wanting: which ferued to keepe in good order their fubicets, that were alwaies fewer in the Army than themselues. As for the Latines, if consanguinitie were not a sufficient obligation, yet many printledges and immunities, which they en 20 ioyed, made them affured vnto the State of Rome: vnder which they lived almost at libertie, as being bound to little elfe, than to ferue it in warre. It is true, that a yoke, how casie socuer, seemes trouble some to the necke that hath been accustomed to freedome. Therefore many people of Italie have taken occasion of severall advantages, to deliuer themselves from the Roman subjection. But still they have beene reclaimed by warre; the Authors of rebellion have sharpely punished; and the people, by degrees, have obtained fuch libertie, as made them effectee none otherwife of Rome, than as the common citic of all Italie. Yea, in processe of time it was granted vnto many cities, and those farre off removed, even to Tarfus in Cilicia, where Saint Paul was borne, That all the Burgeffes should be free of Rome it selfe. 30 This fauour was conferred absolutely vpon some; vpon some, with restraint of giuing voice in election of Magistrates, or with other such limitation, as was thought fit. Hereunto may be added, that it was their manner, after a great conquest, to release ynto their new subjects halfe of their tribute which they had beene wont to pay vnto their former Lords, which was a readic way, to bring the multitude into good liking of their present condition; when the reuiew of harder times past, should rather teach them to feare a relaple, than to hope for better in the future, by feeking innouation. Neither would it be forgotten as a special note of the Romans good gouernment. That when some for their well-deseruing, have had the offer to be made Liu, Dec. 3.1.3. citizens of Rome; they have refused it, and held themselves better contented with 40 their owne present estate. Wherefore it is no maruaile, that Petellia, a citie of the Brutians in Italie, chose rather to endure all extremitie of warre, than, vpon any condition to for fake the Romans; even when the Romans themselves had confessed that they were vnable to helpe these their subjects, and therefore willed them to looke to their owne good, as having beene faithfull to the vtmost. Such love purchased these milde Gouernours, without impairing their Maiestie thereby. The summe of all is: They had, of their owne, a strong Armie; they doubled it, by adioyning thereunto the Latines; and they further increased it, as neede required, with other helpe of their owne subjects: all, or the most of their followers, accounting the prosperitie of Rome to be the common good.

The moderate vie of four reigne power being so effectuall, in affuring the people vnto their Lords, and confequentlie, in the establishment or enlargement of Dominion; it may feeme strange, that the practice of tyrannic, whose effects are contrarie, hath beene so common in all ages. The like, I know, may bee faid, of all Vice, and Irregularitie whatfocuer. For it is leffe difficult (who focuer thinke otherwife) and more lafe, to keepe the way of Justice and Honestie, than to turne while from it; vet commonly our passions lead vs into by-pathes. But where Luit, Anger, Feare, orany the like Affection, seduceth our reason, the same varulie appetite either bringeth with it an excuse, or at least wife taketh away all cause of wonder. Intyrannie it is not for for as much as we can hardly deferie the paffion, that is of force to infinuate it felfe into the whole tenour of a Gouernment. It must be confessed, that lawlesse desires haue bred many Tyrants: yet so, that these desires haue seidome beene hereditarie, or long-lasting; but have ended commonly with the Tyrants to life, sometimes before his death; by which meanes the Government bath beene reduced to a better forme. In luch cases, the laying of Aristotle holds, That Tyran- Arist Politib. 1. nies are of short continuance. But this doth not fatisfie the question in hand. Why did 6.12 the Carthaginians exercise Tyrannie? why did the Athenians? why have many other Cities done the like? If in respect of their generall good; how could they beignorant, that this was an ill course for the safetie of the Weale publique? If they were led hereunto by any affection; what was that affection, wherein fo many thoufand citizens, divided and subdivided within themselves by tactions, did all concurre, notwithstanding the much diversitie of temper, and the vehemencie of priuate hatred among them? Doubtles, we must be fame to say, That T yrannic is, by 20 it felfe, a Vice diltinet from others. A Man, we know, is Animal posticum, apt, euen by Nature, to command, or to obey; euery one in his proper degree. Other defires of Mankinde, are common likewife vinto bruit beaftes; and fome of them, to bodies wanting lense: but the delire of rule belongeth vnto the nobler part of reason; whereunto is also answerable an aptnesse to yeeld obedience. Now as hunger and thirst are given by nature, not onely to Man and Beast, but vnto all forts of Vegetables, for the fullentation of their life: as Feare, Anger, Luft, and other Affections are likewise naturall, in convenient measure, both vinto Mankinde, and to all creatures that have fenfe, for the fhunning or repelling of harme, and feeking after that which is requisite; even so is this defire of ruling or obaying, engrafted by 30 Nature in the race of Man, and in Man onely as a reasonable creature, for the orderingofhis life, in a civile forme of inttice. All these in bred qualities are good and vsefull. Neuerthelesse, Hunger and Thirst are the Parents of Gluttonie and Drunkennesse, which, in reproach, are called beastlie, by an unproper terme: since they grow from appetites, found in leffe worthie creatures than beaftes, and are yet not focommon in beaftes, as in men. The effects of Anger, and of fuch other Pathons as descend no lower than vnto bruit beastes, are held lesse vile; and perhaps not without good reason: yet are they more horrible, and punished more gricuously, by sharper Lawes, as being in generall more pernicious. But as no corruption is worse, than of that which is best; there is not any Pashon, that nourisheth a vice

40 more hurtfull vnto Mankinde, than that which iffueth from the moti noble roote, euen the depraued Affection of ruling. Hence arise those two great mischiefes, of which bath beene an old question in dispute, whether bee the worse; That all things, or That nothing, should be lawfull. Of these, a dull spirit, and ouer-loaden by fortune, with power, whereof it is not capable, occasioneth the one; the other proceedeth from a contrarie diftemper, whose vehemencie the bounds of Reason cannot limit. Vnder the extremitie of either, no countrie is able to sublist : yet the defective dulnesse, that permitteth any thing, wil also permit the execution of Law, to which, meere necessitie doth enforce the ordinarie Magistrate; whereas Tyrannie is more actine, and pleafeth it felfe in the excesse, with a false colour of in-

50 flice. Examples of stupiditie, and vnaptnes to rule, are not very frequent, though fuch natures are every where found: for this qualitie troubles not it felfe in feeking Empire; or if by fome errour of fortune, it encounter therewithall, (as when Claudius, hiding himselfe in a corner, found the Empire of Rome) some friend or elle a wife, is not wanting to supply the defect, which also crueltie doth helpe

to shadow. Therefore this Vice, as a thing vnknowne, is without a name. Tyrannie is more bold, and feareth not to be knowne, but would be reputed honourable: for it is prosperum & fælix scelus, a fortunate mischiefe, as long as it can subsist. There is no reward or honour ( faith PETER CHARRON) assigned to those, that know how to increase, or to preserve humane nature: all honours, greatnesse, riches, dignities. empires, triumphs, trophees, are appointed for those, that know how to afflict, trouble, or destroy it. CAES AR, and ALEXANDER, have vn-made and flaine, each of them, more than a million of men: but they made none, nor left none behinde them. Such is the errour of Mansiudgement, in valuing things according to common opinion. But the true name of Tyrannie, when it growes to ripeneffe, is none other, than to Feritie: the same that Aristotle saith to be worse than any vice. It exceedeth indeed all other vices, iffuing from the Paffions incident both to Man, and Beaft; no leffe than Periurie, Murder, Treason, and the like horrible crimes, exceede in villanie. the faults of Gluttonie and drunkennesse, that grow from more ignoble appetites. Hereof Sciron, Procrustes, and Pityocamptes, that vsed their bodily force to the defiruction of Mankinde, are not better examples, than Phalaris, Dionylius and Agathecles, whose mischieuous heads were assisted by the hands of detestable Ruffians. The same barbarous desire of Lordship, transported those old examples of Feritie. and these latter Tyrants, beyond the bounds of reason: neither of them knew the vse of Rule, nor the difference betweene Freemen, and flaues.

The rule of the husband ouer the wife, and of parents ouer their children, is naturall, and appointed by God himselfe; so that it is alwaies, and simplie, allowable and good. The former of these, is, as the dominion of Reason ouer Appetite; the latter is the whole authoritie, which one free man can have ouer another. The rule of a King is no more, nor none other, than of a common Father ouer his whole countrie: which hee that knowes what the power of a Father is, or ought to bee. knowes to be enough. But there is a greater, and more Masterlie rule, which God gaue vnto Adam, when he faid; Haue dominion over the fish of the Sea, and over the fowle of the aire, and ouer every living thing that moveth upon the earth: which also hee confirmed vnto Woah, and his children, laying, The feare of you, and the dread of you, 30 shall be upon every beast of the earth, and upon every fowle of the aire, upon all that moueth vponthe earth, and vpon all the fishes of the Sea zinto your hands are they delinered. Hee who gaue this dominion to Man, gaue also an aptitude to vieit. The execution of this power hath fince extended it felfe, ouer a great part of Mankinde. There are indeed no small numbers of men, whose disabilitie to gouerne themselves, proves them, according vnto Aristotles doctrine, to be naturallie slaues.

Arif. Poll, 1.63 Yet finde I not in Scripture any warrant, to oppresse men with bondage : vnleffe the lawfulneffe thereof be fufficiently intimated, where it is faid, That a man shal not be punished for the death of a servant, whom he hath slaine by correction, Exod.c.21. v.21 if the feruant line a day or two, because he is his monie; or else by the captinitie of the 40 Num.c.30.2040 Midianitify girles, which were made bond-flaues, and the Sanctuarie had a part of them for the Lords tribute. Doubtleffe the custome hath beene very ancient: for Noab laid this curse vpon Canaan, that hee should be a servant of servants; and Abraham had of Pharaoh, among other gifts, men-feruants, and maide-feruants, which were none Gen.12, v.16. other than flaues. Christian Religion is faid to have abrogated this olde kinde of feruilitie: but furely, they are deceived, that thinke fo. Saint Paul defired the li-

Epift. to Philem. bertie of Onesimus, whome he had wonne vnto Christ: yet wrote hee for this vnto Philemon, by way of request, crauing it as a benefite, not vrging it as a dutic. Agreeable hereto is the direction, which the same Saint Paul giveth vnto servants: Let euery man abide in the same calling wherein hee was called: art thou called, being a servant? 50 care not for it, but if thou mailt be made free, we it rather. It is true, that Christian Religion hath procured libertie vnto many; not onely in regard of pietie, but for that the Christian Masters stood in feare, of being discoucred by their slaues, vnto the persecuters of religion. Mahomet likewise by giuing libertie to his followers, drewe

many vnto his impietie: but whether he forbade it, as vnlawfnll, vnto his fectators, to hold one another of them in bondage, I cannot tell; faue that by the practice of the Turks and Moores, it seemes he did not. In England we had many bond-servants, untill the times of our last civile warres : and I thinke that the Lawes concerning villenage are still in force, of which the latest are the sharpest. And now, since slaves were made free, which were of great vse and service, there are growne vp a rabble of Rogues, Cutpurfes and other the like Trades; flaues in Nature, though not in

But whether this kind of dominion be lawfull, or not; Ariflotle hath well proto ned, that it is naturall. And certainly wee finde not fuch a latitude of difference in any creature, as in the nature of man: wherein (to omit the infinite diffance in chate of the elect & reprobate) the wilest excell the most toolish, by far greater degree, than the most foolish of men doth surpasse the wifest of beasts. Therfore when Commiseration hath given way to Reason: we shall find that Nature is the ground eyen of Masterly power, & of seruile obedience, which is therto correspondent. But it may be truly faid, that some countries have subsisted long, without the ve of any feruilitie: as also it is true, that some countries have not the vse of any rame cattell. Indeede the affections which vphold civill rule are (though more noble)not so simplie needfull, vnto the sustentation either of our kind, as are Lust, and 20 the like; or of cuerie one, as are hunger and thirst; which not with standing are the lowest in degree. But where most vile, and servile dispositions, have libertie to shew themselues begging in the streets; there may wee more justly wonder, how the dangerous toile of fea-faring men can finde enough to vindertake them, than how the fwarme of idle vagabonds should increase by accesse of those, that are weatie of their owne more painefull condition. This may suffice to proue, that in Mankind there is found, ingrafted euen by Nature, a defire of absolute dominion: whereunto the generall cuttome of Nations doth subscribe; together with the pleasure which most men take in flatterers, that are the basest of slaves.

This being fo, we finde no cause to maruaile, how Tyranny bath beene so rife 30 in all ages, and practifed, not onely in the fingle rule of fome vicious Prince, but ever by confent of whole Cities and Estates: since, other vices have likewise gotten head, and borne a generall fway; notwithstanding that the way of vertue be more honourable, and commodious. Few there are that have vied well the inferiour Paffions: how then can we expect, that the most noble affections should not bee disordered? In the gouernment of wife and children, some are vtterly carelesse, and corrupt all by their dull conniuencie: others, by masterly rigour, hold their owne blood under condition of flauerie. To be a good Gouernour is a rare commendation; and to preferre the Weale publike about all respects what soeuer, is the Vertueiufly termed Heroicall. Of this Vertue, many ages affoord not many exam-40 pies. Hector is named by Aristotle, as one of them; and descruedly, if this praise be due to extraordinarie height of fortitude, vsed in defence of a mans owne countrie. But if we confider, that a loue of the generall good cannot be perfect, without reference vnto the fountaine of all goodnesse: wee shall finde, that no Morall vertue, how great focuer, can, by it felfe, deferue the commendation of more than Vertue, as the Heroicall doth. Wherefore we must search the Scriptures, for patterns hereof; fuch as Danid, Iofaphat, and Iosas were. Of Christian Kings if there were many fuch, the world would soone be happie. It is not my purpose to wrong the worth of any, by denying the praise where it is due; or by preferring a lesse excellent. But he that can finde a King, religious, and zealous in Gods cause, without enforcement 50 either of advertitie, or of some regard of state; a procurer of the general peace and quiet; who not onely vieth his authoritie, but addes the trauell of his eloquence, in admonishing his Judges to doe instice; by the vigorous influence of whose Goucrnment, civilitie is infused, even into those places, that have beene the dennes of Sauage Robbers and Cutthrotes; one that hath quite abolished a slauish Brehon

Law, by which an whole Nation of his subjects were held in bondage; and one, whose higher vertue and wisdome doth make the praise not onlie of Nobilitie and other ornaments, but of abstinence from the bloud, the wives, and the goods. of those that are under his power, together with a world of chiefe commendations belonging vnto some good Princes, to appeare lesse regardable: he, I say, that can finde such a King, findeth an example, worthie to adde vnto vertue an honourable title, if it were formerly wanting. Vnder fuch a King, it is likelie by Gods bleffing, that a Land shall flourish, with increase of Trade, in countries before vnknowne; that Civilitie and Religion shall be propagated, into barbarous and heathen countries; and that the happinesse of his subjects, shall cause the Nations farre 10 off remoued, to wish him their Souereigne. I neede not adde hereunto, that all the actions of fuch a King, even his bodilie exercises, doe partake of vertue; fince all things tending to the preservation of his life and health, or to the mollifying of his cares, (who, fixing his contemplation vpon God, seeketh how to imitate the vnspeakeable goodnesse, rather than the inaccessible maiestie, with both of which himselseis indued, as farre as humane nature is capable) doe also belong to the furtherance of that common good, which hee procureth. Left any man should thinke me transported with admiration, or other affection, beyond the bonds of reason, I adde hereunto, that such a King is neuertherlesse a man must die, and may erre : yet wisdome and fame shall set him free, from errour, and from death, both 20 with and without the helpe of time. One thing I may not omit, as a fingular benefite (though there be many other besides) redounding vnto this King, as the fruit of his goodnesse. The people that live vnder a pleasant yoke, are not onely louing to their Souereigne Lord, but free of courage, and no greater in muster of men, then of flout fighters, if neede require: whereas on the contrarie, he that rulethas ouer saues, shall bee attended in time of necessitie, by slauish mindes, neither louing his person, nor regarding his or their owne honour. Cowards may bee surious, and flaues outragious, for a time: but among spirits that haue once yeelded vn-Hom. Odyff.1.7. to flaueric, vniuerfally it is found true, that Homer faith, God bereaueth a man of halfe his vertue, that day when he casteth him into bondage.

Of the de things, I might perhaps more seasonably have spoken, in the generall discourse of Gouernement: but where so lively an example of the calamitic following a tytannicall rule, and the vice of Mercinaries, thereupon depending, did offer it selte, as is this present business of the Carthaginians; I thought that the note would be more effectuall, than being barely delivered, as out of a common place.

ð. III.

How the warre against the Mercinaric was diverstie mannaged by HANNO and AMILCAR, with variable successes. The bloudy counsailes of the Mercinaries; and their finall destruction.

Eing now to returne vnto those Mercinaries, from whome I have thus farre digressed, I cannot readily finde, by what name henceforth I should call them. They are no longer in pay with the Carthaginians, for that they are neither are they to pretend, that they seek their wages already due, for that they are neither Mercinaries, nor Mutiners. Had they all they all they all they are neither Mercinaries.

beene fubiceds vato Carthage, then might they juitly have beene termed Rebels: 50 but Spendius, and others, that were the principall part of them, ought none allegeance to that State, which they endeuoured to fubuert. Wherefore I will borrow the name of their late occupation, and full call them Mercinaries, as Poblius also doth.

These vsing the advantage of their present strength, besseg. *Vitea, and Hippogreta, Cities of great importance, as being seated vpon the westerne Hauen of Carles in things, where it is divided by a necke of land; Hippogreta standing in wards vpon the great Lake; *Vitea surther out vpon the Sea. Neither was the Campe at Thurs aban contained, which lay filthie to hinder the Carthaginians, from passing vp into the countries for *Matho and Spendius* wanted not men, to followe the warre in all parts at the similar to the countries of *Matho and Spendius* wanted not men, to followe the warre in all parts at the similar to the countries of *Matho and Spendius* wanted not men, to followe the warre in all parts at the similar to the same states of *Matho and Spendius* wanted not men, to followe the warre in all parts at the same states of *Matho and *Mat

How the Carthaginians were amazed with this vnexpected perill, any man may Farina, or Bifer conceine. But the bufinesse it selfe awakes them hastilie. They are hardly prest on it and by the 10 all fides; and therefore transiled their braines to the vttermoft, how to shake off felices, Gard these furious dogges from their shoulders, who sometimes by night, sometimes Melba. Niger by day, came vnto the very walles of their Citie. In this exigent Hanno was made faith, that the their Generall: who failed not in his accustomed diligence of making all good pre- is ruined, and paration: but had gotten together what socuer was needfull, as well to relieue a the place, Towne belieged, as to batter and affaile any place defended against him. With flood, now these provisions, and with an hundred Elephants, hee came to Vice; so suddenly, called Magathat the enemies as men surprised, for sooke their Trenches, and retired themselves verie socients. vnto a rifing peece of woody ground, where they might be safe against the violence and built beof his beafts. Hanno, thinking that he had to doe with Numidians, whole custome faith Silius. A 20 was, after any losse, to flie two or three whole daies journie off; presently entred it flo ishedbethe Towne; to thew himselfe, after this his victory. But these good fellowes, against fore Carthage whom he was to warre, had learned of Amilear, to retire and to fight againe, many fo did it after times in one day, as need required. Therefore as soone as they perceived, that hee carthag was knew not how to yie a victorie; they affailed their owne Campe, and with great throwne down by the Romans, flaughter, draue the Carthaginians out of it, forcing them to hide themselves with in the third Puin Vica; and got possession of all the store, that Hanno had brought for the reliefe mick Watte Faof the Towne. This bad beginning Hanno followed with futable indifferetion: the deathot looling the benefit of many faire opportunites, and fuffering the enemies to take cattothe younpossession of all the entrance from Carthage to the firme land.

The Carthaginians, perceiving this, were exceedingly troubled, and did therefore with a lefall their flete-anchor; fending to the field their great Captainn, smilear, whom they furnished with ten thouland foote of Inpply, and fenentie Elephants was billione, whom they furnished with ten thouland foote of Inpply, and fenentie Elephants was billione, microparticles and worke enough to doe, before he should be able to meet with the enemies who no equal ground. For besides other places of aduantage that the Mercena ries had occupied, blame had suffered them to winnethe only Bridge, by which the the sime of River Macra, or Bagradais, was passable to wrote the travaile into the Continent. This River had not many foords, nor those casife for a single manto get our; but yoon them all was kept such guard, as gaue to Amilear little hope of preounding in seeking way by force. As for the Bridge it selle, Matho and his followers that were the decided and had there built a Towne, wherein to lie commodiously, were there lodged: and had there built a Towne, wherein to lie commodiously, 40 were there lodged: and had there bint a 1 owner, which the terminationly, intentitie onely to the cultodic thereof. But Amilian had observed, that the very mouth of Bagradas vscd to be sometimes cloyed with sand and grauell, that was driven in by certaine customarie windes, & could not be driven outagaine, by force of that flow River; till the winde falling, or changing, suffered the weight of the waters, to disburden their channel. Hereof he made vsc; and taking his opportunity, palled the River; contrarie to all expectation, either of the enemie, or of his owne Citizens.

There was no neede to bid Spendius looke about him, when once it was heard, that Amilear was come over Bagradus: all the Mercenaries were troubled with the 50 newes; knowing that they were no longer to deale with the improvident gravitie of Hanno, but with an able spirit, even with their own Master in the Art of Warre, whom they admired, though they hated him. But this seare was soone changed into presumption; when more than sifteene thousand of their owne societie, were come from Prica; and other tenne thousand from the gard of the Bridge. Their Kkkk 2

Armie was farre greater, than that of Amilear; and they were, in their owne indgement, the better men, vpon which confidence, they resolued to charge him on all fides, and beate him downe, in despight of his worth and reputation. With this resolution they attended vpon him; watching for some advantage; and till exhorting one another to play the men, and give the onset. Especially they that followed him in the Rere, had a great minde to begin the fight; whereunto their promotnesse was such, as tooke from them their former circumspection. Amilear held his way towards the Bridge, keeping himselse on plaine grounds, that were fittest for the service of his Elephants, which hee placed in front of his Armie. Neither made hee showe of any delire to fight, but suffered the rashnes of his enemies to increase, 10 till it should breake into some disorder. At length perceiving, that with more boldnesse than good heed, they followed him so neere, as would bee little for their good, if hee should turne vpon them, he hastened his march, even to such a pace. as made a shewe little differing from plaine slight. The Mercinaries presently fell vpon his skirts; belceuing, that for feare of them he was ready to runne away. But whilest they confusedly, as in sudden opinion of victorie, were driving at the heeles of those that had the Reare; Amilear wheeled about, and met them in the face, charging them hotely, but in very good order, fothat amazed with the apprehension of inexpected danger, they fled without making any resistance. In this ouerthrowe, there were lixe thousand of the Mercinaries slaine, and about two 20 thousand taken; the rest fled; some to the Campe at Vtica; others to the Towne at the Bridge; whither Amilear followed them fo fast, that he wanne the place cafily: the enemies being thence also fled vnto Tunes, as not having recollected their spirits to make it good.

The fame of this victorie, together with the diligence of Amilear in pursuing it, caused many Townes revolted, partly by feare, partly by force, to returne to their former obedience. Yet was not Matho wanting to himselfe, in this dangerous time. He sent about Numidia and Africke, for new supplies; admonishing the people, now or neuer to doe their best, for the recourrie of their freedome; hee per-Iwaded Spendius, and Autarstus that was Captaine of the Gaules, to wait voon Amil 39 car, and alwaics to keepe the higher grounds, or at least the foot of some hill, where they might be safe from the Elephants; and hee himselfe continued to presse the Towne of Hippagreta with an hard fiege. It was necessarie for Amilear, in passing from place to place, as his businesse required, to take such waies as there were : for all the countrie lay not levell. Therefore Spendius, who still coasted him, had oncegotten a notable aduantage of ground: the Carthaginians lying in a Plaine, furrounded with hilles, that were occupied by the Mercinaries, with their Numidian and African succours. In this difficultie; the fame of Amilear his personal worth didgreatly benefit his countrie. For 2 ar auas w, a yong gentleman commanding over the Numidians, was glad of this occasion serving to get the acquaintance 40 and loue of to brauca man, which he much defired : and therefore came vnto Amilcar, fignifying his good affection to him, with offer to dochim all feruice. Amilear ioyfully entertained this friend; promifed vnto him his owne daughter in marriage; and so wanne from the enemies two thousand horse, that following W arauasus turned vnto the Carthaginians side. With this helpe he gaue battaile vnto Spendiu: wherein the Numidian laboured to approuchis owne valour, to his new friend. So the victorie was great: for there were flaine ten thouland of Spendius his fellowes, and foure thousand taken prisoners, but Spendius himselfe, with Autaritus the Gaule, cleaped to doe more mischiefe. Amilear dealt very gently with his prisoners: pardoning all offences past, and dismissing as many, as were vnwilling to become so his followers; yet with condition, that they should neuer more beare armes against the Carthaginians; threatning to take sharpe reuenge vponall, that should breake

tending to winne from them, the hearts of their fouldiers. Wherefore they refolned to take fuch order, that not a man among them should dare, to trust in the good nature of Amilear, nor to hope for any fafetie, whilest Carthage was able to doe him hurt. They counterfeited letters of advertisement, wherein was contained, that fome of their company respective onely of their private benefit, and carelesse of the generall good, had a purpose to betraie them all vnto the Carthaginians, with whom they held intelligence; and that it was needfull, to looke well vnto Gelco. and his companions, whom these traitours had a purpose to enlarge. Vpon this Theme Spendius makes an Oration to the fouldiours, exhorting them to fidelitie; to and shewing with many words, that the seeming humanitie of Amilear, toward fome, was none other than a baite, wherewith to entrap them all at once together; as also telling them, what a dangerous enemic Gesco would prooue, if hee might escape their hands. While hee is yet in the midft of his tale; were letters come, to the same purpose. Then steps forth Autaritus and speakes his minde plainely: faying, that it were the best, year the onely way, for the common safetic, to cut off all hope of reconciliation with Carthage; that if some were deuising to make their owne peace, it would goe hard with those that had a care of the warre; that it were better to make an end of Gefco his life, than to trouble themselves with looking to his custodie; that by such a course every one should be ingaged in the pre-20 fent Action, as having none other hope left, than in victoric alone; finally, that fuch as would speake here-against, were worthy to be reputed Traitours. This Autaritus was in great credit with the fouldiours, and could speake fundrie languages, in such fort, that hee was understood by all. According to his motion thereforeit was agreed, that Gefco, and all the other prisoners, thould forthwith be put to horrible death, by torments. Neuerthelesse there were some, that for loue of Gesco, fought to alter his intended crueltie; but they were forth with stoned to death, as a Document vnto others; and so the Decree was put in execution. Neither were they there with all contented; but further ordained, that all Carthaginian prisoners cucrafterwards. Of this crucltie I need fay no more, then that it was most execrable feritie. As for the counsaile of vsing it, it was like vnto the counsaile of AcHI TOPHEL; All Israel shall heare, that thou art abborred of thy father; then shall the hands of all that are with thee, be from. Such are the fruits of desperation. He that is past all hope of pardon, is afraid of his owne fellowes, if they be more innocent; and to avoide the punishment of leffe offences, committeth greater. The cowardize of offenders, and the revengefull spirits of those that have beene wronged, are breeders of this desparation: to which may be added, some deficiencie of Lawes, in diffinguishing the pu-40 nilhments of malefactors, according to the decree of their feuerall crimes. A coward thinkes all prouision too little, for his owne securitie. If PHOCAS be a coward (said the Emperour MAVRITIVS) then is he murderous. To be fledfast and sure, in taking revenge; is thought a point of honour, and a defensative against new injuries. But wrongfully: for it is opposite to the rule of Christianitie; and such a qualitie discovered, makes them deadly enemies, who otherwife would have repented, and fought to make amends, for the wrong done in passion. This was it, which wrought fo much woe to the Carthaginians; teaching Matho, and his Africans, to suspect euen their gentlenesse, as the introduction to extreme rigour. Like vnto the errours of Princes and Gouernours, are the errours of Lawes. Where one and the fame pu-50 nishment, is awarded vnto the lesse offence, and vnto the greater, he that hath aduentured to robbe a man, is easily tempted to kill him, for his owne securitie.

which they tooke, should be served in like fort: and that the subjects or friends of

30 Carthage, should lose their hands, and so be sent home: which rule they observed

Against these inconveniences Mercie and Severitie, vsed with due respect, are the best remedies. In neither of which Amilear failed. For as long as these his owne souldiours were any way likely to be reclaimed, by gentle courses; his humanitie Kkkk 2 was was readie to inuite them. But when they were transported with beastly outrage, beyond all regard of honestie and shame, he rewarded their visillanie with answerable vengeance; casting them vnto wilde beasts, to be denoured.

Vntill this time Hanno, with the Armie under his command, had kept himselfe Vntill this time Hanno, with the Armie under his command, had kept himselfe apart from Amilear, and done little, as may seeme, for that nothing is remembred of him, since his late losses. Neither was Amilear forrie to want his helpe, as being able to doe better without him. But when the warre grew to such extremitie, as atheratined utter ruine to the one or the other side; then was Hanno sent for, & came to Amilear, with whom hee ioyned his forces. By this accesse of frength Amilear was not enabled, to doe more then in former times: rather he could now performe 10 nothing; such was the hatred betweene him and his vinworthy Colleague. The Townes of Viies and Hippagreta, that had stood alwaies firme on the Carthagnian partie, did now resolt vinto the enemie, murdering all the solidiours that they had in Garrison, and castling their bodies forth, without suffering them to be buried. The proussions brought by sea, for maintenance of the Armie, were lost in sole weather: and Carthage it selles should an danger of being besieged, about which Matho and Spendius consulted, whiles one of the Carthaginian Generals did (as it were) binde the others hands.

It hath in all Ages beene vsed, as the safest course, to send foorth in great Expeditions, two Generals of one Armie. This was the common practice of those two 20 mighty Cities, Athens and Rome; which other States and Princes have often imitated; perswading themselues, that great Armies are not so well conducted by one, as by two : who out of emulation to excel each other, will vse the greater diligence. They have also ioyned two chiefe Commanders in equal commission, vpon this further consideration; the better to restraine the ambition of any one, that should be trusted with so great a strength. For hercofall Common-weales have beene icalous, having beene taught by their examples that have made themselues T yrants ouer those Cities and States that have imployed them. In this point, the Venetians have bin so circumspect, as they have for the most part, trusted strangers, and not their owne, in all the warres which they have made. It is true, that the equal 29 authoritie of two commanding in chiefe, ferueth well to bridle the ambition of one or both, from turning upon the Prince or State that hath given them trust: but in mannaging the warre it selfe, it is commonly the cause of ill successe. In warres made necre vnto Rome it selfe, when two good friends were Consuls, or such two at least, as concurred in one desire of Triumph; which honor (the greatest of any that Rome could give) was to be obtained by that one yeeres service; it is no marvaile, though each of the Confuls did his best, and referred all his thoughts vnto none other end then victorie. Yet in all dangerous cases, when the Consuls proceeded otherwise then was desired, one Dittator was appointed, whose power was neither hindered by any partner, nor by any great limitation. Neither was it indeede the 40 manner, to send foorth both the Consuls to one warre; but each went, whither his lot called him, to his owne Prouince; vnlesse one businesse seemed to require them both, and they also seemed fit to be joined in the administration. Now although it was fo, that the Romans did many times prenaile with their joynt Generals: yet was this neuer or feldome, without as much concord, as any other vertue of the Commanders. For their modestie hath often beene such, that the lesse able Captaine, though of equall authoritie, hath willingly submitted himselfe to the other, and obeyed his directions. This notwithstanding, they have many times, by ordaining two Commanders of one Armic, received great and most dangerous ouerthrowes; whereof in the second Punick warre we shall finde examples. 50 On the contrarie fide, in their warres most remote, that were alwayes mannaged by one, they feldomefailed to winne exceeding honour, as hereafter shall appeare. Now of those tenne Generals, which served the Athenians at the Battaile of Marathon, it may truly be faid, that had not their temper been better, than the judgement of the people that fent them forth, and had not they submitted themseliues to the conduction of Mititades; their affaires had found the same success which they found at other times, when they coupled Nieus and Asibiadas together in Sisil-the one being so oner-warie, and the other so hastie, as all came to nought that they undertooke; whereas Gimon alone, as allo Aritidas, and others, hauing sole charge of all, did their Countrie and Common-weale most remarkeable ferruse. For it is had to finde two great Captaines, of equal discretion and valour; but that the one hath more of furie than of indgement, and so the contrarie, by which the both cocasions are as often ouerslipt, as at other times many actions are vineas only to windertaken. I remember it well, that when the Prince of condy was staine after the Remained Street with the Admirall Calculus as bathers one.

o indertaken. Trememoer it went, tota when the Pinice of 10,00% was italine after the Battaile of Lamsa, (which Prince, together with the Admirall Challum, had the conduct of the Protestant Armie) the Protestants did greatly bewaile the loss of the faid Prince, in respect of his Religion, person, and birth; yet comforting themselves, the thought it rather an aduancement, than an hinderance to their affaires. For so much did the valour of the one, out-reach the adults designed of the other, as what soeuer the Admirall intended to winne by attending the aduantage, the Prince aduentured to lose, by being our-consident in his owne courage.

But we need no better example, than of the Carthaginians in this prefent buffines:

who though they were full fack of their ill-grounded love to Hanne, and were visualling to difgrace him; yet feeing that all ranne towards ruine, through the difcord of the Generals, committed the decision of their controversies, who the Armiethat served voter them. The indgement of the Armie was, that Hanno should depart the Campe: which he did, and Hannibal was sent in his stead, one that would be directed by Amilear; and that was enough.

After this, the affaires of Carthage began to prosper somewhat better. Matho and spendius had brought their Armie necre vnto the Citie 3 and lay before it, as in a slege. They might well be bold, to hope and aduenture much; having in their Campe aboue fiftie thousand, besides those that lay abroad in Gartisons. Neuerthelesse, the Citie was too strong for them to winne by assault; and the entrance 30 of victualles they could not hinder, if any should bee sent in by friends from about Hieron, King of Syracufe, though during the warres in Sicil he affifted the Roman, and fill continued in their Alliance, yet now fent fuecours to the Carthaginius: fearing their fall, and confequently his owne, because if no other State gaue the Romans formwhat to trouble their difgestion, the Principalitie of Syracufe would sone be deuoured by them. The Romans also gaue them some stender affistance, and for the present refused good offers made vinto them by the Mercinaries. This they did, to shew a kind of noble disposition; which was indeed but counterseit, as the sequele manifestly proved.

While (Matho and his followers were bufily preffing the Citie, Amilear was as diligent, in waiting at their backes, and cutting off all that came to their flipply: 16 that finding themselues more straightly besieged by him, than Carthage was by them, they purposed to desist from their vaine attempt, and try some other course. Hercupon they issue into the field: where Spendius, and one Zareas an African Captaine affisting the rebellion, take vpon them to sinde Amilear works; leaving Mathoin Tanis, to negotiate with their friends, and take a general care of the businesses. The Elephants of Carthage, and horse of Naraws sum, made spendium searchall to decend into the Plaines. Wherefore hee betooke himselfe to his former method of warre; keeping the mountaines, and rough grounds, oroccupying the

50 straightest passages, wherein the desperate courage of his men might show it selfe, with little disaduantage. But Amilar had more skill in this Art, than could bee matched by the labour of Spendius. Hee drew the enemie to many skirmishes; in all which the successe was such, as added courage to his owne tuen, and abated the strength and spirit of the Rebels. Thus he continued, prouoking them night and day: fill intrapping some of them, and sometimes giving them the overthrow in plaine battaile: vntill at length he got them into a straight, whence ere they should get out, he meant to take of them a good account. Their judgement was enough, to perceiue their owne disaduantage: and therefore they had the lesse stomake to fight; but awaited for helpe from Tunis. Amilear prudently foreseeing, that neceffitie might teach them, to dare impossibilities, vsed the benefit of their present feare, and thut them close vp with Trench and Rampart. There they waited miferably for fuccour, that came not: and having spent all their victuailes, were so pinched with hunger, that they fed vpon the bodies of their prisoners. This they fuffred patiently, as knowing that they had not descrued any favour from Carthage; 10 and hoping, that their friends at Tunis would not bee vimindfull of them. But when they were driuen to such extremitic, that they were faine to denoure their owne companions, and yet faw none appearance or likelihood of reliefe: their obstinacie was broken; and they threatned their Captaines with what they had deferued, vnlesse they would goe foorth to Amilear, and secke such peace as might be gotten. So Spendius, Zarxas, and Autaritus, fell to consultation, wherein it was refolued, to obey the multitude, and yeeld themselves, if it were so required, vnto the death, rather than to perish by the hands of their owne companions. Hereupon they fend to craue parie, which is granted; and these three come forth to talke with Amilear in person. What they could say vnto him, it is hard to coniecture: yet 20 by the conditions which Amilear granted, it feemes that they tooke the blame vpon themselues, and craued pardon for the multitude. The conditions were, that the Carthaginians should choose, out of the whole number of these enemies, any ten whom they pleased, to remaine at their discretion; and that the rest should all be dismissed, each in his shirt, or in one single coate. When the peace was thus concluded; Amilear told these Ringleaders, that he chose them presently, as part of the ten, and so commanded to lay hands on them: the rest he foorthwith went to fetch, with his whole Armie in order. The Rebels, who knew not that peace was concluded vpon fo gentle articles, thought themselues betraied: and therefore amazedly ranne to armes. But they wanted Captaines to order them; and the same 30 astonishment, that made them breake the Couenants of peace, whereof they were ignorant, gaue vnto Amilear both colour of iustice, in accomplishing reuenge, and case in doing the execution. They were all slaine: being fortie thousand, or more,

This was a famous exploit: and the newes thereof, exceeding welcome to Carthaze; and terrible to the revolted Cities of Africk. Henceforward Amilear, with his Naraussus and Hannibal, carried the warre from Towne to Towne, and found all places readic to yeelde: Vtica, and Hippagreta, onely standing out, vpon scarc of descrued vengcance; and Tunes, being held by Matho, with the remainder of his Armie. It was thought fit to begin with Tunis, wherein lay the chiefe strength of 40 the enemie. Comming before this Towne, they brought forth Spendius, with his fellowes, in view of the defendants, and crucified them vnder the walles; to terrific those of his olde companions, that were still in armes. With this rigour the siege began; as if speedie victorie had beene assured. Hannibal quartered on that part of Tunis, which lay towards Carthage; Amilear on the opposite fide: too farre asunder to helpe one another in sudden accidents; and therefore it behoued each, to be the more circumspect.

Matho from the walles beheld his owne destinie, in the miserie of his companion, and knew not how to avoide it otherwise, than by a cast at dice with fortune. So he brake out voon that part of the Carthaginian Armie, that lay secure, as if all 50 danger were past, under the command of Hannibal: and with so great and unexpected furie he fallied, that after an exceeding flaughter, he tooke Hannibal prisoner; on whom, and thirtie the most noble of the Carthaginian prisoners, he presently renenged the death of Spendius by the same torture. Of this Amilear knew nothing till it was too late; neither had he strength enough remaining, after this great loffe, to continue the fiege; but was faine to breake it vp, and remoue vnto the mouth of the Riuer Bagradas, where he incamped.

The terrour was no leffe within Carthage, vpon the fame of this loffe; than had beene the ioy of the late great victoric. All that could be are armes, were fent into the field, under Hanne; whom, it feemes, they thought the most able of their Capraines furniting the lateaccidents of Warre. If there were any Law among them. forbidding the imployment of one fole Generall, necre vnto their Citie (for they are knowne to hauetrusted one man abroad) the time did not permit, in this hastie 10 exigent, to deutle about repealing it. But thirtie principall men are chosen by the Senate, to bring Hanno to Amilears campe, and by all good persuasions to reconcile them. This could not be effected in one day. It neerely touched Amilear in his honour, that the carelefnesse of Hannibal seemed to be imputed vnto him, by sending his enemie to moderate his proceedings. Neuertheleffeafter many conferences, the authoritie of the Senatours prevailed; Amilear and Hanno were made friends; and thenceforth, whilest this warre lasted, Hanno tooke warning by Hannibals calamities. to followe good directions, though afterwards hee returned to his old and deadly Lin Du. 3.1.t.

In the meane feafon Mathe was come abroad; as meaning to vie the reputation 20 of his late fucceife, whileft it gaue some life vnto his businesse. He had reason to doe as he did: but he wanted skill to deale with Amilear. The skirmifnes, and light exercites of warre, wherein Amilear trained his Carthaginians, did so farreabate the firength, and withall diminish the credit of Masho, that he resolved to trie the fortune of one battaile: wherein either his defires should be accomplished, or his cares ended. To this conclusion the Carthaginians were no leffe prone, than Matho: as being wearie of these long troubles, and insupportable expences; confident in the valour of their owne men, which had approved it felfe in many trials; and well affured of Amilear his great worth, whereunto the enemie had not what to oppose. According to this determination, each part was diligent in making prouision; inui-30 ting their friends to helpe; and drawing foorth into the fielde, all that lay in Gar-

The iffue of this Battaile might have beene foretold, without helpe of witchcraft. Matho, and his followers, had nothing whereon to presume, saue their dating spirits, which had beene well cooled by the many late skirmishes, wherein they had learned how to runne away. The Carthagini we had reason to dare, as hauing often beene victorious: and in all points elfethey had the better of their encmies; especially (which is worth all the rest) they had such a Commander, as was not eafily to be matched in that Age. Neither was it likely, that the defire of libertic should worke so much, in men accustomed to seruitude; as the honour of their 40 State would, in Citizens, whose future and present good lay all at once ingaged in that aduenture. So the Carthaginians wanne agreat victorie, wherein most of the Africans their enemies were flaine; the rest sled into a Towne, which was not to be defended, and therefore they all yeelded; and Matho himselfe was taken aliue. Immediacly vpon this victorie, all the Africans that had rebelled made submission to their old mafters : Vtica onely, and Hippagreta flood out, as knowing how little they descrued of fauour. But they were soone forced, to take what conditions best bleafedthe victours. Matho and his fellowes were led to Carthage in triumph; where they suffered all torments that could be deuised, in recompence of the mischiefes which they had wrought in this warre. The warre had lasted three yeeres, and a-50 bout foure moneths, when it came to this good end: which the Carthaginians, whose fubiects did not loue them, (hould with leffe expence, by contenting their Mercinaries, haue preuented in the beginning.

How the Mercenaries of the Carthaginians, that were in Sardinia, rebelled : and were afterwards driven out by the Ilanders. The faithlesse dealing of the Romans with the Carthaginians in taking from them Sardinia, contrarie to the peace.

Hilest Matho and Spendius were making this terrible combustion in Africke; other Mercenaries of the Cartbaginians had kindled the like 10 fire in Sardinia: where murdering Bostar the Gouernour, and other Carthaginians, they were in hope to get, and hold that Iland to their own vie. Against these one Hanno was fent with a small Armie (such as could be spared in that busic time) consisting likewise of Mercenaries, leuied on the fudden. But these companions that followed Hanno, finding it more for their fafety, and present profit, to joyne themselves with those that were already revolted than to indanger themselves by battaile, for the good of that commonweale, of which they had no care; began to enter into practice with the Sardinian Rebels; offering to runne one course of fortune with them in their enterprise. This their offer waskindly taken; but their faith was suspected. Wherefore, to take a way all 20 icalousie and distrust, they resolved to hang up their Commander Hanne, and performed it. A common practice it hath beene in all Ages, with those that have vndertaken the quarrell of an vniust warre, to enjoyne the performance of some notorious and villainous act, to those that come into them as seconds, with offer to partake, and to affift the impious purposes which they have in hand. It is indeed the best pawne, that desperate men can deliuer to each other, to performe some fuch Actions, as are equally vnpardonable to all.

By such a kind of crueltie did the vngratefull Mantineans murder a Garrison of Achaians, fent vnto them for their defence against the Lacedamonians, by Aratus; who, when hee had formerly possess himselfe of their Citie, by right of warre, did 30 not onely spare the sacke and spoile thereof, but gaue them equall freedome with the rest of the Cities vnited. These Revolts are also common in our Court-warres; where, in the conquests of newe fortunes, and making of newe parties, and factions, without the depression or destruction of olde friends, we cannot be received and trusted by old enemies. Ce font les coups de vieille escrime. These, (say the French) be the blowes of the old art of fencing.

These Mercinaries in Sardinia were no whit lesse violent in their purpose, than were Spendius, and his affociates : onely they wanted a Matho among them, to negotiate with the inhabitants of the Province. The Ilanders were no leffe glad, than the fouldiours, that the Carthaginians were expelled the Countrie: but they 40 could not agree about the profit of the victorie. The Sardinians thought that it was enough, if they rewarded the fouldiours for their paines taken. Contrariwife, the fouldiours were of opinion, that the title of the Carthaginians to that Ile, was devolved vnto themselves, by right of conquest. The same quarrell would (in likelihood) hauerisen, betweene Spendius with his Mercenaries, and their African friends; if the common delire of both had once taken effect: vnleffe the riches of Carthage had served to content them all. But in Sardinia, where there was none other valuable reward, than possession and rule of the Countrie; the matter was not eafily taken vp. So they fell to blowes; which how they were dealt, I know not; but finally, the Mercenaries were driven out, and compelled to faue themselves in Ita- 50 he. Before their departure out of Sardinia, they had inuited the Romans into it; with as good right, as the Mamertines had called them into Sicil. Yet this offer was refufed, vpon reasons that follow.

the Carthaginians tooke almost five hundred, and held them in prison. Hercof was made a great complaint: fo that the Romans sent Embassadours to Carthage, requiring satisfaction. It was no time for the Carthaginians to dispute: they quietly yeelded to release them all. This was so kindly taken, that they forbade all their Merchants, to trade thenceforth with the Rebels; admonishing them to carry all prouisions to Carthage. And vpon the same reason, did they for beare to meddle with Sardinia, or to accept the Citie of Vica, offering it felle vnto their subjection. This might have ferued, as a notable example of the Roman faith, to all posteritie: had not the iffue proued, that it was meere regard of greater profit, which kept to them so temperate, no longer than the hope lasted of thriuing better thereby, than they should have done by open breach of faith. The whole estate of Carthage depended, at that time, upon the vertue of Amilear: who had he beene ouerthrown by Spendius or Matho, in one maine battaile, that mightie Citie must either have fallen into the barbarous hands of merciles villaines, or haue humbled herfelfe under protection of the Romans, with whom shee had lately striuen for superioritie. That extreme necessitie, whereinto Matho reduced the Citie, by the fortune of one fallie made out of Tunis, is enough to proue, that Carthage was not farre from fuch a miscrable choice. Wherfore it was not vnwisely done of the Romans, to make such demonstration of kindnesse, and honourable dealing, as might inuite a rich, but 20 finking thippe, to runne her felfe aground vpontheir thore. But when all was well ended in Africke, and the Carthaginians began to prepare for the recourse of Sardinia: then did Ambition put off her goodly vizour. The Romans perceiuing that Carthage, beyond their hope, had recoursed her feete againe; began to strike at her head. They entertained the proffer of those Mercinaries, that were fled out of Sardinia; and they denounced warre against this enscebled and impouerished Citie, vnder a shamelesse pretence, that the preparations made for SARDINIA, were made indeed against Rome it selfe. The Carthaginians knew themselves vnable to relist; and therefore yeelded to the Romans demand; renouncing vnto them all their right in Sardinia. But this was not enough. They would have twelve hundred talents, 30 in recompence belike (for I fee not what reason they could alleage) of the great feare which they had endured, of an inualion from Carthage. It is indeed plaine, that they impudently fought occasion of warre. But necessitie taught the Carthaginians

In a Citie long accustomed to rule, the brauer determination casilie tooke place: and the best meanes were thought vpon, for the increase of puissance and Empire. The 50 strength, and the jealousie of the Romans, forbade all attempts vpon the Mediterran feas; but the riches of Spaine, that lay vpon the Ocean, were vnknowne to Rome: wherefore that Prouince might serve, both to exercise the Carthaginians in warre, and to repaire their decaied forces, with all needfull supplies. Of this Spanish Expedition, the charge and four aigne trust was committed vnto Amilear : vpon haue fince whom his Countrie did wholly repose it selfe; in hope to recour strength by his meanes, that had faued it from ruine.

Hanno, with some other enuious men, that were of his faction, took little pleasure in the generall loue and honour, which daily increased towards Amilear and his friends. Yet could they not denie him to bee the most worthy of command in all the Citic: onely they commended peace and quietnesse; adulting men to beware of pronoking the Romans, in whole amitie they faid, that the felicitie of Carthage did confift. By fuch discourses, harsh to the eares of good Citizens, who had feeling of the wrong done to their Common weale; they got none other reputation, than of fingularitie: which the ignorant fort suspected to be wisedome.

But the glory of Amilear was continually vpheld and enlarged, by many notable feruices that he did, to the fingular benefit of his Countrie. He paffed the Streights of Hercules, (now called the Streights of Gibraltar) and landed on the westerne coast of Spaine; in which Countrie, during nine yeeres that he lived there, hee subjected vnto the State of Carthage the better part of all those Provinces. But finally, in 2 battaile that he fought with a Nation in Portugale, called the Vettones, (defending himselse a long time with an admirable resolution) hee was innironed and slaine: carrying with him to the graue the same great honour and same, by which in many

After the death of Amilear; Afdrubal his sonne in law was made Generall of the 20 Carthaginian forces in Spaine. This was a good man of warre; but farre better in practice and cunning, than in deedes of armes. By his notable dexteritie in matter of negotiation, he greatly enlarged the Dominion of Carthage: adding fo many subiects and confederates thereunto, that the Romans began to grow icalous agains of this hastie increase. He built a goodly Citie, vpon a commodious Hauen, in the Kingdome of Granado, opposite to that of Oran in Africa, and gaue it the name of The Spaniards New Carthage, which to this day it neerely retaineth, being called now * Carthagena. With this successe of the Carthaginians in Spaine, the Romans were not alittle troubled; but begin to cause their owne negligence. For whereas they had formerly taken so much paines to beate them out of the Ile of Sicil, as suspecting their 30 neighbourhood there; they had now, by cumbring themselues in a warre of farre leffe importance, (whereof I shall speake anon) given them ley sure, without interruption, to recouer vpon their owne Continent, a Dominion by farre exceeding, both in the bodies of men and in revenue, that which the Romans had taken from them. But how to helpe this, at the present they knew not; for they daily exthe yeare 1385 pected to be inuaded by the Gaules, their ancient enemies, and neerest neighbours to the West. But hee needeth little helpe of force, that knoweth himselfe to be feared: it is enough if hecrequelt; fince his requelt shall have the vertue of a com-

Yet were the Romans vtterly destitute of all good colour; that might helpe them 40 to intermeddle in Spaine. The Spaniards were then vnacquainted with Rome, whereof (in probabilitie) they scarce had heard the name : so that there were no Mamertines, nor other fuch Rebels, to call in Roman succours. But in the enterprise of Sardinia, the Romans had learned an impudent pretence, that might also serve their turne in Spaine. For though it were apparent, that the Spanish affaires had no relation to the peace between these two Cities; and though it were nothing likely, that Asdrubal had any purpose, to extend his victories vnto the gates of Rome, or to any of the Roman frontiers: yet (as if some such matter had beene suspected) they sent vnto him, requiring that hee should forbeare to proceed any further, than to the Riuer of Iberus. In addressing their messengers, rather to Asdrubal, than to the Citie 50 of Carthage; they seeme to have hoped, that how socuer the generalitie of the Carthaginians had fweetly fwallowed many bitter pilles, to avoide all occasion of warre with Rome: yet the braueric of one man might proue more fastidious, and, refenting the iniurie, returne fuch answere, as would intangle his whole Countrie in the quarrell, that they fo much defired; and might embrace at leifure, when once they had found apparent cause. But As druball finely deluded their expectation. He pretended no manner of diflike at all: and whereas they would have this infolent couenant inferted into the articles of peace; he tooke vpon him to doc it, of his owne power, with such appearance of conformitie to their will, that they went their wayes contented, and fought no further.

If it had beene fo, that the State of Carthage, thereunto preffed by the Romans, for feare of present warre; had ratified this new composition made by Afdrabal, vet thould it not have flood bound in honour, to observe the same carefully, vnlesse to an oath had also beene extorted, to make all fure. But fince all paffed quietly, vnder the bare authoritie of Afdrubal; this Capitulation was none other in effect, than a second breach of peace; whereof the Romans might be accused more justly, than they could accuse the Carthaginians of periurie, (as they after did) for refusing to stand to it. By this Treatie with Afdrubal, the Romans wanne fome reputation in Spaine. For when it was once conceived by the Spaniards, that the Citie which would needes be mistresse ouer them, stood in feare her selfe, of receiving blowes from a stouter Dame; there were foone found fome, that by offering themselves to the protection on of Rome, became (as they thought) fellow-feruants with Carthage. But the Car-20 thaginians will shortly teach them another lesson. The Saguntines, a people on the South fide of Iberus, entred into confederacie with the Romans, and were gladly accepted. Surely it was lawfull vnto the Romans, to admit the Saguntines, or any other people (neither subject, nor open enemic in warre to the Carthaginians) into their focietie: and vnlawfull it was vnto the Carthaginians, to vse violence towards any that should thus once become confederate with Rome. Neuerthelesse, if we confider the late agreement made with Afdrubal; we shall finde that the Romans could have none other honest colour of requiring it, than an implicit couenant of making the River Iberus a bound, ouer which they themselves would not passe, in any Discoucrie or Conquest by them intended to be made vpon Spaine: in which 20 regard, they might have some honest pretence to require the like of the Carthaginians; though Rome as yet had no foote, on the one fide of Iberus, whereas Carthage, on the other fide of that River, held almost all the Countrie. Howsoever it were; this indignitie was not so easily digested, as former injuries had beene. For it was a matter of ill consequence, that the Nations which had heard of no greater power than the Carthaginian, should behold Saguntum resting securely among them, vpon confidence of helpe from a more mightie Citie. Wherefore either in this respect; or for that the sense is most feeling of the latest injuries; or rather for that now the Carthaginians were of power to do themselves right: warre against Saguntum was generally thought vpon, let the Romans take it how they lift. In fuch termes were 40 the Carthaginians, when Adrubal died, after he had commanded in Spaine eight yeeres: (being flaine by a flaue, whose master he had put to death) and the Great Hannibal, sonne of the Great Amilear, was chosen Generall in his stead.

The effate of Greece from the death of PIRRHVS, to the raigne of PHILIP the fonne of DEMETRIVE in Macedon.

N the long terme of the first Punick warre, and the vacation following, betweene it and the fecond; the chate of Greece, after the death of Pyrrbus, was growne fomewhat like vnto that, wherein Philip of Mandan had found it: though farre weaker as in an after foring. The cedon had found it ; though farre weaker, as in an after-spring. The 10 whole countrie had recoucred by degrees, a forme of libertie : the pettie tyrannies (bred of those inferiour Captaines, which in the times of generall combustion, had seised each vpon such Townes as he could get) were, by force or accident, extirpated, and reformed; and some States were risen to such greatnesse. as not onely served to defend themselves, but to give protection to others. This conversion to the better, proceeded from the like diffensions and tumults in Macedon, as had beene in Greece, when Philip first began to encroch vpon it. For after many quarrels and great warres, about the Kingdome of Macedon, betweene Antigonus the elder, Cassander, Demetrius, Lysimachus, Selencus, Pyrrhus, and the Gaules: Antigonus, the sonne of Demetrius, finally got and held it, reigning fixe and thirtie 20 veeres; yet so, that he was divers times thence expelled, not onely by the Gaules, and by Pyrrhus, as hath beene alreadic shewed, but by Alexander the sonne of Pyrrhus the Epirot, from whosefather he had hardly wonne it. This happened vnto him, by the reuolt of his fouldiours, even at fuch time, as having overthrowne with great flaughter an Amie of the Gaules, he was converting his forces against the Athenians, whom he compelled to receive his Garrisons. But his yong sonne Denetrius railed an Armie; wherewith he chased Alexander, not onely out of Macedon, but out of his owne Epirus, and restored his father to the Kingdome.

By the helpe of this yong Prince Demetrius (though in another kind) Antigonus got into his possession the Citadell of Corinth; which was justly termed the fetter of 30 Greece. The Citadel called Acrocorinthus, flood upon a fleep rockie hill on the North fide of the towne; and was by nature and art fo ftrong, that it feemed impregnable. It commanded the towne; which was of much importance, as occupying the whole breadth of the Isthmus, that running betweene the Agean and Ionique Scas, ioyneth Peloponnesus to the Maine of Greece. Wherefore he that held possession of this Castle, was able to cut off all passage by land, from one halfe of Greece unto the other; besides the commoditie of the two Seas, vpon both of which, this rich and goodly Citie had commodious hauens. Alexander, the sonne of Polysperchon; and after his death, Cratesipolis his wife, had gotten Corinth in the great shuffling of Prouinces and Townes, that was made between Alexanders Princes. Afterwardsit pal- 40 fed from hand to hand, vntill it came, I know not how, to one Alexander; of whom I finde nothing elfe, than that he was thought to bee poisoned by this Antigonus, who deceived his wife Nicas thereof, and got it from her by a tricke. The device was this. Antigonus fent his yong Demetrius to Corinth, willing him to court Nicas, and seeke her marriage. The foolish old widdow perceived not how vnsit a match the was for the yong Prince, but entertained the fancie of marriage; whereto the old King was euen as readic, to consent, as was his sonne to delire it, and came this ther in person to solemnize it. Hereupon all Corinth was filled with facrifices, feasts, plaies, and all forts of games: in the middelt of which, Antigonus watched his time, and got into the Castle, beguiling the poore Ladie, whose icalousie had beene ex- 50 ceeding diligent in keeping it. Of this purchase hee was so glad, that he could not containe himselfe within the grauitie beseeming his old age. But as hee had stollen it; fo was it againe stollen from him: neither lived he to revenge the losse of it, being alreadic spent with age. Demetrius, Demetrius, the sonne of this Antigonus, succeeding vnto his father, reigned ten yeeres. He made greater proofe of his vertue before he was King than after. The Dardanians, Ætolians, and Mehaans, held him continually bussed in warre; wherin his fortune was variable, and for the more part ill. About these times the power of the Macedonians began to decay : and the Gracians to cast off their yoke.

CHAP.2. S.6.

Philip, the onely fonne of Demetrius, was a yong child when his father died; and therefore Antigonus, his vncle, had the charge of the Kingdome, during the minoritie of the Prince; but he assumed the name and power of a King, though hee respected Philip as his owne sonne, to whom he left the Crowne at his death; This 10 Antigonus was called the Tutor, in regard of his Protectorship; and was also called Doson, that is as much as, Will give, because he was slow in his liberalitie. He represfed the Dardanians, and Theffalians, which molested his Kingdome, in the beginning of his raigne. Vpon confidence of this good service, hee tooke state vpon him, as one that rather were King in his owne right, then onely a Protector. Hereupon the people fell to mutinie; but were soone appealed by faire words, and a seeming unwillingnesse of his to meddle any more with the Gouernment. The Achaians tooke from him the Citic of Athens, soone after Demetrius his death; and likely they were to have wrought him out of all or most that hee held in Greece, if their owneestate had not beene endangered by a neerer enemy. But civile diffention, 20 which had ouerthrowne the power of Greece, when it flourished most; ouerthrew iteafily now againe, when it had scarcely recourred strength after a long sicknesse; and gaue to this Antigonus no leffe authoritie therein, than Philip the father of A. lexander, got by the like aduantage.

These Achaians, from small beginnings, had increased in short time to great strength and fame: so that they grew the most redoubted Nation of all the Greeks. By the equalitie of their Lawes, and by their elemencie (notwithstanding that they were a long time held under by the Macedonians and Spartans) they did not onely draw all others by their love and alliance, but induced, through their example, the rest of the Cities of Peloponnesus, to bee governed by one Lawe, and to vie

30 one and the fame fort of waights, measure, and monic. Aratus, the Sicyonian, was the first that vnited them againe; and gaue them courage, after that they had beene by the Macedonian Captaines divided into many Principalities. In elder times they were gouerned by Kings, as most of the great Cities of Greece were; to which kinde of rule they first subjected themselues, after the descent of the Heraclida, when Tisamenus the sonne of Orestes possess the Territorie of Achaia. In this estate they continued to the time of Gyges; after whome, when his sonnes sought to change the Legall government of their Predecessors into Tyrannie, they expelled them, and made their State popular; as feeming most equall. This forme of Common-weale had continuance, with some small 40 changes according to the diucritic of times, till the reigne of Philip and Alexander Kings of Macedon: who tempest-like ouer turned all things in that part of the world. For those twelue Cities, called the Cities of alliance, whereof Helice, and Bura or Olemus, the Sea had eaten vp alittle before the Battaile of Leuelres; were, by disturbance of the Macedonians, divided from each other, and trained into a warre, no leffe foolish than cruell, among themselues. But in the one hundred and foure and twentieth Olympiad, in which, or neere it, Ptolomie the sonne of Lagus, Lysimachus, Scleucus, and Ptolomie Ceraunus, left the world; two of the ten remaining Cities and People, namely, the Patrenfes and the Dimei, united themselves, and laid the foundation of that generall accord, and re-vnion, which after followed. For having 30 beene, some of them Partisans with fundric Macedonian Captaines, and others hauing beene gouerned by pettie Kings; they began to fasten themselues in a strong league of amitie, partly, in the Olympiad before spoken of, and partly, at such time as Pyrrhus made his first voiage into Italie. Now after the uniting of the Patrenses and Dimai, to whom also the Cites of Tritea, and Phara, ioyned themselues;

CHAP. 2. S.6.

Ægira chased out her Garrisons: and the Burians, killing their Kings, entred with the Ceraunians into the same Confederacie. These Cities, for twentie & fine yeeres, yled the same forme of Gouernement with the Achaians; who by a Senatoric and two Prætors, ordered all things in their Commonweale, and some after, by one Prætor, or Commander: of which, Marcus Carynensis was the first, and Aratus the Second.

This Aratus was a noble yong Gentleman of Sicyon, who lining at Argos in exile. whilest his Countrie was oppressed by Tyrants, found meanes, through the helpe of other banished men, to enter their owne Citie by night, with ladders; whence they chaced the Tyrant, and restored the people to libertie. This was in the time of Antigonus Genatas King of Macedon, a Prince more buffe in watching what to get 10 among the Greekes, than wife in looking to his owne. For feare of Antigonus, the Sieyonians entred into the Achaian league: which though at that time it received more increase, by their accession, than it added strength to them; yet the benefit of this conjunction ferued well enough against Antigonus, whose subtilty was somewhat greater than his valour. As the industrie and counsaile of Aratus deliuered his Countrie from bondage, and fortified it by the Achaian league: fo further, by his great liberalitie, with the exceeding great cost of one hundred and fiftie talents, he pacified the inexplicable controuerfics, betweene the banished Sicyonians, which returned with him, and the other Citizens that had possession of these mens Lands: as also with the same mony he drew many others to affift him in those enterprises 20 following, that redounded to the fingular good of all Achaia. The mony he obtained of Ptolemie Euergetes King of Egypt; who partly had a desire to hold some ftrong and fure friendship in Greece, partly was delighted with the conversation of Aratus himselfe, that made a dangerous voiage to him into Agypt, and fed his pleafure in goodly pictures, with the gift of many curious pecces, wherein the workemen of Sicyon excelled.

The first of Aratus his great attempts, was the surprize of the Aratoristhus or Citadell of Corists, which he wanne by night, being thereinto guided by some theeues that he had hired for the purpose, who living in the place, had practifed to rob Antigonus his treasurie, passing in and out by a secret path among the rockes, 30 Yet was he saine to fight for it, ere he could get it: though indeede Antigonus his Souldiers were rather ouer-come by their owne searc, than by any sorce of the afailants; as mistrusting left the Achians were more in number, than in truth they were, and having lost the advantages of the place already, vpon which they had presumed, before they were aware of any enemie.

In the kinde of night-feruices, ambulhments, furprifes, and practices, Aratus was very cunning, aduenturous, and valiant: in open field, and plaine battaile, her was astimorous. By this fitnange mixture of cowardize and courage, he minifired argument of diffutation, to Philosophers and others; Whether a valiant man (as he was efteemed, and in fome case approued) might looke pale and tremble, when 40 he beganne battaile; and whether the vertue of Fortitude were dimersfined, by the fundry natures of men, and in a manner confined, vnto seucrall forts of action. In resoluting which doubts it may be said; that all vertue is perfected in men by exercife, wherein they are trained by occasion: though a naturall inclination standed in neede of little practice; whereas the defect hereof must be supplied with much instruction, vse, good successe, and other helps, yet hardly shall grow absolute in generall. Such was Aratus in matter of Warre. In sincere affection to his Countrie he was vareproueable, and so acknowledged: as his following actions will telitife.

When Areacrinthus was taken, and ioyned vnto the Common-wealth of Ashais, the Megarians reuolted from Aster from Astropaus, and entred into the fame Corpo. 79 ration. So did the Trazenians, and the Epidaurians: whereby this new erecked State grew so powerful, that it aducentured to take Athens, from the Macedonians; and Argas and Megalopiis, from Tyrants that held them. The enterprise vpon Athens was of none effect. For though Araus wasted the sle of Salamis, to show his strength, and fent home the Athenian prisoners, without ransome, to allure the Citie by shew of some; yet the Athenians stirred neither against him, nor for him, as being now growne honest states to the Macedonians. Vpon Argos the adventure was carried more strongly. The Achaians came sometimes to the gates of the Citie, but the people stirred not: once they entred it, and might have wonne it, if the Citizens would have lent any helpe to the recoverie of their owne freedome; sundire times, and with divers event, they sought with the Tyrants, (who rose yo one after another in Argos) in open field, and slue one of them in battaile, but all sufficed not: will at length Arisonachus the Tyrant was so terrified, perswaded, and hired, by 10 Arasus, that he consented to resigne his estate. The like did Xenon the Tyrant of Hermione, and Cleonymus that had oppressed the Phisisans. Whilest this businesse with the Arginess was no concept, systads the Tyrant of Megalopist was so well handled by Arasus, that, without compulsion, he gave libertie to his Citic, and annexed.

with the Argines was on foot, Lyssadas the Tyrant of Megalepolis was so well handled by Arstus, that, without compulsion, he gaue libertie to his Citic, and annexedito the Councell of Achaia: whereby he got such credit, that he was chosen General of their forces (which was a yeerly Office, and might not be held two yeeres together by one man) cuerie second yeere, for a certaine while, he and Arstus succeeding one another by turnes. But those late Tyrants, and new Citizens, Lyssadas and Arssansabus, were carried with private passion from care of the generall good; in which courses they opposed Arstus, to the great hurt of Achaia, as shall appeare to inductime.

The Acheans having obtayned so much pussifiance and reputation, that Ptolomic King of Egypt was become Patron of their Alliance, and sin title of honour) General of their forces by Sea and Land, made open Warre vpon Demetrius the Sonne of Artigomis Sonatas, for the libertie of Athens, It is strange and worthy of noting, That when Arstus in this quarrell had lost a battaile, the Athenians wore Garlands, in signe of toy, to flatter their good Lords the Macedonians, that had wonnet he victorie. Such were now the Athenians become; in whom the rule was verified, that holds true in generall of the multitude, Aut humiliter servit, aut supposed dominaturs It is either base in service, in soft of the molitude. Aut a summand. Neuerthelesse who so Demetrius was dead, Arstus performed that by monic, which he could not by force;

and corrupting the Captaine of the Macedonian Garrison, purchased libertie to the Athenians, who thencesoorth held good correspondence with the Acheans, lowing them, and speaking well of them, which was all that they could doe: but into their Corporation they entred not, scorning it belike, in regard of their owne out-worne glorie.

Now as the Common-wealth of Achaia daily increased within Peloponnefus, by inflice and honestie; so did the Ætolians, in the vtter part of Greece, yea and within Peloponnefus it felfe, waxe very powerfull, by flurdineffe of bodie, and rude courage in fight, without helpe of any other vertue. They had floutly defended themselues 40 against Antipater and Craterus; partly by daring to doe and suffer much; partly by the natural strength and fastnesse of their Countrie; but especially by the benefit of the time, which called away these famous Captaines to other bulinesse, as hath beene related. They had molefted Caffander, in fauour of Antigonus; and were themselues as much plagued by him, & by the Acarnanians, a little, but a sout Nation, that tooke his part. Afterwards they had to doe with Demetrius, the sonne of the first Antigonus, and more or leffe, with al the Kings of Mecedon succeeding him. They'likewise held often Warre with the Acarnanians, Athamanians, Epirots, and many Cities in Peloponnesus: so that they were hardened with perpetual traunile; seldome putting off their Armour. But their hardinesse ill deserued the name of va-30 lour, seeing they had no regard of honestie or friendship; measuring all things by their owne infolent wil, and thinking al people base-minded, that were not as fierce and outragious as themselucs.

These Ætolians had lately made great spoiles in Peloponnesus, and occupied a good part of the countrie. They had inuaded the friends of the Aehaanstaken and facked

Pallene; where although they were foundly beaten by Aratus; yet their desire of gaine made them greedie of a new voiage thither, as to a Countrie wherein somewhat was to be gotten. But they were forced to looke another way, by Demetrius the fonne of Antigonus Gonatas: who preffed them fo hardly, that they were driven to feeke helpe of the Acheans; which they obtained. The warre which the Acheans made vpon Demetrius, without Peloponnesus, in Attica, though it tended to expelling the Macedons out of Greece, yet the benefit thereof redounded chiefly vnto the Atolians, at whose instance it was set on foot: for thereby were the Macedonian forces diverted from them. Neither was this good turne vnacknowledged; though very basely the Etolians, giving thanks in words, devised how to requite the benefit 10 with some great mischiefe. They saw that the Acheans were desirous, to bring all Pelopannefis into their Alliance and Corporation: of which intent, the Lacedamonians were very lealous. Wherefore these Atolians laboured carnelly, to set the Lacedemonians and Acheans together by the cares : hoping that if this might come to paffe, they themselues should be called into helpe (it skilled not on what side) and fo get no small share, both in bootic and Territorie. Neither did they forbeare to communicate this their deuice vnto Antigonus; offering to make him partaker of their gaine, whom they knew to be offended with the many losses, that his Kingdome had fustained by the Achaans. Of this plot Aratus was aware: who therefore determined to suffer many indignities, rather than to give the Lacedamonians cause 20 to take armes. But this resolution was taken somewhat too late: and not also gether in his own power to hold. He had been medling with the Archadians, that were dependants of Lacedemon: and thereby had provoked the Lacedemonians to looke about them, feeing that all Peloponnejus, excepting themselues, the Eleans, and a few Arcadians their friends (who also were attempted) was alreadie become Achaan.

The Citie of Sparta was in ill case about these times sand subject to the injuries of any stronger Neighbour. Pyrrhus had greatly weakned it; The Ætolians entring Laconia with an Armie, had carried away fiftic thousand slaves; and, which was worse, their discipline was corrupted, Austice and Luxurier aigned among them, the poore was oppressed by the rich, & the generositie of spirit, that had sometime 39 beene their generall vertue, was hardly now to be found among the best of them. There were left in Sparta no more than feuen hundred naturall Citizens; of whom not aboue one hundred had lands: all the rest were needie people and desirous of innouation. Hereupon followed intestine sedition; which endangered the Citie most of all. Agis a good King, who fought to reforme the disorders of the State, exhorted the people to a firich observation of Lyenrgus his laws. To which purpose be caused them to passe an Act, for the abolishing of all debts, and equal division of lands. All the yonger, and the poorer fort were glad of this: but the rich men opposed it. These had recourse vnto Leonidas the other King, (for in Sparta were two Kings) who tooke their part; being himselfea dissolute man, as one trained up in the 40 Court of Syria, whence also he had his wife. In this contention Leonidas was expelled the Citie, and a new King chosen in his fread. But Agis his friends and Counfailors in this enterprise, abused his good meaning to their owne private commoditie. They were hastie to take away all debts, and cancell bonds, for they themsclues were deeply indebted: but the division of lands they afterwards hindred, because their owne possessions were great. Hence arose a tumult in Sparta, which these men increased by their soule oppression of the poorer Citizens. So that in fine, Leenidas was brought home, and restored to his Kingdome, and the two adverse Kings driven to take Sanctuarie; out of which, Cleombrotus, the late-made King, was difmissed into exile: but Agis was trained forth, drawne into prison, and there by his 50 enemies condemned and strangled, together with his Mother, and his old Grandmother. The like to this was neuer knowne in Sparta: and (which is the moreodious) this crueltie proceeded from the Ephori, Magistrates that should have given Patronage to the lawes, vling their power, and more power than to them belonged, against a King, that had proceeded orderly in reforming the Citie, as the lawes re-

The death of Agu was much lamented by all good Citizens; and scrued to establish the impotent rule of a few tyrannicall oppressors. In which case Aratus might well hope, to adioyne Lacedamon to the Achean Common-wealth: though it were great injustice to take such advantages, & attempt by force, that which would have redounded to the generall good of Peloponnefis, and to the benefit of Spartait felfe, ifit could have beene wrought by perswasion.

CHAP.2. S.6.

But the same man who redressed the disorders of Sparte, and revenged the death 10 of Agu, did also requite the iniust attempts of the Achesus, even in their owne kind: obtruding vpon them by force, an vnion of all Peloponnefus; though little to their good liking, for that the Lacedemonians and their King, should have beene the principall; not they and their Prator. Leonidas having thus caused Jgis to be flaine, tooke his wife that was very rich and beautifull, and gaue her in mariage (perforce) to his owne sonne Cleomenes. This yong Prince fell greatly enamoured on his wife, and fought to winne her affection, as well as he had her person. He discoursed much with her about the purpole of her former husband Jgis, and by pittying his miffortune, began to entertaine a delire of accomplishing that, wherein Agis had failed. Socomming himselfe to be King, whilst be was very yong, hee gladly embraced all 20 occasions of warre: for that he hoped by strong hand to effect that, which Agu, by proceeding formally, in so corrupt an estate of the Citie, had attempted to his owne ruine. Therfore when the Ephori gaue him in charge, to take and fortific Albenaum, a Temple on the marches of Laconia, to which both they and the Megalopolitans pretendedtitle, he readily performed it, Hercof Aratus made no complaint, but fought to take by surprise Tegea and Orchomenus, Cities then confederate with the Lacedamonians: wherein, his intelligence failing, he lost the labour of a painefull nights trauaile, and discouered his enmitte to Sparta; of which Cleomenes was nothing fortic. By these degrees the warre began. In the entrance whereto Aratus had discovered the Atolian practice, and therfore would have staiced the quarrell from proceeding

30 too farre. But Lyfisdas and A iffomachus would needes fight, and he could doe none other than be ruled by them; especially seeing Chemenes was so vegent. Aristomschus was at that time General of the Acheans, (He & Lyfiadas being of great account, fince they had abandoned their tyrannie) who fent vnto Aratus, lying then in Athens, and required his affiltance in a journie to be made into Laconia. No diffwalions of Aratus would ferue: therefore he came in person, and tooke part of a businesse, litthepleafing him in the present, and lesse in the future. When he met with Cleomenes, hedurst not fight; but opposed himselse against Aristomachus, who desired to give battaile. Yet had the Acheans twentie thousand foot, & one thousand horse, in their Armie: whereas Cleomenes had no more than fine thousand in all. This gaue repu-

40 tation to the Lacedemonian, and raised an ill report vpon Aratus; which Lysiadas helped to make worse, by accusing his cowardize. Neuerthelesse the Ackessis would not fall out with Aratus their Benefactor, but chose him their General the yere, following, against Lysiadas his accuser that fued for the place. Being Generall him selfe, it behould him to confute, with deedes, the flanderous wordes of Lyfiadas. Therefor the purposed to set vpon the Eleans: but was met withall on the way, necre vnto the Mount Lycaus, by Cleomenes; who vanquished him in a great battaile, and draue him to hidehim selfe all night for feare, so that he was thought to have beene slaine. This misaduenture Aratus recompensed by a trick of his owne more naturall occupation: performing with his broken Armie, that which could hardly have been ex-30 pected, had he bin victorious. For whilst there was no suspition of any great matter that he could undertake; he fecretly wrought with fome of the Mantingans, who did lethim into their Citic. The Mantineans had once before joyned themselves with the Achaians; but flortly vpon feare, or some other passion, they gave themselves to the Atolians; and from the Atolians, presently after this victoric, to Cleamenes, from whom immediately they were thus won. For this their leuitie they were not punished, but freely admitted now againe into the Achean societie. As this good fucceffe repaired the credit of Aratus; fo another battaile almost ruined it, Cleamenes and he encountred neere vnto Megalopolis; where the Achaans had somewhat the better at the first, but their Generall durst not follow his advantage. Therupon Lyfisdas, of whom we spake before, grew somewhat impatient with anger; and taking with him all the horse, brake vpon the Lacedamonians, whom hee routed at the beginning, but pursuing them too farre into places of hard passage, he was slaine by them, and his followers driven backe vpon their owne Companions; in fuch fort, 10 that finally all the Armie was disordered, and put to flight. This was a great loffe, and incenfed the Acheans against Aratus : yet their indignation proceeded no further, than that they refused to make any longer contribution, towards the pay of those Mercinaries which he had waged. This Aratus tooke patiently, and followed the warre neuertheleffe; wherein though Cleamenes wanne fome Townes, and Aratus got the better in one small fight, yet little of importance was done; the Acheans being wearie, and the Spartan King intentiue to another businesse.

Cleomenes having led into the field all that were like to hinder his purpose, and tired them with pamefull journies, for looke the Achean warre on a ludden, and came vnexpected home to Sparta, where hee flue the Ephori, and reflored by force 20 the ancient discipline of Lyeurgus. Then gaue hee an accompt of his doings: and shewing by what degrees the Ephori had incroched vpon the power of Kings, and many disorders had growne in the Citie; he justified his proceedings, and forthwith began to make equal division of the Lands, reducing all to the first institution. Hee also supplied the defect of Citizens, by choosing new, out of such as were friends to the State, and valiant men: fo that henceforth his Countrie might not altogether stand in neede of mercinarie helpe, as it lately had done, to faue it selfe from the Atolians, Illyrians, and other enemies. All this was dispatched in great haste; the Spertans well fatisfied; and Cleamenes himselfe ready in the field, ere his enemies could takeaduantage of these his domesticall troubles.

The Acheans hearing of this great alteration in Sparta, thought that it would be long, ere Cleomenes durit iffue forth of the Citic, for feare of some rebellion. But it was not long ere they heard, that he had wasted all the Countrie of Megalepolis; had ranged ouer all Arcadia at his pleasure; and was admitted into Mantinea; and readic to take other places, euen of Achaia. These newes displeased them nota little: but they must patiently endure to heare worse. For when Cleamenes had shaken off the power of the Ephori, that curbed his authoritie, hee proceeded more roundly in his worke; being better obeyed, and by better men. His Lacedamonians resumed their ancient courage; and he himselfe had the heart to demand the Principalitie of Greec. He did not therefore henceforth contend, about the poffession 40 of a few Townes: but aduentured to winne or lose all. The Atolians, in fauour of his attempt, declared themselves on his side: and whereas he had gotten Mantinea, Teges, and other places, to which they had some title, they willingly renounced all their interest vnto him.

Aratus did apprehend the danger of his Countrie, and faw that Antigonus with the Atolians, or perhaps without them, would shortly make an end of that, which Cleomenes had thus begunne. Therefore hee deuised how to prouide against the worst, and either to repaire all, or (if it could not bee) to fane all from vtter ruine. The office of Generall when it was next put vpon him, hee refused; fearing to bee so farre prest, as to hazzard in one battaile all 50 the force of his Countrie, to which as hee had neuer any affection, nor perchance courage, fo was his manner of warfare otherwife. For he commonly attempted by surprise, and defended upon the advantage of place, after the manner of the Irish, and of all other Nations, ouer-charged with numbers of men. Yet did he not for sake the care of the weale publike, though in aiming at the generall good, it seemes that private passion drew him into an ill course. He saw, that Megalopolis could not be defended without making a dangerous hazzard of battaile: that Mantines had not only opened her gates vnto Cleomenes, but flaine the Achean Garrison that lay therein; that other Townes had yeelded vnto him, without compulsion; and that Aristomachus, once Tyrant of Argos, and fince Generall of the Acheans, was now revolted vnto the enemie, following the fortune of Cleomenes. Ptolemie was too farre off to helpe; and the necreneffe of Antigonus was very dange-10 rous; yet might be viefull, if this King would (as Polybius faith) like others, be friend or enemie, as should best agree with his owne profit. To make triall hereof, Aratus practifed with some of Megalopolis, whom he found apt vnto his purpose; and inftructed them how to deale both with Antigonus, and the Acheans.

The Citie of Megalopolis had beene well affected to the Macedonians, ever fince the time of Philip the Father of Alexander, who had obliged it vnto him by some especiall benefits. At this time it lay neerest vnto the danger; was very faithfull, and therefore deferued fuccour; yet could not well bee relieued by the Acheans, with their owne proper strength. Wherefore it was thought meet, that Embassadours should bee sent vnto the generall Councell of Achaia, requesting leave and 20 good allowance, to trie the fauour of Antigonus in their necessitie. This was granted, for lack of what elfe to answere: and the same Embassadours dispatched away to Antigonus. They did their owne errand briefly ; telling him of the good will and respect which their Citie had of long time borne vnto him and his Predecesfours; of their present neede; and how it would agree with his honour to give them aide. But when they delinered the more generall matter, wherein Aratus had given them instruction; showing how the ambition of Cleomenes, and violence of the Liolians, might redound to his owne great losse or danger, if the one and the other were not in time preuented; how Aratus himselfe did stand affected; and what good likelihood there was of reducing the Acheans under the Patronage of 30 Macedon: then beganne Antigonus to lend a more attentiue care to their discourse.

He embraced the motion: and to give it the more life, he wrote vnto the Megalopolitans, that his helpe should not be wanting, so farre forth, as it might stand with the Acheans good liking. Particularly he commended himselfe, by these Messengers, to Aretus; affuring them, that he thought himselfe highly bound to this honourable man, whose former actions he now perceived, not to have beene grounded upon any hatred to the Masedonians, but only vpon a full and worthy love to his owne Nation. With this answere they returne to Ategalopolis: and are presently fent away to the Councell of Achsia; there to make some speedy conclusion, as the necessitie of the time required. . 40 The Acheans were glad to heare, that Antizonus was fo inclinable to their defire; and therefore were ready to entertaine his fauour, with all good correspondence. Hereunto Aratus gaue his confent; and praised the wisedome of his Countrimen, that so well discerned the best and likeliest meanes of their common safetie:

adding neuertheleffe, that it were not amiffe, first of all to trie their owne abilitie; which if it failed, then should they doe well to call in this gracious Prince, and make him their Patron and Protector. Thus hee shewed himselfe moderate, in that which himselfe of all others did most wish to the end, that hee might not afterward sustaine the common reprehension, if any thing fell out amisse; since it might appeare, that he had not beene Author of this Decree, but only followed, and that to leifurably, the generall confent. Neuerthelesse in true estimation, this finenesse of Aratus might have beene vsed, with his greater commendation, in a contrarie course. For it had beene more honourable, to make an end of the Warre, by yeelding vnto Cleomenes that power which they gaue vnto Antigonus: fince therby he should both have freed his

Countrie from all further trouble ; and withall should have restored vnto the vniuerfall state of Greece, that honorable condition, whereof the Macedonians had berest it. But it is commonly found (which is great pittie) that Vertue having risen to honour by degrees, and confirmed it felfe, (as it were) in the feat of Principalitie, by length of time, and successe of many actions; can ill endure the hastic growth of any others reputation, wherewith it fees it selfelikely to bee ouer-topped. Other cause to despise the Lacedamonians there was none; than that they lately had bin in dangerous case: neither could any reason be found, why Aratus should prefer Antigonus before Cleamenes, than that he had flood indoubt of the one, when he thought himselfe more mighty than the other. Wherefore he was justly plagued, when he 10 faw his owne honors reverfed by the infolent Macedonians; and in flead of living as a companion with Cleamenes, that was descended of a long race of Kings, the posteritie of Hercules was faine to doe facrifice vnto Antigonus, as vnto a God, and was finally poisoned by Philip, whose Nobilitie was but of fine descents, and whom perhaps he might have feene his fellowes, if he had not made them his Lords. By this inclination to the Macedonians, the loue of Ptolomie was loft: who forthwith tooke part with Cleomenes, though he did not supply him with such liberalitie, as hee had vsed to the Acheans; being warned, as may seeme, by their example, to be more watie both in trufting & disburling. Cleamenes himselfe, whileft this businesse with Antigenus was afoot, paffed through Arcadia with an Armie, & laboured by all meanes 20 to draw the Achains to battaile. At the Citie of Dymes in Achaia were affembled all the remaining forces of the Nation; with which it was concluded, to make triall, whether perhaps they might amend their estate, without seeking helpe of the Macedonian. Thither went Cleomenes, and there fought with them; where hee had fo great a victorie, that the enemie was no longerable to keepe the open field. The calamitie was such, that Aratus himselse durst not take upon him to be their Generall, when his turne came in the next election. Wherefore the Acheans were compelled to fue for peace; which was granted upon this easie condition: That they should not arrogate vnto themselves the command of Peloponnesws, but suffer the Lacedemonians (as in former ages) to be their Leaders in Warre. Hereunto if they would 39 condescend, he promised vnto them, that he would presently restore al places taken from them, and al his prisoners ransom-free: also that they should enjoy their owne Lawes and Liberties without moleflation. This gentle offer of Cleamenes was very pleasing to the Acheans: who desired him to come vnto the Citie of Lerna, where a Parliament should be held, for the conclusion of the Warre.

Now seemed the affaires of Greece likely to be settled in better order, than they had ever beene fince the beginning of the Peloponnesian Warres, year or fince the Perfian Inualion: when God, who had otherwise disposed of these matters, hindred all, with a draught of cold water, which Cleamenes dranke in a great heat, and thereupon fell extreme sick, and so could not be present at Lerna, but caused the Parliament to 40 be deferred to another time. Neuerthelesse he sent home the chiefe of his prisoners, to shew that he meant none other than good faith. By this faire dealing he confirmed the Acheans in their defire of his friendship : who affembled againe at Areos, there to establish the League. But Aratus was violently bent against it; and sought by great words, and terrible threats, to make his Countrimenafraid of resoluing. When all would not serue turne, he betooke himselfe to his cunning; and sent word to Cleomenes, that hee should doe well to leave his Armie behinde him, and come alone into Argos, receiving Hostages for safetic of his person. Cleamenes was already farre on his way, when he met with this advertisement : and tooke it in ill part, that he should be thus deluded. For it had beene an easie matter, to have told him so 50 much at the first, and not have made him come so farre with an Armie, which afterwards he must dismisse. Yet that which chiefly seemes to have troubled him, was the drift of his oppugners; who fought thereby, either to make him wait without the gates, and deale only with themselves and their Messengers; or if he would ad-

uenture himselfe into the Citie, then to deprine him of all Royall shew, that might breede respect of him in the Multitude. This was that indeede which Aratus seared. and for which he fought to hinder his comming thither in person: lest the people. hearing the promifes of Cleomenes ratified by his owne mouth, should presently be wonne with his gentle words, & finish the bargaine without more adoc. Therefore Cleomenes wrote vnto the whole Councell, bitterly complaining against these iuggling tricks: and dratus was not farre behinde with him, in as bitter an Oration. So betweene feare of the one, and reuerence of the other, the Affembly knew not how to proceede, but abruptly brake up, leaving all as it were to fortune. Cleomenes 10 tooke his aduantage of their present weakenesse, and renewed the Warre, Many Cities yeelded vnto him willingly; many hee forced; and partly by force, partly by terrour, he wanne Argos, which neuer King of Sparta before him could doc. In this case Aratus sent his owne sonne to Antigonus, entreating him to deferre no time, but come presently to relieue the distressed Acheans. Antigonus gaue as good words as could be wished: sauing that he vtterly refused to doe any thing, vnlesse he might first haue Acrocorinthus put into his hand. This demand was somewhat like vnto that of the Hunter, who promifed to helpe the Horse against his enemie the Stag: but with condition, that the Horse should suffer himselfe to be saddled & bridled. Aratus was herewithall contented, but wanted all honest colour to doe it: seeing 20 the Corinthians had no way descrued, to be thus given away to the Macedonians.

Yet at length an occasion was found; for that the Corinthians, perceiuing what he intended, were minded to arrest him. So hee withdrew himselfe out of their Citie, and fent word to Antigonus, that the Castle should bee ready to let him in. The Corinthians on the other lide ranne to Cleomenes; who loft no time, but made hafte with them to Corinth, where he fought how to get possession of their Castle, or at least to faue it from Antigonus, by furrounding it with Trenches, that none might iffue nor enter without his leave. Whilest this was in doing, he tooke speciall order, that Aratus his house and goods, within the Towne, should be safely kept for the Owner : to whom he sent Messenger after Messenger, desiring him to come to a-30 greement, and not to bring in the barbarous Macedonians, and Illyrians, to Peloponnefus: promiling that if he would harken to these perswasions, then would he give him double the same pension, which hee had beene wont to receive of King Ptolemie. As for the Callle of Corinth, which was the gate of Peloponnesus, and without which none could hold affured foueraigntic of the Countrie; he defired that it might not be committed vnto his owne disposition, but be in yntly kept by the Lacedemonians and Acheans. All this entreatic ferued to no purpose. For Arains, reiecting vtterly the motion, lent his owne sonne as an Hostage to Antigonus; and laboured with the Acheans, to put Acrocorintbus into his hands. Which when Cleomenesynderstood, he seised upon the goods of Aratus in Corinth, and wasted all the 40 Countrie of Sicyon, whereof this his Aduerfarie was natiue. Antigonus in the meanetime drew neere to the Ishmus; having passed with his Armie through Eubers, because the Atolians held the streights of Thermopyle against him. This they did, either in fauour of Cleomenes, which they pretended; or in doubt of the greatnesse, whereunto the Macedonians might attaine by the good fuccesse of this journie. At his comming thither he found the Lacedamonians ready to forbid his entrance: and that with sufficient strength; yet with no purpose to hazzard battaile, but rather to wearie him thence with hunger, against which hee came not well prouided. Antigonus therefore laboured hard to make his way by force; but he was not able fo to doe : hee fecretly got into the Corinthian Hauen; 50 but was violently driven out againe, with great losse of men; finally he resoluted to turne aside, and seeke a passage ouer the gulfe of Corinth, to Sicyon, or some other part of Achaia; but this required much time, and great preparation, which was not

gonus, and no leffe troubled his Endmies, The dehans were gotten into that Cities, and the Garrison which Cleamenes had left therein, thoughir was not driven out of the Citadell, yet was hardly diffreffed, and flood in neede of prefent helpe. Argos had al waies bin endmie to Sparts, and well affected to the Kings of Macedon. When Cleamenes tooke it, he forbare to chase out those whom he most suspected; partly, ar the entreatic officiends; and partly, for that they all made shew to be glad of his prosperitie. They were glad indeede of Chemienes his victories, both in Argos and elsewhere, as many as hoped that he would cause all debtors to be discharged from their creditours, as he had lately done in Sparea. But that which Cleomenes had done in Sparta, was agrecable to the Spartan inflitution: inother places, where it would 10 haus beene tyrannicall, he did it not. Thereupon, such as were disappointed of their vniust hopes, beganne to turne good Common-wealths-men; and called him Tyrant for his doings at home, because hee would not doe the like abroad. So they tooke their time; inuited the Atheans; affailed his Garrison; cut in peeces the Rescue that he sent; and compelled him at length, to for sake the defence of Corinth, and looke vnto the enemies that were behind his backe. For when he vnderstood. by continual meffages, that his men which held the Citadell at Argos, were almost loft : hee beganne to feare, left his labour in guarding the entry should grow friuolous the Acheans in the meane while spoiling all that lay within. Therefore hee for sooke his custodie of the Ishmus, and made all haste towards Argos: which if he 20 could faue, he means to trust fortune with the rest. And so farre he prevailed at his comming to Argos; that both Argues and Acheans were glad to house themselves, leaving him Master of the streets; when the horse men of Antigonus were discoucred a-farre off, hasting to relieue the Citizens; and Antigonus himselfe (to whom Corinth was yeeked, as foone as the Spartan had turned his backe) following apace with the bodie of his Armic. Cleamenes therefore had no more to doe, than to make a fafe retrait. This he did ; and got him home into Laconia: looling in thort space all or most of that which he had beene long in getting.

The fift Booke of the first part

Antigonus having shewed himselfeat Argos, and commended the Citizens, went into Areadia; where he wanne such Cassles as were held for Cleomenes, and restored 30 them to the old Possessors. This done, he tooke his way to Agium, where was held a Parliament by the Acheans: to whom he declared the cause of his comming, and spake braue wordes, that filled them with hope. The Acheans were not behinde with him; but made him Captaine Generall ouer them and their Confederates: and further entred into covenant with him, That they should not deale with any Prince or State, either by writing or Embassadour, without his consent. All this while, & somwhat longer, Aratus was the only man, that seemed to rule the Kings heart : carrying him to Sieyon, his owne Towne (for Winter was come on) where he not only feasted him as a great Prince, but suffered more than humanehonours. as facrifices and the like, to be done vnto him. This example of Aratus and his Si- 40 eyonians, was followed by the rest of Achaia: which had made (for sooth )a very wise bargaine, if in flead of Cleomenes that would have beene a King, it had obtained the protection of a God. But this God was poore; and wanting wherewith to pay his Macedonians, imposed the burthen vpon the Acheans. This was hardly taken: yet worse must be endured in hope of better. Neither was Aratus himselfe over-carefully respected; when the statues of those T yrants, which he had throwne downe in Argos, were againe erected by Antigonus; or when the statues, which he had erected, of those that had taken Acrocorinthus with him, were all throwne downe by the same King, and one only left vnto himselfe at his earnest entreatie. It might therefore appeare, that this God was also spightfull. Neuerthelesse in taking re- vo uenge vpon those that offended him, Aratus did satisfie his owne passion by the aide of these Macedonians. For with extreme torments he did put Aristomachus to death, who had beene once Tyrant of Argos; afterwards Generall of the Achaans; and from them revolting vnto Cleomenes, did fall at length into their hands. In like fort handled hee (though not as yet) the Mantimeans for their ingratitude and crueltic flewed to the Acheaus. For he flue all the principall Citizens, and fold the refi, men, women, and children, all for bond-flaues: diuiding the fpoile; two parts to the Macadomians, and the third to the Acheaus. The Towne it lefte was given by Antigonus to the Argines: who peopled it with a Colonic of their owne; and Acatus having charge of this bufineffe, caused it to be new-named Antigonus. Surely of this crueltie there can be no better excufe; than even the flatterie, which Aratus was driven to vieto Antigonus: Forafunch as it was a token of feruilitie, whereinto they had viged and brought him; whom he, as in reuenge thereof, did thus require. But leaving to fpeake of this change, which the comming in of the Macedomian wrought, in the Civill state of the Acheaus; Let vs returne into his warre against the Lacedamonian. The next Summer Antigonus wanne Tegea, Mantinea, Orchomenu , Herea, and Telphussa: Mantinas he dispeopled, as was said before; in Orchomenus he placed a Garrison of his Macedonians; the rest he restored to the Acheans; with whom he wintred at Agium, where they held a Parliament. Once only Cleamenes had met him this yeare; and that was on the borders of Laconia, where he lay ready to defend his owne Territorie. The reason why he stirred no further, nor followed Antigonus to Mantinea, and to those other Townes that hee wanne, was this: He had few Soul-20 diers, and not monie enough to wage more. Ptolemy the Agyptian promised much, but would performe nothing, vnleffe he might haue Cleomenes his own Mother, and his children in pledge. These were sent into Agypt; yet the aide came not. For Ptolemie was flow; as dealing in the bufineffe of Greece, rather for his mindes fake, than vpon any apprehention of necessitie. Cleomenes therefore prouided for himselfe, as well as his owne abilitie would serve. He manumised all the Heilotes, which were the Lacedemonian flaues: taking monie for their libertic, and arming two thoufand of them, after the Macedonian falhion. Hauing thus increased his forces, hee came on the sudden to Megalopolis; that lay secure, as having defended it felfe in more dangerous times, and having now Antigonus neere at hand in Agium. The 30 Towne he wanne: but after he was entred, all that were fit to beare armes, rofe haftily against him;&though they could not drine him out, yet faued the multitude, to whom they gaue a Port free for their cleape. He tent after the Citizens, offering their Towncand goods to them againe, if they would bee of his partie. But they brauely refused his offer : wherefore he sacked and ruined it, carrying with him to Sparta a great bootie that he found therein. These newes assonished the Acheans at Agum: who thereupon brake vp their Parliament. Antigonus fent hastily for his Macedonians, out of their wintering places: but they were fo long in comming, that Cleomenes was fafely gone home. Therefore he returned them back to their lodgings, and went himselfe to Argos, there to passe the rest of this valueky winter, somewhat 40 further from the eyes of the greened Acheans. When he had laine awhile at Argos, Cleomenes was at the gates, with no great number of men, yet with more than Antigonus had then about him. The Argines perceiving that their Countrie would be spoiled, if Antigonus did not iffue into the field ; were very earnest with him to goe forth and fight. But hee was wifer then to be moved with their clamours; and fuffered them to fee their villages burnt to bid him refigne his Office of Protector vnto some that were more valiant; and to satisfic their passions with soolish wordes; rather than he would be ouer-come in fight, and thereby lose more honour than could easily be repaired. By this Cleamenes had his desire, in weakning the reputation of his enemie: though he thereby added neither followers, nor other frength,

O VILO Lacensmon.

Afterwards, when the feafon was more fit for warre, Antigonus gathered together all his troups; meaning to require these brauado's of his enemie, with the conquest of Sparta. Cleomenes on the other side, laboured to keepe the warre from his owne gates; and therefore entred upon the Countrie of Argos, where he made Mm na m m fuch hauocke, as drew Antigonus thither, from his intended inuation of Laconia. Many great affronts the Macedonian was faine to endure, in coasting the Spartan King; that ranging ouer the Countrie of the Argiues, Phliasians, and Orchomenians, draue a Garrison of his out of Oligyrtis; and did sacrifice, asit were, before his face, in the suburbs of Areas, without the Temple of Juno, that was shut vp; sending vnto him in scorne, to borrow the keyes. These were light things; yet served to dishearten the schean fide, and to fill the enemy with courage, which was no matter of light importance. Therefore hee concluded to lay apart all other regard of things abroad, and to put all to hazzard; by fetting up his reft, without more delay, vpon Sparta it felfe. He had in his Armie eight and twentie thousand foot, and to twelue hundred horse, collected out of sundrie Nations, as Macedonians, Illyrians, Gaules, Epirots, Beotians, Acarnanians, and others; together with the Acheans, and their friends of Peloponnesus. Cleamenes had of all forts, twentic thousand, with which he lay at Selasia: fortifying slightly the other passages into Laconia, through which the Macedonians were not likely to seeke entrance. Antigonus comming to Selasia, found his enemic so strongly incamped, upon and between the hils of Eua and Olympus, that he was constrained to spend much time there, before hee could aduance any one foot: neither lay it in his power to come hastily to blowes, which he greatly defired, without the hazzard of his whole armie, in affayling their wel-defenced Campe. But at length (as it happens, when men are wearie both of their 20 hopes and feares) both Kings being refolued to make an end one way or other; Antigonus attempted with his Illyrians, to force that part which lay on the hill Ena, but his Illyrians were so ill seconded by the Achean foot, that the Spartan horse, & lightarmed foot, incamped in the freight vallie between those hils, issuing forth, fell vpon their skirts; and not onely difordered them, but were like to have endangered al the rest. If Cleomenes himselfe had stood in that part of the battaile, he would have made great yfe of fuch a faire beginning. But Euclidas, his brother, a more valiant than skilfull Souldier, commanded in that wing: who neither followed this aduantage, nor tooke fuch benefit as the ground affoorded, whereon he lay. Philopamen the Arcadian of Megalopolis, who afterwards proued a famous Captaine, served 30 then on horse, as a private yong man, among the Acheans. He seeing that all was like to goe to rout, if their Illyrians were driven to fall backe vpon the Army following them; perswaded the Captaines of the Achean horse, to break upon the Spartan Mercinaries. But they would not: partly despising his youth and want of charge; partly, for that Antigonus had given order, that they should keepe their places, vntill they received a figne from him, which was not as yet. Philopamen perceiving them to be more orderly, than well aduised; entreated some of his owne Countrimen to follow him; gaue a charge vpon the Spartans; and forced them not onely to leave the Illyrians, but feeke how to faue them felues. Being fo farre advanced, he found the place which the Illyrians had attempted, like enough to bee wonne, 40 through the vnskilfulnesse of him that held it. Wherefore hee alighted, and perfwaded the men at armes his Companions to doe the like: the folly of Euclidas being manifest, who kept the top of the Hill, and stirred not to hinder those that ascended, but waited for them in a Plaine, where they might fight vpon cuen termes. So he recourred the Hill top; where though he was fore hurt, yet yee made good the place that he had gotten, vntill the whole Armie came vp to him; by which the Lacedemonians were beaten from it, with great flaughter of them in their descent. This ouerthrow, and death of Euclidas, made Cleamenes lose the day: who fighting brauely on the other fide, vpon Olympus, against Antigonus himfelfe, was like to have been furrounded and loft, if he had not withdrawne himfelfe with an ex- 50 traordinarie speede. In this battaile ended the glorie of Lacedamon, which, as a light readie to go out, had with a great, but not long blaze, shined more brightly of late, then in many ages past.

Cleomenes

Cleomenes fled vnto Sparta: where he had no defire to flay, finding onely two hundred left, of fixe thouland Spartans that he had led vnto this battaile, and most of his hired Souldiers dead, or gone away. So hee perswaded his people to yeelde themselues vnto Antigonus; and promising to doe all that should at any time lie in his owne power, for their good, he hasted away to the Sea-side (where he had shipping long before provided, against all that might happen) and imbarqued himselfe for Ægypt. Hee was louingly entertained by Ptolemie Euergetes; who vndertooke to restore him to his Kingdome; and (perhaps) meant no lesse, as being much delighted with his gallant behauiour and qualities. In the meane season bee had a 10 pension allowed him, of source and twentie talents, yeerely. But this Ptolemie died; and his sonne Ptolemie Philopater succeeded him: a vicious yong Prince, wholly gouerned by lewd Women, and base Men, vnmindefull of all vertue, and hating any in whom it was found. When therefore Cleomenes was desirous to returne into Greece, whither the troubles in Peloponnesus did seeme to inuite him; Ptolemie, and his Minions, would neither give him aide; nor yet dared to dismisse him (as he desired) to trie his owne friends in Greece, because he was too well acquainted with the weakenesse of Agypt: nor well knew how to detaine him against his will. At length they deuised matter against him, and made him prisoner. The last act of him was, that with thirtie of his Countrimen, he vndertooke 20 a desperate enterprize: breaking out of the prison, and prouoking the Alexandrians to rebell and seeke their libertic. In which attempt hee slue some enemies of his that he met; and having walked up and downe the firects, without refiffance (no man offering to take his part, or, which is very ftrange, to fight against him on the Kings behalfe) he, and his Companions, agreed together to bee ministers of their owne death. Vpon his dead bodie Ptolemie was bold to shew his indignation and flue his Mother and Children, that had beene sent thither as Hostages, together with the wives of his Adherents, as many as were there, attending vpontheold Queene. Such was the end of Cleomones; a generous Prince, but Sonne of Leonidas, who had caused Agis, with his Mother and Grand-mother, to 30 come to such a bloudie ende, as now befell his owne Wife, Sonne, and Grand-

of the Historie of the World.

After the Victorie at Sellasia, Antigonus without resistance entred Sparta: whereinto neuer the force of any Enemie, before him, could make way, Hee kindely entreated the Citizens, and left them to their owne Lawes and Gouernment: tarrying there no longer, than two or three dayes; after which he hastened out of Peloponnesw, and neuer returned. The cause of his speedy departure was, an advertisement that he received out of Macedon; how the Illyrians over-ranne, and destroied the Countrie. Had these newes come a little sooner; or had Cleomeneseither deferred the fight, a few dayes longer, or at least-wife tarried a few 40 dayes after the fight, in Sparta: the Kingdome of Lacedamon would have flood, and perhaps haue extended it selfe ouer all Greece. But God had otherwise deter-

Antigonus fought a great battaile with the Illyrians, and ouer-came them. Yet therein he caught his bane: not by any wound, but by ouer-frayning his voice; wherewith he brake a veine that bled inwardly, and in short space finished his life, who was troubled before with a confumption of the lungs. His Kingdome descended vnto Philip, the sonne of Demetrius, being then a Boy: as also about the same time it was, that Antiochus, furnamed (I knownot why) the Great; and Ptolemie Philopater; beganne to raigne in Afia, and Azypt; Boycs all. Of thefe, Ptolemie, 50 though old enough to loue Harlots, when he first was King, yet continued a Boy, all the seventeene yeeres of his raigne. The vnripe age of Philip and Antiochus, bred such intestine inconvenience to their Kingdomes, as is vsual in the minoritie of Princes: but their elder yeares brought them acquainted with the Romans; vpon Mmmmm 2 which occasion, when it comes, we shall more seasonably speake of them, and of their Kingdomes, more at large.

Q. VII.

How the Illyrians infested the coast of Greece; and how they were subdued by the Romans.

Hilest things thus passed in Greece; and whilest the Carthaginians were 10 buile in their conquest of Spaine: the Romans had found themselues worke among the Sardinians and Corfleans, that were easily subdued at first, and easily vanquished againe, when they rebelled. I hey made also warre with the !!spians, wherein they got much bonour with little paine. With the Gaules they had much adoct that lasted not long; being rather, as Liuie faith, a tumule then a warre. So that by all these light exercises, their valour was hardly kept from rust. How they got the Ilands in the Mediterran Sea sit hath bene shewed before: of their dealings with the Illyrians and Gaules, it is not meet to hearterly filter.

The Illerians inhabited the Country now called Slauonia: attouble some Nation, 20 impatient of reft, and continually making warre for gaine, without either regard of friend or foe. They were inuited by Demetrius King of Mucedon, to helpe the Mydianians, his friends, that were belieged by the Atolians; for that they refused to be of their fociety. Before the Illyrian succours came, the Mydionians were fo far fpent. that the Atolians contended about the booty: the old Prætor, or chiefe Magistrate of their Nation, who was going out of his Office, clayming to have the honour of the victory, and the division of the spoile to be referred vnto him; for that he had in a manner brought the fiege to an end, and wonne the Towne : others, that were in hope to he chosen into the Office, contradicting this, and desiring that old orders might be kept. It was a pretic strife, and somewhat like to that of the French in later 30 ages, who thought vpon dividing the prey, before they had wonne the victories. which anon they loft, at Poitters and at Agincourt. The Etolians wifely compounded the difference, ordering it thus; That the old, and the new Prætor, should be iountly intitled in the victorie, and have equall authoritie in distribution of the gettings. But the Illyrians finished the strife much more elegantly, and after another fashion. They arrived, and landed, ere any was aware of them; they fell upon the Ætolians; & though good relistance was made, yet got the victorie, partly by force of their owne multitude, partly by helpe of the Mydionians, that were not idle in their owne bulinesse, but stoutly fallied out of the Towne. Many of the Atolians were flaine, more were taken their Campe and all their baggage was loft: the Illy- 40 rians tooke the spoile, and went their way; the Mydionians crected a Trophie, in-scribing the names, both of their old and new Magistrate (for they also chose new, Officers at the same time) as the Etolians had directed them by example.

The fuccesse of this voyage, highly pleased Agron King of the Illyrians:not only in regard of the monie, wherewith Demetrius had hired his assistance, or of the bootie that was gotten; but for that hauing vanquished the south of the Greeks, hee found it not vnease, to enrich himselfe by setting you the lesse was inke. For ioy of this he sasted, and dranke so immoderately, that he fell into a Pleurisse, which in sew daies ended his life. His Kingdome, together with his great hopes, he less winto Testa, his wife.

Tentagaue her people free libertie, to roball Nation at Sea, making no difference betweene friend and foe; as if thee had beene fole Mistresse of the falt Waters. Shee armed a fleet, and sent into Greece: willing hee Captaines, to make Warre where they found advantage, without any further respect. These fell with the westerne coast of Peloponnesus; where they inuaded the Eleans, and Messenians. Afterwards they returned along by Epirus, & stayed at the Citie of Phanice, to take in victuailes and other necoffaries. There lay in Phanice eight hundred Ganles, that having beene Mercinaries of the Carthaginians, went about to betray, first Agricentum, then Eryz, to the Romans; but fayling to do either, they nevertheleffe revolted, and were for their misdeedes disarmed, and sent to Sea by the Romans, yet entertained by these Epirots, and trusted to lie in Garrison within their Towne. The Gaules were foone growne acquainted with the Illyrians, to whom they betraied Phanicis 10 which deferued none other, in trufting them. Al Epirus was prefently in armes and hastned to drive out these vnwelcome guests. But whilest the Epirots lay before the Towne, there came newes into their Campe, of another Illyrian Armie, that was marching thitherward by Land, under one Scerdibirlas; whom Queene Teuta had fent to help his fellowes. Vpon this aducrtisement, a part of them is sent away towards Antigonia, to make good that Towne, and the threights adioy sing, by which these new commers must enter into their Countrie; another part of these remaines at Phanice, to continue the fiege. Neither the one, northe other, feed well in their bulineffe. For Seerdilaidas found meanes to joyne with his fellowes; and they that were belieged within Phanice, fallied out of the towne, and gaue fuch an ouerthrow 20 to the Epirots, as made them despaire of fauing their Countrie, without great and speedie helpe from abroad. Wherefore Emballadours were fent to the Acheans and Atolians: crawing their helpe, with very pittifull termes of entreatie. They obtained their fuit; neither was it long, before an Armie, sent by these two Nations, was readie in Epirus, to present battaile vnto Seerdilaidas. But Seerdilaidas was called home, by letters from Tenta the Queene, that fignified a rebellion of some Illyrians against her: so that he had no minde to put his forces to hazzard, but offered compolition; which was accepted. The agreement was, That the Epirots might ransometheir Towne, and all their people that were prisoners; and that the Illyrians should quietly depart, with all their bootie and slaves. Having made this profitable 30 and honourable bargaine; the Illyrians returned into their own Countrie by Land, fending their bootie away by Sea.

At their comming home, they found no such great trouble, as that which they brought, or had occasioned in this voyage. For in fulfilling the commandement of their Queene, they had taken many Italian Marchants, whileft they lay at Phanice; and made them good prize. Hereof the complaints, made vnto the Roman Senate, were fo frequent, that Embassadours were sent to require of Tenta, that she should abstaine from doing such injuries. These Embassadours found her very jolly; both for the riches which her fleet had brought in ; and for that flee had, in fhort space, tamed her Rebels, and brought al to good order, saue only the towne of Isfa, which 40 her forces held streightly besieged. Swelling with this prosperitie, shee could hardly affoord a good looke to the vnmannerly Romans; that found fault with her doings; and calling them by a true name, Pyracie, required amends. Yet when their speech was ended, she vouchsafed to tell them, That injurioin publike shee would doe tilem none: as for private matters, no account was to be made of them; neither was it the manner of Kings to forbid their Subjects to get commoditie, how they best could, by Sea. But (said the yonger of the two Embassadours) we Romans haue a manner, and a very laudable one, to take reuenge in publike, of those private wrongs that are borne out by publike authoritie; therfore we shall teach you, God willing, to reforme your Kingly manners, and learne better of vs. These words the 50 Queene tooke so impatiently, that no reuenge could fatisfie her, but the death of him that had spoken them. Wherefore, without all regard of the common Law of Nations, shee caused him to be slaine: as if that had been the way, to set her heart at rest, which was indeede the meane, to disquiet and afflict it ever after.

The Romans, provoked by this outrage, prepare two great Armies; the one by

Sea, confishing of two hundred faile, commanded by C. Fulusus; the other by Land, led by A. Posthumus. They trouble not themselves any more, with requiring satisfaction; for this injurie is of fuch nature, as must be requited with mortall warre. It is indeed econtrarie to all humane Law, to vie violence towards Embaffadours: the reason and ground whereof, seemes to beethis; that since without mediation, there would neuer be an end of warre and destruction, therfore it was equally receiued by all Nations, as a leffon taught by Nature, that Embaffadors should passe freely, and in fafetic, between enemies. Neuerthelesse, as I take it, this generall Law is not without limitation. For if any King, or State, lay hold vpon Embaffudours sent by their enemies, not vnto themselves, but vnto some third, whom they to should draw into the quarrell; then it is as lawfull, to vse violence to those Embassadours (thus emploied, to make the warre more terrible) as it is to kill the men of warre, and subjects, of an enemie. And so might the Athenians have answered it, when they flew the Lacedamonian Embaffadours, that were fent to Xerxes, to draw him into a warre vpon the Athenians. Neither are those Embassadours, which pra-Etile against the person of that Prince, in whose Countries they reside, warranted by any Law whatfoeuer. For whereas the true Office of an Embaffadour reliding, is the maintenance of amitie; if it be not lawfull for one Prince, to practife against the life of another, much leffe may an Embaffadour doe it without incurring justly the fame danger of punishment, with other Traitors, in which case, his place gives him 20 no priniledge at all. But we will leave this dispute to the Civilians; and goe on with the reuenge, taken by the Romans, for the flaughter of their Embassadour Corun-

The Illyrian Queene was secure of the Romans, as if they would not dare to firre against her. She was indeede in an errour; that hath vndone many of all forts greater and leffe than she, both before and since: Hauing more regard unto fame, than unto the substance of things. The Greekes were at that time more famous than the Romans; the Ætolians and Epirots had the name of the most warlike people in Greece; these had shee casily vanquished; and therefore thought, that with the Romans she should be litle troubled. Had she considered, that her whole Armie, which wrought 30 fuch wonders in Greece, was not much greater, than of ten thousand men; and that neuerthelesse, it prevailed as much, by oddes of number, as by valour, or skill in armes; shee would have continued to vse her advantage, against those that were of more fame than strength, with such good caution, that she should not have needed to oppose her late-gotten reputation, against those that were more mightie than her selfe. But she was a woman, and did what she listed. Shee sent foorth a greater fleet than before, under Demetrius of Pharos, with the like ample commission to take all that could bee gotten. This fleet divided it felfe; and one part of it fell with a Dyrrachium, a Dyrrachium; the other, with Coreyra. Dyrrachium was almost surprized by the fometime cal-led Epidamia, Illyrians; yet was it rescued by the stout Citizens. In b Coreyra the Illyrians landed; 40 and now Da- wasted the Isle; and besieged the Towne. Hereupon the Etolians and Acheans were races, feated called in to helpe: who came, and were beaten in a fight at Sea; loling, befides ovpon the mait Sea, be thers of leffe note, Marcus Carynensis, the first Prator of Achaia, whom Aratus suctweene the lands of Pha ceeded. The Towne of Coreyra, diffinaied with tt is ouerthow, opened the gates Hands of Pha-ras and Coregra, vnto Demetrius Pharius; who tooke possession of it, with an Illyrian Garrison: senb coreyra, an ding the rest of his forces to beliege Dyrrachium. In the meane scason, Teuta was an-Hand of the Adriante Sea, grie with her Captaine Demetrius: I know not why ; but so, as he resoluted to trie anot farre from ny other course, rather than to trust her.

The Romans were euch readie to put to Sea, though vncertaine which way to led now corfu, and in the post take, when aduertisement was brought to C. Fuluiss the Consuls, of Demetrius his 50 and in the post take, when aduertisement was brought to C. Fuluiss the Consuls, of Demetrius his 50 festion of the feare and discontent. Likely it was, that such an occasion might greatly helpe to aduance the businesse in hand. Wherefore the Consult failed thither; where hee found the Towne of Coreyra so well prepared to his hand by Demetrius, that it not only received him willingly, but delinered into his power the Illyrian Garrison, and fubmitted it selfe vnto the Roman protection.

After this good beginning, the Confull failed along ft the coaft, to apollonia; ac- a Apollonia, a companied with Demetria, whom he yied thenceforth as his counfailer and guide. Dirrachinmon To Apollonia came also Posthumus, the other Consull, with the Land-Armie, num- Daraggo, ypon bred at twentie thousand foot, and two thousand horse. Thence they hasten to- the Sea-coast. wards Dyrrachium, which the Illyrians had befieged; but vpon newes of the Roman siffopolis. Armie, they disperse themselues. From thence the Romans enter Illyria, and take Parthenia; beat the Illyrians by Sea, take twentie of their ships; and enforce the Queene Teuta to forsake the coast, and to couer her selfe in Rifon, farre within the Land. In the end, part of the Romans haste them homeward, and leaue the best 10 places of Illyria in the hands of Demetrius; another part staics behinde, and profecutes the warre, in such fort, that Tenta was forced to begge peace: which shee obtained vpon miserable conditions; to wit, That shee should quit the better part of Illyria, & pay tribute for the rest; and from thenceforth, neuer send any of her ships of warre, towards the coasts of Greece, beyond the Iland of Lissa: except it were some one or two veffels, vnarmed, and by way of Trade.

C HAP.2. S.8.

After this Illyrian warre, the Romans fent Embassadours into diversparts of Greece, fignifying their loue to the Countrie, and how, for good will thereunto, they had made warre with good successe vpon Tenta, and her people. They hoped, belike, that some distressed Cities would take this occasion, to delire their patronage: 20 which if it hapned, they were wife enough to play their ownegames. But no fuch matter fell out. The Embaffadours were only rewarded with thankes; and a decree made at Corinth, That the Romans thenceforth might be partakers of the Ilhmian pastimes. This was an idle courtesie, but well meant by the vaine Greekes, and therefore well taken by the Romans: who by this illyrian Expedition got nothing in Greece, sauc a little acquaintance, that shall be more hereafter.

d. VIII.

Of the warre betweene the Romans and Gaules, somewhat before the comming of HANNIBALinto Italio.

He Gaules that dwelt in Lumbardie, were the next, against whom the Romans tooke Armes. These were a populous Nation, and often molested Rome; sometimes with their owne forces, and sometimes with the affiftance of those that inhabited France. Once their fortune was good; when they tooke Rome, and burnt it : though the issue of that Warre proued notanswerable to the beginning, if we may give credit vnto Roman Historians. In following times, their fuccesse was variable, and commonly bad. Ma-40 ny ouerthrowes they received; and if they got any victorie, it yeelded them no profit, but was soone extorted out of their hands. They were indeede more fierce. than welladuised: lightly stirred up to warre, and lightly giuing ouer. At the first brunt, they were said to be more than men; but when that was past, leffe than women. The Romans were acquainted with their temper, by long experience; and knew how to handle them : yet gate alwaies carefull heede to their approch, were k only bruited. For the danger of them was sudden, and uncertaine; by reason of their neighbourhood, and want of intelligence among them. Few of their attempts wpon Rome, were called warres, but tumultus Gallici; tumults of the Gaules; and rightly. For they gaue many alarms to Italie, and vied to rife with great Armies : but 50 after a few dayes march, and sometimes before their setting forth, any small occafion served to disperse them. Having received an overthrow; they would rest ten. or twelue yeeres, fometimes twentie or thirtie : till they were stirred vp againe, by yonger heads, vnacquainted with the danger. Whileft they refled; the flate of Rome, that against these made only desensiue warre, had leisure to grow, by setting yoon others. Herein God prouided well for that Monarchie, which hee intended to raile: that the Gaules never fell vpon Italie, with a mighty power, in the time of any other great and dangerous warre. Had they attempted to conquer it, whilest Parrhus was transiling in the same enterprise; or in either of the two former Punick warres; it may be doubted what would have become of this imperious Citie. But it seemes that the Gaules had no better intelligence in the affaires of Italie, than strangers had in Gaule. At least, they knew not how to vse their times: and were therefore like to fmart, when soeuer the enemies, whom they had much prouoked, and little hurt, should finde leifure to visit them at their owne home: which was now after the first Punick Warre. Once before this, the Romans had beene bold, to fet 10 upon the Gaules in their owne Countrie; and that was three yeeres before the com. ming of Pyrrhas into Italie. At that time the Senones, a Tribe of the Gaules, inuading Hetruria, and belieging Arretium, had wonne a great battaile and flaine L. Cecilius with the most of his Armic. Mannius Curius the new Confull, sent Embassadours to them, to treat about ransome of prisoners. But these Embassadours they slue. Therefore when fortune turned to the better, the Romans followed it fo well, that they expelled these Senones out of their Countrie, and sent a Colonie of their owne . There were to inhabit it. This caused the Boy, another people of Gaule, to feare the like mea- 20 divers nations fure: who thereupon tooke armes, and drew the Hetrurians to their fide. But the Roof the Bay; as mans ouerthrew them in two great battailes; and thereby made them fue for peace, by in Sermanis, which lasted vntill this end of the Illyrian warre.

beene accustomed to enlarge their bounds, by driving out their Neighbours perforce. Wherefore they laboured with the Transalpines (so the Romans called those in France, as lying from them beyond the Alpes, though to vs they are neerer; like as they called Cifalpines, or by-bither the Alpes, those who dwelt betweene them and diffunction had caused their losse, so their vnion might recompence it, with large amends. But the businesse was so foolishly carried, that the Cifalpines and Transalpines, fell together by the cares, putting the Romans only to a tumult, without further trouble of warre. Soone after, they were viged by a greater indignitie, to goe more substantially to worke. For C. Flaminius, a popular man in Rome, proposed a Decree which was ratified by the people; That, belides one Colonie already planted in the territoric of the Senones, as many more should be carried thither, as would ferue to people the whole Countrie betweene Ancona and Ariminum: exterminating vtterly those Gaules. Such an offer, were it made in England, concerning einaltie of Rome tooke this in fo good part, not with standing all danger joyned with the benefit, that Flaminius had ever after their good will.

This dreadfull President extremely displeased the Boy: who being Neighbours to Ariminum, feared the like displantation. And because all the rest of the Gaules had reason to resolue, that themselves also should bee rooted out by degrees . The great Nation of the Insubrians, which inhabited the Duchie of Milan, joyned with the Boij, & vpon a common purse entertained the Gessates, Nations about Rhodanus, wageable as the Switzers in these times. The Gessates having received a great are the people Impreft, come to the field vnder the conduct of their Kings, Concelitanus & Aneroeabout Bergamo, flus: who with the Boy and Insubrians, compound an Armic of fiftie thousand foot, and twentie thousand horse, and those of the best men, and best appointed, that euer inuaded the Roman Territorie; to whom, the Seno-galli, that had beene beaten out of their possessions, gaue a great increase of strength. On the contrarie side, the 50 these cenoman- Venetians, and the f Cenomanni, adhered to the Romans: as better beleeuing in their ni in France, and inhabited prosperitie and rising fortune. For feare of whose incursions therefore, the Gaules were forced to leave a good part of their Armic, on the frontier of Milan: With the rest of their forces they entred into Tuscane. The Romans hearing of this danger,

It vexed the Gaules, to fee a Roman Colonic planted in their Countrie; who had the Mountaines) to draw them to their party: reasonably presuming, that as their 30 ther Virginia, or Guiana it felfe, would not ouer-joy the Multitude But the Commo- 40 fend Amilius to Rimine, to stop their passage; and in the place of C. defence of Tuscane. Being at this time greatly troubled, with the confideration of this powerfull Armie, which the Gaules had affembled, they caused a view to bee taken, as well of all their owne forces, as of those of their Allies: who were no lesse willing than themfelues, to oppose the incursions of the barbarous people; fearing, as they had cause, that their owne destruction could not bee preuented otherwise, than by the good fortune of Rome. The numbers, found in this Multer, deserue to be recorded : be-10 cause they set out the power of the Romans in those dayes. With the Consulls they fent forth to the warre foure Legions of their owne: enery Legion confishing of fine thousand two hundred foot, and three hundred horse; and of their Allies, thirtie thousand foot, and two thousand horse. There were also appointed for Supplies (if any miladuenture came to these) of the Sabines and Hetrurians fiftie thousand foot, & fourethousand horse; which Armie was to be lodged in the border of Hetruria, Of the Fmbri and Sarfinates, which inhabited the Apenines, there were twentie thousand; and of the Venetians and Cenomans, other twentie thousand: which latter Armies were directed, to invade the Boy, that forcing them to defend their owne Territories, the generall Armie of the Gaules should be thereby greatly dimi-20 nished. There were besides these, to bee ready against all vicertaine chances of warre, thirtie thousand foot, and fifteene hundred horse, garrisond in Rome it selfe, of their owne people; and of their Allies, thirtic thousand foot, and two thousand horse. Ouer and about these great troupes; in the Roll of the Latines, that was sent unto the Senate there were numbred fourescore thousand foot, and flue thousand horfe: in that of the Sammites, fewentie thousand foot, and of horse seven thousand, in that of the B Japyges, and Messapyges, fiftic thousand foot, and fixteene thousand g Japyger and horse; the Lucans sent a lift of thirtie thousand foot, and three thousand horse; the Mellapyer h Marli Marrucini, Ferentani, and the Vestini, of twentie thousand foot, and foure one Nation; thousand horse. The Romans had also two Legions in Sicil, and about Tarentum, who are also

30 containing eight thousand four chundred foot, and source hundred horse. So as of called Some fines, Percent the Romans and Campans jointly, reckoning men armed, and fit to beare armes, there are, applians, were registred two hundred and fiftie thousand foot; and of horse, three and twen-and said the connection tie thouland : of which, reckoning the Romans apart, there were an hundred and fif- is now apalla, tie thousand foot and about fixe thousand horse. Casting up the whole forces of all containing the the Provinces in Italie, both of the Romans and their Confederates, it amounted to head-land of feuen hundred thousand foot, and seventie thousand horse. But the number is calabria. fomewhat miffe-cast by Polybius; not with a purpose to enrich himselfe by the dead h A people of paies: for where he reckons nine hundred horse too many, he falls short nine thoufand two hundred of the foot.

40 How great focuer this Muster was, it seemes to have beene like vnto that, which them a people of traile. Lodowick Sforza made, when Lewesthe twelfth inunded Milan: at what time, the bet- k A people of ter to encourage himselfe, and his subjects, hee tooke a Roll of all persons able to Campanias calbeare armes, within the Duchie, though indeed he were never able to bring a tenth Ferenines, faith part of them into the field. Certaine it is, that the battailes of Trebia, Trasymene, Leander. and Canne, did not confume any fuch proportion, as was answerable to this large accompt. Yet were the Romans faine to arme their flaues, euen for want of other Souldiers, after their ouerthrow at Canne. Wherefore the manualle is not great, that the Carthaginians and others were little terrified, with report of fuch a multitude. For all heads are not fit for helmets: though the Roman Citizens were, in generall, 30 as good fighting men, as elfewhere might be found.

Notwithstanding all these counter-preparations, the Gaules keepe on their way: and entring into Tuscane, destroy, and put to fire and sword, all that lay before them. From thence they march directly towards Rome; hoping to finde the Romans, rather in deliberation, than in the field. But their intelligence failes them. For the race,& dwelt

Roman Armie, sent into Tuscane, having taken some other way than they did, and finding that it had miffed of them, came againe fast after them, to arrest them in their journie. Hereof when they heard the rumour, fearing to be charged on their backes, they turned head : and in the same evening discovered the Roman Armie, by whom they incamped. It was now a matter of apparant necessitie, that fight they must. Wherefore they helped themselues with a stratageme; that shewed no great finenesse of wit, but such, as well bescemed those that had none other occupation than warre; and flood them in good flead at the present. In the dead of the night, they cause their foot to march away, but not farre: leaving their horse in guard; to whom they give order, to come off at the first light of day, with such a speede, as to mightrather argue a running away, than a retrait, as if they had not dared to abide battaile. The Romans, interpreting this their hastie departure, as the Gaules desired they should, follow them in disorder. The Gaules returne; charge them; and kill fixe thousand vpon the place; the rest take a peece of ground of advantage, and defend themselues, till L. Emilius, being at Arimmum, comes to their succour. Vpon the comming of the Confull, the Gaules confult, whether they should give the Romans battaile, or forbeare. In which dispute, Aneroesus, one of their Kings, perfwades them, rather to returne into their owne Countries; where, after they had disposed of the great spoiles and riches which they had gotten, they should then renew the warre, being without carriage, pefter, or other impediment. This aduice 20 they all embrace; for feeing they that were Mercinaries, had obtained what they came for to wit, the spoiles of their enemies; they thought it wisedome, to hazzard neither it, nor themselues, any further. This indeede had beene a good resolution, if they had taken it, before the enemie had beene in fight. But as well in the warres of these latter ages, as in former times, it hath euer beene found extreme dangerous, to make a retrait in the Head of an enemies Armie. For although they that retire, doe often turne head; yet in alwaics going on from the pursuing enemie, they finde within a few miles, either streight, hedge, ditch, or place of disaduantage, which they are inforced to passe in disorder. In such cases, the Souldier knowes it, as well as the Captaine, that he which for sakes 39 the field, perceives, and feares some advantage of the Enemies. Feare, which is the betraier of those succours that Reason offereth, when it hath once possess the heart of man, it calleth thence both courage and vnderstanding. They that make the retrait, are alwaies in feare to be abandoned; they that leade the way, feare to be ingaged: and so the hindmost treads on his heeles that is foremost, and consequently, all disband, runne, and perish, if those that fauour the retrait, be not held to it by men of great courage. The miferable ouerthrow, that the French received in Naples, in the yeere 1503. vpon a retrait made by the Marques of Sal, doth testifie no leffe. For although a great troupe of French horse, sustained the pursuing enemie a long time, and gaue the foot leifure to trot away; yet being retarded by often tur- 40 nings, the Spanish foot ouer-tooke and defeated them vtterly. During the warres betweene the Imperialls, and the French; Boili and Mont were loft at Brignolles, who in a brauerie would needes fee the enemie, before they left the field. So was Stroft ouerthrowne, by the Marques of Marignan, because he could not be perswaded, to dislodge the night before the Marques his arrivall. Therefore did the French King Francis the first, wifely : when without respect of point of honour, he dislodged from before Landersey, by night; as many other, the most aduised Captaines, (not finding themselves in case to give battaile) have done. Iene trouve point (saith the Marshall Montve) au fait des armes chose si difficile, qu'une retrait; I finde nothing in the arte of warre fo difficult, as to make a safe retrait. A sure Rule it is, that there 50 is leffe dishonor to dislodge in the darke, than to be beaten in the light. And hereof M. de la None giues this judgement, of a daies retrait, madein France, presently before the battaile of Moncountour. For (faith he) staying vpon our reputation, in shew not to dislodge by night; we lost our reputation indeede, by dislodging by day :

whereby we were forced to fight vpon our disaduantage, and to our ruine. And yet did that worthy Gentleman, Count Lodowick of Massau, brother to the late famous Prince of Orange, make the retrait as Moncountour with so great resolution, as hee saud the one halfe of the Protessant Armie, then broken and disbanded, of which my selfe was an eye-witnesse and was one of them that had cause to thanke him for it.

Снар. 2. §.8.

Now the Gaule, embracing the safe aduice (as they take it) of one of their Kings; turne their backs to the enemie, & their saces homeward. **Emilius* followes them, as necre as he can, without ingaging himselfle, attending his aduantage. In the meane while, C. **Atilius* the other Confull*, with the Legions of Sardinis*, lands at Pifa; so to as the Gaules, inclosed betweene two Armies, are forced to fight. They therefore equally fittengthen their Reare, and Front. To sustaine **Emilius*, they appoint the Giffates, and the **Milanois*; in the Front, they range the Piemontois*, and the reft of the Gaules* inhabiting ypon the River of Po. The manner of the fight Polybius describeth a large: which was well sought of all hands. But in the end the Gaules tell; and so did **Atilius* the Confull*: who died in the place, accompanied with the two Kings of the Gaules*, **Concolitanus* and **Anexofus**, with fortic thousand of their Vasfallis.

After this fatall ouerthrow, the Gaules lost courage; and, ere long, all that they held in Italie. For they were inuaded the yeerefollowing this ouerthrow, by the 20 new Consulls, Falaius, and Manlius. The Romans knew well how to veste their chorie: they gaue not ten, twentie, or thirtie yeers time, to the Gaules, to repaire their forces, as the Gaules had done to them. These new Consulls beat the Boy; but by reason of the great raines that fell, and the great pestilience that raigned, they were compelled for that present to surcease. In the second yeere, Furius, and Flaminius, inuade the Malanus; and prevaile very farre, being strongly assisted by the Commanniand the Venetians. Neuerthelesse these Consults were removed out of their Province, by the Senate of Rome, and compelled to resigne their Office: because the Augures, or Southyayers, had sound, that some token or other of the Birds (in which, and all sorts of their divination, the Romans were extremely superstitions) had not 30 only fores shewed little good, when they were chosen, but had also nullisted the cle-

36 only to tente where some and the second of the contents of this reuocation, from the Senate, and being otherwise aduertised of the contents, was not hastic to open them: but first gaue battaile vnto the enemies, vanquished them, and spoiled their Countrie; then pervsed the letters; and returning home obtained a triumph, foreagainst the will of the Senate, and not altogether with good liking of the people; who yet bare him out, for that hee sided in faction with the Commonaltie, though a man of great Nakshiite.

This was that Flaminius, who had proposed the Decree, for dividing the Countrie of the Senone; among the people of Rome. He was the first, or one of the first, ot hat vnderstanding the Majestice of Rome to be indeed wholly in the people, and no otherwise in the Senate, than by way of Delegacie, or grand Commission; did not stand highly upon his birth and degree, but courted the multitude, & taught them to know and vietheir power, ouer hinselfe, and his fellow-Senators, in reforming their disorders. For this, the Commons highly esteemed him, and the Senators as deeply hated him. But he had the surressing the first grand the surressing the fame arte; which in processe of the surressing the Elaminius and his Colleague, being depoted; M. Claudius Marcellus, and Cn. Cornelius Scipio, were chosen Confulls, for the reft of that yeere. The Gaules about this time delired peace, and were like vo haue obtained it: though the new Confulls were againft it, as fearing to want worke. But when thirtie thousand of the Gessate, following their King Britomarus, were come ouer the Aspersand joyned with the Insulations: all other discourse, than of present warre, was at an end. So the Confulls hafted into their Prouince, where they besieged deerre, a towne not farre from 24-use of (of farre had the Romans pierced already) in the Duchie of Milan. To divert them them from this fiege, Britomarus fate downe before Classidium, a Towne in the same Tract, with great part of his forces: leauing the reft, with the Infubrians, to attend upon the Confulls at Acerra, and to looke to the defence of Milan. But this would not (uffice, to make the Romans breake vp their fiege. Marcellus, taking with him the greatest part of the horse, & fixe hundred foot lightly armed; thought to deale well enough with those at Clastidium. Britomarus heard of the Consulls comming ; and met him vpon the way : fo fuddenly, that the Romans had no leifure to reft themfelues after their journie, but were compelled instantly to fight: Herein Britomarus had done well; if he had not forthwith, in a rash braueric, lost his game at a cast. He had advantage enough in number, both otherse and foot: but he thought so well to of his owne personall valour, that he rode out single before his Armie, prouoking any one to fight with him. Marcellus was no leffe daring, than the barbarous King : whether more wife in this action, I will not dispute, he was more fortunate, and that fufficed to commend him. He flue and difarmed Britomarus, in presence of both Armies: whereby his owne men tooke such courage, and his enemies were so dismaied, that without much trouble of fight, the Romans obtained a great victorie.

This was the third and laft time, that euer any Roman Generall she the Generall of the enemies, with his owne hand. To this kinde of victorie, belonged a peculiar triumph; whereofonly Romalus, Cossia, and this Muredlus, had the honour; yet I dare say, that the two Scipio; and divers other Roman Captaines, especially Cassa, 20 were better men of warre than any of these three; though they neuer offered up to Iv 112 E. Optima spalia; The Armoun of a Generall slaine by themsclaus; when they were Generalls, nor perhaps affected fo to doc.

After this victorie, Acerra was yeelded to the Romans; and Milan Soone after: with all that belonged to the Cifalpnes, or Gaules that walkin Lumbardie. Thus was that valiant and mighty Nation, that had for so many yeerse vexed the State of Rome, and in former times taken the Citic it selfe, brought to nothing in a short time, their pleasant and sertile Territorie possess by the Romans; and the remainder of their Nation, inhabiting, Italie, so many as would not subject their neckes to the Roman yoke, either forced to abandon their Countries, or to hide themselnes in 30 the cold and barren Mountaines, like Out-lawes and Thecues. And thus did the Romans spend the three and twentie yeers, following the peace made with Carthage. In part of which time, they were at such leisure, that they closed up the Temple of Tamus: which they neuer did before, it standing alwaies open, when they had any warre slaue once, in the raigne of Rumas y nor in long time after, until the raigne of Augustus. But this their present happinesse was not to last long:

a dangerous warre, and perhaps the greatest that had euer beene,
was to come who their gates; which being well ended,
they might boldly yndertake, to extend their Monarchie as farre, as their ambition

could reach.

10 The warres of HANNIBAL in Spaine. Quarrels between the Romans and Carthaginians.

HANNIBAL beflegeth and taketh Seguntum, whileft the Romans are bufied

with the Illyrians, Warre proclaimed betweene Rome and Carthage.

A N N IB A L, the fonne of Amilear, was about fixe and twentie yeeres old, when hee was chosen. Generall of the Carthaginian forces in Spaine. Hee was elected by the Armie, as foone as Afarabal was dead: and the election was ratified by the state at Carthage; wherewith Hanne and his Complices were nothing pleased. This was now the third of the Burchine Ramily (Scalled of Amilear, whose surrounds was Bareas) that had command in chiefe, ouer the men of warre. Which honour would perhaps haue been elste enuicd, by these domethical enemies; if the Allies and Friends of the Barchine house, had not also borne the whole sway in gouernment, and beene the only men regarded, both by the Senate and the people. This generall good will, as it was first purchased by the most worthy deserts of Lamiser, in fauing his Countrie from imminent ruine, enlarging the Dominion thereof, and enriching it Countrie from imminent ruine, enlarging the Dominion thereof, and enriching it among his friends and followers. Hammetherefore, and his Partisans, being neither able to taxe the vertue of their enemies, that was unreproueable; nor to performe the like services who the Common-weale; had nothing left, whereby to value themselves, excepting the generall reprehension of Warre, and cautelous aduice of not prouoking the Roman. This they seasond otherwhiles with detraction; saying, that the Barchine saction went about to oppress the billious words were unregarded; and if it were sactious, to beare ill will to Rome, then were all the Citizens (very sew excepted) no less Barchine, than Hamitalhimsels. For it was long since apparent, that the oath of the Romans, to the articles of speace, affoorded no securitie to Carthage; were shee never so quiet, and officially of the care of t

40 ticles of peace, affoorded no fecuritie to Carthage were interested to quertain our cious; vinleffe she would yeeld to become their Subiect. Since therefore the peace was like to hold no longer, than virill the Romass could find some good aduantage, to renew the Warre; it was rather desired by the Carthaginian; that that whilest their owne state was in good case, the warre should beginne; than that in some vinhappie time of famine or petilience, or after some great losse of Armie or Fleet, they should be drivent to yeeld vinto the impudent demands of their nemies; & to give away basely their lands and treasures, as they shad lately done; or miserably fight, yoon termes of disaduantage.

This disposition of his Countrimen, Hannibal well understood. Neither was he 50 ignorant (for his father, and other friends, had long time deutice of this businesse) that in making warre with the Romans, it was no small advantage to get the start of them. If once he could bring an Armie into talke, without molestation; there was good hope, that he should finde friends and affishance, euen of those people, that helped to increase the Roman armies in forreigne wars. But this could neuer be effected.

Red, if the matter were openly disputed at Carthage. For it was to be doubted, that the Carthaginians, how glad socuer they would be, to heare that he had set the war on foot, would neuertheleffe bee flow and timorous as commonly men are in the beginning of great enterprises, if the matter were referred to their deliberation. Which it it should happen; then were the Romans like to be made acquainted, not onely with the generalities of his purpose, but with such particulars as must be difcoursed of, in procuring allowance to his dessigne. This might suffice to disorder the whole Project. Wherfore, he resolved to lay siege vnto Saguntum; which might sceme not greatly to concerne the Romans; and would highly please the Carthaginians, that had fresh in mind the indignitic of that Spanish I ownes alliance with their 10 false friends. So should hee affaie both the patience of his enemies, and the disposition of his owne Citizens.

Having thus concluded, he nevertheleffe went faire and orderly to worke: and beginning with those that lay next in his way, approached vnto Saguntum by degrees. This he did (faith Linie) to give some colour to his proceedings : as if he had not principally intended the warre against Saguntum, but had been drawne thither by course of bulinesse. Yet reason teacheth plainly, that without regard of such formalities, it was needefull to finish the conquest of the rest, before hee did any thing that should prouoke the Romans. First therefore he entred vpon the Territorie of the * Oleades; and having belieged Althau (Linie calleth it Carteia) their chiefe 20 Citie, he became, in a few dayes, Master, not only therof, but of all the other townes of their Countrie. This Nation which he first vndertooke, being subdued, and the Amer of Love. Put in the old winter at hand; he rested his Armie in New Carthage, or Carthagena; and imparted defeription of liberally to the Souldiers, the spoiles he had gotten in bislate conquest.

In the Spring following, he pursued the warre against the "Vaccai: and without any great difficultie, wanne first Salmantica, now called Salamanca; and after it, b Ar-Tagus; and by bucala, by affault: though not without a long fiege, and great difficultie. But in his Sustas, not tar from New Car- returne, he was put to the heighth, both of his courage, and of his Martiall iudgement. For all such of the Vaccei, as were able to beare armes, being made despea A people of callet the old. rate by the spoile of their Countrie, with those of Salamanea, and of the Oleades, that 20 b Arbucala, or had escaped in the late ouer-throw, joyning themselves with the Tolerans; compounded an Armie of an hundred thousand able men: and stayed Hannibal on the bankes of the River Tagus, which runneth to the Sea by Lisbourne in Portugale.

These foure nations, having had experience of Hannibals invincible courage, and that he neuer faw enemic, vpon whom he durst not give charge; were throughly. refolued, that his natural valour would at this time no leffe neglect the cold aduice of discretion, than at other times it had seemed to doe, when the like great occasion perswaded him to vie it. But he that makes himselfe a bodie of Crystall, that all men may looke through him, and discerne all the parts of his disposition; makes himselfe (withall) an Asse: and thereby teacheth others, either how to ride, or 40 drive him. Wife men, though they have fingle hearts in al that is iust and vertuous, yet they are like coffers with double bottomes: which when others looke into, being opened, they see not all that they hold, on the sudden, and at once. It is true, that this subtile Carthaginian, when he served under Ashubal, was, of al the men of marke in the Armie, the most aduenturous. But that which may befeeme a Captaine, or inferiour Commander, doth not alwaies become a Chiefe; though it hath fometime succeeded well with such great ones, as have beene found more fortunate, than wife. At this time, our great Man of warre knew as well how to diffemble his courage, as at other times to make it good. For he with-drew himselfe from the River side, as if fearefull to foord it; thereby to draw over that great multi- 50 tude, from their bankes of advantage. The Spaniards, apprehending this in fuch fort, as Hannibal defired that they should; thrust themselves in furic and disorder, into the swift streams, with a purpose to charge the Carthaginians, abandoning (as they thought for feare) the defences on the contrarie fide. But when Hannibal faw them in their way, and well-neare ouer; he turned backe his Elephants to entertaine them at their landing: and thrust his Horse-men, both above and beneath them, into the River. These carrying a kind of Lance de gay, sharpe at both ends, which they held in the middeft of the staffe; had such an aduantage ouer the foot, that were in the River, under their strokes, clattered together, and unable to moue or shift their bodies, as on firme ground: that they slew all those, (in a manner) without refiftance, which were alreadic entred into the water; and purfued the refl, that fled like men amazed, with fo great a flaughter, as from that day forward, there was not any Spaniard, on that fide the River of Iberus, (the Saguntines excep-10 ted) that had the daring to lift vp their hands again fi the Carthaginians.

The Saguntines, perceining the danger towards them; cryed before they were hurt. They sent Embassadours to Rome, and bemoned themselves, as likely to fuffer that, which afterwards they fuffered indeede; only because of their alliance and friendship with this honorable Citie, which the Carthaginians hated. This tale moued the Senate: but much more a report, that Saguntum was alreadie belieged. Hereupon some crie out, that Warre should be proclaymed by Land and Sca; as also that the two Consuls should be sent with Armies, the one into Spaine, the other into Africk. But others went more Roman-like to worke; and carried it. So it was onely concluded; that Embaffadours should be sent into Spaine, to view the state 20 of their Confederates: which were indeede none other, than the Saguntines. For if Hannibal intended warre against Rome, it was likely, that he would give them, ere it were long, a more plaulible occasion to take armes against him : if he had no such purpose; yet would it beein their power, to determine what they listed themselues, vponthe report of these Embassadours; and this their gravitie, in being not too rash at first, would serue to countenance their following Decree. Of these Embasfadours Liniereports, that they found Hannibal before Saguntum; but could not get audience of him, and therefore went to Carthage, where also they were not regarded, nor heard. But Polybius, an Historian of finceritie leffe questionable, tels, that they found him at Carthagena; and had conference with him, though fuch as 30 left them doubtfull. This is more agreeable to the rest of Hannibal his whole course. And furely we might wonder, why the Carthaginians should afterwards admit a more peremptorie Embassage (as Liuie confesseth) and fall to disputation about the conenants of peace; if they had rejected that which was fent vpon none other pretence, than prevention of warre. Whilest the Embassadours passed to and fro, Hannibal prepared not onely his forces, but some Roman pretences, against Saguntum. He found out Mamertines, or people that should do as the Mamertines in Sicil had done for the Romans; and implore his helpe against the Saguntines. These were the Turdetani; a Nation adjovning to Saguntum, and having many quarrells with them: (as happens commonly 40 among Neighbours) of which, Hannibal him lelfe had hatched some. Finding therefore such an occasion, what soeuer it was, as made him able to say, that the Saguntines had first prouoked him, ere he meddled with them; he made no more ado, but fate downe with his whole power before their Towne. He was now more fecure. than he had formerly been, of his own Citizens: for that they had not entertained the Roman Embassadours, with any trembling reverence, as of late yeres they had beene wont. Neuertheleffe, hee was glad of any handfome colour, to shadow his actions, not only because the warre, which he so much desired, was not proclaimed; but that he might not be checked in his course, as an open enemy, before he could fet foot in Italie. The Romans had the like, though contrarie desire. They were glad 50 of the quarrell: as hoping, that Carthage, with all thereto belonging, should therby in short space become their own. Yet were they not hastic to threaten, before they were readie to strike; but meant to temporize, vntill they had an Armie in readineffe to be fent into Spaine, where they thought to make Saguntum, the feat of the

In the meane while, Demetrius Pharins, whom the Romans had made King ouer a great part of Illyria, rebelled against them: eitheir for that he found himselfe ouerfireightly tyed up by them, with hard conditions; or rather because he was of an unthankefull disposition. The commotion of the Gaules, and afterward, the fame of the Carthaginian warre, emboldened him to despise his Benefactors and Patrons: whom he ought to have defended and aided, in all perills, even with the hazard of his whole estate, which he had received of their gift. But hee was a Traitor to his owne Queene; and therefore dealt according to his kinde, with those that had rewarded him for being such. First, he built ships, and spoiled the Iles of Greece: against the couenants to which he was bound. Then he aduentured further and sei- to fed upon some places, that the Romans kept in their owne hands. If he had begun fooner, or rather if he had flaied fomewhat longer, he might have fped better. For the busines with the Gaules, was ended; with Hannibal, not throughly begun; when he declared himselfe, by his doings, an enemie, and was vanquished. The Roman Conful, Emilius, was fent against him: who in seven daies wan the strong Towne of Dimalum; and thereby brought fuch terror vpon the Countrie round about, that Embassadors were sent from al places, to yeeld themselves, without putting him to further paines. Only the Citie of Pharus, in which Demetrius lay, prepared to relifi: which it might have done long, if the hot-headed Rebel had not been too foolish. Æmilius landed a great part of his Armie, in the Isle of Pharus, by night; and be- 20 flowed them in couert; prefenting himfelfe the next morning, with twenty thips before the Towne, and offering to force the Hauen. Demetrius with all his power issued out against the Consultand was soone intercluded from the Town, by those that lay in ambush. Wherefore he fled away through by-paths to a creeke, where he had shipping readie for him, and embarqued himselfe: leaving all his estate vnto them of whose liberalitie he first had it.

This businesse, though it were soone dispatched, yet prevented it not the siege of Saguntum: before which Hannibal sate downe, ere Amilius was landed in Illyria. In the beginning of the fiege, the Carthaginian, were much discoraged, by reason of the braue fallies made by the Saguntines; in one of which, their Generall received a dan- 30 gerous wound in the thigh, that caused him to lie many daies vnable to moue. No. uertheleffe he was not vimindfull of his worke in the meane while; but gave order to raife certaine moueable Towers, that might equal those which were built on the walls of the Citie; and to prepare to batter the curtaines, and make a breach. These being finished and applied, had soone wrought their effect. A great & large breach was made, by the fall of diners Towers, and a great length of wall; whereat an hot affault was given: but it was fo well fustained by the Saguntines, as the Carthaginians were not only beaten from the breach, and out of some ground within the Town, which vpon the first furie they had won; but they were pursued even to their own trenches and camp. Neuertheleffe the Carthaginian Armie, wherein were about an 40 hundred and fiftie thousand men, did so wear je the townesmen with continual trauaile, that at length it got within the walls; and was only hindred from taking full possession of the Citie, by some counter-works of the Saguntines, that were also readie to be won. In this extremitie, there was one Alcon a Saguntine, that conveyed himselfe out of the Towne, to treat with Hannibalfor some accord. But the conditions which the Carthaginian offered, were so seucre, & without alcompasse of honour, as Alcon durst not returne to propound them to his countrimen. For Hannibal demanded all that they had; gold, filuer, plate, and other riches within the Citie: yea, the Citie it selfe to be abandoned by the Citizens; promising, that he would affigne some other place for their habitation: not allowing them, to carrie out with 50 them any other thing, wherewith to fullaine themselves, than the clothes on their backs; or other armes to defend them, than their nailes and teeth. Yet might they farre better have submitted themselves vnto this miserable appointment, (seeing thereby they might have enjoyed their lines, & faued the honor of their wives and daughters) daughters) than to haue rested at the discretion of the Conquerour, as soone after they did; by whom their wines and daughters were dessoured before their faces; and all put to sword, that were aboue soureteene yeares of age. For it was a pose comfort, which a great number of them tooke; when not daring to fight, and self their bloud at the dearest rate, they that themselues we like most wretched creatures in their ownehouses, and therein burnt themselues with all that they like the dying vareuenged. The treasures found in Sagnatum, which were very great, them whole kept, therewith to pay his Armie; the sauce, and other bootic, bee divided a mong his Souldiers; reserving some things of choice, wherewith to present his to friends at Carthage, and to animate them vant the Warre.

To friends at Carinage, and to animate cut in the content of the angry at their owne flownedle, in forbearing to fend helpe vnto the Sagantines, ther held out eight moneths, looking fill for fuccour, in vaine. Wherefore they determined to repaire their honour, by taking flarpe reuenge. To this end they fent Emballadours againe to Carthage: demanding onely, whether it were by general tonfent and lowance of the Carthage indens, that H n n n is not had made marre vpon Sagantum which if they granted (as it feemed they would) then to give them defiance. Hereunto answere was made, in the Senate of Carthage, to this effect: That this their fecond answere was made, in the Senate of Carthage, to this effect: That this their fecond they made in the former. For in that, they only required inflice against Hannibal, but in this, the

The former. For in that, they only required-united against Hammon, but in this, the very State and Common wealth of Carthage, was viged to pleade guiltie, or not guiltie. But (faid the Carthagminn speaker) whether the Generall of our Armie in Spaine, in besieging Saguntum, haue only followed his ownecounsaile, or whether he did it, by direction from visit is not the question which the Roman sought to ask ws. That which is indeed worthy examination or dispute, is; Whether it were lamful, or unlawfull, for Hannia Lto doe as he hath done. For it belongs to vs. to call our owne Commanders in question, and to punish them according to their faults and errours; to you, to challenge vs, it wee haue done any thing contrary to our late League and Contrast. It is true, that in our negotiation with Luthatius there.

30 Gonful, the Allies of both Nations were comprehended: but the Sagantines were not then of your Allies, and therefore no parties to the peace then made; for of your Allies in the future, or fours, there was no dispute. As touching the last agreement, betweene you and Assagntines were comprehended by name; it is you that have raughtvs, how to answere that particular. For whatsfower you found in the Treatic betweene vs and Lustaius, to your owne disaduantage, you cast it vyon your Consuls presumption; as promising those things, for which he had no warrant from the Senate and Peopleof Rome. If then it beel awfull for the Romans, to disauous the actions of their Consuls and Commanders, concluding any thing without punctuall and precise warrant; the 40 same libertie may we also assume, and hold our selves no way bound in honour, to performe those bargaines, which Assagntable hath made for vs, without our comperforme those bargaines, which Assagntable hath made for vs, without our commandement and confent.

CHAP. 2. S.I.

This was an impertinent answere, and little better then a meere cavill. For Lulitatius the Consull, in his Treatie of peace with the Carshagniams, had exprely referred the allowance thereof to the people of Bome. It had becene therefore much better, to have dealt plainely; and to have alleaged, That after this League was made, and consirmed on both parts, it was broken by the Romans, in robbing the Carshagniams of the Isle of Sardinis, and with all of twelve hundred talents: which perjurie the state of Carshage, being now growne able, would revenge with open to considerate, and forthwith inferted their names into the Treatie of peace with Assurbal: seeing that the Treatie with Assurbal, and all other businesse between Rome and Carshage, following the violence and breach of peace, in taking away Sardinia, were no better then Roman injuries; as implying this commination, Dee

what soener we require, else will we make warre, without regard of our oath, which wee bane alreadie broken.

But this the Carthaginians did not alleage, forgetting, in heat of contention (as Polybius takes it) the best of their Plea. Yet since Liuie himselfe doth remember and acknowledge, that the taking of Sardinia from the Carthaginians, did inflame the foirit of Amilear with defire of reuenge : we may reasonably thinke, that the mention of this injurie was omitted, not so much vpon forgetfulnesse, as for that it was not thought convenient, by ripping vp such ancient matter of quarrell, to shew that the warre, now towards, had long beene thought ypon, and like to be made with extraordinarie force; in other manner than heretofore. In conclusion, the Carthaginian 10 Senate moued the Roman Embailadours, to deliuer vnto them in plaine termes the purposes of those that sent them, and the worst of that, which they had long determined against them: as for the Saguntines, and the confining of their Armies within Iberus; those were but their pretences. Whereupon Q. Fabius gathering vp the skirt of his Gowne, as if somewhat had been laide in the hollow therof, made this short reply: I have herc(quoth he)in my Gown-skirt both Peace and Warre: make you (my Masters of the Senate) election of these two, which of them you like best, and purpose to embrace. Hereat all cryed out at once; Euen which of them you your felfe haue a fancy to offer vs. Marry then (quoth Fabius) take the Warre, and share it among you. Which all the Affembly willingly accepted.

This was plaine dealing. To wrangle about pretences, when each part had refolued to make warre, it was mecrely triuolous. For all these disputes of breach of peace, haue euer been maintayned by the partie vnwilling, or vnable to sustaine the warre. The rustie sword, and the emptie purse, doe alwaies plead performance of couenants. There have beene sew Kings or States in the World, that have otherwise understood the obligation of a Treatie, than with the condition of their owne advantage: and commonly seeing peace between ambitious Princes and States, is but a kinde of breathing) the best advised have rather begunne with the sword, than with the trumper. So dealt the Arragonais with the French in Naples; Henrie the second, of France, with the Imperials, when he wrote to Brifes, to supplie as ma. 30 ny places as he could, ere the warre brake out; Don John, with the Natherlandisand Philip, the second, of Spaine, with the English, when in the great Imbarge he tooke all our ships and goods in his Ports.

But Hamibal, besides the present strength of Carthage, and the common feeling of injuries received from these enemies, had another private and hereditaric desire, that violently carried him against the Romans. His sather Amilear, at what time he did sacrifice, being ready to take his journey into Spaine, had solemnely bound him by oath, to pursue them withimmortall hatred, and to worke them all possible mischiele, as soone as he should be a man, and able. Hamibal was then about nine yeeres old, when his father caused him to lay his hand you the Altar, and make 40 this vow: so that it was no marualle, if the impression were strong in him.

That it is inhumane, to be queath hattred in this fort, as it were by Legacie, it cannot be denyed. Yet for mine ownepart, I doe not much doubt, but that some of those Kings, with whom we are now in peace, have received the like charge from their Predecessor, that as soone as their costers shall be full, they shall declare themselves enemies to the people of Expland.

HANNIBAL takes order for the defence of Spaine and Africke.

His iournic into Itali.

CHAP. 3. S.2.

Arrebeing thus proclaimed, Hannibal refolued, not to put vp his fword, which hee had drawne againth the Saguntines, until bee had therewith opened his paffage vnto the gates of Rome. So began the fecond Panick (Warre; fecond to none, that cuer the Senate and people of Rome fultained. Hannibal wintred at Caribagena; where hee licensed his Spanish Souldiers to visit their friends, and refresh themselves against the Spring. In the meane while he gaue instructions to his brother Afdrubal, for the 20uernement of Spaine in his absence. Hee also tooke order, to send a great many troups of Spaniards into Africk, to equall the numbers of Africans formerly drawne thence into Spaine; to the end, that so the one Nation might remaine as pledges and gages for the other. Of the Spaniards, hee transported into Africk thirteene thoufand, eight hundred, and fiftie foot, and twelue hundred horse; also eight hundred flingers of the * Baleares. Besides these, he selected foure thousand soot, al yong men, * 200 and of qualitic, out of the best Cities of Spaine; which he appointed to be garriford 20 in Carthage it felfe, not so much in regard of their forces, as that they might ferue for hostages: for among those foure thousand, the best of the Spanish Citizens, and those that swayed most in their seuerall States, had their Sonnes or Kinsmen. Hee also left with his brother, to guard the coast and Ports, fiftie and seuen Gallies; whereof thirtie seuen were presently armed, and appointed for the warre. Of Africans, and other Nations strangers, he left with him aboue twelve thousand foot, and two thousand horse, besides one and twentic Elephants.

Having in this fort taken order for the defence of Spaine and Africk; he fent Difcourses before him, to view the passages of the Pyrengan Mountaines, and of the Alpes. He aifo fent Embaffadors to the Mountainers of the Pyrenes, & to the Gaules, 30 to obtaine a quiet passage: that he might bring his Armic entire into Italie, and not be compelled to diminish his forces, by any warre in the way, till hee came to encounter the Romans. His Embaffadors, & discouerers, being returned with good fatisfaction; in the beginning of the Spring, he past ouer the River of therws, with an Armie confisting of fourescore and ten thousand foot, and twelve thousand horse. All those parts of Spaine, into which he had not entred before, hee now subdued : and appointed Hanno (not that old enemic of his house, who fate fill at Carthaze) to gouerne Spaine on the East side of Iberus; to whom he left an Armie often thousand foot, and one thousand horse. Being arrived at the borders of Spaine, fome of his Spanish Souldiers returned home, without asking leave : which that o-40 thers might not also doe, or attempt, he courteoully dismissed many more, that seemed willing to be gone. Hereby it came to passe, that the journie seemed the lesse tedious vnto those that accompanied him; as being not enforced by compulsion. With the rest of his armie, confisting now but of fiftie thousand foot, and nine thoufand horse, he past the Pyrenees, and entred into Gaules. He found the Gaules that bordered vpon Spaine, ready in Armes, to forbid his entrance into their Countrie; but wonne them, with gentle speech, and rich presents that he bestowed vpon their Leaders, to fauour his Expedition. So without any molestation, hee came to the banke of Rhodanus; where dwelt, on each fide of the River, a people called Volca. These were vnacquainted with the cause of his comming; and therefore sought to 50 keepe him from paffing ouer the water. But he was greatly affifted by some of those Gaules, that inhabited on the West side of Rhodinus, to wit, by those of Viuaretz and Lionnois. For although many of them had transported themselves and their goods, into the Countrie of Daulphine, thinking to defend the further banke against him: yet fuch as remained, being desirous to free their Countrie of so many ill guests, were better pleafed to have their Countriemen beaten, which had abandoned them, than to have their owne flore of corne and cattaile wasted, by the long flay of fogreat an Armie, as lay you them. For which reason, they helped him to make boates; informed him of another more easie passing, between the River; and lent him guides. When the vessels for transportation of his Armie were in readinesse; he sent Hanno, the some of Bomicar, by the River; himsels in the meane while making countenance to enter the Foorde below. The end of this labour was: that Hanno charging the Gaules vinawares you their owne side, and Hannibal, at the same time, passing the River in their faces, the further banke was wonne, though with some difficultie; and the enemies dispersed. Yet was he greatly troubled in conveying our this Elephants; who marvailously search the water. He was therefore driven to make rasses of trees, and couer them with earth and turse; whereof hee saftened one to each banke, that might serve as bridge, to and from another of the same for the toolog, you which the beauts were towed ouer.

Having past this first brunt, and ouer come both the rage of the River, and of those that defended it, he was visited by the Princes of the Gaules Cifalpines, that inhabited Piement and Milan, who lately had revolted from the Remans. These informed him of the passages of the Alpes, that they were not so difficult, as common report made them; & from these he received guides, with many other encouragements. All which notwithstanding; hee found himselfe extremely incumbred by 20 the Savoians; and loft, both of his carriages, and of his Carthaginians, more than willingly he would, or had formerly thought that he should. For he was twice mainely affailed by them, before he could recouer the plaine Countries on the other fide. And whereas this iournie ouer the Mountaines cost him sifteene dayes trauaile, he was euery day, more or leffe, not only charged by those Mountainers, but withall, extremely beaten with grieuous weather and snow: it being in the beginning of Winter, when he beganne, and ouer-came this passage. But the faire and fertile Plaines, which were now ready to receive them; with the affiftance and conduct of the Cifalpine Gaules, who by their proper forces had so often inuaded the Roman Territorie; gaue them great comfort, and encouragement to goe on : having no- 30 thing elfe of difficultie remaining, but that which from the beginning they made accompt to ouer-come, by their proper valourand resolution; namely the Reman Armies, and relistance.

ò. III.

How the Romans in vaine follicited the Spaniards and Gaules to take their part.

The rebellion of the Cifalpine Gaules against the Romans.

He countries of Spaine and Gsule, through which the Carthaginians marched thus farre, had beene follicited before, by the fame Roman Embaffadours, who had denounced the warre at Carthage. The feast they were infruêted by the Senate, tooke Spaine in their way homeward from Carthage, with a purpose to draw into the Roman Alliance, as many of the Cities and Princes as they could; at leaft, to diffused them from contracting any friendfhip with the Carthaginians. The first which they attempted, were the Volcaus, a people in Spaine; from whom, in open assembly, they received by one that spake for the rest, this vncomfortable answer. With what size (saith 50 he)can yee Romans persuade vs to valew your Alliance, or to preferre it before the friendship of the Carthaginians; seeing we are taught by the example of the Sagunius, to be more wise, than 60 For they, relying on your faith and promised as fishance, have been eviterly rooted out, and destroiced by the Carthaginians; whom they might elfe haue held their affured friends, and good neighbours, as we, and other the people of spaine haue found them. Yee may therefore be gone, with this refolution from vs, That for our parts (and so I thinke, I may anfwere for the reft of our Countriemen) the Romans henceforth are not to expect any kindneffe at our handles: who are refolued, neuer to make accompt of their protection, nor amitic, From the Volcians, the Embaffadours tooke their way towards the Gaules; wing their beft arguments to perfunde them, not to suffer the Carthaginians to passe into Italie, through their Territoric; and withall greatly glorifying themselues, their therepth, and large Domnion. But the Gaules laught them to forme, and had hardto ly the patience, to heare them speake. For shall we (said one of their Princes) by re-

of the Historie of the World.

Oly the patience, to heare them I peake. For main we dato often that Interestypte is fishing Hamnibals passage into Italie, entertaine a war which is not meant to be made againthy 3? Shall we hold the warre among our selues, and in our owne T erritorie, by force, which marcheth with a speedy pace from vs, towards our ancient encemies? Haue the Romans deserved so well of vs, and the Carthoginians so ill, that wee should fee fire on our owne houses, to saue theirs from burning? No, week now it well, that the Romans haue already forced some Nations ofours, our of their proper T erritorie and inheritance, and constrained others, as free as themselves, to pay them tribute. We will not therefore make the Carthoginians, our enemies; who have no way as yet offended vs, nor we them.

An union way a yet olicitudes show the Emballadours returned home; carrying no good newes, of friends likely to belpethem; but rather fome affurance from the people of Mafalia, which were Confederates with Rome, that the Gaules were determined to take part with their enemie. Of this inclination, the Cfalpine Gaules gaue hastie proofe. For when the newes was brought into Italie, that the Carthagnians had passed thereas, and were on the way towards Rome; this alone sufficed to stirre up the Boij, and Infubrians, against the Romans. These people were lately offended at the plantation of new Roman Colonies, at Cremona, and Placentia, within their Territories. Relying therefore upon the Carthagnian linecour, which they suppose to be now at hand; they laid asside all regard of those hostings, which they had given

30 to the Romans, and fell vpon the new Colonies. The Townes it feemes that they could not winne; for Hannihallhortly after failed to get them. But they forced the Roman Commiffioners, (who belike were abroad in the Country) to flie to Modena: where they belieged them. The fiege of Modena had continued forme fmall time; when the Gaules, hauing little skill in affaulting Ciries, waxed wearie, and feemed defirous to haue peace, and to come to forme good accord with the Romans. This they did of purpofe, to draw on forme meeting; that they might therein lay hand vpon the Romans Deputies, thereby to redeeme their Holtages, in way of exchange. And it fell out, in part, according to their with. For the Romans fent out Embaffadours to treat with them, and to conclude a peace; whom they detained. Manius the 40 Prætor, who lay in these quarters with an Armie, hearing this outrage; marched in 40 Pretor, who lay in their quarters with an interest and all hafte to the reliefe of the belieged. But the Gaules, having laid a firong ambuth in a wood ioyning to the way, fell vpon the Pretor fo opportunely, as he was vitterly ouerthrowne, and all his followers left dead in the place; a few excepted, that recovered, by faft running, a little village, but defencible, vpon the River of Po. When this was heard at Rome, C. Aidius, another of the Pretors, was haftly fent, to reliene the befieged, with one Legion, and five thousand of the Roman affociates: which forces were taken out of the Confuls Armie, and fupplied by a new leuie.

As the Gaules were too rath and haftie: fo were the Romans too flow, and indeede

As the Gudes were too ralh and faithe: 10 Were the Company World Man Indicate too ill-aduifed, in the beginning of this warre. They were not perfunded, that 50 Carthage, which had almost feruilely endured so many indignities, in time of the late peace; would be so braue and couragious on the sudden, as to attempt the conquest of statie it selfe. Wherefore they appointed one of their Confuls, to make warre in Spaine, the other in Africk: resling secure of all danger athome. Titus Sempronius tooke his way toward Africk, with an hundred & three score Quinqueremes, or Gallons.

lies, of fine to an Oare; which preparation may feeme to threaten enen the Citie of Carthage, to which it shall not come neere. P. Cornelius Scipio, the other Confull. made all possible haste, by the way of Genoa, into Prouence; and vsed such diligence. hauing the winde also fauourable, as in fine dayes he reconcred Massilia. There hee was aduertised, of Hannibal his having passed the River of Rhodanis; whom hee thought to have found bulle yet awhile in Spaine. Hannibal had also newes of the Confuls arrivall: whereof he was neither glad, nor forry; as not meaning to have to doe with him. Each of them fent forth Scouts, to discouer the others number and doings: Hannibal, about five hundred Numidians; Scipio, three hundred of his better appointed Roman horse. These met and fought, and the Numidians were 10 beaten: yet could not the Romans greatly bragge, having flaine only two hundred, and lost of their owne, one hundred and fortie. But when Scipio drew neere, to have met with the Carthaginians; he found, that they were gone three dayes before; and that (as hee then found affuredly true) with an intent to looke vpon the walls of Rome. This interrupted his intended voiage into Spaine. Neuertheleffe hee fentaway thither his brother Cn. Cornelius Scipio, with the greatest part of his Fleet and Armic, to trie what might bee done against Aldrubal and the other Carthaginian Lieutenants in that Countrie. He him selfe, taking with him a few choice bands, returned by Sea to Pifa; and so passing through Tuscane into Lumbardie, drew together the broken troupes of Manlius and Atilius, that lately had beene beaten by 20 the Gaules: with which forces he made head against the enemie, thinking to finde him ouer-laboured, with trauaile of his painefull journie.

ð. IIII.

Scipio the Roman Confulouer come by HANNIBALAt Ticinum. Both of the Roman Confuls beaten by HANNIBAL, in a great battaile at Trebia.

Iue moneths Hannibal had fpent in his tedious journie from Carthagens; what great mufter he could make, when hee had paffed the Alpes, it is not easily found. Some reckon his foot at an hundred thousand, and his horse at twenty thousand; others report them to have been only twenty thousand foot, and fixe hundred horse. Hannibal himfelfe, in his Monument which he raised, in the Temple of Juno Lacinia, agreeth with the latter fumme. Yet the Gaules, Ligurians, and others that joyned with him, are likely to haue mightily increased his Armie, in short space. But when he marched Eastward from the bankes of Rhodinus, he had with him eight and thirty thousand foot, and eight thousand horse; of which, all save those remembred by himselfe in 40 the Inscription of his Altar in Iuno's Temple, are like to have perished, by diseases, enemies, Rivers, and Mountaines; which mischiefes had devoured, each, their seuerall shares.

a These dwelt about Turine. agoodly City, now fubicat vnto the Duke of Savoy which

Having newly passed the Alpes, and scarce refreshed his wearied Armie in the Countrie of Piemont; he fought to winne the friendship of the a Taurins, who lay next in his way. But the Taurini held warre at that time with the Insubrians, which were his good friends; and refused (perhaps for the same cause) his amitic. Wherefore he affaulted their Towne; and wanne it by force in three dayes. Their spoile ferued well to hearten his Armie; and their calamitie, to terrifie the Neighbour places. So the Gaules, without more adoc, fell vnto his fide: many for feare, many 50 Ha Taurinorum. for good-will, according to their former inclination. This disposition ranne through the whole Countrie: which joyned, or was all in a readinesse to joyne, with the Cartheginians; when the newes of Scipio the Conful his arrivall, made some to be more aduifed, than the reft. The name of the Romans was terrible in those quarters; what was in the Carthaginians, experience had not yet laid open. Since therefore the Kon man Confull was already gotten through the most defencible passages, ere any speech had been heard of his approch; many sate still, for very feare, who else would faine have concluded a League with these new-come friends; and some, for great ter feare, offered their feruice against the Carthaginians, whom neverthelesse they wished well to speede.

This wavering affection of the Province, whereinto they were entred, made the two Generals halten to the triall of a battaile. Their meeting was at Ticinum, now called Pania; where each of them wondred at the others great expedition : Hanni-10 bal thinking it strange, that the Conful, whom he had left behind him on the other fide of the Alpes, could meet him in the face, before hee had well warmed himselfe in the Plaines; Scipio admiring the firange adventure of paffing those Mountaines, and the great spirit of his Enemie. Neither were the Senate at Rome little amazed. at Hannibals fuccesse, and sudden arrivall. Wherefore they dispatched a Messenger in all halte vnto Sempronius, the other Conful, that was then in Sicilia, giving him to understand hereof : and letting him further know, that whereas he had beene directed to make the warre in Africa, it was now their pleasure that hee should forbeare to profecute any such attempt, but that hee should returne the Armie vnder his charge, with all possible speede, to faue Italie it selfe. According to this order, Sem-20 pronies fent off his Fleet from Lilybaum; with direction to land the Armient Ariminum, a Port Towns not farre from Rauenna; quite another way from Carthage, whither he was making hafte. In the meane while, Scipio and Hannibal were come fo neere, that fight they mult, ere they could part alunder. Hereupon, both of them prepared the minds of their Souldiers, by the best arguments they had vnto which Hannibal added the Rhetorick of a present example, that he shewed vpon certaine prisoners of the Savoyans, which he brought along with him, fitted for the purpose, into Italie. For these, having beene no lesse miserably fettered and chained, than sparingly fed; and withall so often scourged on their naked bodies, as nothing was more in their defire, than to be deliuered from their miseries by any kind of present 30 death, were brought into the middle of the Armie: where it was openly demanded, which of them would fight hand to hand with some other of his Companions, till the one of them were flaine, with condition being the Victor, to receive his libertie, and some small reward. This was no sooner propounded, than all of them together accepted the offer. Then did Hannibal cause lots to be cast, which of them should enter the List, with such weapons, as the Chieftaines of the Gaules were wont to vse in single combats. Euery one of these vnhappie men wished, that his owne lot might speede, whereby it should at least be his good fortune, to end his miseries by death, if not to get a reward by victorie. That couple, whole good hap it was to be chosen, fought resoluedly: as rather desiring, than fearing death; and having 40 none other hope, than in vanquishing. Thus were some few coupies matched, it skilled not how equally: for all these poore creatures were willing, vpon whatsoener vneuen termes, to ridde themselves out of slaverie. The same affection that was in these Combatants, and in their fellowes which beheld these, wrought also vpon the Carthaginians, for whom the spectacle was ordained. For they deemed happy, not only him, that by winning the victoric had gotten his liberty, together with an horseand armour: but cuen him also, who being slaine in fight, bad escaped that miferable condition, vnto which his Companions were returned. Their Generall perceiuing what impressionthis dumbe shew had wrought in them, beganne to admonish them of their owne condition, speaking to this effect: That he had laid before them an example of their owne estates: seeing the time was at hand, wherein thev were all to runne the same fortune, that these slaues had done; all to line victorious and rich; or all to die, or (which these prisoners esteemed farre more grieuous) to line in a perpetual flauerie: That none of them all, in whom was common sense, could promife to himselfe any hope of life by flight; fince the Mountaines, the Ri-

uers, the great distance from their owne Countries, and the pursuit of mercilesse Enemics, must needes retrench all such impotent imaginations. He therefore praied them to remember, that they, who had even now praifed the fortune both of the Victor, and of the vanquished, would make it their owne case; seeing there was neuer any in the world, appointed with fuch a resolution, that had ever been broken. or beaten by their enemics. On the contrarie, he told them, that the Romans, who were to fight vpon their owne foile, and in view of their owne Townes; who knew as many waies to faue themselves by flight, as they had bodies of men to fight withall, could no way entertaine such a resolution as theirs: seeing the same necesfitie, (to which nothing feemes impossible) did no way presse them, or constraine them. In this fort did Hannibal, with one substantial largument, That there was no 10 meane betweene Victorie and Death, encourage his Companions. For (faith a great Captaine of France )la comodite de la retracte aduance la fuite; The commoditie of a retrait, doth greatly advance a flat running away.

Seivio. on the other fide, after that he had given order for the laying of a bridge ouer the River of Ticinus, did not neglect to vie the best arguments and reasons hee could to encourage the Armie he led putting them in minde of the great conquests and victories of their Ancestors; against how many Nations they had prevailed; and ouer how many Princes, their Enemics, they had triumphed. As for this Armie commanded by Hannibal, although it were enough to tell them, that it was no better than of Carthaginians, whom in their late warre they had so often beaten, by 20 Land and Sea; yet he prayed them withall to confider, that at this time it was not only fo diminished in numbers, as it rather seemed a troupe of Brigants and Theeues, than an Armie like to encounter the Romans; but fo weather-beaten, and starued, as neither the men, nor horses, had strength or courage to sustaine the first charge that should be given vpon them. Nay (said he) yee your selves may make judgement what daring they have now remaining, after so many travailes and miseries; feeing when they were in their best strength, after they had past the Roane, their horse-men were not only beaten by ours, and driven backe to the very Trenches of their Campe, but Hannibal him selfe, fearing our approch, ranne head-long towards the Alpes: thinking it a leffe difhonour, to die there by frost famine, and precipita- 39 tion than by the sharpe swords of the Romans, which had so often cut downe his people, both in Africa, and in Sicil.

It was not long after this, ere the two Generalls met : each being farre advanced before the groffe of his Armie, with his Horse; and the Roman having also with him fome light-armed foot, to view the ground, and the enemies countenance. When they discovered the approach one of the other; Scipio sent before him his horsemen of the Gaules, to beginne the fight, and bestowing his Darters in the void ground betweene their troupes, to affilt them: himfelfe with his Roman men at armes, following foftly in good order. The Gaules (whether defirous to trie the metall of the Carthaginians, or hoping thereby to get fauour of the Romans) behaued themselves 40 couragiously, and were as couragiously opposed. Yet their foot that should have aided them, shranke at the first brunt, or rather fled cowardly away, without casting a Dart; for feare of being troden downe by the enemies horse. This notwithstanding, the Gaules maintained the fight, and did more hurt than they received; as prefuming that they were well backt. Neither was the Confull vnmindfull to relieue them : their hardinesse deserving his aide; and the hastie slight of those that should have flood by them, admonishing him that it was needfull. Wherefore hee adventured himselfe so farre, that he received a dangerous wound; and had been eleft in the place, if his sonne (afterward surnamed Africanus) had not brought him off: though others give the honour of this rescue, to a Ligurian slave. Whilest the Ro- 50 mans were bussed in helping their Consull; an vnexpected storme came driving at their backs, and made them looke about how to helpe themselues. Hannibal had appointed his Numidian light-horse, to give vpon the Romans in flanke, and to com-

paffe them about, whileft he with his men at armes fuftained their charge, and met them in the face. The Numidians performed this very well: cutting in peeces the feattered foot, that ranne away at the first encounter, and then falling on the backs of those, whose lookes were fastened upon Hannibal and Scipio. By this impression, the Romans were shuffled together, and rowted : so that they all betooke them to their speede, and left vnto their enemies the honour of the day.

When Scipio faw his horse thus beaten, and the rest of his Armie thereby greatly discouraged; hee thought it a point of wisdome, having lost so many of his Fleet vpon the first puffe of winde, to take Port with the rest, before the extremest of the 10 tempest ouer-tooke him. For he saw by the lowring morning what manner of day it was like to proue. Therefore his battaile of foot being yet vnbroken, hee in a manner stole the retrait; and recovered the bridge over Ticinus, which hee had formerly built. But notwithflanding all the hafte that he made, he left fixe hundred of his Reare behinde him: who were the last that should have passed, and staid to breake the bridge. Hereinhe followed this rule of a good man of warre, Si certamen quando q, dubium vi deatur : tacitam miles arripiat fugam : fuga enim aliquando laudanda: which must be understood in this fort; If a Generall of an Armie, by some unprosperous beginnings doubt the successe; or find his Armie fearefull or wavering; it is more profitable to steale a safe retrait, than to abide the uncertaine event of battail.

It was two daies after, ere Hannibal could paffe the Riner; Scipio the whilest refreshing his men, and easing himselfe of his wound in Placentia. But as soone as Hannibal presented his Armie before the Towns, offering battaile to the Romans, who durst not accept it, nor iffue forth of their campe; the Gaules, that hitherto had followed Scipio for feare, gathered out of his feare, courage to forfake him. They thought that now the long-defired time was come, in which better Chieftaines and Souldiers, than Aneroestus, Britomarus, and the Gessates, were come to helpe them: if they had the hearts to helpe themselues. Wherefore the same night they fell vpon the Roman campe; wounded and flue many; especially of those guards that kept watch at the gate; with whose heads in their hands, they fled oner to the Car-30 thaginians, and prefented their feruice. Hannibal received them exceeding courte-oully, and dismiss them to their owne places; as men likely to bee of more vie to him, in perswading the rest of their Nation to become his Confederates, than in any other feruice at the prefent.

About the fourth watch of the night following, the Conful stale a retrait, as hee had done before; but not with the like case and securitie. Hannibal had a good eye vpon him; and ere he could get farre, fent the Numidians after him: following himfelfe with all his Armie. That night the Romans had received a great blow, if the Numidians, greedie of spoile, had not staid to ransack their campe; and thereby giuen time to all, saue some few in Reare, that were slaine or taken, to passe the River 40 of Trebia, and faue themselves. Scipio, being both vnable to travaile by reason of his wound, and withall finding it expedient to attend the comming of his fellow-Conful; incampes himselfe strongly upon the bankes of Trebia. Necessitie required that he should so doe; yet this diminished his reputation. For every day, more & more of the Gaules fel to the Carthaginian fide; among who came in the Boil, that brought with them the Roman Commissioners, which they had taken in the late Insurrection. They had hitherto kept them as Pledges, to redeeme their owne Hostages: but now they deliner them up to Hannibal, as tokens and pledges of their affections towards him; by whose helpe they conceived better hope of recovering their owne men and lands. In the meane while, Hannibal, being in great scarcity of victuals, 50 attempted the taking of Classidium, a Towne wherein the Romans had laid up all their store and munition. But there needed no force; a Brundusian, whom the Romans had trusted with keeping it, fold it for a little monie.

The newes of these disasters, brought to Rome, filled the Senate and People, ra-00000

ther with a defire of hastic reuenge, than any great forrow for their losse received, feeing that, in a manner, all their toot, wherein their strength and hope consilted, were as yet entire. They therefore hasted away Sempronia, that was newly arrived, towards Ariminum, where the Armie, by him sent out of Siell, awaited his comming. He therefore hasted hither; and from thence hee marched speedily towards his Colleague: who attended him voon the bankes of Trebia. Both the Armies being joyned in one, the Confuls deulised about that which remained to bee done: Sempronius receiving from Seipio the relation of what had passed field since Hannibal: arrival; the fortune of the late fight; and by what errour or misaduenture the Romans were therein foiled: which Scipio chiefly laid on the reuolt and treason to Sempronius, having received from Scipio the state of the affaires in those parts; fought by all meanes to trie his fortune with Hannibal, before Scipio were recoursed of his wounds, that thereby he might purchase to himselfe the sole glorie of the vi-Gorie, which he had alreadic, in his imagination, certainely obtayned. He also feared the election of the new Consuls: his owne time being well-neere expired. But Scipio perswaded the contrarie; objecting the viskilfulnesse of the new-come Souldiers: and withal gaue him good reason, to assure him that the Gaules, naturally vnconstant, were vpon termes of abandoning the partie of the Carthaginians, those of them inhabiting betweene the Riuers of Trebia, and Po, being alreadie revolted. 20 Sempronius knew all this as well as Scipio: but being both guided and blinded by his ambition, he made halte to finde out the dilhonour, which he might otherwise eafily have avoided. This resolution of Sempronius was exceeding pleasing to Hannibal: who feared nothing so much as delay and losse of time. For the strength of his Armie, confifting in firangers, to wit, in Spaniards and Gaules; he no leffe feared the change of affection in the one, than the impatiencie of the other: who being farre from their owne home, had many passions mouing them to turne their faces towards it. To turther the defire of Sempronius, it fell out so, that about the same time, the Gaules inhabiting necre vnto Trebia, complayned of injuries done by the Carthaginians. They did not supply Hannibal with necessaries, as hee supposed that 30 they might have done; although he daily reprehended their negligence, telling them, that for their fakes, and to fet them at libertie, he had undertaken this Expedition. Seeing therefore how little they regarded his words, he was bold to bee his owne Caruer; and tooke from them by force, as much as he needed of that which they had. Hereupon they flie to the Romans for helpe : and, to make their tale the better, fay that this wrong is done them, because they refused to joyne with Hanmibal. Scipio cared not much for this : he suspected their fallhood, and was affured of their mutability. But Sempronius affirmed, that it flood with the honor of Rome, to preferue the Confederates from fuffering injurie : and that hereby might be won the friendship of all the Gaules. Therfore he sent out a thousand horse: which com- 40 ming vnlooked for vpon Hannibal his forragers, and finding them heavy loaden cut many of them in pieces, and chaced the rest even into their owne campe. This indignitie made the Carthaginians fallie out against them : who caused them to retire fafter then they came. Sempronius was readie to back his owne men ; and repelled the enemies. Hannibal did the like. So that at length, all the Roman Armic was drawne forth; and a battaile readie to bee fought, if the Carthaginian had not refusedit.

This victorie (for so the Consul would have it called) made the Romans in generall destrous to try the maine chance in open field: all the perswassions of Sepio to the contrarie notwithstanding. Of this disposition Hannibal was advertised by 50 the Gulles, his spies, that were in the Roman Gampe. Therefore he bethought himfelse how to helpe sorward the victorie, by adding some stratagem to his forces: Hee sound in the hollow of a water-course, over-growne with high reede, a fit trench to couer an ambuilh. Thereinto he can his brother Mago, with a thouland choice horse, and as many foot. The rest of his Armie, after they had well warmed and well fed themselues in their campe, he led into the field, and marched towards the Conful. Earely in the morning, he had fent ouer Trebia some companies of Aumidian light-horse : to braue the enemie, and draw him forth to a bad dinner, ere he had broken his fast. Sempreneus was ready to take any opportunitie to fight: and therefore not onely iffued out of his campe, but foorded the River of Trebia, in a most cold and miserableday; his foot being wet almost to the arme-holes: which, together with the want of foode, did so enfeeble and coole their courages, as they to wanted force to handle the armes they bare. Strong they were in foot, as well of their owne Nation, as of the Latines: having of the one, fixteene, of the other, twentie thousand. The masse of these they ranged in a grosse Battalion, guarded on the flanks with three thousand horse: thrusting their light-armed, and Darters, in loose troups in the head of the rest, in the nature of a Vantguard. The Carthaginian numbers of foot, were in a manner equall to their enemies ; in horse, they had by farre the better, both in number and goodnesse. When therefore the Roman horse, ranged on the flankes of their foot, were broken by the Numidians; when their foot were charged both in front and flanke, by the Spaniar de, Gaules, and Elephants, when finally the whole Armic was vnawares prest in the Reare, by Mago and his two 20 thousand, that rose out of their place of ambush: then fell the Romans, by heapes, under the enemies fwords; and being beaten downe, as well fighting in diforder, as flying towards the Riuer, by the horse-men that pursued them, there escaped no more of fixe and thirtie thousand, than ten thousand of all forts, Horse and Three great errours Sempronius committed, of which every one descrued to bee recompenced with the losse that followed. The first was, that hee fought with Hansibids in a Champaine, being by farre inseriour in horse, and withall thereby subice to the African Elephants, which in inclosed or vn-even grounds, and woodlands, would have beene of no vie. His second errour was, that he made no disconduction of the place upon which he sought, whereby he was grossly over-reach, and infinared, by the ambush which Hannibal had laid for him. The third was, that hee drench his soot-men with emptie stomachs, in the River of Trebia, evenin a most cold and frostic day, whereby in effect they lost the vise of their limbs. For as one saith well; There is nothing more inconvenient and perilous, thus to present an Armie tyred with travaile, to an evenie fresh and set; since where the strength of bodie faileth, the generalized friends that as an unprofitable vapour.

The broken remainder of the Koman Armic, was collected by Scipio, who got therewith into Placentia; stealing away the fame night, which was exceeding rainy, from the Carthaginians; who either perceived him not, because the shearing, or 40 would not perceive him, because they were ouer-wearied. Sempronius escaped with extreme danger, flying through the Countrie that was ouer-runne by the enemies horse. Hee was attended by more, than were requisite in a secret slight; yet by fewer, than could have made resistance, if the enemie had met with him. Neuertheleste be got away, and came to Rome, where hee did his office in choosing new Consuls for the yeere following: and then returned into his Province, with a fresh supply against Hammoal.

The departure of HANNIBAL from the Cifalpine Gaules into Hetruria. FLAMINIVS the Roman Conful staine; and his Armie destroyed by the Carthaginians, at the Lake of Thrasymen.

He Winter growing on apace, was very sharpe, and vnfit for seruice:

to the great contentment of the Romans, who being not able to keepe 10

to the great contentment of the Romans, who being not made in the field, lay warme in Placentia, and Cremona. Yet Hamibal did not fuffer them to reft very quiet: but vexed them with continual administration of the Conference of larmes; affayling divers places; taking fome; beating the Gaules their adherents; and winning the Lygurians to his partie, who presented him, in token of their faithfull love, with two Roman Quæstors or Treasurers, two Colonels, and fine Centlemen the Sonnes of Senatours, which they had intercepted. These and in general all such prisoners as he had of the Romans, he held in streight places, loden with yrons, and miserably fed: those of their followers he not onely well entreated, but sent them to their Countries without ransome; with this protestation. That he therefore undertooke the Warre in Italie to free them from the 20 oppression of the Romans. By these meanes he hoped, and not in vaine, to draw many of them to his partie and affiltance. But the Gaules were not capable of fuch perswasions. They stood in seare, lest he should make their Countrie the seate of the Warre, and perhaps take it from them. They were also more grieued than reason willed them, at his feeding upon them, and wasting their Territorie. Wherefore some of them conspired against his life; others admonished him of the danger: and these that gave him the advice, were readic soone after to practise against him; but were in like fort detected. He was therefore glad to vie Perwigs of haire, and false beards of divers colors, to the end that he might not be described, nor known, to those that should undertake to make him away. Faine hee would have passed 30 the Apennines, upon the first appearance of Spring; but was compelled by the violence of weather, to tarrie among the Gaules, till he had seene more Swallowes than one. At length, when the yeare was somewhat better opened, he resolved to take his leave of these giddie Companions, and bring the warre necrer to the gates of Rome. So away hee went, having his Armie greatly increased with Ligurians and Gaules: more feruiceable friends abroad, than in their owne Countrie. That the paffage of the Apennine Mountaines was troublesome, I hold it needlesse to make any doubt. Yet fince the Roman Armies found no memorable impediment, in their marches that way : the great vexation which fell vpon Hannibal, when hee was trauailing through and ouer them, ought in reason to be imputed rather to the 40 extremitie of Winter, that makes all wayes foule, than to any intolerable difficultie in that iournie. Neuerthelesse to avoide the length of way, together with the refistance and fortifications, which may not improbably be thought to have beene erected upon the ordinarie passages towards Rome: he chose at this time, though it were with much trouble, to trauaile through the Fennes and rotten grounds of Tuscane. In those Marishes and bogges, he lost all his Elephants, saue one, together with the vsc of one of his eyes; by the movstnesse of the airc, and by lodging on the cold ground, and wading through deepe mire and water. In briefe, after hee had with much adoe recovered the firme and fertile Plaines; he lodged about Arretium: where he somewhat refreshed his wearied followers, and heard newes of the 50

C.Flaminius, and Cn. Seruiltus had of late beene chosen Consuls for this yeere: Seruilius, a tractable man, and wholly gouerned by aduice of the Senate; Flaminius, an hot-headed popular Orator; who having once beene robbed (as heethought) of his Confulship, by a deuice of the Senators, was afraid to be served to againe, vnleffe he quickly finished the warre. This jealous Conful thought it not best for him to be at Rome, when he entred into his Office, left his aduerfaries, by fayning fome religious impediment, should detaine him within the Citic, or find other bufinesse for him at home, to disappoint him of the honour, that hee hoped to get in the Warre. Wherefore he departed fecretly out of the Towne; and meant to take possession of his Office, when the day came, at Ariminum. The Fathers (so the Senators were called) highly displeased with this, renoked him by Embassadors: but 10 he neglected their injunction; and hasting to meet with the Carthaginians, tooke his way to Arretium, where he shortly found them.

The fierie disposition of this Consul, promised vnto Hannibal great assurance of victorie. Therefore he prouoked, with many indignities, the vehement nature of the Roman: hoping thereby to draw him vnto fight, ere Serulius came with the reft of the Armie. All the Countrie betweene Fefule and Arretium he put to fire and fword, even under the Confuls nofe; which was enough to make him ftirre, that would not have fitten still, though Hannibal had beene quiet. It is true, that a great Captaine of France hath faid ; Paysgafte vefte pas perdu ; A wasted Countries not thereby loft. But by this wafte of the Countrie, Flaminius thought his owne honour 20 to be much impaired; and therefore advanced towards the Enemie. Many aduifed him (which had indeede beene best) to have patience awhile, and stay for his Colleague, But of this he could not abide to heare: faying, that he came not to defend Arretium, whilest the Carthaginians went, burning downc al Italie before them, to the gates of Rome. Therefore he tooke horse; and commanded the Armie to march. It is reported as ominous, that one of their Enfignes flucke fo fast in the ground, as it could not be plucked up by the Enfigne-bearer. Of this tale, whether true or falfe, Tullie makes a jeast : faying that the cowardly knaue did faintly pull at it (asgoing now to fight) having hardily pitched it into the earth. Neither was the answere of Flaminius (if it were true) disagrecable hereto: for he commanded, that 30 it should be digged up, if feare had made the hands too weak to lift it; asking withall; whether letters were not come from the Senate, to hinder his proceedings. Of this jealousie both hee, and the Senate that gaue him cause, are likely to re-

All the Territoric of Cortona, as farre as to the Lake of Thrasymene, was on a light

fire, which whilest the Consul thought to quench with his enemies bloud, he purfued Hannibal fo vnaduifedly, that he fell, with his whole Armie, into an ambush cunningly laid for him, betweene the Mountaines of Cortona, and the Lake. There was he charged vnawares, on all fides, (faue only where that great Lake of Perulia permitted neither his enemies to come at him, nor him to flie from them) knowing 40 not which way to turne, or make relistance. So was hee flaine in the place, accompanied with fifteene thousand dead carkasses of his Countrimen. About fixe thoufand of his men, that had the Vantgard, tooke courage as for the most part happens, out of desperation; and breaking through the enemies, that stood in their way, recourred the tops of the Mountaines. If these had returned, and given charge vpon the Carthaginians backs, it was thought that they might have greatly amended, if not wholly altered, the fortune of the day. But that violence of their feare, which kindled by necessitie, had wrought the effects of hardinesse; was well asswaged, when they ceafed to despaire, of sauing their lines by slight. They stood still, in a could sweat, upon the Hill-top; hearing under them a terrible noise, but not dis-50 couering how things went, because of the great fogge that held all the morning.

When it grew toward noone, the aire was cleared, and they might plainly discerne the lamentable flaughter of their fellowes. But they staid not to lament it : for it was high time, they thought, to be gone, ere they were descried, and attached by the enemies horse. This they should have thought vpon sooner; since they had no mindeto returne vnto the fight. For descryed they were, and Maharbal sent after them; who ouer-tooke them by night in a Village, which hee furrounded with his horse: and so they yeelded the next day, rendring their armes, vpon his promise of their lines and liberties. This accord Hannibal refused to confirme; saying, that it was made by Maharbal, without sufficient warrant, as wanting his authoritie to make it good. Herein hee taught them (yet little to his owne honour) what it was to keepe no faith; and fitted them with a tricke of their owne. For if it were lawfull vnto the Romans, to alter couenants, or adde vnto them what they lifted; if the Carthaginians must be fain to pay certaine hundreds, and yet more hundreds of talents, 10 belides their first bargaine; as also to renounce their interest in Sardinia, and bee limited in their Spanis Conquests, according to the good pleasure of the Romans, whose present advantage is more ample, than the conditions of the late concluded peace: then can Hannibal bee as Roman, as themselves; and make them know, that perfidiousnesse gaineth no more in prosperitie, than it looseth in the change of fortune. Fifteene thousand Italian Prisoners, or thereabout, hee had in his hands : of which all that were not Romans, hee fet free without ranfome; protesting, as he had done before, that it was for their fakes, and to free them and others from the Roman tyrannie, that he had undertaken this warre. But the Romans hee kept in ftraight prifon, and infetters; making them learne to cate hard meate. This was a good way to 20 breede in the people of Italie, if not a lone of Carthage, yet a contempt of Rome: as if this warre had not concerned the generall safetie, but only the preserving of her owne neck from the yoke of flauerie, which her ouer-strong enemies would thrust you her in reuenge of her oppressions. But an ancient reputation, confirmed by fuccesse of many ages, is not lost in one or two battailes. Wherefore more is to bee done, ere the Carthaginian can get any Italian Partilans.

Prefently after the battaile of Thrassmene, C. Centronius, with foure thousand Roman horse, drew necervation the Campe of Hamibal. Hee was sent from Arminians, by scrutius the other Consul, to increase the firength of Flamibia; but comming too late, hee increased only the misaduenture. Maharbal was imployed by Hamibal, 30 to intercept this companie; who finding them amazed with report which they had newly heard of the great ouerthrow, charged them, and brake them: and killing almost halfe of them, draue the rest vnto an high piece of ground, whence they came downe, and simply yeelded to mercie, the next day. Serutius himselfe was in the meane while skirmishing with the Gaules; against whom hee had wrought no matter of importance, when the newes was brought him, of his Colleagues ouer-throw and death in Heturais, that made him hasten backe to the defence of Rome.

In these passages, it is easie to discerne the fruits of popular lealousie, which perfwaded the Romans to the yeerely change of their Commanders in the wars; which greatly endangered, and retarded the growth of that Empire. Certaine it is, that all 40 men are farre better taught by their owne errours, than by the examples of their fore-goers. Flaminius had heard, in what a trap Sempronius had bin taken vp but the yeere before, by this fubtile Carthaginian; yet fuffered he himselfe to be caught soone after in the same manner. Hee had also belike forgotten, how Sempronius, fearing to be preuented by a new Conful, and ambitious of the fole honour of beating Hannibal in battaile, without helpe of his companion Scipio, had been erewarded with fhame and loffe; elfe would be not, contrarie to all good advice, have beene so half to fight, before the arrivall of Servilius. If Sempronius had been continued in his charge it is probable that he would have taken his companion with him the fecond time, and have fearched all suspected places, proper to have shadowed an ambush: 50 both which this new Gonful Flaminius neglected. We may boldly avowit, that by being continued in his Government of France ten yeeres, Cafar brought that mightie Nation, together with the Heluetians and many of the Germans, under the Roman yoke; into which parts had there beene enery yeere a new Lieutenant ent, the would hardly, if euer, haue beene subdued. For it is more than the best wit in the World can doe, to informe it selfe, within one yeeres compasse, of the nature of a great Nation, of the Factions, of the Places, Riuers, and of all good helpes, whereby to proactive a warreto the best effect. Our Princes have commonly left their Deputies in Ireland three yeeres; whence, by reason of the shortnesse of that their time, many of them haue returned as wise, as they went out; others haue profited more, and yet when they beganne butto know the first rudiments of Warre, and Gouernement, fitting the Countrie, they haue beene called home, and new Apprentices sent in their places, to the great prejudice both of this and that Estate. But to the them used of Princes and Gouernours, to vp-hold their slothful ignorance, by the old examples and policie of other ages and people; though neither likensse of time of occasion, or of any other circumstance, haue persuaded the imitation.

ð VI.

How Q.F. A BIVS the Roman Dictator, fought to consume the force of HANNIBAL, by lingring warre. MINVILVS, the Master of the Horse, homoured and advanced by the People, for bold and successfully attempting, advantures rashly upon HANNIBAL, and is like to perish with his Armie, but referred by FABIVS.

Reatly were the Romansamazed, at this their ill successe, and at the danger apparent; which threatned them in more terrible manner, than cuer did warre, fince Rome it felfe was taken. They were good Souldiers; and so little accustomed to receive an ouerthrow; that when Pyrrhus had beaten them, once and againe, in open field, all Italie was firangely affected with his fuccesse, and held him inadmiration, as one that 20 could worke wonders. But Pyrrhus his quarrell was not grounded upon hate : hee only fought honour, and fought (as it were) vpon a brauerie: demeaning himfelfe like a courteous enemie. This Carthaginian detested the whole Roman name; against which he burned with desire of reuenge. Ticinum, Trebia, and Thrasymene, witneffed his purpose, and his abilitie. Which to withstand, they fled vnto a remedie that had long beene out of vie, and created a Dictator. The Dictators power was greater than the Confuls, and scarcely subject vnto comptroll of the whole Cities Wherefore this Officer was seldome chosen, but vpon some extremitie, and for no longer time than fixe moneths. He was to be named by one of the Confuls, at the appointment of the Senate: though it were fo, that the Conful (if he flood vpon his 40 prerogatiue) might name whom he pleased. At this time, the one Consul being dead, and the other too farre off; the People tooke vpon them, as having supreme authoritie, to give the Dignitic by their election, to Q. Fabius Maximus, the best reputed man of warre in the Citic, Novum factum, novum confilum expetit; Contrarie winds, contrarie courfes. Q. Fabius chose M. Minutius Rufus Master of the horse: which Officer was customarily, as the Dictators Lieutenant; though this Minutius grew afterwards famous, by taking more vpon him.

The first act of Fabius, was the reformation of somewhat amisse in matter of religion; a good beginning, and commendable; shad the Resignon been also good. Butifit were true (as Liuie reports it) that the bookes of Sphil were consulted, and Liuiasi of Sphil preferred in Rome, were distated by an cuill spirit. For it was orday ned, that some Vow, made in the beginning of this warre to Mars, should be made anew, and amplified, as having not been rightly made before also that great Plaies should be vowed wnto supirer, and a Temple to Venus, with other such trumperie. This vehemencie of superstition, proceeds al waies from vehemencie of seare. And surely this was a time, when *Rome* was exceedingly distempered with passion: whereof that memorable accident, of two women that suddenly died, when they saw their somes returne aliue from *Thrassmen*, may serve to beare witnesse; though it bee more properly an example of motherly loue. The walls and towers of the Civie were now repaired and fortisted; the bridges ypon Riuers were broken downe; and all care taken, for desence of *Rome it selfe. In this tumult, when the Dictator was newly set forth against *Hannibal*, word was brought, that the *Carthaginian* fleet had intercepted all the supply, that was going to *Cn. Scapio* in Spaine*. Against these *Carthaginans*, Fabius* commanded *Serailius* the Conful to put to Sea; and taking yp 10 all the slippsabout *Rome, and *Ossius*, op urfue them: whilest he, with the Legions, attended ypon *Hannibal*. Four Legions he had leuied in haste: and from *Ariminum* he received the Armie, which Serailius the Conful to a conducted thither.

With these forth-with he followed apace after Hannibal; not to fight, but to affront him. And knowing well, what advantage the Numidian horse had over the Romans, he alwaies lodged himselfe on high grounds, and of hard accesse. Hannibal in the meane while, pursuing his victorie, had ranged ouer all the Countrie, and vfed all manner of crueltic towards the inhabitants; especially to those of the Roman Nation, of whom he did put to the fword, all that were able to beare armes. Palling by Spoletum and Ancona, he incamped upon the Adriatick shores; refreshed his dif- 20 cased, and ouer-trauailed Companies; armed his Africans after the manner of the Romans; and made his dispatches for Carthage, presenting his friends, which were in effect all the Citizens, with part of the spoiles that hee had gotten. Having refreshed his Armie; fed his horses; cured his wounded Souldiers; and (as Polybius hathit) healed his horse heeles of the scratches, by washing their pasternes in old wine : he followed the coast of the Adriatick Sea towards Apulia, a Northerne Province of the Kingdome of Naples; spoiling the Marrucini, and all other Nations lying in his way. In all this ground that he ouer-ranne, he had not taken any one Citie: only he had affaied Spoletum, a Colonie of the Romans; and finding it well defended, presently gaue it ouer.

The malice of a great Armie is broken, and the force of it spent, in a great siege. This the Protestant Armie foundtrue at Poictiers, a little before the battaile of Moncounter; and their victorious enemies, anon after, at S'. lean a' Angeley. But Hannibal was more wife. He would not engage himfelfe in any fuch enterprize, as should detaine him, and give the Romans leave to take breath. All his care was to weaken them in force and reputation:knowing, that when once hee was absolute Master of the field, it would not be long ere the walled Cities would open their gates, without expecting any engine of battery. To this end he presented Fabius with battaile, as foone as he faw him; and prouoked him with all manner of brauado's. But Fabius would not bite. Hee well knew the differences, betweene Souldiers bred vp, euer 40 fince they were Boyes, in warre and in bloud, trayned and hardened in Spaine, made proud and aduenturous by many victories there, and of late by some notable acts against the Romans; and such, as had no oftner seene the enemie, than bin vanquished by him. Therefore he attended the Carthaginian so neere, as hee kept him from ftraggling too farre; and preserved the countrie from vtter spoile. He inured his men by little and little, and made them acquainted with dangers by degrees; and hee brought them first to looke on the Lyon a farre off, that in the end they might sit

Now Minutius had a contrarie disposition, and was as fierie as Flaminius; taxing Fabius with cowardise and feare. Bur all flirred not this well-aduised Commander. For wise men are no more moued with such noise, than with winde bruised out of a bladder. There is nothing of more indiscretion, and danger; than to pursue misfortune: It wastern it selfe sooner by sufferance, than by opposition. It is the invading Armie that desires battaile: and this of Hampibal, was both the invading, and the victorious, Fabius therefore suffered Hannibal to croffe the Apennines, and to fall upon the most rich and pleasant Territorio of Campania; neither could be by any arguments be persuaded, to adventure the Roman Armie in battaile: but being larre too weake in horse, be alwaies kept the Halls and fast grounds. When Hannibal faw he could by no means draw this warie Dictator to fight, that the Winter came on; and that the towns shood sirme for the Roman, whose Legions were in sight, though effect of the Proposed to rest his Armie; that was loaden with spoile, in some pleatiful and afford place, till the following Spring. But ere this can be done, he must passe along by the Dictators campe, that hung ouer his head upon the Halls of Casilians and the proposed the passe of the way the course supply the passe of the

CHAP.3. S.6.

10 cala, and Casilinum: for other way there was none, by which hee might issue out of that goodly Garden-countrie, which hee had already wasted, into places more aboundant of prouisson for his wintering. It was by meere error of his guide, that he first entred within the session strength. For he would have bin directed vinto Casilinum, whence he might both assay he faire Citie of Capua, which had made him friendly promises vinder hand, and hinder the Romans from comming neere it to preuent him. But his guide mise vinder though the Casilinum pronunciation, and conducted him away another way, from Casilinums to Casilinum, whence Fabius hoped that he should not easily escape. Now beganne the wisdome of Fabius to grow into credit; as if he had taken the Casilinum; in a trap, & wonne the victorie, without blowes.

20 But Hamnibal reformed this opinion, and freed himselfe, by a slight inuention, yet

20 But Hannibal reformed this opinion, and freed himfelfe, by a flight inuention, yet feruing the turne as well as a better. In driving the country, hee had gotten about two thousand Kine; whose hornes he dressed with drie saggests, and setting fire to them in the darke night, caused them to be driven vp the hills. The spectacle was strange, and therefore terrible; especially to those, that know it to be the worke of a terrible enemie. What it should meane, Fabins could not tell: but thought it a denice to circumuent him; and therefore kept within his Trenches. They that kept the hill-tops, were hornibly assiad, when some of these serve gotten beyond them; and ran therefore halily away, thinking that the enemies were behind their backs, and fell among the light-armed Carthaginians, that were no lessed a straid of them. So Hannibal, with his whole Armierceouvered sure ground, without moleflation: where he flayed till the next morning; and then brought off his light footmen, with fome flaughter of the Romans, that began to hold them in skirmifn: After this, Hamibal made semblance of taking his journic towards Rome: and the Dictator coasted him in the wonted manner; keeping still on high grounds, between him and the Citie, whilest the Carthaginian wasted all the Plaines. The Carthaginian tooke Goryon, an old ruinous Towne in Apalia, so faken by the Inhabitants; which he turned into Barnes and Store-houses for winter, and incamped winder the broken walls. Other matter of importance he did none: but the time passed idely, till the Dictator was called away to Rome, about some businesse of Religion, and left the 40 Armie in charge with Mānuim, the Mafter of the horfe.

Minutins was glad of this good occasion to shew his owne sufficiencie. Hee was fully persuaded, that his Romans, in plaine field, would be too hard for the Africans and Spaniar driby whom if they had beene foiled already twice or thrice, it was not by open force, but by subtlitie & ambulh, which he thought himselfe wise crough to preuent. All the Armie was of his opinion; and that so carnessly, as he was preferred by indgement of the Souldiers, in worthinesse to command, before the cold and warie Fabins. In this jollitic of conceit, hee determined to fight. Yet had hee beene peremptorily forbidden so to doe, by the Dictator; the breach of whose command was extreme perill of death. But the honour of the victorie, which hee so held vindoubtedly his owne; the loue of the Armie; and the friends that he had at home bearing Office in Rome, were enough to saue him from the Dictators rods and axes, tooke he the matter neue: so hainously, Hamibad on the other side was no less glad, that he should play with a more aduenturous gamester. Therefore hee drew necerciand op prouoke the Romans, font forth a third part of his Armie to waste the Countrie. This was boldly done, seeing that Minutius incamped hard by him:but it feemes, that hee now despised those whom hee had so often vanquished. There was a peece of high ground betweene the two camps; which because it would bee commodious to him that could occupie it, the Carthaginians seized vpon by night with two thousand of their light armed. But Minutus, by plaine force, wanne it from them the next day; and entrenching himselfe thereupon, became their nee-rer neighbour.

The maine businesse of Hannibal at this time was, to prouide abundantly, not only for his men, but for his horses, which hee knew to bee the chiefe of his strength; that he might keepe them in good heart against the next Summer: if besides this he 10 could give the Romans another blow, it would increase his reputation, encourage his ownemen, terrifichis enemies, and give him leave to forrage the Countrie at will. Since therefore Minutius did not in many dayes iffue forth of his campe, the Carthaginian sent out (as before) a great number of his men, to fetch in haruest. This advantage Minutius wifely espied, and tooke. For he led forth his Armie, and fetting it in order presented battaile to Hannibal, that was not in case to accept it, cuen at his owne Trenches. His horse, and all his light Armature, divided into many companies, hee fent abroad against the forragers; who being dispersed ouer all the fields, and loaden with bootic, could make no relistance. This angred Hannibal, that was not able to helpe them; but worse did it anger him, when the Romans 20 tooke heart to affaile his Trenches. They perceined that it was meere weakeneffe, which held him within his campe, & therefore were bold to despise his great name, that could not relift their present strength. But in the heat of the businesse, Aldrubal came from Gergon with foure thousand men, being informed of the danger, by those that had escaped the Roman horse. This emboldened Hannibal to iffue forth against the Romans; to whom neuerthelesse hee did not such hurt, as hee had

For this peece of service Minutius was highly esteemed by the Armie, & more highly by the People at Rome, to whom he fent the newes, with somewhat greater boast than truth. It seemed no small matter, that the Roman Armie had recovered 30 spirit, so farre forth that it dared to set vpon Hannibal in his owne campe; and that in so doing, it came off with the better. Euery man therefore praised the Master of the horse, that had wrought this great alteration; and consequently, they grew as farre out of liking with Fabius, and his timorous proceedings, thinking that hee had not done anything wifely, in all his Dictatorship: saving that he chose such a worthy Lieurenant; whereas indeede in no other thing hee had so greatly erred. But the Dictator was not so joyfull of a little good luck, as angry with the breach of difcipline; and fearefull of greater danger, thereon likely to enfue. Hee faid that hee knew his owne place, and what was to be done; that he would teach the Master of the horse to doe so likewise; and make him give account of what he had done, if hee 40 were Dictator: speaking it openly, That good successe, issuing from bad counsaile. was more to be feared, than calamitie; for as much as the one bred a foolish confidence; the other taught men to be warie. Against these Sermons every one cryed out; especially Metellus, a Tribune of the people: which Office warranted him to speake, and doe what he list, without feare of the Dictator. Is it not enough (said he) that this our only Man, chosen to be Generall, and Lord of the Towns, in our greatest necessitie, bath done no manner of good, but suffered all Italie to bee wasted before his eyes, to the vtter shame of our State; vnlesse he also hinder others, from doing better than himfelfe can, or dares? It were good to confider what he meanes by this. Into the place of C. Flaminius hee hath not chosen any new Conful all this 50 while: Seruilius is fent away to Sea, I know not why; Hannibal and Hee, have as it were taken Truce; Hannibal sparing the Dictators grounds: (for Hannibal had indeede forborne to spoile some grounds of Fabius, that so hee might bring him into enuic & suspition) & the Dictator giving him leave to spoile all others, without impeachment.

peachment. Surely his drift is even this: He would have the warre to last long, that he himselfe might be long in Office, and have the sole Government both of our Citic, and Armies. But this must not be so. It were better, that the Commonaltie of Rome, which gaue him this authoritie, should againe take it from him, and conferre it vpon one more worthy. But left, in mouing the people hereto, I should feeme to doe him injurie; thus farre forth I will regard his honour: I will only propound, That the Master of the Horse may be joyned in equal authority with the Dictator; a thing not more new, nor leffe necessarie, than was the electing of this Dictator, by the People.

Снар.3.5.6.

10 Though all men, even the Senators, were ill perswaded of the course which Fabius had taken against Hannibal, as being neither plausible, nor seeming beneficial at the present; yet was there none so injurious, as to thinke that his generall intent, and care of the Weale publike, was lesse than very honourable. Whereas therefore it was the manner, in paffing of any Act, that some man of credit and authority, besides the Propounder, should stand up, and formally deliuer his approbation; not one of the principall Citizens was found so impudent, as to offer that open differace, both vnto a worthy Personage, and (therewithall) vnto that Dignitic, whose great power had freed the State at feuerall times, from the greatest dangers. Only C.Terentius Varro, who the yeere before had beene Prætor, was glad of fuch an opportu-20 nitie, to winne the faucur of the Multitude. This fellow was the sonne of a Butcher; afterwards became a shop-keeper; and being of a contentious spirit, grew; by often brabblings, to take vpon him as a Pleader, dealing in poore mens causes. Thus by little and little he got into Office; and rose by degrees, being advanced by those, who in hatred of the Nobilitie fauoured his very basenesse. And now hee thought the time was come, for him to give an hard push at the Consulship; by doing that, which none of the great men, fearing or fauouring one another, either durst or would. So he made an hot inucctive, not only against Fabius, but against all the Nobilitie; saying, that it grieued them to see the people doc well, and take vpon them what belonged vnto them, in matter of Gouernement; that they fought to 30 humble the Commons by pourrie, and to impourish them by warre; especially by warre at their owne doores, which would foone confume enery poore mans liuing, and findehim other worke to thinke vpon, than matter of State. Therefore he bade them to be wife: and fince they had found one, (this worthy Master of the horse) that was better affected vnto them and his Countrie, to reward him according to his good deferts; and gine him authoritic, accordingly as was propounded by the Tribune, that so hee might be encouraged and enabled, to proceede as he had begunne. So the Act passed.

Before this busic day of contention, Fabius had dispatched the election of a new Conful, which was M. Atilius Regulus, in the roome of C. Flaminius : and having 40 finished all requisite businesse, went out of Towne, perceiving well, that he should not bee able to withstand the Multitude, in hindering the Decree. The newes of Minutius his aduancement, was at the campe as soone as Fabius: so that his old Lieutenant, and new Colleague, beganne to treat with him as a Companion; afking him at the first, in what fort he thought it best to divide their authoritie: whether that one, one day; and the other, the next; or each of them, successively, for fome longer time, should command in chiefe. Febius briefly told him, That is was the pleasure of the Citizens, to make the Master of the horse equal to the Dictator; but that he should neuer be his superiour: He would therefore divide the Legions with him, by lot, according to the custome. Minutius was not herewith greatly plea-50 fed; for that with halfe of the Armie he could not worke fuch wonders, as otherwise he hoped to accomplish. Neuerthelesse hee meant to doe his best; and so taking his part of the Armie, incamped about a mile and an halfe from the Dictator. Needfull it was (though Livie seeme to taxe him for it) that he should so doe. For where two fenerall Commanders are not subordinate one vnto the other, nor joyned in Commission, but have each entire & absolute charge of his owne followers there are the forces (though belonging with one Prince or State) not one, but two dittined Armies : in which regard, one campe shall not bold them both, without great inconvenience. Polybius neither sinder salt with this disunction; nor yet reports, that Fabius was viwilling to command in chiefe successively (as the two Consilis vsed) with Minutius, by turnes. Hee saith that Minutius was very refractarie; and so proud of his advancement, that continually he opposed the Dictator: who thereupen referred it to his choice, either to divide the forces between ethem, as is said before, or else to have command over all by course. This is likely to be true. For natures impatient of subjection, when once they have broken loose from the rigour of authority, love nothing more, than to control with it as if herein consisted the proofe and affurance of their libertie.

CHAP.2. S.6.

It behoued the Master of the horse, to make good the opinion which had thus aduanced him. Therefore he was no lesse carefull, of getting occasion to fight, than was Fabius of avoiding the necessitie. That which Minutius and Hannibal equally de ired, could not long be wanting. The Countrielying betweene them was open and bare, yet as fit for ambush, as could be wished: for that the sides of a naked valley adjoyning, had many, and spacious caues; able, some one of them, to hide two or three hundred men. In these lurking places, Hannibal bestowed fine hundred horse, and five thousand foot; thrusting them so close together, that they could not 20 be discourred. But left by any misaduenture they should be found out, and buried in their holes, he made offer betimes in the morning, to feize vpon a peece of ground that lay on the other hand: whereby he drew the cies and thoughts of the Romans. from their more needfull care, to businesse little concerning them. Like vnto this was the occasion, which, not long before, had prouoked Minutius, to aduenture vpon the Carthaginians. Hoping therefore to increase his honour, in like fort as hee got it ; he sent first his light armature, then his horse, and at length (seeing that Hannibal seconded his owne troupes with fresh companies) hee followed in person with the Legions. He was soone caught; and so hotly charged on all sides, that he knew neither how to make relistance, nor any safe retrait. In this dangerous case, whilest 30 the Romans defended themselves, loosing many, and those of their best men: Fabius drew neere, in very good order, to relieue them. For this old Captaine, perceining a farre off, into what extremitie his new Colleague had rashly thrown himselfe, and his followers; did the office of a good Citizen; and regarding more the benefit of his Country, than the difgrace which he had wrongfully sustained, sought rather to approve himselse by hasting to doe good, than by suffering his enemie to feele the reward of doing ill. Vpon Fabius his approch, Hannibal retyred: fearing to be well wetted with a showre, from the cloud (as he termed the Dictator) that had hung so long on the Hill-tops. Minutius forth with submitted himselfe to Fabius; by whose benefit hee confessed his life to have beene saued. So from this time forwards, the 40 Warre proceeded coldly, as the Dictator would haue it; both whilest his Office lafled, which was not long, and likewise afterwards, when he delinered up his charge vnto the Confuls, that followed his instructions.

Seruilius the Conful had pursued in vaine a Carthaginian fleet, to which he came neuer within kenning. He ranne along all the coast of Italie; tooke hostlages of the Sardanan and Conficans; passed ouer into Afriek; and there negligently falling to spoile the Countrie, was shamefully beaten aboord his ships, with the loss of a thousand men. Weighing anchor therefore in all haste, her extrumed home by Sietl; and (being for equired by the Dictators letters) repaired to the campe, with his fellow-Consul, where they tooke charge of the Armie.

Q. VII.

The Roman people, defirous to finish the warre quickly, choose a rash and unworshie Consul. Great forces leaved againsh HANNIBAL. HANNIBAL sale heth the Romans proussions in the Cassile of Canna. The new Consults fet forth againsh HANNIBAL.

Ith little pleafure did they of the poorer fort in Rome, heare the great commendations, that were given to Fabius by the principal Citizens. He had indeed preferued them from receiving a greatouet throw but he had neither finished the warre, nor done any thing in apparance thereto tending. Rather it might seeme, that the reputation of this his one worthy act, was likely to countenance the flow proceedings, or perhaps the cowardize (litt were no worfe) of those that followed him, in protracting the work to a great length. Else, what meant the Confuls to sit idle the whole winter, contrarie to all former custome; fince it was neuer heard before, that any Roman Generall had willingly suffered the time of his command to run away without any performances as it is were honorable to doe suft nothing? Thus they sufpected they knew not what; and were readic every man, to discharge the griefe and anger of his own 20 private losse, ypon the ill administration of the publique.

This affection of the people, was very helpful to C. Terentius Varre, in his fuit for the Confullhip. It behoued him to firthe, whilft the Iron was hot; his owne worth being little or none, and his credit ouer-weake, to make way into that high Dignits. But the Cominaltie were then in fuch a moode, as abundantly fupplied all his defects, Wherein to help, he had a kinfman, Bibius Herennius, then Tribune of the People; who spared not to vie the libertie of his place; in saying what he litted, without all regard of truth, or modesite. This bold Orator stuck not to affirme, That Hamibal was drawn into Hale, and suffered therein to range at his pleasure, by the Noblemen, That Minutius indeed with his two Legions, was likely to have been over-

30 throwne, and was referred by Fabius with the other two: but had all been joyned together, what they might have done, it was apparent, by the victoric of Afunitus, when he comanded ouer all as Mafter of the horfe; That without a Plebeian Conful, the watre would neuer be brought to an end; That fuch of the Plebeians, as had long fince been advanced to honour by the people, were grown as proud as the old Nobilitie, and contemned the meaner fort, cuer fince themfelues were freed from contempt of the more mightie; That therefore it was needful to choofe a Conful, who should be altogether a Plebeian, a meere new man, one that could boalt of nothing but the Peoples loue, nor could wish more, than to keep it, by well descruing of them. By such per fluxifions, the Multitude was won, to be wholly for Treitius: to the great vexatio of the Nobles, who could not endure, to see a man raised for none

o the great vexatio of the Nobles, who could not endure, to fee a man raifed for none other vertue, than his detracking from their honor; and therfore opposed him with altheir might. To hinder the defire of the People, it fel out, or at least was alleaged, that neither of the two present Consuls could well be spared, from attending vpon Hannishal, to hold the Election. Wherefore a Dictator was named for that purpose: and he againe deposed; either (as was pretended) for some religious impediment, or because the Fathers desired an Inter-regum, wherein they might better hope to prevaile in choice of the new Consuls. This Inter-regumm tooke name and being in Roma, at the death of Romulus; and was in vse at the death of other Kings. The order of five was this, Althe Fathers, or Senators, who at the first were an hundred, parted

50 themselues into Tens, or Decaries ; and gouerned successively, by the space of five daies, one Decarie after another in order yet so, that the Listors, or Vingers, carrying the Fasses, or bundles of rods and axes, waited only vpon the chiefe of them with these Ensignes of power. This custome was retained, in times of the Consults; and put in vsc, when by death, or any casualtic, there wanted ordinary Magistrates of the old yeare, to substitute new for the yeare following. The advantage of the Fathers berein was, that if the Election were not like to goe as they would have it, there necded no more, than to let slip five daies, & then was all to begin anew: by which interruption, the heat of the Multitude was commonly well affwaged. Vpon such change of those, that were Presidents of the Election; it was also lawfull vnto new Petitioners, to sue for the Magistracies that lay void: which otherwise was not allowed; but a time limited, wherein they should publiquely declare themselues to feeke those Offices. But no denice would serue, against the generall fauour borne vnto Terentius. One Inter-regnum passed ouer; and the malice of the Fathers, against the vertue (as it was believed) of this meane, but worthic man, feemed fo manifest, 10 that when the People had vrged the businesse to dispatch, only Terentius was chofen Conful : in whose hand it was left, to hold the election of his Colleague. Hercvpon all the former Petitioners gaue ouer. For whereas men of ordinary marke had frood for the place before; it was now though meet, that, both to supply the defect, and to bridle the violence of this vnexpert, and hot-headed man, one of great fusiciencie, and reputation, should be joyned with him, as both Companion and opposite. So L. Emilius Paulus, he who few yeares since had ouer-come the Illyrians, and chaced Demetrius Pharius out of his Kingdome, was veged by the Nobility to fland for the place: which he eafily obtained, having no Competitor. It was not the desire of this honourable man, to trouble himselfe any more in such great busi- 20 nesse of the Common-wealth. For not with standing his late good service; He, and M. Liuius that had been his companion in Office, were afterwards injuriously vexed by the People, and called vnto judgement: wherin Liuius was condemned, and Amilius hardly escaped. But of this iniuftice they shall put the Romans well in minde each of them in his fecond Confulthip, wherein they shall honorably approve their worth; the one of them nobly dying, in the most gricuous losse; the other brauely winning in the most happic victorie, that euer befell that Common-wealth.

These new Consuls, Varro and Paulus, omitted no part of their diligence in preparing for the warre: wherein though Varro made the greater noise, by telling what wonders he would worke, and that hee would aske no more, than once to haue a 20 fight of Hannibal, whom he promifed to vanquish the very first day; yet the prouidence and care of Paulus, travailed more earneftly toward the accomplishment of that, wherof his fellow vainely boafted. He wrote vnto the two old Confuls Seruilius and Atelius; desiring them to abstaine from hazard of the maine chance; but neuertheleffe, to ply the Carthaginians with daily skirmish, and weaken them by degrees: that when he and his Colleague should take the field, with the great Armie which they were now leuying, they might find the foure old Legions well accustomed to the Enemie, and the Enemie well weakened to their hands. He was also very strict in his Musters; wherein the whole Senate assisted him so carefully, as if in this Action they meant to refute the flanders, with which Terentius and his Adhe- 40 rents had burdened them. What number of men they raifed it is vncertaine. Fourefcore thousand foot, at the least, and fixe thousand horse, they were firong in the field, when the day came, which Varro had so greatly desired, of looking vpon Han-

Hiero, the old King of Syraun/e, as he had relieued the Carthaginians, when they were diffressed by their owne Mercinaries; so did he now send helpe to Rome, a thousand Archers, and Slingers, with great quantity of Wheat, Barlie, and other prousitions: seating nothing more, than that one of the set wo mighty Citics should destroy the other, whereby his owne estate would fall to ruine; that shood by right, by having them somewhat evenly ballanced. He gave them also counsaile, to send 50 forces into Africa; is (sentaps) by that meanes they might divert the warre from home. His gifts, and good advice were lovingly accepted; and instructions were given to Titus Octavilius the Prator, which was to goe into Sieil, that he should accordingly passed over into Africk, it he found it expedient.

The great Leuies, which the Romans made at this time, doe much more ferue to declare their puillance, than any, though larger accompt by Poll, of fitch as were not eafly drawne into the field, and fitted for feruice. For befides thefe Armies of the Confuls, and that which went into Siell, twentie fine thou fand, with I. Poffhumius Albinus another of the Prætors, went againft the Gaules, to reclaime that Proteince, which the pafläge of Hannibal through it, had taken from them. The contemplation of this their prefent firength, might well embolden them to do as they did. They fent Embafladors to Philip the sone of Demetrius, King of Macedons; requiring him to deliuer into their hands Demetrius Pharius: who having been their to subject, and rebel, was fled into this Kingdom. They also fent to the Hyrians, to demand their tribute; whereof the day of payment was alreadic paft. What answere they received, it is not knowne: only this is known, that Demetrius Pharius was not fent vnto them; and that Philip hencesoorth beganne to have an eye ypon them, little to their good. As for the Hyriam monie, by the flists that they were driven foone after to make, it will appeare, that the one halfe of it (how little foeuer) would have beene welcome to Rome, and accepted, without any cauli about forfeiture for non paiment of the whole.

Whilft the Citie was busied in these cares, the old Consuls lay as necrevinto Hannish, as possibly as they could, without incurring the necessitie of a battaile. Many os skirmishes they had with him; wherein their successive for the most part, was rather good than great. Yet one mischance not only blemished the honour of their other feruices, but was indeed the occasion, to draw on the miscrie following. Hannish for the most part of that time, made his abode at Gepton, where lay all his store for the Winter. The Roman, to be neere him lodged about Cannussiam; and, that they might not be driven to turne aside for all necessaries to the losse of good opportunities, they bestowed much of their prouissons in the Castle of Canna: for the town was razed the yeere before. This place Hannish wanne; and thereby not only furnished himselfe, but compelled his enemies to want many needfull things, valed they would be troubled with farre carriage. Besides this, and more to his advantage, he enabled himselfe to abide in that open Countrie, fit for the service of his horse: longer then the Romans, having so many mouthes to feed, could wel endure to tarrie; without offering battaile; which he most desired. Of this milhap when Seruilius had informed the Senate, letting them understand, how this Peece, taken by Hannibal, would ferue him to command no small part of the Country adjacent; it then seemed needfull, euen unto the Fathers themselves, to adventure a battaile with the Carthaginius, rather than suffer him thus to take roote in the ground of Italie. Neuerthelesse, assume that hee should have patience yet awhile: for that the Counts would shortly be there, with a power sufficience yet awhile: for that the Counts would shortly be there, with a power sufficience yet awhile:

cient to doe as need required.

When all things were readie in the Citie, and the feason of the yere commodious to take the field, the two Consuls, with their armie, set forth against Hamishat. This was alwaies done with great solemnite: especially, when soleme they went forth to warre against any noble or redoubted Enemie. For Sacrifices, and solemne Vowes, were made vnto supter, and the rest of their gods, for good successe and victorie: which being performed; the Generals in warske attrict, with an honorable traine of the principall men, not only such as were of their kindred and alliance, or followed them to the warre, as Voluntaries, for love, but a great number of others that meant to abide at home, were accompanied on their way, & difmissed with triendly leave taking, and good wishes. onely in dealing with the Carthaginians, but (which he thought harder) in bridling the outragious follic of his fellow-Conful. The anfwere of Paulus was, That hee meant not againe to runne into danger of condemnation, by offending the multitude; that he would doe his best for his countrie: but if he saw his best were likely to be ill taken, he would thinke it lesse rashnesse to aduenture upon the Enemies sword, than upon the malice of his owne Citizens.

Diffension betweene the two Roman Consuls. Whether it be likely, that HANNIBAE was upon point of flying out of Italie, when the Roman pressed him to sight. The great battaile of Canna.

Hele new Generals, arriuing at the Camp, difinified M. Atilius one of the last yeares Consuls, requesting it because of his age and weakenes:

Servilius they retained with them, as their Assistant. The first thing that Limilius thought necessaries, to hearten his Souldiers with good words; who out of their bad successes had gathered more cause of feare, than of courage. Hee willed them to consider, not only now. their victories in times past against the Carthaginians, and other more warlike Nations than were the Carthaginians, but even their own great numbers: which were no 20 leffe than all that Rome at the present was able to set forth. Hee told them in what danger their Countrie stood; how the state and safety thereof rested upon their hands; ving some such other common matter of perswasion. But the most effectual part of his Oration was, That Hannibal with this his terrible Army, had not yet obtained one victoric by plaine force and valour: but that only by deceit and ambush he had stolne the honor, which he had gotten at Trebia and Thrasymene. Herewithall he taxed the inconfiderate rathnesse of Sempronius and Flaminius; of whom the one faw not his enemies, vntill he was furrounded by them; the other scarce faw them, when they flruck off his head, by reason of the thick mist, through the darkeneffe whereof he went groping (as it were blinde-fold) into their snares. Finally, de- 30 claring what advantages they had against the Enemie ; and how destitute the Enemie was of those helps, by which he had hitherto prevailed against them; hee exhorted them to play the men, and doc their best. They were easily perswaded : for the contemplation of their owne multitude, and confidence of the Roman vertue in matter of armes, gaue them cause to thinke, that under a Captaine so well experienced, and enery way fufficient, as Amilius was knowne to bee, they should easily prevaile against the Carthaginians: that came farre short of them in all things else, faue craft; which would not alwaies thriue. But in one thing they mistooke the meaning of their Generall. It was his desire that they should have heart to fight; not that they should lose the patience of awaiting a convenient season. But they, 49 having preconceived a victorie, thought all delaies to be impediments: and thereby fought to robbe them felues of their best helpe; which was, good conduct. They remembred what talke they had heard at Rome: and were themselves affected with the Vulgar defire, of ending the warre quickly; wherein fince Amilius had acknowledged, that the advantage was theirs, why did he make them for beare to vse it? Thus thought the common Souldier: and thus also thought the Conful Terentius; who was no leffe popular in the Campe, than he had been in the Citic. Expectation is alwaies tedious; and neuer more, than when the Euent is of most importance. All men longed, both at Rome, and in the Armie, to be freed from the doubtfull passions of Hope and Feare: therfore Terentius, who hastned their desire 50 to effect, was likely to winne more thankes, than should his Colleague, though greater in performance.

Thus while the Romans thinke themselues to have the better of their Enemies, they fall into an inconvenience, than which few are more dangerous; Diffension of their chiefe Commanders. Varro would fight : Amilius would fo too, but faid that it was not yet time; why? because the enemie must shortly dislodge, and remoue hence, into places leffe fit for his horse. But shall the Romans wait, till Hannibal, having caten vp his last yeares provisions, returne into Campania to gather a fecond Harueft? This would (faid Farro) fauour too much of Q. Fabius: And your haste (said Paulus) doth fauour no lesse of C. Flaminius. Their deedes were like their wordes: for they commanded by turnes interchangeably every day. Amilius lodged fixe miles from Hannibal, where the ground was somewhat vneuen. Thither if the Carthaginians would take paines to come; hee doubted not to fend them away 10 in such haste, as they should not leave running till they were out of Italie. But they came not. Terentius therefore the next day descended into the Plaines; his Colleague holding him, and befeeching him to flay. Nevertheleffe he fate downe close by Hannibal: who as an unbidden guest gaue him but a rude wel come and intertainement. The Carthaginian Horle, and light Armature, fel vpon the Roman Vantcourrers; and put the whole Armie in tumult, whileft it was yet in march; but they were beaten off, not without loffe, for that the Romans had among their Velites, fome troupes weightily armed, whereas the Carthaginians had none. The day following, Æmilius, who could not handfomly withdraw the Army out of that level ground; incamped upon the River Aufidus; fending a third part of his forces over the wa-20 ter, to lie vpon the Easterne banke, where they entrenched themselves. Hee neuer was more vn willing to fight, than at this prefent: because the ground served wholly for the aduantage of his enemie; with whom he meant to deale, when occasion should draw him to more equal termes. Therefore he stirred not out of his Trenches, but fortified himselfe; expecting when Hannibal should dislodge, and remoue toward Gergen, Canna, or some other place, where his store lay, for want of necesfaries: whereof an Armie forraging the country, was not likely to carrie about with it sufficient quantitie, for any long time.

Here it would not be passed ouer with silence, That Linie differeth much in his Relation from Polybius: telling many strange tales, of the miserie into which Han-30 nibal had been driven; and of base courses that he devised to take; if the Romans could have retained their patience a little longer. He had (faith Liuie) but ten daies prouision of meat. He had not monie to pay his Souldiers. They were an vnruly Rabble, gathered out of feuerall Nations, fo that he knew not how to keepe them in order; but that from murmuring, they fell to flat exclamations, first, about their Pay, and Prouant, and afterwards for very famine. Especially the Spaniards were readic to forfake him, and runne ouer to the Roman fide. Yea Hannibal himfelfe was once youn the point, to have stolne away into Gaule with all his horse, and left his foot vnto their miserable destinies. At length for lacke of all other counsaile, he refolued to get him as farre as he could from the Romans, into the Southermost parts 40 of Apulia; to the end, that both his vnfaithfull Souldiers might finde the more difficultie in running from him; and that his hunger might be relieved with the more early haruest. But whilest he was about to put this deuice in execution, the Romans pressed him so hard, that they even forced him vnto that, which hee most defired; euen to fight a battaile voon open Champaine ground : wherein hee was victorious; It was not vncommendable in Linie, to speake the best of his owne Citizens; and, where they did ill, to fay, That, without their owne great folly, they had done paffing well. Further also he may be excused; as writing onely by report. For thus hee faith; HANNIBAL de fuga in Galliam [dicitur] agit affe; HANNIBAL [is faid] to have bethought himfelfe of flying into Gaule: where he makes it no more then a matter of heare-fay; as perhaps was all the rest of this Relation. As for the processe it selfe, it is very incredible. For if Hannibal, comming out of Gaule, through the Marishes and Bogs of Heiruria, could finde victuailes enough, and all things needfull vinto his Armie, the Summer forgoing: what should hinder him to doe the like this yeare; especially seeing he had plaid the carefull busband in making a great haruest; since he had long beene Master of the open field; and besides, had gotten, by surprise, no fmall part of the Romans prouisions? Suteable hereunto is all the rest. If Hannibal had taken nothing but corne and cattaile; his Souldiers might perhaps have fallen into mutinic for pay. But he brought gold with him into Italie; and had fo well increased his stock, since he came into that Countrie, that hee had armed his African Souldiers, all Roman-like; and loaden his followers with spoile: having left wherewith to redeeme as many of his owne, as were taken by the Enemie; when the Romans were not willing, as finding it not case to doe the like. In this point therefore, we are to attend the generall agreement of Historians: who give it as a principall commendation vnto Hannibal, That hee alwaies kept his Armie free from fedition, 10 though it were composed of fundrie Nations; no lesse different in Manners, Religion, and almost in Nature, than they were in languages: and well might he so doe, having not only pronounced, That which of his men focuer fought brauely with an Enemic, was thereby a Carthaginian; but folemnely protested and sworne, (befides other rewards) to make as many of them, as should deserve and seeke it, free Citizens of Carthage. The running away into Gaule, was a fenlesse device. Hannibal, being there with his whole Armie, tooke so little pleasure in the Countrie and People, that he made all haste to get him out of it. And what should he now doe there with his horse? or how could hee bee trusted, either there or elsewhere? yea, how could be defire to line; having betrayed all his Army; and relinquished his 20 miserable foot, to the butcheric of their enemies? This tale therfore Plutarch omitteth; who in writing the life of Hannibal, takes in a maner al his directions from Liuie, But of this and the like it is enough to fay, That all Historians love to extoll their owne countrimen; and where a losse cannot be dissembled, nor the honour of the victorie taken from the Enemie, and given vnto blind Fortune, there to lay all the blame on somestrange misgouernment of their own forces: as if they might eafily haue wonne all, but loft all through fuch folly, as no Enemie can hope to find in them another time. w and I

Now let vs returne backe to the two Armies, where they lie emcamped on the River Aufidus. Varrowas perswaded, that it concerned him in honor, to make good 30 his word vnto the people of Rome; and fince he had thus long waited in vaine, to get the confent of Paulus, now at length to vie his owne authority; and, without any more disputing of the matter, to fight when his owneday came. When therefore it was his turne to command; at the first breake of day he beganne to passe the River, without staying to bid his Colleague good morrow. But Paulus came to him; and fought, as in former times, to have diffwaded him, from putting the effate of his Countrie to a needlesse bazard. Against whose wordes and substantial arguments, Terentius could alleage none other, than point of Honour. Hannibal had presented them battaile at their Trenches: should they endure this Brauado? He had sent his Numidians over the River but even the day before, who fel vpon the Romans that 40 were fetching water to the leffer Campe; and draue them shamefully to runne within their defences, which also they made offer to affaile: must this also be suffered? He would not endure it: for it could not but weaken the spirit of the Roman Souldier; which as yet was lively, and full of fuch courage, as promifed affured victorie. When Amilius perceiued, that he could not hinder the obstinate resolution of his Companion; he tooke all care, that what he faw must be done, might be done. well. Ten thousand Roman foot he caused to be left behind, in the greater campe, opposite vnto the Carthaginian; to the intent, that either Hannibal might bee compelled, to leave behind him some answerable number, for defence of his Trenches. (which out of his paucity he was leffe able to spare from the battaile, than were the Romans) or that these ten thousand, falling upon the Carthaginian Campe, when the fight beganne, and taking it with all the wealth therein, might therby (as commonly doe such accidents) terrifie and distract the Enemies in the heate of fight. This done; the two Confuls went ouer the water with their Armie to the leffer Cump, whence whence also they drew forth their men, and ranged them in order of battaile: the ground on the East part of the River, feeming perhaps more fit for marthalling of their Armie. Hannibal was glad of this, as he had great cause, and, without any delay,passed likewise oner, somewhat higher up the streame, which ranne from the South; leaving in his owne campe fo many, as he thought would ferue to defend it. and no more. To encourage his men; He bade them looke about them, and view the ground well, vpon which they were to fight. They did fo. And could you (faid he) pray for any greater fortune, than to joyne battaile with the Romans vpon such a levell ground, where the stronger in horse are sure to prevaile? They all assented to him ; and shewed by their countenances, that they were very glad of it. Well then (faid he further) yeare first of all to thanke the gods, that have brought them hither; and then Vs, that have trained them along, and drawne them into necessitie of playing for their lines, where they are furcto loofe them. As for these Remans, I was faine to encourage you against them, when yee met them first but now yee may euenencourage your felues, by calling to minde that they are the men. whom ye haue as often beaten as seene. Of one thing only I will put you in mindes That whereas hitherto you fought for other respects; as, to drive them before you out of Gaule; and to winne the open Countrie, and fields of Italie; both of which vee haue obtained: now are yee to fight for the Townes themselves, and all the 20 riches within them; which this victorie shall make yours. Therefore play the sour Souldiers: and ere many houres passe, yee shall bee Lords of all that the Romans

When he had faid this; his brother Wage came to him, whom hee had fent to view the countenance of the Enemie. Hannibal asked him, what newes; and what workethey were likely to have with these Romans? Worke enough (answered Man go) for they are an horrible many. As horrible a many as they are (thus Hannibal replied) I tell thee, brother, that among them all, fearch them neuer fo diligently, thou shalt not finde one man, whose name is Mage. With that hee fell a laughing, and so did all that flood about him: which gladded the souldiers, who thought their

30 Generall would not be so merry, without great assurance. Whether it were so, that Hannibal, in the pride of his victories already gotten, valued one Mago about many thousand Romans, or whether he intimated, that the Romans were no leffe troubled with thinking vpon Mago and his Companions, than was Mago with beholding their huge multitude; or whether hee meant only to correct the fad moode of his brother with a jest, and shew himselse merry vnto the Souldiers: this his answere was more manly, than was the relation of his discouerer. But if Hannibal himselfe had beene fent forth by Mage, to view the Romans; he could not have returned with a more gallant report in his mouth, than that which Captaine Gam, before the battaile of Agincourt, made vnto our King Henrie the fift: faying, that of the Frenchmen.

40 there were enow to bee killed; enow to bee taken prisoners; and enow to run away. Euen fuch words as thefe, or such pleasant jests as this of Hannibal, are not without their moment; but serue many times, when battaile is at hand, to worke vpon such passions, as must gouerne more of the businesse: especially, where other needfull care is not wanting; without which they are but vaine boafts.

In this great day, the Carthaginian excelled himselse; expressing no lesse perfe-Aion of his militarie skill, than was greatnesse in his spirit and underrakings. For to omit the commodiousnesse of the place, into which bee had long before conceived the meanes to draw his enemies to battaile; He marshalled his Armie in such conuenient order, that all hands were brought to fight, where every one might doe 50 best service. His Darters, and Slingers of the Baleares, hee sent off before him, to encounter with the Roman Velites. These were loose troupes, answerable in a manner to those, which we call now by a French name Enfans perdues; but when we vsed our owne termes, the forlarne hope. The groffe of his Armie following them, he ordered thus. His Africans, armed after the Roman manner, with the spoiles which they had gotten at Trebia, Thrasymene, or elsewhere; and well trained in the vie of those weapons, that were of more advantage, than those where with they had formerly ferued: made the two wings, very deepe in File. Betweene these hee ranged his Gaules and Spaniards, armed, each after their owne Countrie manner; their thields alike; but the Gaules vling long broad swordes, that were forcible in a downe-right ftroke; the Spaniards, short and well-pointed blades, either to strike or thrust; the Gaules, naked from their nauell vpwards, as confident in their owne fiercenesse: the Spaniards, wearing white cassocks embroidered with purple. This medley of two Nations, differing as well in habit and furniture, as in qualitie, made a gallant shew; and terrible, because strange. The Gaules were strong of body, and surious in giving 10 charge; but soone wearied, as accustomed to spend their violence at the first brunt, which disposition all that come of them have inherited to this day. The Spaniards were leffe eager, but more warie; neither ashamed to give ground, when they were ouer-preffed, nor afraid to returne, and renew the fight, vpon any small encouragement. As the roughnesse of the one, and patience of the other, serued mutually to reduce each of them to a good and firme temper; so the place which they held in this battaile, added confidence joyntly vnto them both. For they faw themselves well and strongly flanked with Carthaginians and other Africans; whose name was growne terrible in Spaine, by their Conquests; and in Gaule, by this their present warre. Since therefore it could not bee feared, that any great calamitie should fall 20 vpon them, whilest the wings on either side stood (ast: these Barbarians had no cause to shrinke, or forbeare to imploy the vemost of their hardines, as knowing that the Enemie could not preffe farre vpon them, without further engaging himfelfe than discretion would allow. Hereunto may be added that great advantage, which the Carthaginian had in horse: by which he was able, if the worst had happened, to make agood retrait. The effect of contraries is many times alike. Desperation begetteth courage; but not greater, nor fo lively, as doth affured Confidence. Hannibal therefore caused these Gaules and Spaniards to advance 3 leaving void the place wherein they had flood, and into which they might fall backe, when they should becouerhardly preffed. So, casting them into the forme of a Crescent, Hee made them as it 30 were his Vantguard: the two points of this great halfe Moone, that looked toward the emptie space from which he had drawne it, being narrow and thinne, as seruing only to guide it orderly backe, when neede should require; the foremost part of the Ring, swelling out toward the enemies, being well strengthned & thickned against all impression. The circle hereof seemeth to have beene so great, that it shadowed the Africans, who flood behinde it: though such figures, cut in brasse, as I have seene of this Battaile, present it more narrow; with little reason, as shall anon appeare : as also in the same figures it is omitted, That any Companies of Africans, or others, were left in the Reare, to second the Gaules and Spaniards, when they were driven to retrait; though it be manifest, that Hannibal in person stood betweene the 40 last rancks of his long battalions, & in the head of his Reare, doubtles well accompanied with the choice of his owne Nation. Betweene the left battalion and the River Aufidus, were the Gaules and Spanish horse, under the command of Asdrubal: On the right wing, toward the wide Plaines, was Hanno (Linie faith Mabarkal) with the Numidian light-horse. Hannibal himselfe, with his brother Mage, had the leading of the Rearc. The whole summe of Hannibals Armie in the field this day, was tenne thousand horse, and fourtie thousand foot; his enemies having two to one against him in foot; and Hee, five to three against them in horse.

The Roman Armic was marfhalled in the vinall-forme: but formwhat more narrow, and deepe, than was accustomed 3 perhaps, because this had beene found con-50 menient against the Caribagonians, in the former warre. It was indeede no bad way of resistance against Elephants, to make the Ranks shirk and short, but the Files long; as also to strengthen well the Reare, that it might stand fast compacted as a wall, under shelter whereof the disordered troupes might read liet themselues. Thus much it seemes, that Terentins had learned of some old Souldiers; and therefore he now ordered his Battailes accordingly, as meaning to shew more skill, than was in his understanding. But the Carthaginians had here no Elephants with them in the field: their aduantage was in Horfe; against which, this manner of embattailing was very unprofitable, for a fmuch as their charge is better fultained in front, than upon a long flanke. As for Amilius; it was not his day of command: He was but an Affiltant; and in such cases it happens often, that wise men yeeld for very wearinesse vnto the more contentious. Vpon the right hand, and toward the River, were the Roman horse-men, under the Conful Paulus: On the left wing, was C. Terentius Varro the 10 other Conful, with the rest of the horse, which were of the Latines, and other Associates: Cn. Sernilius the former yeeres Conful, had the leading of the battaile. The Sunne was newly rifen, and offended neither part; the Garthaginians having their faces Northward; the Romans toward the South.

After fomelight skirmish, betweene the Roman Velites and Hannibal his Darters and flingers of the Baleares: Afarubal brake upon the Conful Paulus, and was roughly encountred; not after the manner of service on horse-backe, vsed in those times, wheeling about Alman-like; but each giving on in a right line, Pouldron to Pouldron, as having the River on the one hand, and the shoulder of the foot on the other hand; so that there was no way left, but to pierce and breake thorow. Wher-20 fore they not only vsed their Lances and Swordes; but rushing violently amongst the Enemies, grasped one another: and so, their horses running from voder them, fell many to the ground; where starting vp againe, they beganne to deale blowes like foot-men. In conclusion, the Roman horse were ouer-borne, and driven by plaine force to a staggering recoile. This the Conful Paulus could not remedy. For Afdrabal, with his boifterous Gaules and Spaniards, was not to bee refifted by these Roman Gentlemen, vnequall both in number, and in horsemanship. When the battailes came to joyning, the Roman Legionaries found worke enough, and somewhan more than enough, to breake that great Crescent, vpon which they first fell: so strongly, for the while, did the Gaules and Spanish foot make relistance. Wherefore 30 the two points of their battaile drew towards the midft; by whose aide, these Oppolites were forced to disband, and flie backe to their first place. This they did in great hafte and feare: and were with no leffe hafte, and follie purfued. Vponthe Africans, that flood behindethem, they needed not to fall foule; both for that there was void roome enough; and for almuch as the Reare, or Hornes of this Moone; pointed into the fafe retrait, where Hannibal with his Carthaginians was ready to reenforce them, when time should require. In this hasty retrait, or flight, of the Gaules and Spaniards; it hapned, as was necessarie, that they who had flood in the limbe or vtter compasse of the halfe Moone, made the innermost or concaue surface thereof (difordered and broken though it were) when it was forced to turne the infide out-40 ward: the hornes or points thereof, as yet, vntouched, only turning round, and recoiling very little. So the Romans, in pursuing them, were inclosed in an halfe-circle; which they should not have needed greatly to regard; (for that the sides of it were exceeding thinne & broken; and the bottome of it, none other than a throng of men rowted, and seeming vnable to make resistance) had all the enemies foot bin cast into this one great body, that was in a manner dissoluted. But whilest the Legions, following their supposed victorie, rushed on vpon those that stood before them, and thereby vnwittingly engaged themselues deepely within the principall strength of the Enemies, hedging them in on both hands; the two African Battalions on either side advanced so farre, that getting beyond the R care of them, they 50 inclosed them, in a manner, behinde : and forward they could not passe farre; without remouing Hannibal and Mago; which made that way the least case. Hereby in is apparent, That the great Crescent, before spoken of, was of such extent, as coue-red the Africans; who lay behinde it undifferened, untill now. For it is agreed, that plut in vit. the Romans were thus empaled onawares; and that they behaved themselves, as Hannib:

men that thought vpon no other worke, than what was found them by the Gaules. Neither is it credible, that they would have beene so mad, as to runne head-long, with the whole bulke of their Armie, into the throat of flaughter; had they seene those weapons bent against them at the first, which when they did see, they had little hope to cscape. Much might be imputed to their heat of fight, and railhnesse of inferiour Captaines: but fince the Conful Paulus, a man fo expert in warre, being vanquished in horse, had put himselfe among the Legions; it cannot bee supposed, that hee and they did wilfully thus engage themselves. Astrubal, bauing broken the troupes of Roman horse, that were led by the Consul Paulus, followed upon them along the River fide, beating downe and killing, as many as he could, (which 10 were almost all of them) without regard of taking prisoners. The Consul himselfe was either driven vpon his owne Legions, or willingly did cast himselse among them; as hoping by them to make good the day, notwithstanding the defeat of his horse But he failed of this his expectation. Neuerthelesse hee cheared up his men as well as hee could, both with comfortable wordes, and with the example of his owne front behaviour: beating downe, and killing many of the enemies with his owne hand. The like did Hannibal among his Carthaginians, in the same part of the battaile; and with better successe. For the Consul received a blow from a sling, that did him great hurt : and though a troupe of Roman Gentlemen, riding about him, did their best to saue him from further harme; yet was he so hardly laid at, that he 20 was compelled, by wounds and weakenesse, to forsake his horse. Hereupon all his company alighted, thinking that the Conful had given order to doe: as in many battailes, the Roman men at armes had left their horses, to helpe their foot in diffres. When Hannibal (for he was neere at hand) perceived this, and underflood that the Conful had willed his horse-men to dismount. He was very glad of it, and pleasant. ly faid, I hadrather he would have delivered them unto me, bound hand and foot: meaning, that he had them now almost as safe, as if they were so bound. All this while C. Terentius Varro, with the horse of the Associates, in the left wing, was maruailously troubled by Hanno (or Maharbal) and the Numidians: who beating up and downe about that great fandy Plaine, raifed a foule dust; which a strong Southwinde, 30 blowing there accustomarily, draue into the eyes & mouthes of the Romans. These, ving their aduantage both of number and of lightnesse, wearied the Consul and his followers exceedingly: neither giving, nor fuftaining any charge, but continually making offers, and wheeling about. Yet at the first they seemed to promise him an happy day of it. For when the battailes were even ready to joyne; fine hundred of these Numidians came pricking away from their fellowes, with their shields cast behinde their backes, (as was the manner of those which yeelded) and, throwing downe their armes, rendred themselues. This was good lucke to beginne withall, if there had beene good meaning. Varro had not leafure to examine them; but caufed them, vnwcaponed as they were, to get them behind the Armie, where he bade 40 them rest quietly till all was done. These crasty adventures did as hee bade them, for a while; till they found opportunitie to put in execution the purpose, for which they had thus yeelded. Under their lackets they had short swords and ponyards; belides which, they found other scattered weapons about the field of such as were flaine, and therewithall flew upon the hindmost of the Romans, whilestall eyes and thoughts were bent another way: so that they did great mischiese, and raised yet a greater terrour. Thus Hannibal, in a plaine levell ground, found meanes to lay an ambulh at the back of his enemies. The last blow, that ended all fight & refistance, was given by the same hand which gave the first. Adrubal, having in short space broken the Roman troupes of horse, and cut in peeces all, saue the Companie of 4- 50 milius that rushed into the grosse of his foot, and a very few besides, that recovered fome narrow passage, betweene the Riuer and their owne Battalions; did not stay to charge vpon the face of the Legions, but fell back behind the Reare of his owne, and fetching about, came up to the Numidians: with whom hee joyned and gave

voon Terentius. This fearefull cloude, asit shewed at the first appearance what weather it had left behinde it, on the other fide: fo did it prognosticate a difmall florme vnto those, vpon whom it was ready now to fall. Wherefore Terentius his followers, having wearied themselves much in doing little, and seeing more worke toward, than they could hope to sustaine; thought it the best way, to avoide the danger by present flight. The Consul was no lesse wife than they, in apprehending the greatnesse of his owne perill; nor more desperate, in striuing to worke impossibilities: it being impossible, when so many shranke from him, to sustaine the impreffion alone, which he could not have endured with their affiliance. Now hee 10 found, that it was one thing to talke of Hannibal at Rome; and another, to incounter him. But of this; or of ought elfe, excepting halfy flight, his prefent leifure would not serue him to consider. Close at the heeles of him and his flying troupes, followed the light Numidians: appointed by Afarubal vnto the pursuit, as fittelt for that feruice. Afdrubal himfelfe, with the Gaules and Spanish horse, compassing about fell vpon the backes of the Romans; that were ere this hardly diffrested, and in a manner furrounded on all parts elfe. He brake them casily; who before made ill refistance, being inclosed, & laid at on every side, not knowing which way to turne. Here beganne a pittifull flaughter: the vanquilhed multitude thronging vp and downe, they knew not whither or which way, whilest every one fought to avoide 20 those enemies, whom hee saw neerest. Some of the Roman Gentlemen that were about £milius, got vp to horse, and saued themselves: which though it is hardly vnderstood how they could doe; yet I will rather beleeue it, than suppose that Linie lo reporteth, to grace therby his Historie with this following tale. CN. CORNELIVS LENTULVS, galloping along by a place, where he faw the Conful litting all bloudied upon a stone, entreated him to rise and saue himselfe; offering him his assistance and horse. But PAVLVsrefused it ; willing LENTVL Vs to Shift for himselfe, and not to loose time: saying, That it was not his purpose to be brought againe into indgement by the People, either as an accuser of his Colleague, or as guiltie himselfe of that dayes losse. Further hee willed LENTVLVS to commend him to the Senate, and in particular to FABIVS: willing 30 them to fortific Rome, as fast and well as they could; and telling FABIVS, that Hee lived and died mindfull of his wholefome counfaile. These words (peraduenture) or some to like purpole, the Conful vttered to Lentulus, either when against his will bee was drawne to that Battaile, or when hee beheld the first deseat of his Horse; at what time he put himselfe in the head of his Legions. For I doubt not, but Hannibal knew what he faid a good while before this; when he thought the Conful and his troupe, in little better case than if they had beene bound. The whole Grosse of the Romans, was inclosed indeede as within a lacke; whereof the African Battalions made the fides; the Spaniards, Gaules, and Hannibal with his Carthaginians, the bottome; and Afdrubal with his horfe, closed up the mouth in which part, they first 40 of all were shuffled together, and beganne the Rout, wherein all the rest followed. Amilius therefore, who could not lit his horse, whilest the battaile yet lasted; and whilest the spaces were somewhat open, by which hee might have withdrawne himselfe; was now (had hee neuer so well beene mounted) vnable to flie, having in his way to close a throng of his owne miterable followers, and to many heapes of bodies, as fell apace in that great Carnage. It fufficeth vnto his henour, That in the Battaile hee fought no leffe valiantly, than hee had warily before, both abhained himselse, and disswaded his sellow-Consul, from fighting at all. If, when the day was vtterly loft, it had laine in his power to faue his owne life, vnto the good of his Countrie, neuer more needing it; I should thinke, that he either too much disestee. 50 med himselse; or being too faintly minded, was wearie of the World, and his vnthankefull Citizens. But iffuch a refolution were praife-worthy in Amilius, as proceeding out of Roman valour; then was the English vertue of the Lord Iohn Talbot Vicount Lifle, sonne to that famous Earle of Shrewesburie, who died in the Battaile of Chastillon, more highly to be honoured. For Emilius was old, grieuously, if not mortally, wounded, and accomptable for the overthrow received: Talbet was in the flowre of his youth, vnhurt, eafily able to haucescaped, and not answerable for that dayes misfortune, when he refuled to for lake his father; who for eleeing the loffe of the battaile, and not meaning to flame his actions past by flying in his old age, exhorted this his noble sonne to be gone, and leave him.

In this terrible ouerthrow died all the Roman foot, faue two or three thousand, who (as Liuie faith) escaped into the leffer campe; whence, the same night, about fixe hundred of them brake forth, and joyning with such of those in the greater campe, as were willing to trie their fortune, conueyed themselues away ere morning, about foure thousand foot, and two hundred horse, partly in whole troups, 10 partly dispersed, into Cannusum: the next day, the Roman Camps, both lesse and greater, were yeelded vnto Hannibal by those that remained in them. Polybius hath no mention of this escape: only he reports, that the ten thousand, whom Amilius had left on the West side of Aufidus (as was shewed before) to set vpon the campe of Hannibal, did as they were appointed; but ere they could effect their defire, which they had well-neere done, the battaile was loft: and Hannibal, comming ouer the water to them, draue them into their owne campe; which they quickly yeelded, having loft two thousand of their number. Like enough it is, that at the first fight of Hannibal, comming upon them with his victorious Armie, a great number of thefe did flie; and thereby escaped, whilest their fellowes, making defence in vaine, 20 retired into their campe, and held the Enemie busied. For about two Legions they were (perhaps not halfe full, but made up by addition of others, whose fault or fortune was like) that having ferued at Canna, were afterwards extremely difgraced by the State of Rome, for that they had abandoned their Companions fighting. Of the Roman horse what numbers escaped, it is vncertaine but very few they were that faued themselves in the first charge, by getting behinde the River; and Terentius the Conful recouered Venusia, with threescore and ten at the most in his companic. That he was so ill attended, it is no maruaile : for Venusia lay many miles off to the Southward; fo that his necreft way thither, had beene through the midft of Hannibals Armie, if the passage had beene open. Therefore it must needes be, that 30 when once he got out of fight, he turned vp fome by-way; fo disappointing the Numidians that hunted contre. Of fuch as could not hold pace with the Conful, but tooke other waies, and were scattered ouer the fields; two thousand, or therabouts, were gathered up by the Namidians, & made prisoners: the rest were slaine, all saue three hundred; who dispersed themselves in slight, as chance led them, and got into fundry Townes. There died in this great Battaile of Canna, besides L. Amilius Paulus the Conful; two of the Roman Quastors or Treasurers, and one and twentie Colonells or Tribunes of the Souldiers, fourfcore Senators, or fuch as had borne Office, out of which they were to be chosen into the Senate. Many of these were of especiall marke, as having beene Adiles, Pretors, or Confuls: among whom was Cn. 40 Servilius the last yeeres Conful, and Minutius, late Master of the horse. The number of prisoners, taken in this battaile, Liuie makes no greater than three thousand foot and three hundred horse : too few to have defended, for the space of one halfe houre, both the Roman camps; which yet the same Linie saith, to have beene overcowardly yeelded vp. We may therefore doe better, to give credit vnto one of the prisoners, whom the same Historian shortly after introduceth speaking in the Scnate, and faying, That they were no leffethan eight thousand. It may therefore be, that thefe three thousand were only such as the Enemie spared, when the furie of Execution was past: but to these must be added about five thousand more, who yeelded in the greater campe, when their companie were either slaine or fled. So 50 the reckoning falls out right: which the Romans, especially the Conful Varro, had before cast vp (as we say) without their Host; nothing so chargeable, as now they finde it. On the fide of Hannibal there died some foure thousand Gaules, fifteene hundred Spaniards and Africans, and two hundred horse, or thereabouts: a losse not fenfible, in the joy of fo great a victorie; which if he had purfued, as Maharbal aduifed him, and forthwith marched away towards Rome; it is little doubted, but that the Warre had prefently beene at an end. But he beleeued not so farre in his owne prosperitie; and was therefore told, That he knew how to get, not how to view, a victorie.

δ IX.

Of things following the battaile at Canna.

CHAP.2. S.9.

Otwithoutgood cause doth Polybius reprehend those two Historians, Fabius the Roman, and Philinus the Carthaginian: who regarding more the pleasure of them, vnto whose honour they consecrated their transiles, than the truth of things, & information of posterities magnified indifferently, whether good or bad, all actions and proceedings, the one of his Carthaginians, the other of his Roman Quirites and Fathers confeript. No man of found judgement will condemne this libertie of censure, which Polybius hath vsed. For, to recompence his junioritie, (such as it was) he produceth 20 Substantiall arguments, to instific his owne Relation; and confuteth the vanitie of those former Authors, out of their owne writings, by conference of places ill cohering: which paines it is to be suspected, that he would not have taken, had hee beene borne in either of these two Cities, but have spared some part of his diligence, and beene contented, to have all men thinke better and more honourably than it descrued, of his owne Countrie. The like disease it is to be seared, that wee shall hereafter finde in others; and shall have cause to wish, that either they were fomewhat leffe Roman, or elfe, that fome Works of their opposite Writers were extant, that fo we might at least heare both sides speake being henceforth destitute of Polybin his helpe, that was a man indifferent. But fince this cannot be we must be 30 fometimes bold, to observe the coherence of things; and believe so much only to be true, as dependeth vpon good reason, or (at least) faire probability. This attentiue circumspection is needfull euen at the present: such is the repugnancie, or forgetfulnesse, which we find in the best Narration, of things following the Battaile of Canna. For it is faid, that foure thousand foot and horse gathered together about the Conful Terentius at Venusia; that others, to the number of ten thousand got into Cannusium, choosing for their Captaines, yong P. Scipie, and ap. Claudius; yet that the Conful Terentius Varro, joyning his companie vnto those of Scipio at Cannusium, wrote vnto the Senate, that he had now well-neere ten thousand men about him; that these letters of the Conful were brought to Rome, when the Senate was newly 40 rifen, that had bene taking order for pacifying those tumults in the Citie, which grew vpon the first bruit of the ouerthrow; and yet, that Embassadours from Capua (after some consultation, whether it were meet to send any, or, without further circumflance, to fide with Hannibal) were fent vnto Terentius, and found him at Venusia, a pretie while before he wrote those letters, which ouer-tooke (in a maner) at Rome the first newes of the ouerthrow. Among such incoherences, I hold it the best way, to omit so much as hath not some particular connexion with matter enfuing: mutuall dependencie in things of this nature, being no small argument of

When Hannibal had facked the Roman campe, and truffed up the spoiles, forth-50 with hediflodged, and marched away into Samnium; finding a disposition in the Hirpines, and many other people thereabout, to for fake the Roman partie, and make alliance with Carthage. The first Towns that opened the gates vnto him, was Colla, where he laid up his baggage: and leaving his brother Mago to take in other places, He hasted into Campania. The generall affection of the Multitude, in all the Cities Qqqqq of Italie, was inclinable vnto him; not only in regard of their grieuous losses, fustained abroad in the fields, which the Romans themselves, who could not hinder him from spoyling the Countrie, especially the poorer fort of them, did hardly endure: but in a louing respect vnto that great courtesie (as it seemed) which he vsed, vnto fuch of them as became his priloners. For as at other times, so now also after his great victorie at Canna, He had louingly dismissed as many of the Italian Confederates of Rome, as fell into his hands : rebuking them gently for being fo obstinate, against him that had sought to deliner them from bondage. Neither spared hee to winne their loue with gifts; pretending, to admire their valour; but feeking indeede, by all waies and meanes, to make them his, whileft all other motiues were 10 concurrent. At this time also hee beganne to deale kindly (though against his nature) with his Roman prisoners: telling them, that he bore no mortall hatred vnto their Estate; but being prouoked by injuries, sought to right himselfe and his countric; and fought with them, to trie which of the two Cities, Rome or Carthage. should beare sourraigne Rule, not, which of them should be destroyed. So he gave them leave to choose ten of their number, that should be sent home to treat with the Fathers about their ransome: and together with these, he sent Carthalo a Nobleman of Carthage, and Generall of his Horse, to feele the disposition of the Senate; whether it were bowed as yet by fo much aduersitie, and could stoope vnto desire of peace. But with the Romans these artes prevailed not, as shall be shewed in due 20 place. The people of Italie, all or most of them, saue the Roman Colonies, or the Latines, were not only weary of their loffes past, but entertained a deceinable hope. of changing their old Societie for a better. Wherefore not onely the Samnites, Lucans, Brutians, and Apulians, ancient enemies of Rome, and not vntill the former generation vtterly subdued, beganne to re-assume their wonted spirits: but the Campans, a Nation of all other in Italie most bound vnto the state of Rome, and by many mutuall affinities therewith as streightly conjoyned, as were any faue the Latines. changed on a sudden their loue into hatred; without any other cause found, than change of fortune.

Campania, is the most goodly and fruitfull Province of Italie, if not (as somethen 30 thought) of all the Earth: and the Citic of Capua, answerable vnto the Countrie, whercof it was Head, so great, faire, and wealthie, that it seemed no lesse convenient a feat of the Empire, than was either Rome or Carthage. But of all qualities, brauerie is the least requisite vnto soueraigne command. The Campans were luxurious, idle, and proud : and valuing themselves like layes by their feathers, despised the vnfortunate vertue of the Romans their Patrons and Benefactors. Yet were there some of the principal among them, as in other Cities, that bore especial regard vnto the majestic of Rome, and could not endure to heare of Innovation. But the Plebeian faction had lately so prevailed within Capua, that all was governed by the pleasure of the Multitude; which wholly followed the direction of Pacuvius Calautus an 40 ambitious Noble-man, whose credit grew, and was vp-held by furthering al popular defires: whereof, the conjunction with Hannibal was not the leaft. Some of the Capuans had offred their Citie to the Carthaginian, shortly after the battaile of Thra-Symene; whereupon chiefly it was, that Hannibal made his journie into Campania; the Dictator Fabius waiting upon him. At that time, either the nerenes of the Roman Armie, or some other scare of the Capuans, hindred them from breaking into actual rebellion. They had indeed no leifure to treat about any article of new Confederacie : or had leifure ferued, yet were the Multitude (whose inconstant loue Hannibal had wonne from the Romans, by gentle vsage, and free dismissing, of some prisoners in good account among them) vnable to hold any fuch negotiation, without advice 50 of the Senate; which mainely impugned it. So they that had promifed to yeeld yo their town to Hannibal, & to meet him on the way, with some of their nobility, that should affure him of all faithfull meaning; were driven to fit still, in a great perplexitie :as having failed to let in this their new friend, yet fufficiently discouered them-

felucs, to draw upon them the hatred of the Romans. In this case were no small number of the Citizens: who thereupon grew the more incenfed against their Senate; on whom they cast all the blame, castly pardoning their owne cowardize. The People holding so tender a regard of libertie, that even the lawfull Governement of Magistrates grieued them, with an imaginarie oppression; had now good cause to seare lest the Senators would become their Lords indeed, and by helpe of the Romans, bring them vnder a more streight subjection, than ever they had endured. This feare, being readie to breake into some outrage, Pacavius made vse of, to ferue his owne ambition. He discoursed vnto the Senate, as they sate in Councell, 10 about these motions troubling the Citie: and said, That he himselfe had both married a Roman Ladie, and given his Daughter in marriage to a Roman: but, that the danger of for faking the Roman partie was not now the greatest: for that the People were violently bent euen to murder all the Senate, and afterward to joyne themfelues with Hannibal; who should countenance the fact, and saue them harmelesses This he spake, as a man well known to be beloued himselfe by the People, and priuie vnto their defignes. Hauing throughly terrified the Senate, by laying open the danger hanging ouer them: He promised neuerthelesse to deliver them all, and to fer things in quiet, if they would freely put themselves into his hands; offering his oath, or any other affurance that they should demand, for his faithfull meaning. 20 They all agreed. Then shutting vp the Court, and placing a Guard of his owne followers about it, that none might enter, nor issue forth, without his leave; Hee called the People to affembly: and speaking as much ill of the Senate, as he knewe they would be glad to heare, he told them, that these wicked Gouernours were furprifed by his policie, and all fast, readie to abide what sentence they would lay vpon them. Only thus much he aduited them, as a thing which necessitie required, That they should choose a new Senate, before they satisfied their anger vpon the old. So rehearling vnto them the names of one or two Senators, hee asked what their judgement was of those. All cried out, that they were worthy of death. Choose then (said he) first of all some new ones into their places. Hereat the Mul-20 titude, vnprouided for such an election, was filent; vntill at last, some one or other adventured to name whom he thought fit. The men so nominated, were veterly difliked by the whole Affembly; either for some knowne fault, basenesse, and infufficiencie; or else euen because they were vnknowne, and therefore helde vnworthie. This difficultie in the new Election appearing more and more, whilest more were to be chosen; (the fittest men to be substituted, having beene named among the first, and not thought fit enough) Pacuroing entreated, and casily prevailed with the people, that the present Senate might for this time be spared, in hope of amends hereafter; which (doubtleffe) they would make, having thus obtained pardon of all offences past. Henceforth, not only the People, as in former times, honoured AQ Paravius, and effeemed him their Patron; but the Senators also were gouerned by him, to whom they acknowledged themselues indebted, for sauing all their lines, Neither did the Senate faile after this, by all obsequiousnesse, to court the People; giuing the reines vnto their lawlesse Wil, who else were likely to cast them downe: All the Citie being thus of one minde; onely feare of the Romans kept them from opening their gates to Hannibal. But after the Battaile at Canne, this impediment was removed: and few there were, that would open their mouthes to speake against the Rebellion. Yet forasmuch as three hundred principal Gentlemen of the Campans, did then serve the Romans in the Isle of Sicil: the Parents and Kinsmen of these prevailed so farre, that Embassadors were sent vnto Terentius the Consul; to see 50 his present case, and what it could minister of Hope or Feare. These, wheresoeuer they found him, found him weakely attended, and as weake in spirit, as in followers. Yet they offered him formally the service of their State; and desired to know what he would command them. But he most basely lamented vnto them the greatnesse of the Roman misfortune: faying, that all was loft; and that the Campans must now, not helpe the Romans, who had nothing left wherewith to helpe themselves, but, make warre in their defence against the Carthaginians; as the Romans had sometimes done for the Campans against the Samnites. Hereunto hee is said to have added a foolish Inucctive, against Hannibal & his Carthagintans : telling, How he had taught them to make bridges of flaughtered carkales, and to feede voon mans flein; with fuch other stuffe, as onely bewraied his owne feare. As for the Campans themselves, He put them in minde of their present strength: they having thirty thousand foot, and foure thousand horse; with monic, and all provisions, in aboundance. Thus he dismissed them, prouder then they came, and filled them with conceit of getting a great Lordship; whereas before, they were somewhat timorous, in adventuring 10 to seeke their owne libertie. Hauing reported this at Capua: the same Embassadors were dispatched away to Hannibal, with whom they easily made Alliance, upon these conditions; That the Campans should be absolutely free, and ruled by their owne Lawes: That no Citizen of theirs should be subject vnto any Carthaginian Magistrate, in what case soeuer, whether in Warre or Peace; and, That Hannibal should deliuer vnto the Campans three hundred Roman prisoners, such as they themfelues would choose, whom they might exchange for their Gentlemen which were in Sieil.

Against all this Negotiation, Decim Magim an honourable Citizen opposed himfelse carnelily: vsing, in vaine, many perfussions, to the wilfull and head-strong 20 Multitude; whom he put in minde of Pyrsbus and the Tarentines, wishing them not to change old friends for new acquaintance. This did he, when they were sending Embassiadorsto Hannibal: and this allo did he, when the new Alliance was concluded; but most earnessly, when a Carthaginian Garrison was entring the Towne: at which time he gaue aduice, either to keepe it out, or to fall vpon it and to cut it in pieces, that, by such a norable piece of service, they might make amends vnto the Remans, whom they had for saken.

Aduertisement hereof was given to Hannibal: who lying about Naples not farre off, fent for Magius to come speake with him in the campe. This Magius refused: alleaging, that he was, by the late concluded Articles, free from subjection vnto any 30 Carthaginian; and therefore would not come. Hannibal thereupon hasted himselfe towards Capua: for bearing to attempt any further upon Naples; which he thought to haue taken in his way by Scalado, but found the walls too high, and was not well prouided, to lay fiege vnto it. At Capua hee was entertained with great folemnitie and pompe : all the people iffuing forth of the Towne, to behold that great Commander, which had wonne fo many noble victories. Hauing taken his pleafure in the light of that goodly Citie, and passed ouer his first Entertainements: He came into their Senate: where he commended their resolution, in shaking off the Roman yoke; promising, that ere long all Italie, and Rome it selfe, should bee driven to acknowledge Capua as chiefe, and receive Law from thence. As for Decius Magius, who 40 openly tooke part with the Romans their enemies; Hee prayed them, that they would not thinke him a Campan, but a Traitor to the State and vie him accordingly, giving sentence out of hand vpon him, as he deserved. This was granted: and Magius deliucred unto Hannibal; who vnwilling to offend the Capuans, at his first comming, by putting so great a man to death, yet fearing that they might sue for his libertie, if he kept him alive, thought it best to send him away to Carthage. Thus Hannibal fettled his friendship with the Campans: among whom, only this Decius Magius had openly dared to speake against him; being affisted by Perolla the sonne of Pacuvius. This Perolls would have murdered Hannibal, whilest hee was at Supper, the first night of his comming; had not his Fathers authoritie kept him 50 from making any fuch attempt. All the Towne (besides) were so carnest in the loue of their new Societie, that they are faid to have murdered all the Romans, vpon whom at the present they could lay hand; or, (which is all one) to have smothered them to death in an hot Bath.

The fame course of fortune, with those of Capus, ranne some other Townes thereabouts, which depended on this, as their Mother-Citic. No.la, Nuceria, Naples, Cassiline, and Acerra, were the Citics next adioyning, that stood out for the Romans. Against these Hannibal went, thinking to finde them weakely manned, as they were indeed, though stoutly defended.

CHAP. 2. S.9.

The Romans at this time were not in case, to put Garrisons into all their walled Townes; but were faine to leaueall places, except a few of the most suspected, vnto the faith and courage of the Inhabitants. Rome it selfe was in extreme feare of Hannibals comming, at the first report of the ouerthrow at Canne: and the gricle of that 10 loffe was fo generall, and immoderate, that it much diffurbed the provision against apparent danger. It was hard to judge, whether the loffe alreadie received, or the feare of destruction presently threatning, were the more terrible. All the Senators found worke enough, to ftint the noise and lamentable bewailings, whereof the ftreets were full. Courriers were fent forth, to bring affured tidings how all went: whereof when letters from the Conful Varro had throughly informed them, they were fo amazed, that they ranne into barbarous superstition; and taking direction (as was faid) from their fatall bookes, buried aline two men and women Gaules and Greekes, in their Oxe-market. If the bookes of Sibyl gaue them fuch instructions; we may justly thinke, that Sibyl herselfe was instructed by the Deuill. Yet is it not 20 improbable, that extremity of feare caused them to harken to wicked Soothfavers; whose detestable counsailes they afterwards, for their owne honour, (as ashamed of such Authors) imputed to the bookes of Sibyl. An Embassadour was fent to Delphi, to confult the Oracle of Apollo; and enquire with what prayers and fupplications they might pacifie the gods, and obtaine an ende of these calamities. This is enough to discouer the greatnesse of their feare; though not seruing to give remedie. At the same time came letters out of Sicil, from the Prætor Octacilius; whom the Senate had appointed, if he found it meet, to passe oner into Africk. In these were contained newes, of one Carthaginian fleet, that wasted the Kingdome of Hieron their good friend and confederate; and of another fleet, riding among the 30 Iles Ægateis, which was in readinesse to set vpon Lilybaum, and the rest of the Roman Province, if the Prætor stirred aside to the rescue of Hieron.

In the middest of these extremities, it was thought needful to call home Terentius the Conful, that he might name a Dictator, to take soueraigne charge of the Weale publique, with absolute power, as necessitic required. It must needes seeme strange, that all forts of people went forth to meet the Conful, & bid him welcome home, gining him thankes for that he had not despaired of the Weale publique. But this was done (as may feeme) by order from the Senate : which therein (doubtleffe) prouided wifely, for vpholding the generall reputation. If his comming into the Citie, had renewed the lamentations and out-cries of the people : what elfe would have 40 followed, than a contempt of their wretchednesse, among those that were subject vnto their Dominion? Now in finding this occasion (though indeed he gaue it not) of bestowing vpon him their welcome, and thankes; they noysed abroad a fame, which came perhaps vnto the eares of Hannibal, of their Magnanimitie and Confidence: that might feeme grounded on their remayning strength. This therefore was wifely done: But whereas Liuie would have vs thinke, that it was done generoufly, and out of great spirit; let me be pardoned, if I beleeve him not. It was done fearefully, and to couer their griefe: had they dared to shew their indignation, they would have struck off his head; as in few yeres after, Cn. Fuluius had his life brought Liuslas. into question, and was banished by them, being lesse blame-worthy, for a smaller offence. M. Junius, by appointment of the Senate, was nominated Dictator; and T. Sempronius, Master of the horse. These fell presently to mustering of Souldiers, of whom they raifed foure new Legions, and a thousand horse : though with much Linds difficultie; as being faine to take vp some, that were very Boies. These foure Legions, are elsewhere for gotten, in accompt of the forces leuied by this Dictator; and two Legions only fet downe, that had beene enrolled in the beginning of the yeere for cultodie of the Citie. Wherfore it may be, that these two Legions being drawne into the field; foure new ones of Pratextati, or Stripplings, were left in their places. In fuch raw Souldiers, and so few, little confidence was to bee reposed; for which reason they increased their number, by adding visto them eight thousand sturdie flaues, that were put in hope of libertie, if they should descrue it by manfull service. This not sufficing; The Dictator proclaimed, that who locuer ought money and could not pay it, or had committed any capitall offence, should forthwith bee discharged of his debt, or punishment, if he would serue in the Warre. To arme these Companies, they were faine to take downe, out of their Temples and Porches, the 10 spoiles of their enemies that had beene there let up : among which, were fixe thoufand Armours of the Gaules, that had beene carried in the Triumph of C. Flaminius. a little before the beginning of this Warre. To such mockerie had God brought the pride of the Romans, as a due reward of their infolent oppressions, that they were faine to iffue forth of their own gates, in the habit of firangers, when Hannibal was readie to encounter them with his Africans, armed Roman-like.

About the same time it was, that Carthalo, with the Agents of the prisoners taken at Canne, came to Rome. Carthalo was not admitted into the Citie, but commanded. whilest he was on the way, to be gone ere night out of the Roman Territoric. To the meffengers of the captines, audience was given by the Senate. They made ear- 20 nest Petition, to be ransomed at the publike charge; not only the teares and lamentation of their poore kins folke, but the great neede, wherein the Citie then flood, of able Souldiers, commending their fute; which yet they obtained not. Befides the generall custome of the Romans (held by long Tradition, and strengthned by a notable Precedent, when Regulus was ouerthrowne, and taken prisoner in the former warre) not to bee too tender of such as had yeelded to the Enemie; much was alleaged against these who now craued ransome: but the special point was that theywere wilfully loft, fince they might have faued them felues, as others did. It fufficed not vnto these poore men, to say, that their offence was no greater than the Confuls: they were told, that this was great prefumption. The truth was, the 30 State wanted money : and therefore could not want excuses, whereby to avoid the difbursement: whether it were so, or not, that any such Plea was held about this matter of redemption, as wee find recorded. Neyther must wee regard it, that the flaues which were armed for the warre, are faid to have cost more, than the summe did amount vnto, that would have ransomed these prisoners. For this is but a tale. deuised to countenance the Roman proceedings as if they had beene seuere; when as indeed they were futeable to the prefent fortune, poore, and somewhat beggerly Hercofit is no little proofe, That Hannibal valued those Roman slaues, whom he had taken in the Campe among their Masters, at no more, than every one the third part of a common Souldiers ransome; and likely it is, that hee offered them at the 40 price, whereat hee thought them current. But wee should suppose, that by trading with Hannibal, a better bargaine for flaues might have been made, than was by the State at home, in dealing with private men; yet must we withall consider, that these private men did only lend these slaves for a while vnto the Common-wealth, and were afterwards contented to forbeare the price of them ( when by order from the Senate they were enfranchised) vntill the warre should be ended. If Hannibal would have given such long day of paiment; it is likely that the Romans would have beene his chapmen: but feeing he dealt only for ready monie, they chose rather to fay, We will not give, than, We cannot. The like aufteritie, vpon the fame reason, but contrarie pretence, was vied toward the Souldiers that escaped from that great 50 Battaile. These were charged for having fled: as the prisoners were, for not flying, when they might have done fo. True it is, that in such cases (if ever) that which they call raggione del Stato may ferue for an excuse: when the Common wealth being driuen to a miserable Exigent, is faine to helpeit selfe, by doing iniuries to private men. And so dealt the Romans now: condemning all those that had served at Canne, to be transported into Stell; and there to serve, not as others did, yntill they had fulfilled twentie yeeres in the warres, or else were fistic yeeres of age; but vntill this warre should be ended, how long socuer it lasted, and that without reward. The same thristic censure, was afterwards laid upon others, for their misbehauiour: but neuer upon any man of qualitie, sauc only (a good while after this, at better leisure upon any man of qualitie, sauc only (a good while after this, at better leisure upon any man of qualitie, sauc only (a good while after this, at better leisure upon of scallus Metellus, and a few other hare-braind sooles his companions; who being frighted out of their wits, with the terrour of so great a losse, were deuting after the battaile, which way to runne out of Italic, when stambakas yet to had scarce one Towne within it. The inequalitie of this rigour grew shortly distalffull to the Commonaltie: and was openly blamed by a Tribune of the People, neuer. Links, is thelesse it was quietly digested, the excuse being no lesse apparent than the fault.

M. Iunius the Dictator, having dispatched all needfull businesse within the Citie, tooke the field with fine and twentie thousand men. What he did with this Armie, I cannot finde: nor more of him, than this, I bathe spent the time about Campanta; where as may be presumed he was not idle. To him therefore perhaps it may be ascribed, that Hannield did no greater euil: for of any cuill done to Hannield, by the Remans in this their weake estate, only Marcellus had the honour. Marcellus, being then one of the Prators, lay at Ofits with a seet, ready to see faile for Sicolabarane and the sum of the properties of the seed of th taken vp.: with which forces he was to defend that liand, and doe what harme hee could in Africk. But hearing of the ouer throw at Canna, a bec sent these of his new Leuie to Rome, for desence of the Citic; and narched halily with his Legion toward Cannassian. Celinering the fleet, empty of Souldiers, to P. Farius his Colleague. Thence was he called by the Magistrates, & chiefe Citizens of Nolezo helpethem; who were like to be forced by the Multitude (affected as were the rest of the Campans) to let in the Carthaginian; and knew not how to auoid this otherwise, than by seeming to deliberate about the Articles of this new Confederacie. Wherefore he made great journies thickeward; and arriude duen time enough to preuent the E-30 nemie. Many idle walkes Hannibal made, be other Citic Archaves and Naples: assume and not predefined the true force and not predefined to the true force and not predefined the true force and not predefined the true force and not predefined the true force and not predefined the true force and not predefined the true force and not predefined the true force and not predefined the true force and not predefined the true force and the true force a

Naples was firong, and not infected with any the leaft touch of diffoidite: it had allo a fure Hauen; whereby it flood in the leffle feare, of fuflayining much inconnenience, by foolie of the Lands and Villages abroad in the Countrie. But at Nola it was thought a valuable confideration, That Hambal was Malter of the field: which if he laid waste, all the poore people were vetrely whone. So thought the Multitude: and fuch talke vied force, that had little feare of their owne private want or powertie, but a great defire to gratifie the Carthaginian. Of the fe, one L. Banius was chiefe; a flour yong Gentleman, and Souldier of effection and the second of the control of the second o

He therefore thought, that it concerned him in honour, to returne the greatest thankes he could vnto so courteous an Enemie. Man cellus perceiving this, wrought vpon the same case nature of the Geneleman: and taking notice of him, as if it had beene by chance, seemed to wonder, why one that had so well deserved of the Roman state, had not repaired vnto him the Prestor, who desired not thing more than such acquaintance. So with many commendations, gifts, and louing entertainement, being himselfe also aman highly reputed for his personall valour, he made this Banius so far in love with him, that nothing could be attempted within Nosagainst the Romans, whereof he had not presently advertisement. Thence went he to Nuceria: which he tooke by composition; and so returned back again.

againe to Nola. Hee was not ignorant, what good affection the common people of

Nola bore vnto him: who although they durft not ftirre in his quarrell, being ouerawed by the Roman Garrison; yet if they faw Marcellus hardly bestead, and forced to turne his care from watching them within, to repelling the enemies affailing him without, like enough it feemed, that they would not bee wanting vnto the accomplishment of their owne desires. Heetherefore brought his Armie close to the

Towne, and skirmished often with Marcellus: not in hope thereby to doe much good, but only to make shew of a meaning to force the Towne; which hee fought in the meane while to take by intelligence. In the night-time there passed messages

once Marcellus, with all his forces, could be trained into the field, the Multitude within the Towne should presently rise; and seizing youn the gates, exclude him as an Enemie, Of this Negotiation Marcellus was adjectifed; and fearing, left the Conspirators would shortly aduenture, even to finde him busied within the Citie, whileft the Carthaginians should scale the walls; he thought it the surest way, to cut off the enemies hope, and fend him away betimes. Wherefore ordering his men in three Companies, within three feuerall gates looking towards the Enemie: He gaue

a streight command, that all the Citizens should keepe their houses. Thus hee lay close a good part of the day, to the enemies great wonder; against whom he had cu-thought Hannibal, that furely all was discourred, and Marcellus now busied with the Citizens. Whereupon he bade his men bring ladders, and make ready for the af-fault; which was done in all halle. But when the Carthaginians were at the very walls, and thought nothing leffe, than that the Romans would meet them in the field: finddenly the middle pate was opened, wherat Marcellus, with the best and oldest of his Souldiers, brake forth upon them, with a great noise, to make his vnex-pected fallie the more terrible. Whilest the Carthaginians, much out of order, were fome of them flying before Marcellus, the rest making head against him: the other vpon the enemies backes. The sudden terrour was more availeable vnto the Romans, than their force: yet the Execution was fo great, that this was accounted as a victorie, and reputed one of the brauest Acts performed in all that warre; foraf-much as hereby it was first proued, that Hannibal might be ouer-come. After this,

Marcellus, being freed from his enemics that were departed, tooke a strict accompt of the Citizens of 2 ola: condemning about threefcore and ten of high Treafon, whose heads he struck off; and so leaving the Towne in quiet obedience vnto their

Senate, went and incamped hard by about Suessula. Hannibal in the meane season was gone to Acerra: where being excluded, he thought it no wisdome to loose time rified the People, who knew themselves vnable to hold out. Therefore, before his

Workes were finished, and they quite surrounded, they stole out by night, and left him the Towne emptie: which he sacked and burnt. Then hearing newes of the Dictator, that he was about Casiline, thither went Hannibal: as being vnwilling, that an Enemie so neere should disquiet him at Capua; where hee meant to Winter. It

feemes, or rather indeede it is plaine, that the late victorie of Marcellus had nothing abated the spirit of the Carthaginian: who durst with a small part of his Armie seeke out the Dictator, that had with him the heart of the Roman strength. Wherefore the joy of his Enemies, vpon so flight an occasion as the death of some two thoucruption; witneffeth chiefly, in what great feare they flood of Hannibal, and how

Crest-fallen they were: that having three yeeres since demanded at Carthage, the body of Hannibal, to be deliuered vnto their pleasure, by his owne Citizens; could now please themselves, as with good newes, to heare, That in a skirmish not farre

fustained the poore belieged men. At length, when all foode was spent, and whatfocuer grew greene under the walls was gathered for fallets; the Carthaginians 40 ploughed up the ground: whereon the besieged presently sowed Rape-seede. Hannibal feeing this, admired their patience; and faid, That he meant not to stay at Cafiline, vntill the Rapes were growne. Wherefore, though hitherto hee had refused to hearken vnto any Compolition, as intending to make them an example to all others, by punishing their obstinacie; yet now he was content, to grant them their liues at an indifferent ransome, which when they had paid, hee quietly dismissed them according to his promife. Seven hundred Carthaginians he placed in Casiline; as a Garrison for defence of the Campans; vnto whom he restored it. To the Pranefine Souldiers great thankes were given, and louing rewards samong which they had offer, in regard of their vertue, to be made Citizens of Rome. But their present condition pleafed them fo well, that they chose rather to continue, as they were, in may be thought, that the Towne was loft, because the Romans durst not aduenture to raise the siege. Barrells of corne were sent by night, floting downe the River; and when some of these, being carried awry by an Eddie of the water, fluck among the Willowes on the banke, whereby this manner of reliefe was discouered and preuented; Gracebus cast a great quantitie of Nuts into the streame, which faintly

Praneste: which is no weake proofe, of the good estate wherin the Cities slourished; that were subject to the Roman Gouernement. This siege of Cassiline was not a little beneficiall to the Romans; as having long detained Hannibal, and confumed much of his time, that might other wise have beene better spent. For Winter ouer-tooke fand of his men, at the most, and those not slaine in plaine battaile, but by a sudden so

him, long before he could dispatch the businesse: which how to quit with his honor he knew not, when hee was once engaged. Therefore he wintered at Capua: where he refreshed his Armie, or rather corrupted it, as all Historians report, and made it effeminate; though, effeminate as it was, He therewithall did often beate the Romans in following times, as shall appeare hereafter.

Of the great supply that was decreed at Carthage to be sent to HANNIBAL in Italie. 10 How by the malice of HANNO, and floth or parsimonie of the Carthaginians, the supply was too long deferred. That the riches of the Carthaginians grew faster, than of the Romans. Of FABIVS and other old Roman Historians, how partiall they were in their writings.

Hen Mago, the sonne of Amilear, had spent some time about the taking in of fuch Italians, as fell from the Romans after the battaile at Canna; his brother Hannibal fent for him to Capua, and thence dispatched him away to Carthage, with the joyfull message of Victoric. 20 He told the Carthaginian Senate, with how many Roman Generalls

his brother had fought; what Confuls he had chaced, wounded, or flaine; how the flout Romans, that in the former war neuer shunned any occasion of fight, were now growne so calme, that they thought their Dictator Fabius the only good Captaine, because he neuer durst aduenture to come to battaile; that, not without reafon, their spirits were thus abated, since Hannibal had slain of them about two hundred thousand, and taken aboue fiftie thousand prisoners. He further told them of the Brutians, Apulians, Samnites, Lucans, and other people of Italie, that following the fortune of those great victories, had revolted vnto the Carthaginians. Among the rest he magnified Capua, as a goodly Citie, and fit to be not only (as already it was) 30 Head of all the Capuans, but the chiefe feat of their Dominion in Italie: and there he informed them, how louingly his brother had beene entertained, where he meant to rest that winter, attending their supply. As for the warre, He said it was cuen at an end, if they would now purfue it closely, and not give the Romans any breathing time, wherein to recollect themselves, and repaire their broken forces. Hee willed them to consider, that the warre was farre from home, in the Enemies Countrie: that so many Battailes had much diminished his brothers Armic; that the Souldiers, who had so well descrued, ought to be considered with liberall rewards; and that it was not good to burden their new Italian friends, with exactions of monie, corne, and other necessaries; but that these things must bee sent from Carthage: 40 reports it : and which the victoric would requite with large amends. Finally hee caused the golden rings, taken from the fingers of the Roman Knights that were flaine, to be powred out openly in the Court: which being measured, filled (as some say) three bushels, poore, the bra- or (as others would rather haue it) no more than one; adding, that by this might appeare the greatnesse of the Roman calamitie, for a smuch as none but the * principall not altogether of that Order, were accussomed to weare that ornament.

Whoso considers the former Punick Warre, may easily find, that the State of Carthage never did receive, in all the durance thereof, any fuch hopefull advertisements from their Captaines abroad. Wherefore it is no meruaile, if the Errand of Mago found extraordinarie welcome. In the vehemencie of this joy, Himileo, a Senator 50 adverse to the faction of Hanno, is faid to have demanded of that great perswader vnto peace with Rome, Whether he were still of opinion, that Hannibal should bee yeelded up unto the Romans; or whether he would forbid them to give thankes un-Roman Equites. to the gods, for this their good successe. Hereunto though it bee not likely that

Hanno made the same formall answere, which Liute puts into his mouth, calling the Carthaginian Senators Patres conforipti, by a terme properto the Romans, and putting them in minde of his owne shamefull overthrow received at the Ilands Egateis: yet the summe of his speech appeares to have beene no lesse malicious, than it is set downe, forasmuch as Hannibal himselse, at his departure out of Italie, exclaimed against the wickednesse of this Hanno; saying, that his hatred against the Barchines. had oppressed their Familie, when otherwise it could not, with the ruine of Carthage. Therefore it may well be, that he made such a jest of these victories, as is reported; faying, It ill befeemed him, who had vanquished the Romans, to call for 10 more helpe, as if he had beene beaten; or him, that had taken their campe, filled for footh with spoile, to make request for meat and monic. To these caulls, if anfwere were needfull, it might be faid, That other bootie than of horses and slaues; little was to be found in the Roman campe : the best of the Souldiers carrying no other wealth into the field, than a few aliluer stude in the bridles and trappings of a Lindan their horses. If Hannibal had taken any maine convoy of mony and provisions, going to supply all wants of a great Armie in some other Prouince, (as the two Science's are afterwards faid to have done, when they wanne the campe of Afdrubal, that carried along with him all the wealth of Spaine, in his journie towards Italie) then might such an objection more justly have beene made vnto his demand of a supply. 20 But the most likely part of Hanno his Oration, and wherein hee best might hope to preuaile, contained a perswassion to vse their fortune with moderation; and now to fecke peace, whileft they had fo much the better in warre.

What would have beene the iffue of this counfaile, if it had beene followed, it were not casie to say. For though it bee likely, that the Roman pride would have brooked much indignitie, in freeing Italie from the danger of warre, yet it is not likely, that the faith, so often broken to the Carthaginians in former times, would haue beene kept entire, when any opinion of good aduantage had called for reuenge of so many shamefull ouerthrowes; since after this warre ended, and a new league concluded, no submiffiue behauiour could preserue Carthage from ruine, longer 30 than vntill fuch time, as Rome was at leifure from all other warres. This counfaile therefore of Hanne, though it might feeme temperate, was indeed every pellilent; and ferued only to hinder the performance of a noble resolution. For it was concluded by a maine confent of the Senate, that fortie thousand Numidians, fortic Elephants, and great abundance of filuer, should bee sent ouer to Hannibal: and that, befides these, twentie thousand foot, and soure thousand horse, should be leuied in Spaine; not only to supply, as neede should require, the Armies in that Province, but to be transported into Italie.

This great aide, had it beene as carefully fent, as it was readily decreed, the Roman Historians would not have found cause, to taxe the rechlesse improvidence of 40 Hannibal, in forbearing to march directly from Cannato Rome, or in refreshing his Armie among the delights of Capua: the next yeeres worke would have finished the businesse, with lesse dangerous aduenture; and the pleasures, which his men enjoyed among the Campans, would have been commended, as rewards by him well thought vpon, wherewith to animate both them and others, that were to bee imploied in the following warre. But either the too much carelefnesse of those, that were loth to make hafte in laying out their monie, before extreme necessitie required it; or the craftie malice of Hanno, and his fellowes, working vponthe private humours of men, that had more feeling of their ownecommoditie, than fenfe of the publike neede; vtterly peruerted, and made unprofitable in the performance, the 50 order that had beene fo well fet downe. The b Elephants were fent : and fome b Lindaes monie peraduenture; vncertaine it is, how long after. But those great forces of threescore thousand foot, and foure thousand horse, came not into Italie, till much was lost of that which already had beene gotten, and a great part of the old Carthaginian Armie, was first consumed by time, and fundry accidents of warre. fome small numbers, no way answering vnto the proportion decreed, were sent into Spaine; and the journie of Afdrubal thence through France into Italie much talked o', but he not enabled therevnto, till many yeeres were past, and the Romans had recourred their strength.

Heere wee may note, what great riches the Carthaginians drewinto their Citie, both by the Tributes received from their subjects, and by their wealthy Trade of merchandize. For it is not long, fince the warre of the Mercinaries; and the perfidioustyrannie of the Romans, extorting in time of greatest necessity twelve hundred talents; had exceedingly impouerished Carthage: which was before brought into great want, euen by the expence of fo much monie, as was to bee disburfed for re- 10 deeming of peace, after the loffe at Egateis. Yet we fee, what great Armies of Numidians, and Spaniards, belides those already on foot, are appointed to the service in Italie, and how little the Carthaginians feare the want of mony in these chargeable vndertakings: whereas the Romans, on the other fide, having three or foure yeeres together beene forced to some extraordinary cost, are faine to goe vpon credit, even for the price of those slaues, which they bought of their owne Citizens to arme for their defence. Such aduantage, in meanes to enrich their Treasurie, had the wealthy merchants of Carthage, trading in all parts of the Mediterran Sea, cuen from Tvrus their Mother-City in the bottome of the streights vnto the great Ocean, aboue the Romans : who lived on the fruits of their ground ; and received their Tributes 20 from people following the same course of life. When time therefore was come. that the hatred of Rome found leifure to flow it felfe, in the destruction of Carthage; the impudence of Roman fallbood, in seeking an honest colour wherewith to shadow the intended breach of faith, discouered plainely whence the jealousie was bred, that this mighty Citie would againe rebell. For the Carthaginians, having giuen vp holtages, euen before the Roman Armie did set forth, to performe what soeuer should bee enjoyned them, with condition that their Citic might not bee deftroyed; and having accordingly, when they were so required, yeelded up all their weapons, and engines of warre; the Romans told them plainly, That the Citie of Carthage, which was the Bodie of the Citizens, should be friendly dealt with all, but 30 the Towne must needes be demolished, and remoued into some other place, that should be twelve miles distant from the Sea. For (said the Romans) this Trade of merchandize, by which ye now line, is not fo fit for peaceable men, fuch as yee promise to become hereafter, as is the Trade of husbandrie; an wholsome kind of life, and enduing men with many laudable qualities, which enable their bodies, and make them very apt for conversation. This villainous dealing of the Romans, though sugred with glosing words, plainly shewes, what good observation the elder Cato had made of the hastie growth of Carthage in riches. For when, being demanded his opinion in the Senate about any matter what socier it were, added still this conclusion, Thus I thinke; and that Carthage should be destroied; Hee may seeme, 40 not only to have had regard vnto that present wealth, which at his being there hee had found in the Citie, but much more vnto these times, & the great height whervnto it rofe, euen suddenly as wee see, out of many calamities, whilest the Romans thought, that it had not beene in case to dare so terrible a warre.

But as the Carthaginians, in gathering wealth, were more industrious and skilfull than the Romans; so came they farre short of them, in the honourable care of the publike good: having every one, or most of them, a more principall regard of his owne private benefit. This made them (belides the negligence commonly found in victors) when the first heat of their affection, wherein they concluded to pursue the warre strongly, was ouer-past, goe more leifurely to worke, than had beene re- 50 quisite in the execution. It was easie for Hanno to perswade couctous men, that they should first of all defend their owne in Spaine. This might be done with little charges. Afterwards, when that Province was secured, they might send an Armie into Italie; so going to worke orderly by degrees. For it were no wisedome, to commit all the strength of the Common-wealth to one hazard of fortune, against the Encmies; or (which perhaps were worse) to the Gouernment of an ambitions man, and his brethren; who having once (if they could so doc) finished the warre, might casily make * Hannibal a King, and subdue Carthage, with the forces that he had gi-bition Hanno uen them to the conquest of Rome.

By fuch malicious working of Hanns, and by their owne stacknesse, incredulitie, set single dulnesse, or niggardize, the Carthaginians were persuaded rather to make small difference ware bursements in Spaine, than to set up all their rest at once in Italie. Yet was it indeed that so hee impossible, to hold a Countrie of so large extent, and so open a coast as that of compassion 10 Spaine, free from all incursion of the Enemie : especially the affection of the Natu- with Legions, ralls being (as in a new Conquest) ill established. A better way therfore it had been as knowing no to make a running warre, by which the Romans might have beene found occupied, make himselfe enen with the ordinarie Carthaginian Garrisons, or some little addition thereunto. a King Liu. For if it were thought meet, to deferre the profecution of their maine intendment lib.vi. against Rome it felfe, vntill such time as every little thorne were pulled out of the fides of fogreat a Prouince, then must Emporie haue bin belieged & forced:which by reason of alliance with the Massilians, gaue vnto the Romans, at all times when they pleased, a readie and secure Harbour. But the Towne of Emporia was too ftrong to be wonne in hafte: it had long defended it felfe against the Barbarians; ha-20 uing not about fourchundred paces of wall to the maine Land, and exceedingly well fortified ; a great Spanish Towne of the same name, lying without it, that was three miles in compasse, very strong likewise, and friend vnto the Gracians, though not ouer-much trusted. Wherefore to force this Towne of Emporie, that was, befides the proper strength, like to be so well assisted by the Massilians, Romans, and some Spaniards; would have been a worke of little lesse difficultie, than was the Roman warre (in appearance) after the battaile at Canna: yea it had bin in effect none other, than to alter the feat of the warre; which Hannibal had already fixed, with better judgement, neere vnto the gates of Rome. The difficultie of this attempt being such as caused it altogether to be forborne; great follie it was, to bee much 30 troubled about expelling the Romans vtterly out of Spaine : whom they might more easily have diverted thence, and drawne home to their owne doores, by making strong warre vpon their Citie. For euen so the Romans afterwardes remoued Hannibal into Africk, by fending an Armie to Carthage; & by taking the like courfe; they now endeuoured to change the feat of the warre, transferring it out of Italie into Spaine. But the private affections of men, regarding the common good no otherwife, than as it is accessary to their owne purposes, did make them easily winke at opportunities, and hope, that fomewhat would fall out well of it felfe, though they fet not to their helping hands. Hanno was a malicious wretch: yet they that thought him fo, were wel enough contented to harken vnto his difcourfes, as long 40 as they were plaufible, and tended to keepe the purfe full. In the meane while they fuffered Hannibal, and all the noble house of Amilear, to wearie themselves in trauaile for the Common-wealth: which all Carthage in generall highly commended, but weakely affifted ; as if the industrie of these Barchines had been somewhat more than needfull. Surely the Carthaginians, in general, were farre leffe honourable than the people of Rome: not only in government of their subject Provinces, but in administration of their owne Estate; few of them preferring the respect of the Weale publike about their private interest. But as they thrived little in the end, by their parlimonie vsed toward their own Mercinaries, when the former Roman warre was finished: so the conclusion of this warre present, will make them complaine, with 50 feeling fighes, of their negligence in supplying Hannibal, after the victorie at Canna; when gladly they would give all their Treasures, to redeeme the opportunitie, that now they let passe, as if it were cost enough to send a few handfulls into

ly, or for the most part, upon successe of things in Italie; the course of actions following will make manifelt. Particularly how matters were ordered in Spaine by the Carthaginian Gouernours, it is very hard, and almost impossible, to set downe. For though we must not reprehend, in that worthy Historian Linie, the tender loue of his owne Country, which made him give credit vnto Fabius and others: yet must we not, for his fake, beleeue those lies, which the vnpartiall judgement of Polybius hath condemned in the Writers that gaue them originall. It were needleffe to rehearle all that may be found in Polybius, concerning the vntruth of that Roman Hiftorian Fabius. One example may suffice. He faith of Amilear and his men at Eryx, in the former warre, That having cleane spent their strength, and being even 10 broken with many miscries, they were glad to submit themselues vnto the Romans. Contrarie hercunto we finde in the life of AMILCAR, let downe by Emilius Pro. bus, That Eryx was in such fort held by the Carthaginians, that it seemed to be in as good condition, as if in those parts there had not beene any warre. These wordes, being referred to the braue resolution of the Carthaginian Souldiers, and the singular vertue of their General infuling such spirit into them; may be taken as not ouerliberall. For in the treatie of peace betweene Amilear and Catulus, when the Roman first of all required, that this Garrison of Eryx should lay downe their Armesand forfake Sicil, threatning, that otherwise he would not talke of any composition: Amilear boldly bade him choose, whether he would talke of it, or no; for that the 20 Armes, which his Countrie had put into his hands to vie against her Enemies, it was not his purpose to yeeld up vnto them. Now since the Romans, contrarie to their custome vpon like aduantages, were content to let Amilear have his will, and not to fland with him vpon point of honour, whilest otherwise they might quietly rid their hands of him; plaine enough it is, that they were farre from thinking him a man confumed with miferies; as Fabius would have him feeme. Hereunto agrees the relation of Polybius: who flatly, and by name, chargeth Fabius with vntruth; faying, that howfoeuer Amilear, and his Souldiers, had endured all extremitie, yet they behaved themselves as men that had no sense thereof, and were as farre from being either vanquished, or tired, as were their Enemies. Such being the difference 30 betweene Fabius (as also perhaps betweene other old Writers of the Roman storie) and those that had more regard of truth, than of flattering the mightie Citie of Rome: we must take it in good part, that how soeuer Liuie introduceth Hanne, in one * Agates In- place, ioyning very foolilhly his owne shamefull overthrow at the Ilands, * Agafulas, ericong; teis, with the great services of Amelear at Eryx, as if both of them had had a like eponite, c. Liu. vent; yet elsewhere he forbeareth not to put a more likely tale (though with as impudent a commemoration of his owne vnhappie conduct) into the same Hanno his mouth, making him fay, That the affaires of Carthage went neuer better, than a little before the loffe of their fleet in that battaile at Sea: wherein himfelfe was Generall. Now, concerning the doings of the Scipio's in Spaine, there is cause to wish, 40 that this Fabius, with Val. Antias, and others of the like stampe, had either written (if they could not write more temperately) nothing at all ; or that the tender affection of Livie to his Rome, had not caused him to thinke too well of their relations: which are such as follow.

CHAP.3.S.II.

Strange reports of the Roman victories in Spaine, before As DRVBAL the fonne of AMILCAR followed thence his brother HANNIBAL into Italie.

T hath beene shewed already, how P. Cornelius Scipio the Conful, returning from Gaule into Italie, to encounter with Hannibal at his difcent from the Alpes, fent before him his brother Cneus, with part of his Fleet and Armie, into Spaine. Two Roman Legions, with fourcteene thousand foot of the Confederates, and twelve hundred horse, had beene alotted vnto this Conful, therewith to make warre in Spaine against Han-10 nibal: who fince he was marching into Italie with the strength of his Armie, P. Scipio beleeved, that a good part of these his owne forces might well be spared from the Spanish Expedition; and therefore made bold to carrie some of the number backe with him, fending on his brother with the rest, as his Lieutenant. Publisus himselfe remayned in Italie all the time of his Consulship: which being expired, He was sent Proconsulinto Spaine by the Senate, with an Armie of eight thousand men, and a fleet of thirtie Gallies.

The Acts of these two Brethren in their Province, were very great; and, as they are reported, som what maruailous. For they continually preuailed in Spaine, against the Carthaginians: whom they vanquished in fo many battailes, & with-drew from 20 their Alliance so many of the Spaniards their Confederates; that we have cause to wonder, how the Enemie could so often finde meanes to repaire his forces, and returne firong into the field. But as the Romans, by pretending to deliuer the Countrie from the tyrannie of Carthage, might casily winne vnto their Consederacie, as many as were galled with the African yoke, and durst aduenture to breake it: so the ancient reputation of the first Conquerours might serue to arme the Naturalls against these Inuaders; and to reclaime those, that had revolted vnto the Romans. were it onely by the memorie of such ill successe, as the like rebellions in former times had found. Hereto may be added the Carthaginian treasure: which easily raised souldiers, among those valiant, but (in that Age) poore, and gold-thirstie Na-30 tions, Neither was it of small importance, that so many of the Spaniards had their children, kinfmen, and friends, abroad with Hannibal in his Italian warres; or feruing the Carthaginians in Africk. And peraduenture, if we durst be bold to fay it; the victories of the Scipie's were neither fo many, nor fo great, as they are fet out by Linie. This we may be bold to fay, That the great Captaine Fabins, or Linie in his person, maketh an obiection vnto Scipio, which neither Scipio, nor Liuie for him, doth anfwer, That if As DR VB A L were vanquifled, as Scipio would fay, by him in Spaine: Liu. lib. as strange it was, and as little to his honour, as it had beene extremely dangerous to Rome, that the same vanquished man should inuade Italie. And it is indeede an incredible narration, That afdrubal being closed in on all sides, and not knowing how to escape

40 out of a battaile, faue only by the steepe descent of Rocks, ouer a great River that lay at his backe, ranne away with all his monie, Elephants, and broken troups, ouer Tagus, directly towards the Pyrences, and fo toward Italie; vpon which he fell with more than threefcore thousand armed Souldiers. Neither doe I see, how it hangs wel together, That he chose a piece of ground very defensible, but most incommodious for his retrait, if he should happen to be vanquished; and yet, that he sent al his monie and Elephants away before him, as not intending to abide the Enemie: Or how it could be true, that these his Elephants, being so sent before, could hinder the Romans (for fo are they faid to have done in the last battaile betweene him and Scipio) from breaking into his camp. Wherfore we can no more than be forry, that 50 all Ca thaginian records of this warre, and Spanish, (if there were any) being veterly loft, we can know no more thereof, than what it hath pleafed the Romans to tell vs: vnto whom it were no wisdome to give too much credit. In this regard, I will summarily runne ouer the doings of the Scipio's in Spaine; not greatly infifting on particulars, whereof there is no great certaintie.

Cn, Cornelius landed at Emporia, an Hauen-towne, not farre within the Pyrenees. retaining still the same name with little inflexion. That by the same of his clemencic he allured many Nations to become subject vnto Rome, as the storie beginnes of him, I could eafily beleeue, if I vnderstood by what occasion they had need to vse his clemencie, or he to give such famous example thereof, being a meere stranger, and having no iurisdiction in the Countrie. Yet is it certaine, that he was a man verie courteous, and one that could well infinuate himselfe into the love of the Barbarians; among whom, his dexteritie in practice had the better successe, for that hee feemed to have none other errand, than fetting them at libertie. This pretext auailed with some: others were to be hired with monie: and some hee compelled to to yeeld by force or feare; especially, when he had wonne a battaile against Hanno, Into all Treaties of accord, made with these people, likely it is that he remembred to insert this Article, which the Romans in their Alliances neuer forgate, vnlesse in long times past, and when they dealt with the Carthaginians, or their Superiours; Maiestatem Pop. Rom. comiter conseruent, which is, as Tullie interprets it, That they Should gently (or kindely) uphold the Maiestie of the People of Rome. This was in appearance nothing troublesome: yet implied it indeed an obscure couenant of subiection. And in this respect it may be true, That the Spaniards became ditionis Romane; of the Roman iurifdiction; though hereafter they will fay, they had no fuch meaning. That part of the Countrie wherein Scipiolanded, was newly subdued by 20 Hannibal in his passage toward Italie; and therefore the more casily shaken out of obedience. Particularly in the Bargutians; Hannibal had found, at his comming among them, such an apprehension of the Roman greatnesse, as made him suspect, that any light occasion would make them start from the Carthaginians. Wherefore he not only appointed Hanno Gouernor over them, as over the rest of the Province betweene Iberus and the Pyrenees, but made him also their Lord; that is, (as I conceine it; for I doe not thinke he gaue the Principalitie of their Countrie vnto Hanno and his Heires, ) He made him not only Lieutenant generall ouer them, in matters of warre, and things concerning the holding them in obedience to Carthage; but tooke from them all inferiour Officers of their owne, leaving them to be governed 30 by Hanno at his discretion. These therefore had good cause to reioyce at the comming of Scipio; with whom, others also (no doubt) found reasons to ioyne; it being the custome of al conquered Nations, in hatred of their present Lords, to throw themselues indiscreetly into the protection of others, that many times proue worse than the former. So were the Neapolitans, and Milanois, in the age of our Grand-fathers, wearie by turnes of the Spaniards and French; as more sensible still of the prefent euil which they felt, than regardfull of the greater mischiefe, whereinto they ranne by seeking to avoide it. This bad affection of his Province, would not suffer Hanno to temporize. Ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse, Hannibal had left vnto him: belides which it is like, that some forces he was able to raise out of his 40 Prouince. Therefore he aduentured a battaile with Scipio; wherein he was ouerthrowne and taken. Following this victorie, Scipio besieged Stiffum, a Towne hard by, and wanne it. But Afdrubal having passed Iberus, and comming too late to the reliefe of Hanno, with eight thousand foot and a thousand horse, fel vpon the Roman Sea-forces, that lay not farre about Tarracon, whom he found careleffe, as after a vi-Storie, rouing abroad in the Countrie; and with great flaughter draue them abourd their ships. This done, he ranne up into the Countrie, where he with drew the 11lergetes from the Roman partie, though they had given hostages to Scipio. Scipio in the meane scason was gone to visit and aide his fleet; where having set things in order, he returned backe, and made toward afdrubal; who durft not abide his comming, but with-drew himselfe againe ouer Iberus. So the Illergetes were compelled by force, having loft Athanagia their chiefe Citie, to pay a fine to the Romans, and increase the number of their hostages. The Ausetani likewise, Confederates of the Carthaginians, were besieged in their chiefe Towne: which they defended thirtie dayes; hoping in vaine, that the sharpe Winter, and great abundance of snow that fell, would have made the Romans to diflodge. But they were faine at length to yeeld: and for this their obstinacie, they were amerced twentie Talents of illuer. During the fiege, the Lacetani came to helpe their distressed Neighbours; and were beaten home by Scipio, leaving twelve thouland of their Companie dead behinde them. I cannot but wonder, how these Lacetani, that are faid to be the first which embraced the friendship of Scipio, should without any cause remembred, become Carthaginian on the sudden, in the next newes that we heare of them. As also it is strange, that all the Sca-coast Nothward of Iberus, having lately become voluntari-

10 ly aitionis Romana; subject unto Rome, should in continuance of the Storie, after a Lin, lib. 21. few lines, hold warre against Scipio, without any affiltance of the Carthaginians. Neither can I beleeve, that Afdrubal, as it were by a charme, flirred up the Illergetes, making them lay alide all care of their Hostages, and take Armes in his quarrell; whilest himselfe had not the daring to stand against Scipio, but ranne away, and saued himselte beyond Iberus. Philinus perhaps, or some Carthaginian Writer, would haue told it thus: That Scipio adventuring too farre into the Countrey, was beaten by Afdrubal back to his ships, whence he durst not stirre, vntill Winter came on: at what time this Carthaginian returned into the heart of his Prouince, leauing some few Garrisons to defend those places, that after Scipio wanne, by returning vpon 20 them, vilooked for, through a deep fnow. As for the Lacetani, Illergetes, and the reft, we may reasonably thinks, that they sought their owne benefit; helping them-felues one while by the Romans against the Carthaginians; and contrariwise, vpon fense of injuries received, or apprehension of more grieuous tyrannie, under which they feared to be brought by these new Masters, harkning againe vnto the comfortable promises of those, that had ruled them before. For that it was their intent to liue vnder their owne Countrey Lawes, and not vnder Gouernours sent from Rome or Carthage, their demeanour in all Ages following may restine: even from henceforth vnto the dayes of Augustus Cafar; till when they were neuer through-

CHAP.2. S.II.

The yeere following this, Cn. Scipio had a victoric against the Carthaginians in fight at Sea; or rather came vpon them vnlooked for, while they rode at Anchor, most of their men being on shore. All their ships, that ranne not too far on ground, he tooke: and thereby grew Master of the whole coasts landing at pleasure, and doing great hurt in all places that were not well defenced. After this victoric, aboue one hundred and twentie Nations, or pettie Estates, in Spaine, are said to have submitted themselves vnto the Romans, and given Hostages: whereby Astrabal was compelled to flie into the vtmost corners of the land, and hide himselfe in Lusitania. Yet it followes; that the Illergetes did againe rebell; that Afdrubal hereupon came ouer Iberus; and that Scipio (though having cafily vanquilhed the Illergetes) went 40 not forth to meet him, but stirred vp against him the Celtiberians, that lately were become his subjects and had given him Hostages. These tooke from the Carthaginian three Townes, and vanquished him in two battailes, wherein they flue fifteen thousand of his men, and tooke soure thousand Prisoners. Then arrived P. Scipio, with the supply before mentioned: and henceforward the two brethren ioyntly administred the businesse in Spaine. The Carthaginians being occupied in the Celtiberian Warre; the two Scipio's did, haud sunct anter; without feare or doubt, passe over therus, & besiege Saguntum. Little cause of doubt had they, if Cn. had alreadic subdued many Nations beyond it, and, among many others, the same Celuberians, that with their proper forces were able to vanquilh Afdrubal. Boftar, the Gouernour of Saguntum, a simple man, suffered himselfe to be perswaded by one Acedus a Spaniard, that the only way to get the fauour and hearty good will of the Countrie, was by freely restoring vnto them their Hollages; asrelling; without any pledge, affured of their faith. But the craftie Spamiard, being trufted with this mellageand restitution of the Hostages, carried them all to the Roman Generalls: perfunding them, as hee had done Boftan, to make the Liberalitie their owne. Hereby the Romans purchafed much lone: if the tale were true; and lift were not rather true, as afterward and cre this we finde, that all the Spinn/h Hostages were left in new Canthage. I am wearie of reheating so many particularities, whereof I can beleeve so see. But since wee finde no better certainties, we mult content our sclues with these.

The yeere following was like vnto this: Afdrubal must be beaten againe. The two Scipio's divide their forces: Cn. makes warre by Land; P. by Sea. Aldrubal, with much labour and entreatie, hath gotten foure thousand foot, and fine hundred horse, out of Africk: He repaires his fleet; and prouides every way to make resi- 10 flance. But all his chiefe Sea-men, and Mafters of his ships, revolt vnto the Romans: because they had beene chidden the last yeere for their negligence, which had betraied the Nauie. The revolt of these ship-masters animates to rebellion the Carpetians, or Carpetani, an In-land people about Toledo, in the very Center of Spaine. These doe much mischiefe, so that Astrubal is faine to make a journey to them. His sudden comming cuts off some of them, that were found scattered abroad in the fields. But they, making head, so valiantly affaile him, that they drive him, for very feare, to incampe himselfe strongly on an high piece of ground; whence he dares not come forth to give them battaile. So they take a Towne by force, wherein he had laide vp all his provisions; and shortly make themselves Masters of the Countrie round 20 about. This good successe breeds negligence; for which they dearely pay. Aldrubal comes upon them, takes them unprepared, beats them, kills the most of them, and disperseth the rest; so that the whole Nation yeeldeth to him the next day. Then come directions from Carthage, that Afdrubal should leade his Armie forthwith into Italie: which we may wonder, why the Carthaginians would appoint him to doe, if they had been einformed by his letters in what hard case he was; and had fo weakely supplyed him, as is shewed before. But thus we findeit reported : and that you the very rumour of this his journie, almost all Spaine was readie to fall to the Romans. Aldrubal therefore fends word prefently to Carthage, That this must not be fo: or, if they will needes have it fo, that then they must fend him a Success- 30 four, and well attended with a strong Armie, which to imploy they should finde worke more than enough; such notable men were the Roman Generalls. But the Senate of Cartbage is not much moved with this excuse: A drubal must needes be gone; and Himileo, with fuch forces as are thought expedient for that service both by Land & Sea, is sent to take the charge of Spaine. Wherfore Afdrubal hath now no more to doe, than to furnish him selfe with store of monie, that hee might have wherewithall to winne the friendship of the Gaules; through whose Countries hee must passe, as Hannibal had done before him. The Carthaginians were greatly too blame, for not remembring to ease him of this care. But since it can bee no better, he laies great Impolitions vpon al the Spaniards his subjects: & having gotten toge- 40 ther as much treasure as he could, onward he marcheth toward Iberus. The Scipio's hearing these newes, are carefull how to arrest him on the way. They besiege ibera (so called of the Rivers name running by it) the richest towne in all those quarters, that was confederate with Afdrubal: who thereupon steps aside to relieve it. The Romans meet him, and fight a battaile with him: which they winne the more easily, for that the Spaniards, his followers, had rather bee vanquilhed at home: than get the victorie, and afterwards be haled into Italie. Great numbers are flaine: and few should have escaped, but that the Spaniards ranne away, ere the battailes were throughly ioyned. Their campe the Romans take, and spoile: whereby (questionleffe) they are maruailoufly enriched; all the monie that could bee raked together 50 in Spaine, being carried along in this Italian Expedition. This dayes event ioynes all Spaine to the Romans, if any part of the Countrie stood in doubt before; and puts Aldrubal so farre from all thought of travailing into Italie, that it leaves him small hope of keeping himselfe safe in Spaine. Of these exployes aduertisement is sent to Rome: and Letters to the Senate, from P. and Cn. Scipio, whereof the Contents are;

That they have neither monic, apparrell, nor bread, wherewith to fulfaine their Linklass.
Armie and Fleet; That all is wanting; so as valies they may be supplied from Rome, they can neither hold their forces together, nor tarrie any longer in the Prounice. These Letters come to Rome in an cuill scason; the State being scarcely able, after the losse at Canne, to helpe it selle at home. Yet relies is sent how hardly, and how much to the commendations of that love and care, which the private Citizens of Rome bare wrothe Common-wealth, shall be inferred elsewhere, into the Relation of things whereof the truth is lesse questionable. At the comming of 10 this supply, the two Scipio's pursue Ashanda, and hunt him out of his busking holes.
What else can we thinke; that remember the last newes of him, and how fearefully
he missingly have the supplementable of the supplementable. The supplementable is the supplementable of the supplementable o

What elfe can we thinke; that remember the laft newes of him, and how fearefully he miftrufted his owne fateite? They finde him, and Mago, and Amilear the fonne of Bomilear, with an Armie of threefcore thou fand men, belieging Militargi: (which the learned Ortelius, & others, probably conjecture to have flood, where Carimena is now, in the Kingdome of Aragon, for there was Militargui, afterward called Forum talij, quite another way) a Towne of the Meggetes their neereft Neighbours, for having revolted vnto the Romans. The Towne is greatly diffrested, but most of all, for want of victualles. The Romans therefore breake through betweene the English of the Military with the miss camps, with terrible slaughter of all that resist them: and having victualled the place, encourage the townsmento defend their walls as shoutly, is they should anon

20 place, encourage the town fmento defend their walls as floutly, as they should anon behold them lighting manfully with the befiegers, in their behalfe. So they siftue forth, about sixteen thousand against three core thousand; and killing more of the Links is enemies, than them selves were in number, drive all the three Carthaginian Commanders, cuery one, out of his quarter; and took that day, be slides prisoners and other bootie, fiftie and eight Ensignes. The Carthaginian Armie, being thus beaten from Illitargi, fall upon Intelhil, that stood a little Southward from the mouth of the term. It is Spaniard are blamed, as too greedy of earning monie by warre, for thus re-enforcing the broken Carthaginians. But it may be wondred, whence the Carthaginians had monie to pay them; since Assaulated viruen to poll the Coungot trie, wanting monie of his owne; and being beaten in this journie, had lost his wealthy carriages, when his campe was taken after the battaile by Ibera. How focuer it happens, the Carthaginians (according to their cullome) are beaten againe at Incibili: where there were of them aboue thirteene thou fand flaine, & aboue three Liud. 23; thou fand taken; be fides two and forty Enfignes, and nine Elephants. After this, (in a manner) all the people of Spaine tell from them who the Romans. Thus could Fabius Valerius Intins, or fome other Hiltorian, to whom Liuie gaue credit, conquer all Spaine twice in one yeere, by winning famous victories; whereof these good Captaines, P. and Cn. Scipio, perhaps were not aware.

The Romans, notwithstanding this large accessed of Dominion, winter on their 40 owne side of therms. In the beginning of the next yeere, great Armies of the Spamiards rise against Advuhul 3 and are ouerthrowne by him. As series, to helpe these his friends, is forced to make great haste ouer the River. At Cassim, to helpe these in the mid-way betweene new Carthage and Saguntum, samous by the death of the great Amiliar, P. Seripi incampeth: and stores the place with victualles, being strong and defencible; as intending to make it his sear for a while. But the Countrie round about is too full of Enemies: the Carthaginum horse have charged the Romans in their march, and are gone off cleare; falling also youn some stragglers, or such as lagged behinde their fellowes in march, they have cut off two thousand of them.
Hereupon it is thought behoutefull, to retire vnto some place more assured. So Pub.

50 withdrawes himselfe vnto Mons Victorie: that rising somewhat Eastward from Incibili, ouer-lookes the Southerne Out-let of Iberus. Thicher the Carthogonian's pursue him: His brother Cn. repaires vnto him; and Asfarbal the sonne of Geso, with a full Armic, arriues to helpe his Companions. As they lie thus neere incamped together, P. Scipio, with some light armed, going closely to view the places therabouts, is discouered by the enemies: who are like to take him, but that he withdrawes himfelfe to an high peece of ground; where they befrege him, untill his brother Cn. fetch him off. After this (but I know not why) Caffulo, a great citie of Spaine, whence Hannibal had taken him a wife, joyneth with the Romans; though being farre difrom them, and feated on the head of the River Beetis. Nevertheleffe the Carthaginians passe ouer iberus, to besiege Illiturgi againe, wherein lodgeth a Roman garrison; hoping to winneit by famine. Wee may justly wonder, what should move them to neglect the rebellion of Caflulo, yea and the Roman Armie lying to close by them, and to feeke adventures further off, in that very place, wherein they had beene fo grieuously beaten the yeere before. But thither they goe: and thither fol- 10 lowes them Cn. Scipio with one Legion: who enters the Towne by force, breakes out upon them the next day, and in two battailes kills aboue twelve thousand, and takes more than a thousand of them prisoners, with sixe and thirtie Ensignes. This victoric(doubtleffe) is remarkeable : confidering that the greatest Roman Legion at this time, confifted of no more than five thousand men. The vanquished Carthaginians beliege Bigarra: butthat fiege is also raised by Cn. Scipio. Thence the Carthaginians remoue to Munda; where the Romans are soone at their heeles. There is a great battaile fought, that lasteth foure houres, wherein the Romans get a notable victorie; and a more notable would have gotten, had not Cn. Scipio beene wounded. Thirtie nine Elephants are killed; and twelue thousand men; three thou- 20 fand prisoners taken, and seuen and fiftie Ensignes. The Carthaginians flie to Auringes; and the Romans pursue them. Cn. Scipso in a Litter is carried into the field, and vanguisheth the Carthaginians againe: but kills not halfe so many of them, as before good cause why, for there are fewer of them left to fight. Notwithstanding all these overthrowes, the Spaniards, a people framed even by nature to set warre on foot quickly fill vp the broken troupes of Afdrubal: who having also hired some of the Gaules, adventures once more to trie his fortune with the Romans. But he is beaten againe, and loofeth eight thouland of his men; belides Prifoners, Elephants, Enfignes, and other appurtenances. After so many victories, the Romans are even ashamed, to leave Saguntum enthralled vnto the Carthaginians; fince, in behalfe of 30 that Citie, they had at first entred into this warre. And well may wee thinke it strange, that they had not reconcredit long before, since wee may remember, that long before this they had wonne all the Countrie once and againe. But it must not be forgotten, that they had ere now befieged Saguntum; and were faine (as appears) to goe their way without it: fo as they neede not to blufh, for having fo long forborne to do that, which ere now they had attempted, but were vnable to performe. At the present they winne Saguntum: and restore the possession thereof vnto such of the poore dispersed Citizens, as they can finde out. They also waste and destroy the Countrie of the Turdetani, that had ministred vnto Hannibal matter of quarrell against the Saguntines. This last action (questionlesse) was much to their honour : 40 and wherin we may be affured, that the Carthaginians would have disturbed them, if they had beene able.

But ouer-looking now tois long continuance of great victories, which the Romans haue gotten in Spaine, other print or token of all their braue exploits, we can perceiue none, than this recourcie of Sagnatum excepting the stopping of Assubation journie; which was indeede of greatest importance, but appertaining to their ownedesence. For they haue landed at Emporia, an Hauen towne, built and peopled by a Colonie of the Phozeans, kinne to the Massin; friends to the Romans; They haue cassily wonne to their party, lost, recoursed, and lost againe, some pettie bordering Nations of the Spaniar sk, that are carried one while by perswassin, other 50 while by force, and sometimes by their owne unfertled passions, and now sinally they haue wonne a Towne, whereof the Carthaginians held entire possessing that when they tooke Sagnatum (stebe) cooke it not by surprise, which is to be suspection.

in this Action we finde no particulars remembred, as when the fame place was taken by Hamnibal) they had gotten the better of their Enemies in fome notable fight. In like fort alfo mult we thinke, that all those battailes lately remembred, after euery one of which Afdrabal fate down before some place, that had rebelled, or seemed ready to rebell, were prosperous vnto the Carthaginians. For it is not the cultome of Armies vanquished, to carry the warre from Townet or Towne, and beleaguer Cities of their Enemies; but to fortise themselues within their owne places of thrength, and therein to attend the leuie and arrivall of new supplies. And surely, if the Romars had beene absolute Masters of the field, when they wanne Sagantuan, they would not haue confumed a whole yeere following, in practifing only with the Celtiberians the next adjoyning people. Yet made they this, little lefte than two yeeres businesses, it has been so the Remans; for securitie of their faith, given Hostagesto Seipio; and, at his appointment; made warre against the Carthagnians, with their proper forces. Wherefore it is strange, that they are now thus hardly wrought; and, not without expresse condition of a great fumme, hired to serve in the Reman Campe. How this may hold together I cannot perceive; wheste perhaps in those dayes it were the Reman customer, or rather the custome of some bad Author whom Lines followers, to call every Messenger, or straggler, that entred their campe, an Hostage

20 of that people from whom he came.

The Celliberians at length, hired with great rewards, fend an Armie of thirtie thouland to helpe the Romans: out of which, three hundred the fittest men are chofen, and carried into Italie, there to deale with their Countrimen that follow Hannibalin his warres. But is any of these three hundred returne back into Spaine, it is to be feared, that he brings with him slock news of the riches and welfare of Hannibals men, that all his fellowes at home are the less enwilling to follow As hubal, when he shall next have a desire to leade them into Italie. Hereof wee finde more than probability, when these Mercinatic Celliberians meet the Carthaginian Army in the field. The two Scipio's, presuming on this accesse of strength, divide their forces,

30 and fecke out the Enemies; who lie not farre off with three Armies, Afanbal, the fonne of Amilear, is necreft at hand; euen among the Celisherians, at Anitagis. With him Cn. Seipio doubts not to take good order: but the feare is, that this one part of the Carthaginan forces being destroicd; Mago, and Afanbal the sonne of Gifeo, hearing the newes, will make we of their distance, which is fine daies march, and, by running into the furthest parts of the Countrie, save themselves from being outer taken. Publius therefore must make the more halite, and take with him the better Souldiers, that is, two parts of the old Roman Armie; leauing the third part, and all the Celisberians, to his brother. Hee that hath the longer journie to make, comes somewhat the sooner to his liges and. Mago, and Afanbal the sonne of 40 Gifia, are not fludying how to runne away: they finde no fuel necessite. They joyne their forces together; mece with P. Scipie; and lay at him to hardly, that he is driven to keepe himselfte close within his Trenches: wherin he thinkes himselfte not well assured. Especially he is vexed by Masantila, Prince of the Massichii, Namidians bordering vpon Mauritania, in the Region called now Tremizen: to whom the chiefe honor of this service is assured, in the he becomes afterward Consederate with the Romans. In this dangerous case P. Scipia gets intelligence, that mabbilis, a Spanish Prince, is comming with seuen thousand and such undred of the Sussificanis, to joyne with his Enemies. Fearing therefore to be streight shut up, and belieged, He issues forth by night, to meet with mabilis is youn the way, leaving T. Fonteiach is S Lieutenant, with a small companie, to defend the campe. He meets with mabilis.

The fight continues so long, that the Numdian horse appeares (whom he thought to haue bin ignorant of his departure land fall upon the Romans on all sides: neither are the Cartheginians farre behinde; but come so fast upon him in Reare, that P. taine which way to turne, yet fighting, and animating his men, where neede most requireth, is struck through with a lance, and slaine: very few of his Armie escaping the same destinie, through benefit of the darke night. The like end hath Cn. Scipio within nine and twentie dayes after. At his meeting with Afdrubal, the Celtiberian Mercinaries all for fake him; pretending that they had warre in their owne Coun-If Anitorgis, where Afdrubal then lay, were, as Ortelius following Beuterus takes it ; a Celtiberian Towne; this was no vaine pretence, but an apparent truth. But we may justly belocue, that they were wonne by Afdrubal, and easily perswaded to take as much monie for not fighting, as they should have had for bazarding their lines. Cn. Scipio therefore being vnable to flay them; and no leffe vnable, without 10 their helpe, either to resist the Enemie, or to joyne with his Brother, makes a very violent retrait; herein only differing from plaine flight, that hee keepes his men together. Afdrubal preffeth hard vpon him : and Mago, with Afdrubal the sonne of Gelco, having made an end of Publius, hasten to dispatch his brother after him. Scipio ficales from them all, by night; but is ouer taken the next day by their horse, and arrested, in an open place of hard stonie ground, where growes not so much as a thrub, vnfit for defence of his Legions against such enemies. Yet a little Hill hee findes, of easie ascent on every side, which he takes for want of a more commodious place, and fortifies with pack-faddles, and other luggage, for default of a better Pallisado. These weake defences the Carthaginians soone teare in sunder: and, breaking 20 in on all hands, leave very few of them alive; that faving themselves, I know not how, within some woods adjoyning, escape vnto T. Fonteius, whom Publius had left in his camp, as is before faid. It is a terrible overthrow, they fay, out of which no man escapes. Yet, how they that were thus hemmed in on enery side, in so bare a ground as affoorded not a shrub to couer them, could breake out, and shrowd themselves within woods adjoyning, I should much wonder; did not a greater miracle following call away mine attention. T. Fonteius is in P. Scipio's campe, on the North fide of Iberus, fearefull (as may be supposed) of his owne life, since his Generall, with two parts of the Romane Armie, had little hope to remaine long fafe within it. Thither comes L. Martins, a yong Roman Gentleman of a notable spirit: who ha- 30 uing gathered together the scattered Souldiers, & drawne some Companies out of their Garrisons, makes a pretie Armie. The Souldiers, being to choose a Generall by most voices, preferre this L. Martius before Fonteinus the Lieutenant; as well they may. For Afdrubal, the sonne of Gefco, comming vpon them; this L. Martius fo encourageth his men, (fondly weeping when hee led them forth, vpon remembrance of their more honourable Generalls lately flaine) and admonisheth them of their present necessitie, that he beates the Carthaginians into their Trenches. A notable victorie perhaps he might have gotten, but that he wifely founds the retrait; referuing the fury of his Souldiers to a greater occasion. The Carthaginians are at first amazed, and wonder whence this new boldnesse growes, in enemies lately van- 40 quished, and now againe little better than taken: but when they see, that the Roman dares not follow his advantage, they returne to their former fecuritie; and vtterly despising him, set neither Corps dugard, nor Sentinell, but rest secure, as if no enemie were neere. Martius therefore animates his fouldiers with lively wordes; and tells them, That there is no aduenture more fafe, than that which is furthest from suspition of being vnder-taken. They are soone perswaded to follow him, in any desperate peece of feruice. So he leades them forth by night, and steales vpon the campe of Aldrubal: where finding no guard, but the enemies fast a sleepe, or very drowzie, He enters without relistance, fires their Cabbins, and giues a terrible alarme; fo that all afrighted, the Carthaginians runne head-long one vpon another, they know 59 not which way. All passages out of their campe Martius hath prepossessed, so that there is no way to escape, saue by leaping downe the Rampart: which as many doe, as can thinke voon it, and runne away toward the campe of Afdrubal the sonne of Amilear, that lay fixe miles off. But Martins hath way-laid them. In a Valley betweene their two campes he hath beflowed a Roman cohort, and I know not what number of Horse; so that into this Ambush they fall every one, and are cut in peeces. But left perchance any should have escaped, and give the alarme before his comming; Martius hastens to be there as soone as they. By which diligent speede; He comes early in the morning vpon this further campe: which with no great difficultie he enters; and partly by force, partly by apprehension of danger which the Enemies conceived, when they beheld the Roman thields, foule, and bloudied with their former execution, He drives head-long into flight, all that can faue themselves from the fury of the fword. Thirtie feuen thouland of the enemics periffi in this to nights worke; belides a thouland eight hundred and thirty, that are taken prisoners. Hereunto Valerius Antias addes, that the campe of Mago was also taken, and seuch thousand flaine : and that in another battaile with Asdrubal, there were flaine tenne thousand more; besides soure thousand three hundred and thirtie, taken prisoners. Such is the power of fome Historians. Limie therefore bath elsewhere well obserued, That there is none so intemperate, as Valerius Antias, in multiplying the numbers that have fallen in battailes. That, whilest Martius was making an Oration to his fouldiers, a flame of fire shone about his head, Livie reporteth as a common tale, not giving thereto any credit : and temperately concludeth, That this Captaine Martins got a great name; which he might well doe, if with fo fmall forces, and in 20 fuch diffresse. He could clearely get off from the Enemies, and give them any parting blow, though it were farre selfe than that which is here set downe.

Of these occurrents L. Martius sent word to Rome, not forgetting his owne good feruice, what selfecter it was, but setting to ut in such wise, as the Senate might judge him worthy to hold the place of their Vicegerent in Spane: which the better to intimate vnto them, He stilled himselse Propreton. The Fathers were no lessen moved with the tidings, than the case required: and therefore tooke such carefull order, for supplying their forces in Spaine; that although Hamibal came to the gates of Rome; ere the Companies, leuied to serve in that Province, could be sent away; yet would they not shay a tide for desine of the site is selfe, but shipped them in all hasses of 30 Spaine. As for that title of Propretor, which Martius had affurned, they thought it too great for him, and were offended at his prefumption in vsurping it: forefeeing well, that it was a matter of ill confequence, to have the fouldiers abroad make choice, among themsellues, of those that should command Armies and Provinces. Therefore C.Clandius New was dispatched away, with all convenient haste, into Spaine: carrying with him about fixe thousand of the Roman foor, and as many of the Latines, with three hundred Roman Horseand of the Latines eight hundred,

It happened well, that about the ctimes, the affaires of Rome beganne to prosper in Halie, and associated when the content of the Malie, and associated when the content of the Malie, and associated when the content of the Malie, the victories of Matrius would ill have served, either to keepe sooting in Spaine, or to 40 stop the Carthaginian Armies from marching towards the Alpes. For when Claudius, landing with his new forces, tooke charge of that remainder of the Armie, which was under Matrius & Fantius; he should stire rokens of the outerthrowes received, than of those miraculous victories, whereof Martius had made his vaunts unto the Senate. The Roman partie was for saken by most of the Spanish friends: whom how to reclaime, it could not easily be deutied. Yet Claudius advanced boldly towards Astrabal the brother of Hamibal: whom he found among the Anstein, neere enough at hand, incamped in a place called Lapides art; out of which there was no issue, but only through a streight, whereon the Roman science at his first comming. What should have tempted any man of vnderstanding to incampe in such a place, it

50 doe not finde: and as little reason can I find in that which followed. For it is said, That Astrobal, seeing himselfe thus lockt vp, made offer to depart for the with out of all Spaine, and quit the Prouince to the Romans, vpon condition, that he and his Armie might be thence dismissed. That he spent many daies, in entertayning parlee with Claudius about this businesse, That night by night he econucied his soor-men

(a few at a time) through very difficult passages, out of the danger; and that finally taking advantage of a mistie day, Hee stole away with all his Horse and Elephants, leaving his campe emptie. If we consider, that there were at the same time, besides this Aldrubal, two other Carthaginian Generalls in Spaine; wee shall finde no leffe cause to wonder at the simplicity of Claudius, who hoped to conclude a bargaine for fo great a Countrie, with one of these three Chiestaines, than at the strange nature of those passages: through which the foot-men could hardly creepe out by night; the Horle and Elephants eafly following them in a darke millie day. Wherefore in giuing beliefe to fuch a tale, it is needfull that we suppose, both the danger wherin the Cartha status were, and the conditions offered for their safe departure, to to haue beene of farre leffe value. Howfoeuer it was; neither this, nor ought elfe that the Romans could doe, served to purchase any new friends in Spaine, or to recover the old which they had loft. Like enough it is, that the old Souldiers, which had chosen Martius their Propretor, tooke it not well, that the Senate, regardlesse of their good deferts, had repealed their Election, and fent a Propretor whom they fancied not so well. Some such occasion may have moved them to desire a Proconful, and (perhaps) yong Scipio by name: as if a title of greater dignitie, were needfull to worke regard in the Barbarians; and the beloued memorie of Cn. and Publiss, likely to doe good, were it reviued in one of the same Familie. Whether upon these, or vpon other reasons; C. Clandius was recalled out of the Province; and Publius the 20 fonne of P: Scipio fent Proconful into Spaine.

This is that P. Schpio, who afterward transferred the warre into Africk: where he happily ended it, to the great honour and benefit of his Countrie. He was a man of goodly prefence, and fingularly well conditioned: especially he excelled in Temperance, Continencie, Bountie, and other Vertues that purchase loue; of which qualities what great vie he made, shall appeare in the tenour of his Actions following. As for those things that are reported of him, sauouring a little too much of the great Alexanders vanitie; How he yied to walke alone in the Capitoll, as one that had fome fecret conference with Iupiter; How a Dragon (which must have beene one of the gods; and, in likelihood, Jupiter himselfe) was thought to have conversed with his 30 Mother, entring her chamber often, and vanishing away at the comming in of any man; and how of these matters he nourished the rumour, by doubtfull answeres; I hold them no better than meere fables, deuised by Historians, who sought thereby to adde vnto the glory of Rome: that this noble Citie might seeme, not only to haue furpassed otheir Nations in vertue of the generalitie, but also in great worth of one fingle man. To this end nothing is left out, that might ferue to adorne this Roman Champion. For it is confidently written, as a matter of viquestionable truth. That when a Proconful was to be chosen for Spaine, there durst not any Captaine of the principall Citizens offer himfelfe as Petitioner, for that honourable, but dangerous charge; That the People of Rome were much assonished thereat; That 40 when the day of Election came, all the Princes of the Citie stood looking one another in the face, not one of them having the heart, to adventure himselfe in such a desperate service; and finally, that this P. Cornelius Scipio, being then about source and twentie yeeres of age, getting vp on an high place where hee might be seene of all the Multitude, requested, and obtained, that the Office might be conferred vp. on him. If this were true, then were all the victories of L. Martins no better than dreames: and either very vnreasonable was the searc of all the Roman Captaines. who durst not follow Claudius Nero, that not long before was gone into Spaine Propretor; or very bad intelligence they had out of the Province, which Afdrubal the Carthaginian, as we heard even now, was ready to abandon. But vpon these inco- 50 herences, which I finde in the too partiall Roman Historians, I doe not willingly

P. Scipio was fent Proconful into Spaine; and with him was joyned M. Iunius Syllanus, as Propretor, and his Coadjutor. They carried with them ten thou faud foot, and a thousand horse, in thirtie Quinquereme Gallies. With these they landed at Emporia; and marched from thence to Tarracon alongst the Sea-coast. At the tame of Scipios arrivall, it is said, that Embassages came to him apace from all quarters of the Proujnce: which he entertained with fuch a majestie, as bred a wonderfull opinion of him. As for the Enemics, they were greatly afraid of him: and so much the greater was their feare, by how much the leffe they could give any reason of it. If wee must beleeve this, then must wee needs beleeve, that their teare was even as great as could be: for very little cause there was, to be terrified with the same of so yong a man, which had as yet performed nothing. All the winter following (or, as some to thinke, all the next yeere) heedid nothing : but spent the time perhaps, as his foregoers had done, in treating with the Spaniards. His first enterprise was against new Carthage: vpon which he came vnexpected, with fine and twentiethou fand foot, and two thousand fine hundred horse; his Sea-forces coasting him, and moderating their course in such wise, that they arrived there together with him. Hee affailed the Towne by Land and Sea; and wanne it by affault the first day. The Carthaginians loft it, by their too much confidence vpon the strength of it: which caused them to man it more flenderly, than was requifite. Yet it might haue been well enough defended.if some Fisher-men of Tarracon had not discoucred vnto Scipio, a secret pasfage vnto the walls; whereof the Townsmen themselues were either ignorant, or 20 thought (at least) that their enemies could have no notice. This Citie of new Carthaze, refembled the old and great Carthage in fituation, standing vpon a demi-Iland, betweene an Hauen and a great Lake, All the Westerne side of the walls, and somewhat of the North, was fenced with this Lake: which the Fisher-men of Tarracon had founded; and finding in some part thereof a shelfe, whereon at low water men might passe knee-deepe, or (at most) wading up to the Nauill, Scipio thrust thereinto fome Companies of his men, who recoursed the top of the wals without relistance: the place being left without guard, as able to defend it felfe by the natural litrength. These falling suddenly upon the backs of the Carthaginians within the Citie; casily forced a gate, and gaue free entrance to the Roman Armie. What bootie was found 30 within the Towne, Liuie himselfe cannot certainely affirme; but is faine to say, That some Roman Historians told lies without measure, in way of amplification. By that small proportion of riches, which was afterward carried by Scipio into the Roman Treasurie, we may casily perceive, how great a vanitie it was to say, That all the wealth of Africke and Spaine, was heaped up in that one Towne. But therein were bestowed all the Spanish Hostages: (or at least of the adjoyning Provinces) whom Scipio entreated with fingular courtefie; restoring them vnto their kindred and friends, in such gracious manner, as doubled the thankes due to so great a benefit. Hereupon a Prince of the Celtiberians, and two pettie Kings of the Ilergetes and Lacetani, neerest Neighbours to Tarracon, and dwelling on the North side of Iberus, 40 for soke the Carthaginian partie; and joyned with the Romans. The speech of Indibilis, King of the Ilergetes, is much commended; for that he did not vant himfelfe, as commonly fugitines vie, of the pleasure which he did vnto the Romans, in revolting from their Enemies; but rather excused this his changing side, as being thereto compelled by injuries of the Carthagenians, and inuited by the honorable dealing of Scipio. This temperate estimation of his new professed friendship, was indeede no vnsuretoken, that it should be long-lasting. But if the Ilergetes had long ere this (as we have heard before) for faken the Carthaginian partie, and floutly held themselues as friendsto Cn. Scipio; then could nothing haue beene deuised more vaine, than this Oration of Indibilis their King, excusing, as new, his taking part with the same,

50 when he should have rather craved pardon for his breach of alliance, formerly contracted with the Father and the Vncle. Most likely therefore it is, that how locuer the two elder Seipiss had gotten some few places among these their Neighbours, and held them by strength; yet were the Roman's neuer Masters of the Countrie, till this worthy Commander, by recovering their Hostages from the Carthaginians, and by

by htt great munificence in fending them home, wanne vnto himfelfe the affured loue and affurance of these Princes. The Carthagmian Generalls, when they heard of this folfe, were very forrie; yet neuerthelesse they set a good saccon the matter; saying, That a young man, having stolne a Towne by surprise, was too farre transported, and ouer-joyed, but that shortly they would meet with him, and put him in minde of his Father and Vacle; which would alter his moode, and bring him to a more contenient temper.

Now if I should here interpose mine owne conjecture; I should bee bold to say, That the Carthiginians were at this time buffe, in fetting foorth towards Italie; and that Scipio, to divert them, vnder-tooke new Carthage, as his Father and Vncle, vp- 10 on the like occasion, sate downe before Ibera. And in this respect I would suppose, that it had not been much amisse, if the passage ouer the Lake had beene vindiscouered, and the Towne held out some longer while. For howsoeuer that particular Action was the more fortunate, in comming to such good iffue vpon the first day: yet in the generalitie of the businesse, betweene Rome and Carthage, it was more to be wished, that Asarabal should bee staied from going into Italy, than that halfe of Spaine should be taken from him. Whereas therefore he had nothing left to do, that fhould hinder his journey; Mago, and Afdrubal, the sonne of Gifco, were thought sufficient to hold Scipio worke, in that lingring warre of taking and retaking Townes, whilest the maine of the Carthaginian forces, under Afdrubal, the sonne of Amilear, 20 went to a greater enterprise: euen to fight in triall of the Empire. But the Roman Hiflorians tell this after another fashion; and say, That Astrubal was beaten into Italy: whither heran for feare, as thinking himselfe ill assured of the Spaniards, as long as they might but heare the name of Scipio. Scipio, fay they, comming vpon Afdrubal, his Vantcourrers charged fo lustily the Caribaginian horse, that they draue them into their Trenches : and made it apparent, even by that small peece of fernice, how full of spirit the Roman Armie was, and how dejected the Enemie. Afdrubal therefore by night retired out of that even ground, and occupied an Hill, compassed on three sides with a River, very steepe of ascent, and not easie of accesse on the forefide; by which himselfe got vp, and was to be followed by the Romans. On 30 the top of it there was a Plaine, whereon he strongly incamped himselfe : and in the mid-way, between the top and root of the Hill, was also another Plainesinto which he descended, more vpon brauery, that he might not seeme to hide himselfe within his Trenches, than for that he durst adventure his Armie to the hazard of a bittell. for which this was no equall ground. But fuch advantage of place could not faue him from the Romans. They climed up the Hill to him; they recourred even footing with him; droue him out of this lower Plaine, vp into his Campe on the Hilltop: whither although the aftent were very difficult, and his Elephants bestowed in the smoothest places to hinder their approch; yet compassing about, and seeking paffage where it was hardeft to be found; but much more ftrongly breaking their 40 way, where the Carthaginians had got up before them, they draue both Men and E-lephants head-long, I know not whither: for it is faid, that there was no way to flie. Out of fuch a battell, wherein he loft eight thou fand men, Afdrubal is faid to have escaped; and gathering together his dispersed troups, to have marched towards the Pyrenees, having fent away his Elephants ere the fight beganne. Neuertheles, Maro. and Afdrubal, the sonne of Gifco, are reported after this, to have consulted with him about this warre; and finally to have concluded, that goe he needs must, were it but to carrie all the Spaniards as farre as might be, from the name of Scipio. How likely this was to have been true, it shall appeare at his comming into Italy; whence these incoherent relations of the Spanish affaires, have too long detained vs.

CHAP. 3. S.12.

Eleft Hannibal wintering at Capua: where hee and his new Confeder rates reioyced (as may bee thought) not a little, to heare the good newes from Carthage of fuch mightic aide, as was decreed to be fent thence wnto him. In former times hee had found worke enough, to thence vnto him. In former times hee had found worke enough, to carrie the Romans corne into his own barnes, and to drive away their Cattell to Gerron: his victories affoording him little other profit, then fullenance for his Armie; by making him Maker of the open field. Hee might perhaps haue forc'd some walled Townes, in like fort as he did Gerron, and the Castle of Canna: but had he spent much time, about the getting of any one place well defended; the 20 hunger, that his Armie must have endured the Winter and Spring following, vntill corne were ripe, would have grieuously punished him for such imploiment of the Summer. This may have beene the reason, why hee forbore to aduenture vpon Rome after his victorie at Canna. For had he failed (as it was a matter of no certaintie) to carrie the Citie at his first comming; want of victuals would have compelled him to quit the enterprise. Yea, many of the people that opened so hashily their gates vnto him, vpon the fresh bruit of his glorious successe, would have taken time of deliberation, and waited perhaps the euent of another battell: if being, either for v .nt of meanes to force the Citie, or of necessaries to continue a siege before it, repelled (as might feeme) from the walls of Rome, hee had prefented himfelfe vnto 30 them with a leffened reputation, somewhat later in the yeere; when time to force their obedience was wanting, vnleffe they would freely yeeld it. But this great part of the care and trauell was past, when so many States of Italie were become his: the yeere following, the Samnites, and other old enemies of Rome, were like to receive a notable pleasure of their new alliance with Carthage, by helping to lay siege vnto that proud Citie, which so long had held them in subjection. Thus the Winter was paffed ouer joyfully, fauing that there came not any tidings of the preparations, to fecond the welcom report of those mightie forces, that were decreed and expected. The Spring drew on and of the promifed supply there arrived no more, than only the Elephants. How late it was ere these came, I finde not: onely we find, that af-40 ter this he had aboue thirtie of them; whereas all, sauc one, that hee brought ouer the Alpes, had been loft in his journey through the marishes of Hetruria. Very bad excuse of this exceeding negligence, they that brought the Elephants could make vnto Hannibal. If they were his friends, they told him truly, what mischieses the persuasion of Hanno wrought among the too niggardly Carthaginians. Otherwise, they might perhaps informe him, that it was thought a fafer, though a farther way about, to passe along through Spaine and Gaule, as hee himselfe had done; and increase the Armie by hiring the Barbarians in the journey; than to commit the maine firength of the r Citie, to the hazard of the Seas: especially wanting a commodious Hauen, to receive the fleete that should carrie such a number of Men, Horses, and 50 Elephants, with all needfull provisions. With these allegations Hannibal must rest content; and fecke, as well as he can, to fatisfie his Italian Confederates. Therefore when time of the yeere ferued. Hee tooke the field: and having finished what refled to be done at Casilinum, sought to make himself Master of some good Hauen-towne thereabout; that might ferue to entertaine the Carthaginian fleet; or take from his Enemies at home all excufe, which they might pretend by want thereof. To the fame purpofe, and to doe what else was needfull, He sent Himito vito the Leorians, and Hanno to the Luens; not forgetting at once to assay all and set of the Luens into forgetting at once to assay all and set of social and Sardinia; since the liege of Rome must needes bee deferred vito another yeere. Hanno made an ill journey of it, being met, or ouer-taken, by T. Semponius Longus: who file about two thousand of his men, with the losse of tewer, than three hundred Romans. But Himileo sped farre better. By helpe of the Brutians, his good friends, hee wanne Petella or Petilia by force, after it had held our some moneths. Hee wanne klewile Confinitis; and Grotzen, that was forsken by the Inhabitants. Also the Citic of Locri, which was of great importance, yeelded vinto to him: as did all other places thereabour; except only the Towneof Rhegium, ouer-gainst Stell.

The great faith of the Petilians is worthic to be recorded, as a notable testimonic of the good government, under which the Roman subjects lived. As for the Samnites, Campans, and others, whose carnelinesse in rebellion may seeme to proue the contrarie; we are to confider, That they had lately contended with Rome for Soueraignetic, and were now transported with ambition: which Reason can hardly moderate, or Benefits allay. The Petilians, in the very beginning of their danger, did fend to Rome for helpe: where their Messengers received answere from the Senate, That the publike misfortunes had not left meanes, to relieve their Affociates 20 that were fo farre distant. The Petilian Messengers (Embassadours they are termed; as were all others, publikely fent from Cities of the Roman Subjection, that had a priuate jurisdiction within themselues) fell downe to the ground, and humbly befought the Fathers, not to give them away : promiting to doe and fuffer what foeuer was possible, in defence of their Towne, against the Carthaginians. Hereupon the Senate fell to confultation againe: and hauing throughly confidered all their forces remaining, plainely confessed, that it was not in their power to gineany reliefe. Wherefore these Embassadours were willed to returne home, and to bid their Citizens prouide hereafter for their owne fatetie, as having alreadie discharged their faith to the vtmoft. All this not with standing, the Petilians (as was faid) held out 30 fome moneths; and having striven in vaine to defend themselves, when there was no apparant possibilitie, gaue to the Carthaginians a bloudie victoric oper them; being vanquished as much by famine, as by any violence of the Assailants.

The Romans at this time were indeede in such ill case, that Hannibal, with a little helpe from Carthage, might have reduced them into termes of great extremitie. For whereas, in a great brauerie, before their loffe at Canna; they had shewed their high mindes, by entertaining the care of things farre off, notwithstanding the great warre that lay vpon them fo neere at hand: it now fell out miferably all at once, that their fortune abroad was no whit better then at home. L. Posthumius Albinus their Pretor they had fent, with an Armie of fine and twentiethousand, into Gaule; 40 to the Illyrian King Pineus they had fent for their Tribute due, whereof the pay-day was past, willing him, if hee defired forbearance, to deliuer hostages for his performance of what was due; and to Philip King of Mucedon they had fent, to require. that he should deliuer vp vnto them Demetrius Pharius, their Subject and Rebellwhom he had received. But now from all quarters they heare tidings, little futeable to their former glorious conceits. Posthumus with all his Armie was cut in peeces by the Gaules, in such fort, that scarce ten men escaped. The manner of his ouerthrow was very strange. There was a great Wood, called by the Gaules, Litana; through which he was to passe. Against his comming, the Enemies had sawed the Trees fo farre, that a little force would serve to cast them downe. When there- 50 fore Posthumius, with his whole Armie, was entred into this dangerous passage, the Gaules, that lay about the Wood, beganne to cast downe the Trees: which falling one against another, bore all downe so fast, that the Romans were over-whelmed, Men and Horses; in such wise, that no more escaped, than is said before.

How this tedious worke, of fawing so many Trees, could take desired effect, and neither bee perceived, nor made trustrate, either by some winde, that might have blowne all downe before the Romans entred, or by some other of those many accidents, whereto the device was subject; I doe not well conceive. Yet some such thing may have beenedone; and what failed in the stratagem, supplied with the Enemies sword. It is not perhaps worthie to be omitted, as a monument of the sauge condition, wherewith Lombardie, a Countrie now so civill, was infected in elder times, That of Possbanus his skull, being cleansed, and trimmed up with gold, a drinking cup was made, and conscerated in their principall Temple, as an holy of vessell, for the vse of the Priest in their solemnities. Of this great overthrow, when word was brought to Rome; the amazement was no lesse that the calamitie. But forrow could give no remedie to the mischiete: and anger was vaine, where there wanted forces to reuenge. Tribute from the Hyrians there came none: neither doe Issue sha and was a second time demanded; this we finde, That with Pleuratus, word was brought to Rome; the amazement was no leffe than the calamitie. But forrow could give no remedie to the milébiefe: and anger was vaine, where there wainted forces to renenge. Tribute from the Illyrians there came none: neither doe Ifinde, that any was a fecond time demanded; this we finde, That with Pleuratus, and Seerdiletus Illyrian Kings, as also with Gentus, who raigned within a few yecres following, the Romans dealt vpone uen tearmes; entreating their affishance against Philip and Perfeus; not commanding their dutie, as Vassalis. The Macedonian troubled them yet a little further. For having assured his affaires in Greece, and enjoying lesser to looke into the doings abroad. Hee sent Emballadours to Hannibal: with 20 whom he made a league, upon these conditions; That the King in person should come into Italie, and with all his forces, by Land and Sea, affist the Carthagimans in 20 whom he made a league, you the teconductions; I hat the King in perion inbuild come into Italicand withall his forces, by Land and Sea, afflict the Carthaginans in the Roman warre, vntill it were finished; That Rome, and all Italie, together with all the spoile therein to bee gotten, should bee left entire vnto the State of Carthage; And that afterwards Itannibad with his Armie should passe into Greece, and there as fift Philip, vntill hee had subdued all his Enemies; (which were the Etalians, Thracians, King Antiochus, and others) leauing semblably vnto him the full possession that Countrie, and the lles adjoyning. But such predisposition of Kingdomes and Prouinces, is lightly comptrolled by the dusine Providence, which therein shewes Itasses she seed to the subdession of the subdession raignetie, by which It rules the whole World, and all that therein is.

The first Embassadours that Philip sent, stell into the Romans hands, in their iournic towards Hammhalt and being examined what they were, aduentured vpon a bold lie, saying, That they were sent from the King of Macedon to Rome, there to make a League with the Senate and People, and offer his helpe in this time of great necessing. The sene were sere so welcome, that the ioy thereof tooks away all care of making better inquirie. So they were souingly seasted; and friendly distinisted, with guides that should leade them the way, and thew them how to auoide the Carthoginians. But they being thus instructed concerning their iournie, sell wilfully into the 40 Campe of Hamibal: who entertained them after a better fallions, and concluded the business, about which they came, youn the points before rememberd. In their returne homeward, they happened againe valuekily to bee descried by the Roman.

the bufineffe, about which they came, you the points before remembred. In their returne homeward, they happened againe vulnekily to bee deferied by the Roman fleete; which, miltrufting them to bee of the Carthagmian partie, gaue them chace. They did their beft to haue efcaped: but being ouer-taken, they fuffered the Roman to come aboord; and trufting to the lichat once had ferued them, faid it agains, That hauing been fent from King Philap, to make a League with the People of Rome, they were not able, by reason of the Carthagmians lying betweene, to get any farther than to Majerus the Pretor, ynto whom they had signified the good affection of the King their Master. The tale was now less credible than before: 50 and (which marred all) Gisea, Bossar, and Mage, with their followers, Carthagmians that were fent with them from Hamibal to ratifie the agreement, being presently

50 and (which marred all) Gileo, Boltar, and Mago, with their followers, Cartingimans that were fent with them from Hannibal to ratific the agreement, being prefently detected, made the matter apparant. Wherefore a little inquifition ferrued to finde all out: so that at length Hannibals owne letters to King Philip were deliuered vp, and the whole businesseed. The Embassadours and their followers were fent SIIII 3 close close prisoners to Rome: where the chiefe of them were cast into prison; and the rest fold for bond-slaues. Yet one of their ships that escaped, carried word into Macadon of all that had happened. Whereupon a new Embassage was sent, that went and returned with better speede; concluding, as was agreed before; onely with some loss of time.

The Romans were exceedingly perplexed: thinking with what heatife weight this Macedonian warre, in an cuill houre, was likely to fall vpon them; when their shoulders were over-burdened with the load of the Carthaginian. Yet they tooke a noble resolution; and suteable vnto that, whereby they kept off the storme, that else would have beaten upon them from Spaine. They judged it more case, with small 10 forces to detaine Philip in Greece, than with all their strength to refish him in Italie. And herein they were in the right. For that the very reputation of a King of Maceelon, joining with Hannibal in such a time, would have sufficed to shake the allegeance not onely of the Latines, and other their most faithfull Subjects, but even of the Roman Colonies that held all priviledges of the Citie, it will appeare by the following fuccesse of things. M. Valerius the Pretor, with twentie Quinquereme Gallies, was appointed to attend upon the Macedonian, and to fet on foot some commotion in Greece; or to nourish the troubles alreadic therein begunne. Philip was busic about the Sea-townes, that looked towards Italie, fetting vpon Apollonia; and thence falling upon Orients; which he wanne, and fo returned to Apollonia againe. The Epi- 20 rots craued helpe of M. Valerius : or rather accepted his kinde offers; who had none other bulinesse to doe. The Garrison that Philip had left in Oricum, was strong enough to hold the Townesmen in good order; but not to keepe out the Romans:of whose daring to attempt any thing against him, on that side the Sea, Philip as then had no suspition. Valerous therefore easily regained the Towne; and sent thence a thousand men, under Neutus Crispus, an under-taking and expert Captaine; which got by night into Apollonia. These made a notable sallie, and brake into Philips Trenches with so great slaughter, that they forced him to forsake his camp, & raise the fiege. The King purposed (as it is faid) to have departed thence by Sea: but Valerius, comming with his fleete from Oricum, stopped vp the mouth of the River; 30 fo that hee was faine to burne his ships, (which belike were no better than long boates) and depart ill furnished of carriages, by Land. After this, Valerius dealt with the Atolians, a Nationalwaies enemie to the Crowne of Macedon; and eafily perfwaded them (being so affected, as hath elsewhere beene shewed) to make strong warre on Philip; wherein he promifed them great affiftance from the Romans. That which most moued the troublesome spirits of the Atolians, was the hope of getting Acarnania: after which they had gaped long; and whereof the Roman was as liberal in making promife, as if already it had beene his owne. So a league was made betweene them : and afterward folemnely published at Olympia, by the Ætolians; and by the Romans, in their Capitoll. The conditions were, That from Atolia to Corcyra, 40 in which space Acarnania was contained, all the Countrie should bee subdued, and left upon the Atolians, the pillage only to be given to the Romans. And that if the Ætolians made peace with Philip, it shuld be with Provision, to hold no longer, than whilest he abstained from doing injurie to the Romans, or their Associates. This was indeede the only point, whereat Valerius aimed, who promifed as much on the Romans behalfe, That they should not make peace with the Macedonian, unlesse it were with like condition of including the Atolians. Into this League was place referred for the Lacedemonians and Eleans, as to those that had made or favoured the side of Cleomenes against the Macedonian, to enter at their pleasure. The like regard was had of Attalus, Pleuratus, and Scerdiletus: the first of which raigned at Pergamus, in 50 Asia the lesse, a Prince hereafter much to bee spoken of; the other two held some part of Illyria, about which the Romans were to farre from contending with them. that gladly they fought to get their friendly acquaintance. But the names of these Associates, are thrust into the Treatic; rather to give it countenance, than for any readinesse which they disclose to enter thereinto. The Ætolians alone, and chiefly Scopes their Pretor, with Dorymachus and others, are yet a while the onely men, of whom the Roman Generals must make much; as the late French King, Henrie the tourth, when he had only the title of Amarre, was faid to court the Majors of Rochel. Philip was not idle, when he heard wherevento the Etolians tended. He repaired his Armie; made a countenance of warre vpon the Illyriam, and other his borderers, that were wont in times of danger to infest the Kingdome of Macedon; wasted the Countrie about Oricim and Apollonia; and ouer-running the Pelagonians, Dardanians, and others, whom he held suspected, came downe into Thessale, whence hee made 10 shew as if he would invade Liolia. By the same of this Expedition, He thought to flirre vp all the Greekes adjoyning, against the Liolians; whom they generally detested as a nest of Robbers, troublesome to all the Countrie. To which purpose, and to hinder the Atolians from breaking into Greece, He left Perfem, his sonne & heire, with foure thousand men, vpon their borders : with the rest of his Armie, before greater businesse thould over-take and entangle him. He made a long journie into Thrace, against a people called the Medes; that were wont to fall vpon Macedon, whenfocuer the King was abfent. The Liolians, hearing of his departure, armed as many as they could against the Aca manians; in hope to fubdue those their daily enemies, and winne their little Countrie, ere hee should beeable to returne. Hereto it 20 much availed, that the Romans had alreadic taken Oeniade and Navos, Acarnanian Townes, conucniently fituated to let in an Armie; and configned them vnto the Atolians, according to the tenor of the contract lately made with them. But the fout resolution of the Acarmanians, to die (as we say) enery Mothers sonne of them, in desence of their Countrie; together with the great haste of the Macedonian (who laied afide all other bufineffe) to fuccour these his friends; caused the Atohans to forfake their enterprise. When this Expedition was given over, the Romans and Ætolians fell vpon Anticyre, which they tooke: the Romans affailing it by Sea, the

Atolians by Land. The Atolians had the Towne, and the Romans the Spoile. For these good services M. Valerius was chosen Consulat Rome; and P. Sulpicius 30 fent in his stead, to keepe the warre on foot in Greece. But besides the Roman helpe, Attalus out of Asa came ouer to affift the Atolians. He was chiefly moued, by his owne jealousie of Philips greatnesse: though somewhat also tickled with the vanity, of being chosen by the Atolians their principall Magistrate; which honour, though no better than titularie, he tooke in very louing part. Against the forces which &ttalus and the Romans had fent, being joyned with the maine power of Etolia, Philip tried the fortune of two battailes; and was victorious in each of them. Hercupon, these his troublesome Neighbours desired peace of him, and vsed their best meanes to get it. But when the day, appointed for the conclusion thereof, was come: their Embaffadours, in stead of making submission, proposed vnto him such intolerable 40 conditions, as ill beseemed vanquished men to offer: and might therefore well testific, that their mindes were altered. It was not any loue of peace, but seare of being belieged in their owne Townes, that had made them delirous of composition. This feare being taken away, by the encouragements of Attalus and the Romans, they were as fierce as euer: and thrust a Garrison of their owne, and some Roman friends, into Elis; which threatned Achaia, wherein Philip then lay. The Romans, making a cut ouer the streight from Naupatius, wasted the Countrie in a terrible brauerie: wherein Philip requited them; comming vpon them in hafte from the Nemaan Games (which he was then celebrating) and fending them faster away, but nothing richer, than they came. In the heat of this contention, Prusias King of Bithynia, fearing the growth of At-

Jin the heat of this contention, Prussas King of Bit bynia, tearing the growth of Astalus, no leffe than Attalus held suspected the power of Philip; sent a Nauie into Greece, to affist the Maeed brian partie. The like did the Carthagmian: and upon greater reason; as being more interested in the success of his affaires. Philip was too weake by Sea: and though he could man some two hundred ships; yet the Vessels.

were fuch as could not hold out against the Roman Quinqueremes. Wherefore it behoued him, to vie the helpe of his good friends the Carthaginians. But their aide came somewhat too late: which might better at first haue kept those Enemies from fastning upon any part of Greece; than afterwards it could ferne to drive them out, when they had pierced into the bowels of that Countrie. Ere Philip could attempt any thing by Sea; it was needfull that he should correct the Eleans, bad Neighbours to the Achaians his principall Confederates. But in affailing their Towne, Hee was encountred by the Etolian and Roman Garrison; which draue him back with some losse. In such cases, especially where God intends a great conversion of Empire, Fame is very powerfull in working. The King had received no great detriment, in 10 his retrait from Elis: rather he had given testimonie of his personall valour, in fighting well on foot, when his horse was slaine under him. He had also soone after taken a great multitude of the Eleans, to the number of foure thousand; with some twentiethousand head of Cattaile, which they had brought together into a place of safetie, as they thought, when their Countrie was inuaded. But it had happened, that in his pursuit of the Roman forragers about Sieyon, his horse running hastily vnder a low tree, had torne off one of the hornes, which (after the falhion of those times) the King wore in his Crest. This was gathered vp by an Atolian; who carried it home, and shewed it as a token of Philips death. The horne was well known, and the tale beleeved. All Macedon therefore was in an yprore: and not onely 20 the Borderers, readic to fall vpon the Countrie, but some Captaines of Philip, easily corrupted; who thinking to make themselves a fortune in that change of things, ranne into such treason, as they might better hope to make good, than to excuse. Hereupon the King returned home; leaving not three thousand men, to affist his friends the Acheans. He also tooke order, to have Beacons erected; that might give him notice of the Enemies doings; vpon whom hee meant shortly to returne. The affaires of Macedon, his presence quickly established. But in Greece all went ill-fauouredly: especially in the Ile of Eubaa, where one Plator betraied to Attalus, and the Romans, the Towns of Oreum, ere Philip could arrive to helpe it; where also the strong Citie of Chalcis was likely to have beene lost, if heehad not comethe sooner. 30 He made such hastic marches, that he had almost taken Attalus in the Citie of Opus. This Citie, lying ouer against Eubæa, Attalus had wonne, more through the cowardize of the people, than any great force that he had vied. Now because the Roman fouldiers had defrauded him in the fack of Oreum, and taken all to themselves: it was agreed, that Attalus should make his best profit of the Opuntians; without admitting the Romans to be his sharers. But whilest he was busie, in drawing as much monie as he could out of the Citizens: the fudden tidings of Philips arrivall, made him leave all behinde him, and runne away to the Sea-fide, where he got aboord his fhips; finding the Romans gone before, vpon the like feare. Either the indignitie of this miladventure; or tidings of Prusias the Bithymian his invasion vpon the Kingdome of 40 Pergamus; made Attalus returne home, without staying to take leave of his friends. So Philip recouered Opus; wonne Torone, Tritonos, Drymus, and many small townes in those parts; performing likewise some Actions, of more brauerie than importance, against the Ætolians. In the meane season, Machanidas, the Tyrant of Lacedamon, had beene busie in Peloponnesus; but hearing of Philips arrivall, was returned home.

The Lacedamonians, hearing certaine report of Cleomenes his death in Ægypt, went about to choofe two new Kings; and to conforme themselhes to their old manner of Gouernement. But their estate was so farre out of tune, that their hope of redressing things within the Citie, proued no less vnfortunate, than had beene 50 their attempts of recovering a large Dominion abroad. Lyourgus a Tyrant rose vp among them: vnto whom succeeded this Machanishas; and shortly after came Nabis, that was worse than both of them. They held on the Atolian and Roman side, for seare of the Achans; that were the chiefe Confederates of Philip, and hated extremely the name both of Tyrant, and of Lacedemonian. But of these wee shall speake more hereafter.

**Philip entring into Achaia, and seeing his presence had brought the contentment.

Philip entring into Achaia, and seeing his presence had brought the contentment of assurance to that Countrie; spake braue words to the Assembly of their States, faying, That he had to doe with an Enemie, that was very nimble, and made warre by running away. He told how he had followed them to Chalcis, to Oreum, to Opus, and now into schaia: but could no where finde them, fuch hafte they made, for feare of being ouer-taken. But flight, He faid, was not alwaies prosperous: He should one day light vpon them; as ere this hee fundrie times had done, and still to their to losse. The Achaians were glad to heare these words; and much the more glad, in regard of his good deeds accompanying them. For hee restored vnto their Nation fome Townes, that were in his hand, belonging to them of old. Likewise to the Megalopolitans their Confederates, He rendred Aliphera. The Dymaans, that had beene taken by the Romans, and fold for flaues, He fought out, ranfomed, and put in quiet possession of their owne Citie. Further, pathing ouer the Corinthian Gulfe, Hee fell vpon the Ætolians: whom he draue into the mountaines and woods, or other their ftrongest holds; and wasted their Countrie. This done, Hee tooke leaue of the Acheans: and returning home by Sea, visited the people that were his subjects, or dependants: and animated them fo well, that they rested searclesse of any threatning 20 danger. Then had he leisure to make warre vpon the Dardanians, ill Neighbours to Macedon: with whom neuerthcleffe he was not fo farre occupied, but that he could goe in hand with preparing a fleet of an hundred Gallies, whereby to make himfelfe Mafter of the Sea; the Romans ( fince the departure of Attalus) having not dared to meet or pursue him, when he lately ranne along the coast of Greece, fast by them where they say.

This good inceffe added much reputation to the Macedonian; and emboldened him to make firong warre vpon the Letolians, at their owne doores. As for the Remans; either fome difpleafure, conceived againft their Confederates; or fome feare of danger at home, when A farubal was ready to fall vpon Italie; cauled them to give

30 ouer the care of things in Greece, and leave their friends there to their own fortunes. The Etolians therfore, being drivento great extremitie, were faine to sue for peace vnto Philip; and accept it, vpon what eucr conditions it best pleased him. The agreement was no sooner made, than P. Sempronius with ten thousand foot, a thousand horse, and thirtie fine Gallies, came ouer in great haste (though somewhat too late) to troubleit. Hearing how things went in Leolia, hee turned afide to Dyrrachium, and Apollonia; making a great noise, as if with these his owne forces he would work wonders. But it was not long, ere Philip came to visit him; and found him tame enough. The King presented him battaile: but herefused it : and suffering the Macedonians to waste the Country round about, before his eies, kept himself close with-40 in the walls of Apollonia; making some Ouercures of peace : which caused Philip to returne home quietly. The Romans had not so great cause to be displeased with the Atelians, as had Philip, to take in euill part the demeanor of the Carthaginians. For notwithstanding the Royall offer that he made them, to serue their turne in Italie, and ashist them in getting their hearts desire, before he would expect any requitall: they had not sent any fleet, as in reason they ought, and as considering his want of

ly oncethey came to his helpe, which was, at his last journie into Achaia. But they were gone againe before his arrivall: hauing done nothing, and pretending seare of 50 being taken by the Romans, cuen at such time as Philip, with his owne Naue, durst boldly passed by Sea, and found none that durst oppose him. This rechleste dealing of the Carthagmans, may therefore seeme to have been one of Hanno his tricks; whereof Hannohals to bitterly complained. For it could not but grieve this malaicious man exceedinglysto heare, that to great a King made offer to serve in person under sufficient abilitie by Sea) it is likely they were bound, either to secure the transportation of his Armie, or to free his coast from the Roman and Atolian Pyracies. On-

d. XIII.

How the Romans beganne to recouer their strength by degrees. The noble affection of the Romans, in relecuing the publike necessities of their Common-weale.

MT was a great fault in the Carthaginians, that embracing so many Enterprifes at once, they followed all by the halues: and wasted more menand monieto no purpose, than would have served (if good order had been raken) to finite the whole they have been been as they are finite the whole they have been to finite the whole they are finite the whole they are finite the whole they are finite to the finite they are finite they are finite they are finite they are finite to the finite they are er had beene taken) to finish the whole warre, in farre shorter space; and make themselves Lords of all that the Romans held. This errour

20 had beenethe leffe harmefull, if their care of Italie had beene fuch as it ought. But they suffered Hannibal, to wearie himselfe with expectation of their promised supplies: which being still deferred from yeere to yeere, caused as great opportunities to be lost, as a conquerour could have desired. The death of Posthumus, and destruction of his whole Armie in Gaule; the begunne rebellion of the Sardinians; the death of Hierotheir friend in Syracule; with great alterations, much to their prejudice, in the whole Itle of Sicil; as also that Warre, of which we last spake, threatned from Macedon; happening all at one time; and that so neerely after their terrible ouerthrow at Canna, among so many revolts of their Italian Confederates; would vtterly haue funke the Roman State, had the Carthaginians, if not the first yeere, yet 30 at least the second, sent ouer to Hannibal the forces that were decreed. It is not to be doubted, that even this diversitie of great hopes, appearing from all parts, administred matter vnto Hanno, or such as Hanno was, whereupon to worke For though it wereinthe power of Carthage, to performe all that was decreed for Italie: yet could not that proportion hold, when so many new occurrences brought each along with them their new care; and required their feuerall Armies. This had not been a very bad excuse, if any one of the many occasions offered had been throughly profequited: though it flood with best reason, that the foundation of all other hopes and comforts, which was the prosperitie of Hannibal in his Italian warre, should have beene strengthened; whatsoever had become of the rest. But the slen-49 der troupes, wherewith the Carthaginians fed the warre in Spaine; the lingring aide which they fent, to vp-hold the Sardinian rebellion, when it was alreadic wel-neere bearen downe; their trifling with Philip; and (amongst all these their attempts) their hastie catching at Sicil: little descrued to be thought good reasons of neglecting the maine point, whereto all the rest had reference. Rather every one of these Actions, confidered apart by it felfe, was no otherwife to be allowed as discreetly undertaken, or substantially followed; than by making supposition, That the care of Italie, made the Carthaginians more negligent in all things elfe. Yet if these allegations would not ferue to content Hannibal; then must be patiently endure to know, that his owne Citizens were jealous of his Greatnesse, and durst not trust him with so 30 much power, as should enable him to wrong the State at home.

What soeuer he heard or thought, Hannibal was glad to apply himselfe to Necesfitie; to feede his Italian friends with hopes; and to trifle away the time about Nola, 2xaples, Cuma, and other places: being loth to spend his Armie in an hard siege, that was to beereferued for a worke of more importance. Many offers hee made vpon

Monarchs, and alter the affaires of the World at pleasure. Therefore he had reafon, fuch as Enuie could fuggeft, to perswade the Carthaginians vnto a safe and thriftie course : which was, not to admit into the fellowship of their Italian warres fo mightie a Prince; whom change of affection might make dangerous to their Empire; or his much affection vnto Hannibal, more dangerous to their libertie. Rather they should doe well to saue charges; and feede the Macedonian with hopes; by making many promites of fending a fleet, and fome other fuccours. This would coft nothing: yet would it ferue to terrifie the Romans, and compell them to fend part of their forces from home; that might finde this Enemie worke abroad. So should 10 the Roman Armies be leffened in Italie; and Philip, when once he was engaged in the warre, be veged vnto the profecution, by his owne necessitie: putting the Carthagimians to little or no charges; yea scarce to the labour of giuing him thankes. Now if it might come to passe, as Hannibal euery day did promise, that Rome, and all Italie, should within a while bee at the denotion of Cribige: better it were that the Citie should bee free, so as the troublesome Greekes might addresse their complaints vnto the Carthaginians, as competent Judges between them and the Macedonian, than that Hannibal, with the power of Africk, should wait upon Philip, as his Executioner. to fulfill his will and pleasure, in doing such injuries as would both make the name of a Caribaginian hatefull in Greece, and oblige Philip to be no leffe impudent, in ful- 20 filling all requests of Hannibal. Whether the countaile of Hanno and his fellowes, were fuch as this; or whether the Carthaginians, of their owne disposition without his aduice, were too sparing, and carelesse, the matter (as farre as concerned Philip) came to one reckoning. For they did him no manner of good: but rather dodged with him; euen in that little courtesse which they most pretended. And this perhaps was part of the reason, why hee begunne the building of an hundred Gallies, as if hee would let them and others know, whereto his proper strength would have reached, had he not vainely given credit to faithlesse promises. When therefore the Etolians had submitted themselves alreadie: and when the Romans desired his friendship, as might be thought, for very feare of him; with reputation enough, and 30 not as a forfaken Client of the Carthaginians, but a Prince able to have succoured them in their necessitie, He might giue ouer the warre, and, without reprehension, leave them to themselves. For hee had wilfully entred into trouble for their sakes: but they despised him, as if the quarrell were meerely his owne, and hee vnable to manage it. The vanitie of which their conceits would appeare vnto them : when they should see that with his proper strength he had finished the warre, and concluded it highly to his honour. So the yeere following it was agreed, by mediation of the Epirots, Acarnanians, and others, That the Romans should retain three or foure Townes of Illyria, which they had recourred in this warre, being part of their old Illyrian Conquest: Places no way belonging to the Masedonian; and therefore per- 40 haps inferted into the couenants, that somewhat might seeme to have been gotten. On the other fide, the Atintanes were appointed to returne under the obedience of Philip: who, if they were (as Ortelius probably conjectures) the people of the Coun-

The Confederates and Dependants of the Macedonian, comprehended in this Peace, were Prusias King of Bishynia, the Acheans, Baotians, The Salians, Acarmanians, and Epirots. On the Roman fide were named, first, the People of Ilium, as an honorable remembrance of the Romans descent from Troy; then, Attalus King of Per- 50 gamus; Pleuratus, an Illyrian Prince; and Nabis, the Tyrant of Lacedamon; together with the Eleans, Messenians, and Athenians. The Atolians were omitted, belike, as having agreed for themselves before. But the Eleans and Messenians, followers of the Ætolians, (and by them, as is most likely, comprised in their League with Philip)

trie about Apollonia, then did the Romans abandon part of their gettings; whereby it appeares, that they did not give peace, as they would feeme to have done, but accepted it, vpon conditions somewhat to their losse.

vpon Nola; but alwaies with bad fuccesse. Once Marcellus forght a battaile with him there: yet under the very walls of the Townes, hairing the assistance of the Citizens, that were growne better affected to the Roman side, since the Heads, that inclined them to rebellion, were cut off. About a thousand men Hamibalin that fight lost which was no great martialle; his forces being then divided, and imploied in sundrie parts of Italie at once. Naples was, euen in those daies, a strong Citie; and required a yeers worke to have taken it by force. Wherefore the earnest desire of Hamibal to get it, was alwaies frustrate. Vpon the Towne of Cumse they of Capua had their plot sand were in hope to take it by cunning. They sent to the chiefe Magistrates of the Cumsus, desiring them (as being also Campan) to be present at a solution, where they would consult about their generall good: promising to bring thither a sufficient guard, to assure the whole Assembly, from any danger that might come by the Romans. This motion the Cumsus made shew to entertaine; but privily sent word of all to T. Sempronius Gracehus the Roman Gracehus was a very good man of warre; and happily chosen Consul in so dangerous a time. His Colleague should have beene Posthumius Albinus, that was lately flaine by the Gaules : after whose death Marcellus was chosen; as being judged the fittest man to encounter with Hannibal. But the Roman Augures either found some religious impediment, that nullified the election of Marcellus; or at least they fai- 20 ned so to have done. because this was the first time, that ever two Plebeian Consuls were chosen together. Marcellus therefore gaue ouer the place: and Q. Fabius Maximus the late famous Dictator, was substituted in his roome. But Fabius was detained in the Citie, about matters of Religion, or Superfittion: wherewith Rome was commonly, especially in times of danger, very much troubled. So Gracehus alone, with a Consular Armie, waited vpon Hannibal among the Campans: not able to meet the Enemie in field; yet intentiue to alloccasions, that should be presented. The Volones, or Slaves, that lately had been earmed, were no small part of his followers. These, and the rest of his men, Hee continually trained : and had not a greater care, to make his Armie skilfull in the exercises of warre; than to keepe 20 it from quarrels, that might arise by vpbraiding one another with their base con-

Whilest the Consul was thus busied at Linternum; the Senators of Cuma sent him word, of all that had passed between them and the Capuans. It was a good occasion to slesh his men, and make them consident against the Enemie; of whom hitherto they had bad experience. Gracchus therefore put himselse into Cume: whence heiffued at fuch time, as the Magistrates of that Citie were expected by the Campans. The Sacrifice was to be performed by night, at a place called Hama, three miles from Cuma. There lay Marius Alfius the chiefe Magistrate of Capua, with fourteene thousand men; not wholly intent either to the Sacrifice, or to any dan- 40 ger that might interrupt it; but rather deuising how to surprise others, than fearing himselfe to be assailed. The Consul therefore, suffering none to goe forth of Cuma, that might beare word of him to the Enemies, issued out of the Towne when it grew darke: his men being well refreshed with meat and sleepe, the day before, that they might hold out the better in this nights feruice. So he came voon the Capuans vnawares: and flew more than two thousand of them, together with their Commander; loofing not aboue an hundred of his ownemen. Their campe hee tooke: but tarried not long to rifle it, for feare of Hannibal; who lay not farre off. By this his prouidence, He escaped a greater losse, than he had brought vpon the Enemies. For when Hannibal was enformed how things went at Hama; forthwith he marched 50 thither: hoping to finde those yong souldiers, and slaues, busied in making spoile, and loading themselues with the bootie. But they were all gotten safe within Cuma; which partly for anger, partly for defire of gaining it, & partly at the vigent entreatie of the Capuans, Hannibal affailed the next day. Much labour, and with ill successe, the Carthaginians and their fellowes spent, about this Towne. They raised a wood-den Tower against it: which they brought close vnto the walls; thinking thereby to force an Entrie. But the Desendants, on the inside of the wall, raised against this an higher Tower: whence they made resistance; and sound meanes at length, to consume with fire the worke or their Enemies. While the Carthaginians were busic in quenching the fire; the Romans, fallying out of the Towneat two gates, charged them valiantly, and draue them to their trenches, with the slaughter of about sourcene hundred. The Consul wisely sounded the Retreat, ere his men were too faire engaged, and Hannibal in a readinesse to require their feruice. Neither would He, in other price of this good fuccesse, administrative to the paid of this good fuccesse, and the Enemie; who presented him battell the day following, neere vnto the walls. Hannibal therefore, seeing no likelihood to preuale in that which he had taken in hand, brake up the sege; and returned to his old Campeat Tifata. About these times, and shortly after, when Fabius the other Consul had taken the sield; some small. Townes were recoursed by the Romans, and the people seuerely punished for their reuolt. The Carthaginian Armie was too small, to fill with Garrisons all places that had yeelded; and withall to abide (as it must doe) strong in the field. Wherefore Hannibal, attending the supply from home, that should enable him to strike at Rome it felfe, was driven in the meane time to alter his course of warre: and, in stead of ma-20 king (as formerly he had done) a general inualion vpon the whole Country, to passe from place to place; and wait vpon occasions, that grew daily more commodious to the enemie, than to him. The Countrey of the Hirpines and Samnites was grieuoufly wasted by Marcellus, in the the absence of Hannibal as also was Campania, by Fabius the Conful; when Hunnibal having followed Marcellus to Nola, and received there the loffe before mentioned, was gone to Winter in Apulia. These people shewed not the like spirit in desending their lands, and fighting for the Carthaginian Empire, as in former times they had done; when they contended with the Romans, in their owne behalfe, to get the Soueraigntie. They held it reason, that they should bee protected, by fuch as thought to have dominion over them: whereby at once they 30 ouerburdened their new Lords; and gaue vnto their old the more case meanes, to take reuenge of their defection.

The people of Rome were very intentiue, as necessitie constrained them, to the workethat they had in hand. They continued Fabius in his Conful ship: and ioyned with him M. Claudius Marcellus; whom they had appointed vnto that honour the yeere before. Of these two, Fabius was called the Shield: and Marcellus, the Roman Sword. In Fabius it was highly, and vpon inft reason, commended, That being himselse Consul, and holding the Élection, he did not stand upon nice points of sormalitie, or regard what men might thinke of his ambition, but caused himselfe to be chosen with Marcellus; knowing in what need the Citie stood of able Comman-40 ders. The great name of these Consuls, and the great preparations which the Romans made; served to put the Campans in seare, that Capua it selfe should bee besieged. To preuent this, Hannibal at their carnelt entreatie came from Arpi: (where he lay, harkening after newes from Tarentum) and, having with his presence comforted these his friends, sell on the sudden vpon Puteoli, a Sea-towne of Campania; about which he spent three daies in vaine, hoping to have wonne it. The Garrison in Puteoli was fixe thousand strong : and did their dutie so well, that the Carthaginian, finding no hope of good inccesse, could onely shew his anger vpon the fields there, and about Naples; which having done, and once more (with as ill successe as before) affaied Nola, he bent his course to Tarentum: wherein he had very great intelligence. 50 Whilest he was in his progresse thither; Hanno made a journic against Beneuentum: and T. Gracebus the last yeeres Conful, hasting from Nuceria, met him there; and fought with him a battell. Hanne had with him about seventeene thousand Foot, Brutians and Lucans for the most part: besides twelve hundred Horse; verie sew of

Thus the Romans through industrie, by little and little, repaired that great Breach in their Estate, which Hannibal had made at Canna. But all this while, and long after this, their Treasurie was so poore, that no industrie nor art could serue to helpe it. The fruits of their grounds did onely (and perhaps hardly) ferue, to feede their Townes and Armies; without any furplufage, that might be exchanged for other 40 needfull commodities. Few they were in Italie, that continued to pay them tribute: which also they could worse doe than before; as living vpon the same Trade, and fubicct to the same inconveniences, which enfeebled Rome it selfe. Sicil and Sardimia, that were wont to yeeld great profit, hardly now maintained the Roman armies, that lay in those Provinces, to hold them safe, and in good order. As for the Citizens of Rome, every one of them suffered his part of the detriment, which the Commonwealth fustained and could now doe least for his Countrie, when most need was: as also the number of them was much decreased; so as if money should be raised upon them by the poll, yet must it be farre lesse, than in former times. The Senate therefore, diligently confidering the greatnes of the war within the bowels of Italie, that 50 could not be thence expelled without the exceeding charge of many good Armies; the perill, wherein Siciland Sardinia flood, both of the Carthaginians, and of many among the Naturals declining from the friendship or subjection of Rome; the threats of the Macedonian, readic to land in the Eulterne parts of Italie, if they were not at the coft to finde him worke at home; the greater threats of Afaraba, to follow his brother ouer the Alps, as foone as he could rid himfelte of the Scipio's in Spaine, and the pouertie of the Common-wealth, which had not money for any one of the few mortall dangers; were driven almost even to extreme want of counfell. But being wiged by the violence of fwift necessitie, fignified in the letters of the two Scipio's from Spaine; they resolved you the onely course, without which the Citie could read the science of the state of the could be seen to th not have sublisted. They called the people to Assembly: wherein Q. Fulaius the Pretor laide 10 open the publique wants; and plainely faid, That in this Exigent, there must beno taking of monie for victuall, weapons, apparrell, or the like things needefull to the Souldiers: but that such as had stuffe, or were artificers, must trust the Common-wealth with the Loane of their commodities, and labours, vntill the Warre were ended. Hereunto hee so effectually exhorted all men, especially the Publicans or Customers, and those which in former times had lived vpontheir dealing in the common Reuennues, that the charge was vnder-taken by private men; and the Armie in Spaine as well supplied, as if the Treasurie had beene full. Shortly after this, M. Atilius Regulus, and P. Furius Philus the Roman Cenfors, taking in hand the redresse of disorders within the Citie, were chiefly intentine to the cor-20 rection of those, that had mil behaued themselues in this present warre. They beganne with L. Caeilius Metellus: who, after the battell at Canna, had held difcourse with some of his companions, about flying beyond the Seas; as if Rome, and all Italie, had beene no better than lost. After him they tooke in hand those, that having brought to Rome the message of their fellowes made prisoners at Canna, returned not backe to Hannibal, as they were bound by oath; but thought themselues thereof sufficiently discharged, in that they had stepped once backe into his campe; with pretence of taking better notice of the Captiues names. All these were now pronounced infamous by the Cenfors: as also were a great many more; euen who soeuer had not serued in the warres, after the terme which the Lawes 3º appointed: Neither was the note of the Cenfors at this time (as otherwise it had vsed to bee) hurtfull onely in reputation: but greater weight was added therevnto, by this Decree of the Senate following . That all such as were noted with infamie by these Censors, should be transported into Sicill, there to serve untill the end of the warre, under the same hard conditions, that were imposed upon the Remainder of the Armie beaten at Canne. The Office of the Censors was; totake the List and accompt of the Citizens; to choose or displace the Senatours; and to set notes of differace (without further punishment) vpon those, whose vnhonest or vnseemely behauiour fell not within compasse of the Law. They tooke also an accompt of the Roman Gentlemen: among whom they distributed the publike Horses of 40 feruice, vnto such as they thought meet; or tooke them away for their misbehauiour. Generally, they had the ouer-fight of mens lines and manners: and their censure was much reuerenced and seared; though it extended no surther, than to putting men out of ranke; or making them change their Tribe; or (which was the most that they could doe) causing them to pay some Duties to the Treasury, from which others were exempted. But besides the care of this generall Taxe, and matters of Moralitic, they had the charge of all publike Workes; as mending of High-waies, Bridges, and Water-courses; the reparations of Temples, Porches, and fuch other buildings. If any man encroched vpon the freetes, Highwaies, or other places that ought to bee common; the Cenfors compelled him to 50 make amends. They had also the letting out of Lands, Customes, and other publike Reuennues, to farme: fo that most of the Citizens of Rome were beholding vnto this Office, as maintaining themselues by some of the Trades thereto belonging. And this was no small helpe to conserue the dignitie of the Senate: the communates being obnoxious vinto the Centers; which were alwaies of that Order, and carefull to vp-hold the reputation thereof. But the Common-weale being now impourrished by warre, and having small store of Lands to let, or of Customes that were worth the farming; Regulus and Philis troubled not themfelues much with perviing the Temples, or other decaied Piaces, that needed reparations; or if they tooke a view of what was requilite to be done in this kinde; ver forbore they to let any thing in hand, because they had not wherewith to pay. Herein againe appeared a notable generolitie of the Romans. They that had beene accustomed, in more happie times, to vindertake such peeces of worke, offered now themselves as willingly to the Censors, as if there had beene no such 10 want: promiting liberally their coft and trauell; without expectation of any paiment, before the end of the warre. In like fort, the Masters of those slaues, that lately had beene enfranchifed by Gracehus, were very well contented to forbeare the price of them, vntill the Citie were in better-case to pay. In this generall inclination of the Multitude, to relieue, as farre foorth as euery one was able, the common necessitie; all the goods of Orphans, and of Widdowes living under Patronage, were brought into the Treasurie; and there the Quastor kept a booke, of all that was laied out for the fustenance of these Widdowes and Orphans: whilest the whole ttocke was vied by the Citie. This good example of those which remained in the Towne, prevailed with the Souldiers abroad: fo that (the poorer fortexcep- 20 ted) they refuted to take pay; and called those Mercinaries, that did accept it, when their countrie was in fogreat want.

The twelve hundred Talents, wrongfully extorted from the Carthaginians; nor any injuries following, done by the Romans in the height of their pride; yeelded halfe so much commoditie, as might bee laied in ballance against these miseries, whereinto their Estate was now reduced. Neuerthelesse, if wee consider things aright; the calamities of this Warre did rather enable Romo to deale with those Enemies, whom shee forth-with under-tooke, than abate or slacken the growth of that large Dominion, whereto shee attained, ere the youngest of those men was dead, whose names wee have alreadie mentioned. For by this 30 hammering, the Roman mettall grew more hard and folide: and by paring the branches of private fortunes, the Roote and Heart of the Common-wealth was corroborated. So grew the Cittle of Athens; when Xerxes had burnt the Towne to ashes, and taken from enery particular Citizen all hope of other felicitie, than that which refled in the common happinesse of the vniuersalitie. Certaine it is, (as Sir Francis Bacon hath judiciously observed) That a State, whose dimension or flemme is small, may aptly serue to be foundation of a great Monarchie: which chiefly comes to passe, where all regard of domesticall prosperitie is laid aside; and every mans care addressed to the benefit of his countrie. Hereof I might fay, that our Age hath scene a great example, in the vnited Provinces in the Wetherlands; 40 whose present riches and strength grew chiefly from that ill assurance, which each of their Townes, or almost of their Families, perceived it selfe to hold, whileft the Generalitie was oppressed by the Duke of Alua; were it so, that the people had thereby growne as warlike, as by extreme industrie, and straining themsclues to fill their publike Treasurie, they are all growne wealthic, strong at Sea, and able to wage great Armies for their feruices by Land. Wherefore if wee valew at such a rate as wee ought, the patient Resolution, conformitie to good Order, obedience to Magistrates, with many other Vertues, and, about all other, the great loue of the Common-weale, which was found in Rome in these dangerous times: we may truly fay. That the Cittie was neuer in greater likelihood to prosper. Nei- 50 ther can it be deemed otherwise, than that if the same affections of the people had lasted, when their Empire, being growne more large and beautifull, shorld in all reason have been more deare vnto them, if the riches and delicacies of Asia had not infected them with fenfualitie, and carried their appetites mainly to those pleafures, wherein they thought their well-being to confit; if all the Citizens, and Subicet's of Rome could haue beleeued their owne interest to be as great, in those wars which these latter Emperours made for their defence, as in these which were managed by the Confuls: the Empire, sounded vpon so great vertue, could not have beene throwne downe by the hands of rude Barbarius, were they neuer so many. But vnto all Dominions God hath set their periods: Who, though hee hath given vnto Man the knowledge of those waies, by which Kingdomes rise and fall; yet hath left him subject wnto the affections, which draw on these fatall chauges, in their 1 times appointed.

d. XIIII.

The Romans win some Townes back from HANNIBAL. HANNIBAL winnes Tarentum. The siege of Capua. Two victories of HANNIBAL. The cournie of HANNIBAL to the gates of Rome. Capuataken by the Roments.

S the People of Rome ftrained themselues to the vtmost, for maintaining the warre: so their Generals abroad omitted no part of industrie, in seeking to recoure what had beene lost. The Towne of Casiline Fabius belieged. It was well defended by the Caribaginian Garrison; and likely to have beene relieved by those of Capus, if Marcellus from

Nola had not come to the affiltance of his Colleague. Neuertheleffe the place held out to obffinately, that Fabius was purposed to give it over: faying, that the enterprife was not great; yet as difficult, as a thing of more importance. But Marcellus was of a contraric opinion. He laid, That many fuch things, as were not at first to 30 haue been under taken by great Commanders, ought yet, when once they were taken in hand, to bee prolequited vnto the best effect. So the siege held on: and the Towne was preffed to hard, that the Campans dwelling therein grew fearefull, and craued parlee; offering to give it vp, fo as all might have leave to depart in fafetie, whither they pleafed. Whilest they were thus treating of conditions: or whilest they were issuing foorth, according to the composition alreadie made; (for it is diuerfly reported) Marcellus, seizing vpon a Gate, entred with his Armie, and put all to fword that came in their way. Fiftie of those that were first gotten out, ranne to Fabius the Conful: who faued them, and sent them to Capuain safety; all the rest were either slaine, or made prisoners. If Fabrus deserued commendations, by hol-40 ding his word good unto these fiftie; I know not how the slaughter of the rest, or imprisonment atterward of such, as scaped the heat of execution, could be excused by Marcellus. It may be that he helped himselfe, after the Roman fashion, with some requiuocation, but he shall pay for it hereafter. In like fort was Mount Marsam in Gafeoigne taken by the Marshall Monlue, when I was a young man in France. For whilest he entertained parlee about composition; the besieged ranne all from their seuerall guards, vpon hastie desire of being acquainted with the conditions propofed. The Marshall therefore discouring a part of the walls vnguarded, entred by Scalado; and put all saue the Gouernour vnto the sword. Herein that Gouernour of Mount Marsam committed two groffe errours; the one, in that hee gaue no or-50 der for the Captaines and Companies, to hold themselues in their places; the other, in that hee was content to parlee, without pledges for affurance given and received. Some such ouer-light, the Gouernour of Cassline seemeth to have committed; yet neither the aduantage taken by Marcellus, or by Monluc, wasvery honourable. When this Worke was ended, many small Townes of the Samnites, and some of the Ttett 3

Lucans and Apulians, were recoursed: wherein were taken, or flaine, about five and twentie thousand of the Enemies; and the Countrie grieuoully wasted by Fabius, Marcellus lying ficke at Nola.

Hannibal in the meane while was about Tarentum; waiting to heare from those, that had promifed to give vp the Towne. But M. Valerius, the Roman Propretor, had thrust so many men into it, that the Traitors durst not stirre. Wherefore the Carthaginian was faine to depart; having wearied himselfe in vaine with expectation. Yet he wasted not the Countrie; but contented himselfe with hope, that they would please him better in time following. So he departed thence toward Salapia: which he chole for his wintring place; and beganne to victuall it, when Summer 10 was but halfe past. It is said, that he was in lone with a yong Wench in that towne: in which regard if he beganne his Winter more timely, than otherwise neede required, He did not like the Romans; whom necessitie enforced, to make their Summer last as long, as they were able to trauell vp and downe the Countrie.

About this time beganne great troubles in Sicil; whither Marcellus the Confull was fent, to take fuch order for the Prouince, as neede should require. Of the doings there, which wore out more time than his Confulfhip, we will speake hereafter.

The new Confuls, chosen at Rome, were Q. Fabius the sonne of the present Conful, and T. Sempronius Gracehus the second time. The Romans found it needfull for the publike feruice, to imploy often-times their bestable men: and therefore made 20 it lawfull, during the war, to recontinue their Officers, and choose such, as had lately held their places before; without regarding any distance of time, which was otherwise required. The old Fabius became Lieutenant unto his sonne: which was perhaps the respect, that most commended his sonne vnto the place. It is noted, That when the old man came into the campe, and his sonne rode forth to meete him: cleuen of the twelue Lictors, which carried each an axe with a bundle of rods before the Consull, suffered him, in regard of due reuerence, to passe by them on horse-backe; which was against the custome. But the sonne perceiuing this, commanded the last of his Lictors to note it: who thereupon bade the old Fabius alight, and come to the Conful on his feete. The father chearefully did fo; faying, It was 30 my minde, sonne, to make triall, whether thou diddest understand thy selfe to bee Consul. Castus Altinius a wealthic Citizen of Arpi, who, after the battell at Canna, had holpen the Carthaginian into that Towne, feeing now the fortune of the Romans to amend; came privily to this Conful Fabius, and offered to render it back vnto him, if he might beetherefore well rewarded. The Confull purposed to follow old examples: and to make this Altinius a patterne to all Traitors; vling him, as Camillus and Fabricius had done those, that offered their vnfaithful service against the Fatifei, and King Pyrrhus. But Q. Fabius the father, was of another opinion: and faid, it was a matter of dangerous consequence, That it should be thought more safe to revolt from the Romans, than to turne vnto them. Wherefore it was concluded, that hee 40 should be sent to the Towne of Cales, and there kept as prisoner; untill they could better refolue, what to doe with him, or what vie to make of him. Hannibal, vnderstanding that Altinius was gone, and among the Romans, tooke it not forrowfully; but thought this a good occasion, to seize vpon all the mansriches, which were great. Yet, that he might seeme rather seuere, than couetous, He sent for the wife and children of Altinius into his campe: where having examined them by torment, partly concerning the departure and intentions of this fugitive, partly, and more strictly, about his riches, what they were, and where they lay, He condemned them, as partakers of the Treason, to be burnt aline; and tooke all their goods vnto himfelfe. Fabius the Conful shortly after came to Arpi: which he wanne by Scalado, in a 50 flormic and rainie night. Five thousand of Hannibals Souldiers lay in the Towne; and of the Arpines themselves, there were about three thousand. These were thrust formost by the Carthaginian Garrison; when it was understood, that the Romans had gotten ouer the wall, and broken open a Gate. For the fouldiers held the townsmen fulpected;

Inspected; and therefore thought it no wisedome, to trust them at their backs. But after some little relistance, the Arpines gaue ouer fight, and entertained parlee with the Romans: protesting, that they had beene betraied by their Princes; and were become subject to the Carthaginians, against their wills. In processe of this discourse, the Arpine Pretor went vnto the Roman Conful: and receiving his faith for fecurity of the Towne, presently made head against the Garrison. This notwithstanding; like it is, that Hannibals men continued to make good relistance. For when almost a thousand of them, that were Spaniards, offered to leaue their companions, and serue on the Roman fide, it was yet couenanted, That the Carthaginians should be suffered to to passe forth quietly, and returne to Hannibal. This was performed: and so Arph became Roman againe; with little other loffe, than of him that had betraied it. About the same time, Cliternum was taken by Sempronius Tuditanus, one of the Pretors : and vnto Cneius Fuluius, another of the Pretors, an hundred and twelue Gentlemen of Capua offered their feruice; vpon no other condition, than to have their goods restored vnto them, when their Citie should bee recoursed by the Romans. This was a thing of small importance: but considering the generall hatred of the Campans toward Rome, it served to discover the inclination of the Italians in those times; and how their affections recoiled from Hannibal, when there was no appearance of those mighty succours, that had beene promised from Carthage. The 20 Consentines also, and the Thurines, people of the Brutians, that had yeelded themfelues to Hannibal; returned agains to their old allegeance. Others would have followed their example, but that one L. Pempenius, who of a Publican had made himself a Captaine, and gotten reputation by some pettie exploits in forraging the country, was tlaine by Hanno, with a great multitude of those that followed him. Hannibal in the meane while had all his care bent vpon Tarentum; which if he could take, it feemed that it would stand him in good stead, for drawing ouer that helpe out of Macedon, which his Carthaginians failed to fend. Long he waited, ere he could bring his desire to passe: and being loth to hazard his forces, where he hoped to preuaile by intelligence; He contented himselfe, with taking in some poore Townes of the 30 Salentines. At length, his Agents within Tarentum found meanes to accomplish their purpole, and his wish. One Phileas, that was of their conspiracie, who lay at Rome as Embassador, practising with the Hostages of the Tarentines, & such as had the keeping of them, conveighed them by night out of the Citie. But hee and his companie were the next day so closely pursued, that all of them were taken, and brought back to Rome; where they suffered death, as Traitors. By reason of this crueltie, or feueritie, the people of Tarentum grew to hate the Romans, more generally and earnestly than before. As for the Conspirators, they followed their businesse the more diligently; as knowing what reward they were to expect, if their intention should happen to be discouered. Wherefore they sent agains to Hannibal: and ac-49 quainting him with the manner of their plot, made the same composition with him for the Tarentines, which they of Capua had made before. Nico and Philomenes, two the chiefe among them, vied much to goe forth of the Towns on hunting by night; as if they durst not take their pleasure by day, for feare of the Carthaginians. Seldome or neuer they missed of their game: for the Carthaginians prepared it readie for their hands, that they might not seeme to have been abroad vpon other occasion. From the campe of Hannibal, it was about three daies journie to Tarentum, if hee should haue marched thither with his whole Armie. This caused his long abode in one place the leffe to be suspected: as also to make his Enemies the more secure, He caufeditto beginen out, that he was fick. But when the Romans within Tarentum, were 30 growne careleffe of fuch his neighbourhood, and the Conspirators had set their bu-finesse in order; He tooke with him ten thousand the most expedite of his horse and foor; and long before breake of day, made all speede thitherward. Fourescore light horse of the Numidians ranne a great way beforehim, beating all the waies, and killing any that they met, for feare lest he, and his troupe following him, should be dif-

couered. It had been often the manner of some few Numidian horse, to doe the like in former times. Wherefore the Roman Gouernour, when hee heard tell in the euening, that some Namidians were abroad in the fields, tooke it for a figne, that Hannibal was not as yet diflodged; and gaue order, that some companies should be fent out the next morning, to strip them of their bootie, and send them gone. But when it grew darke night, Hannibal, guided by Philomenes, came close to the towne: where, according to the tokens agreed upon, making a light to shew his arrivall; Wico, that was within the Towne, answered him with another light, in figne that he was readie. Presently  $\mathcal{R}_{\text{160}}$  beganneto set vpon one of the Gates, and to kill the watchmen. Philemenes went toward another gate: and whiftling (as was his man- 18 ner) called vp the Potter; bidding him make hafte, for that hee had killed a great Bore, so heavie, that fearce two men could hand under it. So the Porter opened the wicket: and forthwithentred two yong men, loaden with the Bore; which Hannibal had prepared large enough, to be worthie the looking on. While the Porter flood wondring at the largenesse of the bealt, Philomenes ran him through with his Bore-speare: and letting in some thirtie armed men, fell vpon all the watch; whom when he had flaine, he entred the great gate. So the Armie of Hannibal, entring Tarent: mat two gates, went directly toward the Market-place; where both parts met. Thence they were distributed by their Generall, and sent into all quarters of the Citie, with Tarentines to be their guides. They were commanded to kill all the Ro. 20 mans; and not to hurt the Citizens. For better performance hereof Hannibal willed the Conspirators, that when any of their friends appeared in fight, they should bidhim be quiet, and of good cheare. All the Towne was in an vprore: but few could tell what the matter meant. A Roman trumpet was viskilfully founded by a Greeke in the Theater: which helped the suspition, both of the Tarentines, that the Romans were about to spoile the Towne; and of the Romans, that the Citizens were in commotion. The Gouernour fled into the Port: and taking boat, got into the Citadell, that flood in the mouth of the Hauen; whence hee might ealily perceive the next morning, how all had passed. Hannibal, assembling the Tarentines, gaue them to understand, what good affection hee bore them; inneighed bitterly against 30 the Romans, as tyrannous oppressors, and spake what else he thought fit for the prefent. This done: and having gotten such spoile as was to bee had of the Souldiers goods in the Towne, He addressed himselfe against the Citadell; hoping that if the Garrison would sallie out, he might give them such a blow, as should make them vnable to defend the Peece. According to his expectation it partly fel out. For when hee beganne to make his approches, the Romans in a brauerie fallying forth, gaue charge vpon his men: who fell back of purpole according to direction, till they had drawne on as many as they could, and so farre from their strength, as they durst aduenture. Then gaue Hannibal a figne to his Carthaginians, who lay prepared readie for the purpose; and fiercely setting upon the Enemie, draue him back with great 49 flaughter, as fast as he could runne; so that afterwards he durst not issue forth. The Citadell flood vpon a Demi-Iland, that was plaine ground; and fortified only with a ditch and wall against the Towne, whereunto it was joyned by a cawfey. This cawfey Hannibal intended to fortifie in like fort against the Citadell; to the end that the Tarentines might bee able, without his helpe, to keepe themselues from all dangerthence. His worke in few daies went to well forward, without impediment from the belieged, that he conceived hope of winning the Peece it felfe, by taking a little more paines. Wherefore he made readie all forts of engines, to force the place. But whilest he was busied in his works, there came by Sea a strong supply from Metapentum: which tooke away all hope of prenailing; and made him returne to his 50 former counsaile. Now for a fmuch as the Tarentine fleet lay within the Hauen, and could not paffe forth, whileft the Romans held the Citadell: it feemed likely, that the Towne would suffer want, being debarred of accustomed trade and provisions by Sea; whilest the Roman Garrison, by helpe of their shipping, might easily be relieued; and enabled to hold out. Against this inconvenience, it was rather withed by the \*\*Jerentines\*, than any way hoped, that their fleet could get out of the Hauers to guard the mouth of it, and eur of fall slipply from the Enemy. Hamibel told them, that this might well be done: for that their Towne standing in plaine ground, and their streets being singly and broad, it would been to hard matter to draw the Gallies outer Land, and stage them into the Sex without. This he vader took and effected whereby the \*\*Roman\*\* Carrison was reduced into great necessitie; though with much patience it held out, and found \*\*Hamibel often-times otherwise busiled; than his after seventied.

Faires required. And the Thurstone Theorem forces, Thus, with mutuall loffe on both fides, the time paffed; and the Roman forces, growing daily fitninger, Q. Endrum Flacum, with Appens Clandius, lately chosen Confuls, prepared to be fiege the great Citie of Copus. Three and twenty Legions the Roman had now armed. This was a great and haltie growth from that want of men, and of all neceffaires, whereinto the look safe time had reduced them. But to fill yethefe Legions, they were faine to take wayong Boyes, that were under feunteency expess of age; and to fend Commillioners aboue fifte miles round, for the feeking out of fuch Lads as might appeare ferticeable, & prefing them to the warres, making yet a Law, That their yeares of seruice, whereinto they were bound by order, of the Citie, should be reckoned, for their benefit, from this their beginning to oyong, as if they had been of lawfull age. Before the Roman Armic drew neere, the Campans selt great want of victuailes, as if they had alreadie beene bestigged. This happened partly by shoth of the Nation, partly by the great waste and spoile, which the Romans had in foregoing yeers made upon their grounds. They fent therefore Embassadours to Europeal; destring him to succourthem ere they were

In is appened partly by nornot the ination, partly by the great white and ipoile, which the Romans had in foregoing vecres made upon their grounds. They fent therefore Embafflidours to Hamibal; deliting him to furcour them ere they were closed vp, as they feared to bee shortly. He gaue them comfortable words: and fent Hamio with an Armieto supply their wants. Hamio appointed them a day; against which they should be readie with all manner of carriages, to store themselues with victualles, that he would provide. Neither did he promise more, than he performed. For hee caused great quantitie of graine, that had beene laied vp in Cities or round about; to be brought into his campe, three miles from Benevatum. Thither at the time appointed came no more than fortie Carts or Wagons, with a sew pack-atthetimeappointed came no more than fortic Carts or Wagons, with a few pack-horfes; as if this had beene enough to victualle Caput. Such was the rechlefinelie of the Campans. Hanna was exceeding angrie hereat: and told them they were worfe than very beafts; fince hunger could not teach them to have greater care. Wherefore hee gave them a longer day; againft which hee made proviifion to flore them throughly. Of all these doings word was sent to the Roman Confuls, from the Citizens of Beneventum. Therefore Q. Fulcius the Conful, taking with him such firength as hee thought needfull for the service, came into Beneventum by night; where with diligence hee made inquirie into the behaviour of the Emenie. He seat-

40 ned, that Hanno with part of his Armie was gone abroad to make proulifions; that fome two thouland Wagons, with a great rabble of Carters and other Varlers, lay among the Carthagnians in their campe; fo that little good order was kept; all thought being fet young great Haruelt. Hereupon the Conful bade his men prepare them felues, to affaile the Enemies campe; and leaving all his impediments within Beneventum, He marched thitherward fo early in the morning, that hee was there with the first breake of day. By comming fo vnexpecked, Hee had well-neere forced the campe on the fudden. But it was very strong, and very well defended: to that the longer the fight continued, the lesse delire had Fulutur to dook more of his men in the artempt; seeing many of them cast away, and yet little hope of doing 20 good. Therefore he said, that it were better to one more leifurely and subdantially

30 good. Therefore he faid, that it were better to goe more leifurely and fubfiantially to worke; to fend for his fellow-Conful with the reft of their Armie; and to lie between thanno and home; that neither the Campan; should depart thence, nor the Carthaginian be able to relieue them. Being thus discoursing, and about to sound theretrait; hee saw, that some of his menhad gotten ouer the Enemies Rampart.

There was great bootie; or (which was all one to the fouldier) an opinion of much that might be gotten in that campe. Wherefore some Enligne bearers threw their Enfignes ouer the Rampart, willing their men to fetch them out, vnleffethey would endure the shame and dishonour following such a losse. Feare of such ignominie than which none could bee greater, made the Souldiers addenture so desperately; that Fuluius, perceiuing the heat of his men, changed purpose, and encouraged those that were iomewhat backward, to follow the example of them, that had alreadie gotten ouer the Trenches. Thus the campe was wonne: in which were flaine aboue live thousand; and taken, aboue seuen thousand, besides all the store of victuailes, and carriages, with abundance of bootie, that Hanno had lately gotten from the Ro- 10 man Confederates. This miladuenture, and the neerer approch of both the Confuls, made them of Capua fend a pittifull Embassage to Hannibal: putting him in minde of all the loue, that he was wont to protest vnto their Citie; and how he had made lhew, to affect it no leffe than carehage. But now, they faid, it would be loft, as Arpi was lately, if he gaue not firong and speedie succour. Hannibal answered with comfortable words: and fent away two thousand horse, to keepe their grounds from spoile; whilest hee himselfe was detained about Tarentum, partly by hope of winning the citadell, partly by the disposition, which he saw in many townes adjoyning, to yeeld vnto him. Among the Holtages of the Tarentines, that lately had fled out of Rome, and being ouer-taken, suffered death for their attempt; were some of 20 the Metaponienes, and other Cities of the Greekes, inhabiting that Easterne part of Italie, which was called of old Magna Gracia. These people tooke to heart the death of their Hostages; and thought the punishment greater, than the offence. Whereforethe Metaponimes, as soone as the Roman Garrison was taken from them, to defend the citadell of Tarentum, made no more adoe, but opened their gates to Hannibal. The Thurines would have donothe like, vpon the like reason: had not some companies laine in their Towne; which they feared that they should not bee able to mafter. Neuertheiesse they helped themselues by cunning: inuiting to their gates Hanno and Mago, that were neere at hand : against whom whilest they proffered their service to Atinius, the Roman captaine, they drew him forth to fight; and re- 30 coyling from him, closed up their gates. A little formalitie they yled in pretending feare, lest the Enemie should breake in together with the Romans; in saving Atinius himselfe, and sending him away by Sea; as also in consulting a fmall while (because perhaps many of their chiefe men were unacquainted with the practice) whether they should yeeld to the Carthaginian, or no. But this disputation lasted not long: for they that had removed the chiefe impediment, easily prevailed in the rest; and delinered up the Towne to Hanne and Mage. This good successe, and hope of the like, detained Hannibal in those quarters; whilest the Consuls, fortifying Beneventum to secure their backs, addressed themselves vnto the siege of Capua.

Many disafters befell the Romans, in the beginning of this great enterprise. T. Semproning Gracebus, a very good man of warre, that had of late been etwice Conful, was flaine either by trecherie of some Lucans, that drew him into ambush; or by some Carthaginian stragglers, among whom he fell vnawares. His bodie, or his head, was very honourably interred, either by Hannibal himselfe, or (for the reports agree not) by the Romans; to whom Hannibal sent it. He was appointed to lie in Beneventum, there to secure the back of the Armie that should be leige Capua. But his death haphed in an ill time; to the great hindrance of that businesses, or Slaues lately manumised, sor sock their Ensignes, and went enery one whither hee thought good, as if they had been discharged by the decease of their Leaders of this it asked some labour to seek them out, and bring them back into their campe. Neuerthese some labour to seek them out, and bring them back into their campe. Neuerthese solutions of the confuls went forward with their worke; and drawing neere to Capua, did all acts of hostilities which they could. Mage the Carthaginian, and the Citizens of Capua, gaue them an hard welcome; wherein aboue sifteene hundred Romans were lost. Neither was it long, ere Hannibal came thither: who fought with the Consuls, and had the better ; infomuch that hee caused them to dislodge. They removed by night, and went fenerall waies: Fulnius toward Cume; Claudius, into Lucaria. Hannibal followed after Claudius: who having led him a great walke, fetcht a compaffe about, and returned to Capua. It so fell out, that one M. Centemus Penula a flout man, and one that with good commendations had discharged the place of a Centurion, lay with an Armie not farre from thence, where Hammibal reflect, when hee was wearieof hunting after Claudius. This Penula had made great vants to the Roman Senate, of wonders which he would worke, if he might be trufted with the leading of fine thousand men. The Fathers were vnwilling in such a time, to reject the vertue 10 of any good Souldier; how meane so euer his condition were. Wherfore they gaue him the charge of eight thousand : and he himselfe, being a proper man, and talking brauely, gathered vp fo many voluntaries, as almost doubled his number. But meeting thus with Hannibal, he gaue proofe of the difference, betweene a flout Genturion, and one able to command in chiefe. Hee and his fellowes were all (in a manner) flaine; scarce a thousand of them escaping. Soone after this Hannibal had word, that Cn. Fuluing, a Roman Pretor, with eighteene thouland men, was in Apulia, very careleffe, and a man infufficient for the charge which he held. Thither he therefore hafied, to visit him: hoping to deale the better with the maine strength of Rome, which pointed at Copus, when he should have cut off those forces, that lay in the Provinces 20 avout, under men of small abilitie. Comming upon Fuluus, He found him and his men so jollie, that needs they would have fought the first night. Wherefore it was not to be doubted, what would happen the day following. So hee bestowed Mago with three thousand of his lightest armed, in places thereabout most fit for ambush. Then offering battaile to Fulniw, Hee soone had him in the trap: whence he made him glad to escape aliue; leauing all, sauetwo thousand of his followers, dead be-

These two great blowes, received one presently after the other, much assonished the Romans. Neuerthelesse all care was taken, to gather up the small reliques of the broken Armies: and that the Confuls should goe substantially forwards with the 30 siege of Capua; which was of great consequence, both in matter of reputation, and in many other respects. The two Consuls sate downe before the towne and C. Claudius Nero, one of the Pretors, came with his Armie from Sueffula to their affiltance. They made Proclamation, That who foeuer would iffue forth of Capua before a certaine day prefixed, should have his pardon, and bee suffered to enjoy all that vnto him belonged: which day being past, there should be no grace expected. This offer was contumeliously rejected; the Capuans relying on their owne strength, and the succorsattended from Hannibal. Before the Citie was closed up, they lent Messengers to the Earthaginian; which found him at Brundusum. He had made a long journie, in hope of gaining the Tarentine citadell: of which expectation failing, he tur-40 ned to Brandusum; vpon advertisement that he should be let in. There the Capuans met him; told him of their danger with earnest words; and were with wordes as braue recomforted. He bade them confider, how a few daies fince he had chased the Confuls out of their fields; and told them, that he would presently come thither againe and fend the Romans going, as fast as before. With this good answere the Mesfengers returned: and hardly could get back into the citie; which the Romans had almost entrenched round. As for Hannibal himselfe; He was of opinion, that Capua, being very well manned, and heartily denoted vnto his friendship, would hold out a long time: and thereby give him leifure, to doe what he thought requisite among the Tarentines, and in those Easterne parts of Italie; whilst the Roman armie spent it 50 selse in a tedious siege. Thus he lingred : and thereby gaue the Consuls time, both to fortifie themselves at Capua, and to dispatch the election of new Magistrates in Rome; whilest he himselfe pursued hopes, that neuer found successe.

Claudius and Faluius, when their terms of Office was expired, were appointed to continue the fiege at Capua; retaining the same Armies, as Proconfuls. The towness men often sallied out: rather in a brauerie, than likelihood to worke any matter of effect; the Enemie lying close within his Trenches, as intending, without other violence, to subduethem by famine. Yet against the Campan horse (for their foot was casily beaten) the Romans vsed to thrust out some troups, that should hold them skirmilh. In these exercises the Campans vsually had the better, to the great griefe of their proud Enemie; who scorned to take foile at the hands of such Rebels. It was therefore deuised, that some active and couragious yong men, should learne to ride behinde the Roman men at armes; leaping vp, and againe dismounting lightly, as occasion served. These were furnished like the Velites, having each of them three or foure small darrs: which, alighting in time of conflict, they discharged thick vpon 10 the Enemies horse, whom vanquilling in this kinde of service, they much disheartned in the maine. The time thus passing, and famine daily increasing within the Citie; Hammbal came at length, not expected by the Romans: and taking a Fort of theirs, called Galatia, fell vpon their campe. At the same time the Capuans issued with their whole power, in as terrible manner as they could deuise: setting all their multitude of vnseruiceable people on the walls; which, with a loud noise of Pannes and Bafons, troubled those that were occupied in fight. Appius Claudius opposing himselfe to the Campans, easily defended his Trenches against them; and so well repressed them, that he draue them at length back into their Citie. Neuerthelesse, in pursuing them to their gates. He received a wound, that accompanied him in short space 20 after to his graue. Q. Fuluiss was held harder to his taske, by Hannibal and the Carthaginian Armie. The Roman campe was even at point to have beene lost: and Hannibal his Elephants, of which he brought with him three and thirtie, were either gotten within the rampart, or else (for the report varies) being some of them slaine vponit, fell into the ditch; and filled it vp in fuch fort, that their bodies ferued as a bridge vnto the Affailants. It is faid, that Hannibal in this tumult caused some fugitiues, that could speake Latine well, to proclaime aloud, as it were in the Consuls name, That every one of the Souldiers should shift for himselfe, and flie betimes vnto the next Hils, for a fmuch as the campe was alreadie lost. But all would not ferue. The fraud was detected: and the Armie, having fitten there so long, had at 30 good leisure strongly entrenched it selfe; so as little hope there was to raise the siege

This did extremely perplexe the Carthaginian. The purchase of Capua had (as was thought) with-held him from taking Rome it selfe: and now his desire of winning the Tarentine Citadell, had well-neere lost Capua; in respect of which, neither the Citadell, nor Citie of Tarentum, were to have beene much regarded. Falling therefore into a desperate anger with himselfe and his hard fortune, that of so many great victories he had made no greater vie: on the fudden he entertained an haughtie resolution, euen to set vpon Rome; and carrie to the walles of that proud Citie, the danger of warrethat threatned Capua. This hee thought would bee a meane, to 40 draw the Roman Generals, or one of them at least, vnto the defence of their owne home. If they rose from the siege with their whole Armie; then had he his desire: If they divided their forces; then was it likely, that either he or the Campans, should well enough deale with them apart. Neither did hee despaire, that the terror of his comming might so assonish the multitude within Rome, as he might enter some part or other of the Citie. His onely feare was, lest the Campans, being ignorant of his purpose, should thinke he had for saken them; and thereupon for thwith yeeld themselues to the Enemie. To preuent this danger, He sent letters to Capha by a subtile Numidian: who running as a fugitiue into the Roman campe, conueighed himselfe thence ouer the innermost Trenches into the Citie. The journie to Rome, was 50 to be performed with great celeritie: no small hope of good successe, resting in the suddennesse of his arrivall there. Wherefore hee caused his men, to haue in a readinesseten daies victuailes; and prepared as many boats, as might in one night transport his Armie ouer the River of Vulturnus. This could not be done so closely, but

That the Roman Generalls by some sugitives had notice of his purpose. With this danger therefore they acquainted the Senate which was therefwith affected, according to the diversities of mens opinions, in a case of such importance. Some gave counsails to let alone Capua, yea and al places of senather then to put the Towne of Rome into perill of being taken by the Enemie. Others were so farre from allowing of this, as they wondered howany man could thinke, that Hamibal, being vnable to relieue Capua; should judge himselfs strong enough to winne Rome; and therefore stoutly said, That, those Legions, which were kept at home for defence of the Citic, would serve the turne well enough, to keepe him out, and send him thence, if he were so vnwise, as to come thither. But it was finally concluded, that letters should be sent to Fuluius and Cluudius, acquainting them perticely with the forces, that at the present were in Rome: who, since they knew best, what the strength was which Hunnibal could bring along with him, were best able to judge, what was needfull to oppose him. So it was referred vnto the discretion of these Generals at Capua, to doe as they thought behouefull; and fir might conveniently be, neither to raise their siege, nor yet to put the Citie of Rome into much aduenture. According to this Decree of the Senate, Q. Fuluius tooks fiscene thousand foot, and athousand horse, the choise of his whole Armie; with which he hasted toward Rome; leaving App. Cluudius, who could not trauel by reason of his wound,

20 to continue the fiege at Capua.

Hamnibal, having paffed ouer Vulturms, burnt vp all his boats; and left nothing that might ferue to transport the Enemie, in case he should offer to pursue or coalt him. Then hasted he away toward Rome; staying no longer in any one place, then he needes must. Yet found he the bridges over Linis broken downe, by the people of Fregelie, which as it stopped him a little on his way; so it made him the more grieuously to spoile their lands, whiles the bridges were in mending. The neerer that he drew to Rome, the greater waste he made: his Numidians running before him; driving the Countrie, and killing or taking multitudes of all sorts and ages, that sed out of all parts round about. The meslengers of these newes came apace,

*30 one after another into the Citie; some few bringing true aduertisements; but the most of them reporting the conceits of their owne seare. All the streets, and Temples in Röme, were pettered with women, crying and praying, and rubbing the Altars with their haire, because they could doe none other good. The Senators were all in the great Market, or place of Assembly; readie to give their advice, if it were asked, or to take directions given by the Magistrates. All places of smoth importance were suffed with soulders: it being uncertaine, youn which part Hamibal would fall. In the middest of this trepidation, there came newes that Q. Fulaius, with part of the Armie from Capua, was hasting to defence of the Citie. The Office of Proconful did expire, at his returne home, and entrie into the Gates of Rome. Where-

need, an Act was paffed, That he should have equall power with the Confuls, during his abode there. Hee and Hannibal artived at Rome, one some after another: Fuluius having beene long held occupied in passing over Fuluiums, and Hannibal receiving impediment in his journey, as much as the Countrie was able to give. The Confuls, and Fuluius, incamped without the Gates of Rome; attending the Carthaginian. Thither they called the Senate; and as the danger grew neerer and greater; so tooke they more carefull and especiall order against all occurrences. Hannibal came to the River Anio or Anien, three miles from the Towne; whence he advanced with two thousand Horse and rode along a great way under the wals; viewing seth of the Anien and Anien, when might held another in Run he gither work.

50 the fire thereof, and confidering how he might best approach it. But he either went, or (as the Roman Storie saith) was driven away; without doing, or receiving any hurt. Many tumults rose in this while among the people; but were superressed by and diligence of the Senators. About the rest one accident was both trouble-time, and not without perill. Of Numidians that had shifted side, and fallen (ypon some displeasures) from Hannibal to the Romans, there were some twelve hundred then in Rome; which were appointed by the Confuls, to passe through the Towne, from the Mount Anentine to the Gate Collina, where it was thought that their feruice might be vicfull, among broken wayes, and Garden wals lying in the suburbes. The faces of these men, and their furniture, wherein they differed not from the sollowers of Hannibals, bred fuch mittaking, as caused a great vproare among the people: all crying out, that Auentine was taken, and the enemie gotten within the wals.

The noise was fuch, that men could not be informed of the truth: and the fireets were so full of cattaile, and husbandmen, which were fledde thither out of the Villages adioyning, that the passage was slopt up: and the poore Numidians pittifully to beaten from the house-toppes, with stones and other weapons that came next to hand, by the desperate multitude, that would have run out at the gates, had it not beene certaine who lay under the walls. To remedie the like inconveniences, it was ordained, That all which had beene Dictators, Confuls, or Cenfors, should have authoritie as Magistrates, till the Enemie departed. The day following, Hannibal passed ouer Anien, and presented battaile to the Romans, who did not wisely if they vndertooke it. It is faid, that a terrible showre of raine, caused both Romans & Carthaginians to returne into their seuerall Camps: and that this happened two daies together, the weather breaking vp, and clearing, as soone as they were departed a funder. Certaine it is, that Hannibal, who had brought along with him no more then ten daies provision, could 20 not endure to stay there, vntill his victuals were all spent. In which regard, the Romans, if they suffered bim to waste his time and prouisions, knowing that hee could not abide there long, did as became well-aduited men: if they offered to fight with him, and either had the better, or were parted (as is said) by some accident of weather; the commendations must be given to their fortune. The terrour of Hannibals comming to the Citic, how great soener it was at the first, yet after some leisure, and better notice taken of his forces, which appeared lesse than the first apprehension had formed them, was much and soone abated, Hereunto it helped well, that at the same time, the supplicappointed for Spaine, after the death of the two Scipio's, was fent out of the towne, & went forth at one gate, while ft the Carthaginian lay before 30. another. In al Panick terrors, as they are called, wherof there is either no cause known or no cause answerable to the greatnesse of the sudden consternation; it is a good remedie to doe somewhat quite contrarie to that which the danger would require, were it fuch, as men haue falhioned it in their amazed conceits. Thus did Alexander cause his souldiers to disarme themselues, when they were alon a sudden in a great fearc of they knew not what. And thus did Clearchin pacific a foolish vprore in his Army, by proclaiming a reward vnto him, that could tel who had lent the Affe into the Campe. But in this present example of the Romans, appeares withall a great magnanimitie: whereby they fullained their reputation, and augmented it no leffe, than by this bold attempt of Hannibalit might sceme to have beene diminished. 40 Neither could they more finely have checked the glorious conceipts of their Enemies, and taken away the difgrace of that feare, which clouded their valour at his first comming; than by making such demonstrations, when once they had recouered spirit, how little they esteemed him. To this purpose therefore that vericpiece of ground, on which the Carthaginian lay incamped, was fold in Rome: and fold it was nothing vnder the value, but at as good a rate, as if it had been in time of peace. This indignity comming to his care, incenfed Hannibal so much, that he made Portfale of the Silver-smithes shops, which were neere about the Market or Common place in Rome; as if his owne title to the houses within the Towne, were no whit worse, then any Roman Citizens could be vnto that piece of ground, wheron he rai- 50 fed his Tent. But this counter-practice was nothing worth. The Romans did feek to manifest that assurance, which they instly had conceined; Hannibal, to make shew continuing in an hope, which was alreadic past. His victuals were almost spe and of those ends, that he had proposed vnto himselfe, this journey had brow forth none other, than the fame of his much daring. Wherefore hee brake vp his campe; and doing what footle we could in the Roman Tetritoric, without spating religious places, wherein wealth was to beegotten, He paffed like a Tempet ouer the Countrie; and ranne toward the Eatterne Sea fo fail; that hee had almost taken the Citic of Rhegium before his artituall was feared or suffected. As for Capna, hee gaue: it lost: and is likely to haue curfed the whole faction of Hanno, which thus difficult of the countries are the suffected.

Q.Fuluius returning back to Capua, made Proclamation anew, that who fo would yeeld, before a certaine day, might fafely doe it. This, and the very returne of 10 Fullines, without any more appearance of Hannibal, gaue the Capuans to understand; that they were abandoned, and their case desperate. To trust the Roman pardon proclaimed, every mans confcience of his owne cuill deferts, told him, that it was a vanitie: and some faint hope was given, by Hanno and Bostar, Captaines of the Carthaginian Garrison within the Towne, that Hannibal should come againe; if meanes could onely be found, how to convey fuch letters vnto him, as they would write, The carriage of the letters was vndertaken, by some Numidians: who running, as fugitines, out of the Towne, into the Roman campe, waited fit opportunitie to make an escape thence with their packets. But it hapned, ere they could conucigh themfelucyaway, that one of them was detected by an Harlot following him out of the 20 Towne; and the letters of Boffar and Hanna were taken and opened; containing a vehement entreatievato Hannibal, that he would not thus for lake the Capuans and them. For (faid they) we came not hither to make warre against Rhegium and Tarentum, but against the Romans: whose Legions wheresoeuer they lie, there also should the Carthaginian Armie bee readie to attend them; and by taking of such course, have wee gotten those victories at Trebia, Thrasymene, and Canna. In fine, they befought him, that he would not dishonour himself, and betray them to their enemics, by turning another way; as if it were his onely care, that the Citie should not be taken in his full view: promifing, to make a desperate fally, if he would once more aduenture to fet vpon the Roman campe. Such were the hopes of Boffar and his 30 fellow. But Hannibal had alreadic done his best: and now began to faint under the burden of that warre, wherein (as afterward he protested) he was vanquished by Hanno and his Partifans in the Carthaginian Senate, rather than by any force of Rome. Lin.1.30. It may well be, as a thing incident in like cases, that some of those which were besieged in Capua, had beene fent over by the Hannonians, to observe the doings of Hannibal, and to check his proceedings. If this were fo; infily might they curle their owne malice, which had cast them into this remedilesse necessitie. Howsoever it were the letters directed vnto Hannibal, fell (as is shewed) into the Roman Proconfuls hands; who cutting off the hands of all fuch counterfait fugitiues, as carried fuch messages, whipt them backe into the Towne. This miserable spectacle brake 40 the hearts of the Campans: fo that the Multitude crying out you the Senate, with menacing termes, caused them to assemble, and consult, about the yeelding vp of Capua vinto the Romans. The brauest of the Senators, and such as a few yeeres since had beene most forward in joyning with Hannibal, vnderstood well enough wherevnto the mattertended. Wherefore one of them inuited the rest home to supper: telling them, that when they had made good cheare, he would drink to them fuch an health as should set them free from that cruel reuenge, which the Enemie sought ypon their bodies. About feuen and twentie of the Senators there were, that liking well of this motion, ended their lives together, by drinking poylon. All the reft, hoping for more mercie than they had deserved, yeelded simply to discretion. So one 50 of the Towne-gates was fet open: whereat a Roman Legion with some other companies, entring, difarmed the Citizens; apprehended the Carthiginian Garrifon; and commanded all the Senators of Capus to goe forth into the Roman campe. At their comming thither, the Proconfuls laid yrons vpon them all: and commanding them to tell what store of gold and silver they had at home, sent them into safe Vuuuu 2

The fift Booke of the first part custodie; some to Cales; others to Theanum. Touching the generall Multitude; they were referred vnto the diferetion of the Senate: yet fo hardly vsed by Fulnius in the meane while, that they had little cause of hope or comfort in this adversitie. Ap. Claudius was brought euen to the point of death, by the wound which he had lately received: yet was he not inexorable to the Campans; as having loved them well in former times, and having given his daughter in marriage to that Pacavius, of whom we spake before. But this facilitie of his Colleague, made Fuluius the more haltie in taking vengeance: for feare, left ypon the like respects, the Roman Senare might proue more gentle, than he thought behouefull to the common fafetie, and honour of their state. Wherefore he tooke the paines, to ride by night vnto Thea- 10 nam, and from thence to Cales: where he caused all the Campan prisoners to suffer death; binding them to flakes, and scourging them first a good while with rods;

after which he struck off their heads. This terrible example of vengeance, which the Carthaginians could not hinder, made al Townes of Italie the leffe apt to follow the vaine hope of the Campans: and bred a general inclination, to returne vpon good conditions to the Roman fide. The Asellans, Calatines, and Sabatines, people of the Campans, that in the former change had followed the fortune of Capus, made also now the like submissio, for very feare, and want of abilitie to relift. They were therefore yied with the like rigour, by Fuluins: who dealt so extremely with them all, that he brought them into desperation, 20 Wherefore some of their yong Gentlemen, burning with fire of reuenge, got into Rome: where they found meanes by night-time, to fet on fire fo many houses, that a great part of the Citie was like to have been confumed. The beginning of the fire in divers places at once, argued that it was no casualitie. Wherfore libertie was proclaimed vnto any slaue, and other sufficient reward vnto any free man, that should discouer who those Incendiaries were. Thus all came out and the Campans, being detected by a slaue of their owne (to whom, aboue his libertie promised, was given about the fumme of an hundred markes) had the punilbment answerable to their deferts. Fuluius hereby being more and more incenfed against this wretched people, held them in a manner as prifoners within their walls: and this extreme feneri- 30 tie caused them at length to become Suppliants vnto the Roman Senate; that some period might be fer vnto their miferies. That whereupon the Senators refolued in the end, was worse than all that which they had suffered before. Onely two poore women in Capua (of which one had beene an Harlot) were found not guiltie of the late rebellion, The reft were, some of them, with their wines and children fold for flaues, and their goods confilcated; others laid in prifon, and referued to further deliberation: but the generalitie of them, commanded to depart out of Campania by a certaine day; and confined vnto severall places as belt liked the angric Victors. As for the Towne of Capua, it was suffered to stand, in regard of the beautie and commodious lite: but no corporation or forme of politic, was allowed to bee therein, 40 only a Raman Prouost was every yeere sent to governe over those that should inhabit it, and to doc instice. This was the greatest act, and most important, hitherto done by the people of Rome, after many great losses in the present warre. After this, the glorie of Hannibal beganne to shine with a more dimme light, than before : his oile being farre fpent; and that, which should have remixed his slame, being vnfortunately shed; as shall be told in place convenient.

How the Carthaginians, making a partie in Sardinia and Sicil, held warre against the Romans in those Ilands; and were ouer-come ..

Hilest things passed thus in Italie; the commotions raised in Sardinia And Still by the Carthaginians & their friends, were brought to a quiet and happie end, by the indultrious valour of the Romans. The Sardinanrebellion was great and fudden: about chirtie thou fand being va in armes, ere the Roman forces could arrive there to suppresse ic. One

Harficor as with his fonne Hiostus, mightie men in that Iland, were the Ring-leaders, being incited by Hanno a Carthaginian, that promifed the affiftance of his Countrie. Neither were the Carthaginians in this enterprise so carclesse, as in the rest of their maine undertakings, about the same time. Yet it had beene better, if their care had beene directed vnto the profecution of that maine businessein Italie; whereon this and all other hopes depended. For it would have sufficed, if they could have hindred the Romans from fending an Armie into Sardinia. Har sicoras with his followers might well enough have served to drive out Q. Mutius the Prætor, who lay sicke 20 in the Prouince; and not more weake in his owne bodie, than in his traine. But whilest they fought reuenge of that particular iniurie, whereof the sense was most gricuous: they neglected the opportunitie of requiting those that had done them wrong, and of the fecuring themselues from all iniuries in the future. Their fortune also in this enterprise was such; as may seeme to have discouraged them from being at the like charge, in cases of more importance. For whereas they sent ouer Afdrubal, surnamed the bald, with a competent fleet and armic; affisted in this Expedition by Hanno the Author of the rebellion, & by Margo a Gentleman of the Barchine house, and neere kinsman to Hannibal: it so fell out, that the whole fleet by extremitic of foule weather, was cast voon the Baleares; so beaten and in such euill 30 plight, that the Sardinians had even spent their hearts, and were in a manner quite vanguilhed, ere these their friends could arrive to succour them.

Titus Manlius was fent from Rome with two and twentie thousand foot, and twelue hundred horse, to settle the estate of that Iland, which he had taken in, and annexed vnto the Roman Dominion, long before this, in his Confulship. It was a laudable custome of the Romans, to preserve and vp-hold in their several Provinces, the greatnesseand reputation of those men, and their families, by whom each Prouince had beene first subdued vnto their Empire. If any injurie were done vnto the Prouincialls; if any grace were to be obtained from the Senate; or whatfocuer accident required the affistance of a Patron: the first Conquerour, and his race afte.

40 him, were the most readie and best approved meanes, to procure the benefit of the people subdued. Hereby the Romans held very sure intelligence, in every Province, and had alwaies in readinesse fit men to reclaime their Subjects, if they fel into any such disorder, as would otherwise have required a greater charge and trouble. The comming of Manlius, retayned in obedience all that were not already broken too farre out. Yet was Harstoras so strong in field, that Manlius was compelled to arme his Mariners: without whom he could not have made up that number of two and twentiethousand, whereof we have spoken before: He landed at Calaris or Carallis, where mooring his ships, he passed up into the Countrie, and sought out the Encmic. Hyoftus, the sonne of Harsteoras, had then the command of the Sardinian Ar-

50 mie left vnto him by his father, who was gone abroad into the Countrie, to draw in more friends to their side. This yong Gentleman would needes aduenture to get honor, by giving battaile to the Romans at his owne differetion. So hee rashly aduentured to fight with an old Souldier: by whom he received a terrible overthrow; and lost in one day about thirtie thousand of his followers. Hyostus himselfe, with Vuuuu 3 the rest of his broken troupes, got into Cornus, the chiefe Towne of the Island: whither Manlius pursued them. Very soone after this defeature came Afd. ubal with his Carthaginians: too late to winne all Sardinia in such haste as he might have done, if the tempest had not hindred his voiage; yet soone enough, and strong enough to faue the Towne of Cornus, and to put a new spirit into the Rebells. Manlius hereypon with-drew himselfe back to Calaris: where he had not stayed long, ere the Sardinians (fuch of them as adhered to the Roman partie) craued his affiltance; their Countrie being wasted by the Carthaginians, and the Rebells, with whom they had refused to joyne. This drew Manlius forth of Calaris: where if he had staied a little longer, A drubal would have fought him out with some blemish to his reputation. 10 But the tame of Asarubal and his companie, appeares to have been greater than was their strength. For after some triall made of them in a few skirmilhes; Manlius aduentured all to the hazard of a battaile; wherein he flew twelue thousand of the enemies; and took of the Sardinians and Carthaginians three thousand. Four choures the battaile lasted: and victoricat length fell to the Romans, by the flight of the Islanders; whose courages had beene broken in their vnprosperous fight, not many daies before. The death of yong Hyostus, and of his father Harsteoras, that slew himselfe for griefe, together with the captiuity of Afdrubal himselfe, with Mago and Hanno the Carthaginians; made the victorie the more famous. The vanquilhed Armie fled into Cornus : whither Manlius followed them; and in flort space wanne 20 the Towne. All other Cities of the Isle that had rebelled, followed the example of Cornus, and yeelded vnto the Roman: who impoling vpon them such increase of tribute, or other punishment, as best sorted with the nature of their seueral offences, or their ability to pay, returned backe to Calaris with a great bootie, and from thence to Rome; leaving Sardinia in quiet. The warrein Sicil was of greater length, and euery way more burdensome to Rome: as also the victoric brought more honour and profit; for that the Romans became thereby not only fauers of their owne, as in Sardinia; but Lords of the whole Countrie; by annexing the Citie and Dominion of Syracuse, to that which they enioved before. Soone after the battaile of Canna, the old King of Syracuse died: who 20 had continued long a stedfast friend vnto the Romans; and greatly relieved them in this present warre. He lest his Kingdometo Hieronymus his grand-child, that was about fifteene yeeres of age; Gelo his sonne, that should have beenehis heire, being dead before. To this yong King his successor, Hiero appointed fifteene tutors : of which the principal were Andronodorus, Zoilus, and Themistius; who had married his daughters, or the daughters of Gelo. The rest were such, as he judged most likely to preserve the Kingdome, by the same arte, whereby himselfe had gotten and solong kept it. But within a little while; Andronodorus, waxing wearie of fo many Coadiutors, beganne to commend the sufficiencie of the yong Prince, as extraordinary in one of his yeeres; and faid, that he was able to rule the Kingdome without helpe of 40 any Protector. Thus by giving over his owne charge, hee caused others to doe the like:hoping thereby to get the King wholly into his hands, which came to passe in a fortas hee desired. For Hieronymus, laying aside all care of gouernement, gaue himselfe wholly ouer to his pleasures: or if he had any regard of his Royall dignitic, it was onely in matter of exterior shew, as wearing a Diademe with ornaments of purple, and being attended by an armed guard. Hereby he offended the eyes of his people; that had neuer seene the like in Hiero, or in Gelo his sonne. But much more he offended them, when by his infolent behaviour, futable to his outward pompe, he gaue proofe, that, in course of life, hee would revive the memorie of Tyrants dead long fince, from whom he tooke the patterne of his habit. Hee grew proud, 50 lultful, cruel, and dangerous to all that were about him : so that such of his late Tutors as could escape him by flight, we reglad to live in banishment: the rest, being most of them put to death by the Tyrant; many of them dying by their owne hands, to avoid the danger of his displeasure, that seemed worse than death it selfe.

Only Andronodorus, Zoilus, and one Thraso continued in grace with him, and were his Counfailers, but not of his Cabinet. Thefe, howfocuer they agreed in other points, were at some dissension about that maine point, of adhering, either to the Romans, or to the Carthaginians. The two former of them, were wholly for the Kings pleasures, which was let on change : but Tirafo, having more regard of his honour and profit, was very earnest to continue the amitie with Rome. Whilest as vet it remained somewhat doubtfull, which way the King would incline: a conspiracie against his Person, was detected by a groome of his; to whom, one Theodorus had broken the matter. Theodorus hereupon was apprehended, and tormented;

10 thereby to wring out of him the whole practice, and the names of the vndertakers. Long it was ere he would speake any thing: but yeelding (as it seemed) in the end. unto the extremitie of the torture; he confessed, that he had beene set on by Thraso; whom he appeached of the treason, together with many more, that were necre in loue or place vnto Hieronymus. All these therefore were put to death, being innocent of the crime wherewith they were charged. But they that were indeede the Conspirators, walked boldly in the streets, and neuer shrunke for the matter: assuring themselves, that the resolution of Theodorus would yeelde to no extremitie Thus they all escaped, and soone after found meanes to execute their purpose. The King himselfe, when Thraso was taken out of the way, quickly resoluted vpon siding

20 with the Carthaginians; whereto he was very inclinable before. Yong men, when first they grow Masters of themselves, loue to seeme wifer than their fathers, by taking different courses. And the liberalitie of Hiero to the Romans, in their great neceffitie, had of late beene fuch, as might have beene termed excessive; were it not in regard of his prouidence; wherein hee tooke order for his owne chate, that depended vpon theirs. But the yong Nephew, taking little heede of dangers farre off; regarded only the things present; the weakenesse of Rome; the prevalent fortunes of Carthage; and the much monie that his grand-father had laid out in vaine, to shoulder up a falling house. Wherefore he dealt with Hannibal: who readily entred into good correspondence with him; that was maintained by Hippocrates & Epicides,

30 Carthaginians borne, but grand-children of a banished Syracusan. These grew into fuch favour with Hieronymus, that they drew him whither they lifted. So that when Appius Claudius the Roman Pretor, hearing what was towards, made a motion of renewing the Confederacie, betweene the People of Rome and the King of Syracufe; his Meffengers were dismissed with an open scoffe. For Hieronymus would needes haue them tell him the order of the fight at Canne; that hee might thereby learne how to accommodate himselfe: saying, That he could hardly believe the Carthaginians; so wonderfull was the victoric as they reported it. Having thus dismissed the Romans, he sent Embassadors to Carthage, where hee concluded a league: with condition, at first, that a great part of the Island should be annexed to his Domini-

40 on; but afterward, that he should raigne ouer all Sicil; and the Carthaginians rest Satisfied, with what they could get in Italie. At these doings Ap. Claudius did not greatly stirre:partly for the indignities that were offered; partly for that it behoued not the Romans, to entertaine more quarrells, then were enforced vponthem by neceffitie; and partly (as may feeme) for that the reputation, both of himfelfe, and of his Citic, had received such blemish, by that which hapned vnto him in his journie, as much discountenanced him when he came into Sicil, & forbad him to looke big. The money that Hiero had bestowed upon the Romans, where with to relieve them in their necessitie, this Appius was to carrie backe vnto him: it being refused by the Roman Senate, with greater braucrie than their present fortune would allow. But 50 in flead of returning the monie with thankes, as he had beene directed, and as it had beene noised abroad that hee should doe: the warre against Philip King of Macedon (whereof we have spoken before) compelled the Romans to lay aside their vaine glory, and fend word after him, that he should configne that monie over to Marcus Valerius; of whose voyage into Greece, the Citie had not otherwise wherewith to beare the charge. This was done accordingly: and hereby Claudius (which name in the whole continuance of that Familie, is taxed with pride) his errand was changed, from a glorious oftentation of the Roman magnanimitie; into fuch a pitti ull tune of thanklgiuing, as must needes have bred forrow and commiscration, in so true a friend as Hiero; or, if it were deliuered after his death, matter of pastime and fcorne, in Hieronymus the new King.

But whilest Hieronymus was more desirous of warre, than well resoluted how to beginne it: his owne death changed the forme of things, and bred a great innovation in the flate of Syracuse; which thereby might have prospered more than euer, had it beene wisely gouerned. Hippocrates and Epicides, of whom we spake before, 10 were fent about the Country with two thousand men; to follicite the Townes, and perswade them to shake off their obedience to the Romans. The King himselfe with an Armie of fifteene thousand horse and foot, went to Leontium, a Citie of his owne Dominion: hoping that the fame of his preparation, would make the whole Island fall to him in all hafte, and accept him for Soueraigne. There the Conspirators tooke him on the fudden, as hee was passing through a narrow street; and rushing betweene him and his guard, strooke him dead. Forthwith liberty was proclaimed: and the found of that word fo joyfully answered by the Leontines, that the guard of Hieronymus, had little courage to reuenge their Masters death. Yet for feare of the worst, a great largesse was promised vnto the Souldiers, with rewards vnto their 20 Captaines; which wrought to effectually; that when many wicked acts of the murdered King were reckoned vp; the Armie, as in detellation of his bad life, suffered his carkasse to lie vnburied. These newes ranne quickly to Syracuse: whither some of the Conspirators, taking the Kings horses, posted away; to significall that had passed; to stirre vp the people to libertie; and to preuent Andronodorns, if he, or his fellowes would make offer to vsurpe a Tyrannie. The Syracufians hereupon presently tooke Armes; and made themselues masters of their owne Citie. Andronodorus on the other fide fortified the Palace, and the Island : being yet uncertaine what to doe; betweenedelire of making himselfe a soueraigne Lord, and feare of suffering punishment, as a Tyrant, if his enterprise miscarried. His wife Demarata, that was 30 the daughter of Hiero, cherished him in his hopes: putting him in minde of that well knowne Prouerbe, which Dionysius had vsed; That a Tyrant should keepe his place, till he were haled out of it by the heeles, and not ride away from it on horse-backe. But feare, and better counsaile prevailed so farre; that Andronodorus, having slept vpon the matter; dissembled his affections, and deferred his hope, vnto better opportunitie. The next day he came forth, and made a speech vnto the People: telling them; That hee was glad to fee, how prudently they behaved themselves in so great a change; that he had stood in feare, lest they would not have contained themselves within bounds of discretion; but rather have sought to murder all without difference, that any way belonged to the Tyrant; and that fince he beheld their order- 40 ly proceeding, and their care, not to rauish their liberty perforce, but to wed it vnto them for euer; he was willingly come to them forth of his strength, & surrendred vp the charge, committed vnto him, by one that had beene an cuill Master, both to him and them. Hereupon great joy was made; and Pretors chosen (as in former times) to gouerne the Citie; of which Andronodorus was one, and the chiefe. But fuch was his defire of Soueraignetie: and so vehement were the instigations of his wife; that shortly he beganne to practise with Hippocrates, Epicides, and other Captaines of the Mercinaries: hoping to make him felfe strong, by their helpe, that were least pleased with the change. Hippocrates and Epicides had beene with the Syracustan Pretors, and told them, that, being fent from Hannibal to Hieronymus, they according 50 to instructions of their Captaine, had done him, whilest he lived, what service they could; and that now they were defirous to returne home. They requested thereforethat they might be friendly dismissed and with a conuoy; that might keepe them from falling into the hands of the Romans, and fet them fafe at Locri. This was

CHAP. 3. S. 15. casily granted: both for that the Syracustan Magilirates were wellcotended to earne thankes of Hannibal, with such a little curtesie; and for that they thought it expedient, to rid their Towne quickly of this troublesome couple; which were good souldiers, and gracious with the Armie, but otherwise lewed men. It was not the desire of these two Sicilians, to be gone so hastily as they made shew: they were more mindfull of the businesse, for which Hannibal had fent them. Wherefore they insinuated themselues into the bosoms of such as were most likely to fill the army with tumult: especially of the Roman fugitives, and those that had cause to mistrust what should become of themselves, when the Romans & Syracustans were come to agree-10 ment. Such instruments as these, Andronodorus had great neede of : as also of many other, to helpe him in his dangerous attempt. Hee found Themissius, that had married Harmonia the fifter of Hieronymu, ready to take his part; as being carried with the like passions of his owne, and of his wife. But in seeking to increase the number of his adherents; he reuealed the matter to one, that reuealed all to the reft of the Pretors. Hereupon it followed, that he, and Themistius, entring into the Senate, were flaine out of hand : and afterward accused to the People, of all the euill which they had done, whilest Hieronymus liued, as by his authoritic; and now fince attempted, in seeking to vsurpethe tyrannie themselues. It was also declared, that the daughters of Hiero and Gelo were accessarie to this dangerous treason: and that 20 the viquiet foirits of these women would neuer cease to worke, vntill they had recoursed those Royall ornaments, and Soueraigne power, whereof their familie was now dispossessed. These daughters therefore of Hiero and Gelo were also condemned to die: & executioners presently sent by the enraged people, to take away their liucs. Demarata, and Harmonia had perhaps descrued this heavie sentence : but Heracles, the daughter of Hiero, and wife of Sosippus, being altogether innocent; was murdered together with her two yong daughters, in the halty execution of this ralh judgement. Her husband Softppus was a louer of the Common-wealth; and in that respect so hated by Hieronymus, that being sent Embassador to King Piblemie, che.he durst not returne home; but saied in Egypt as a banished man. This considera-30 tion, when it was too late, together with some other pittifull accidents accompanying the flaughter, fo affected the multitude; that (pardoning them felues) all cryed out vpon the authors of so foule a butcherie. Being thus incenfed against the Senate; and knowing not otherwise how to satisfie their anger; they called for an election of new Pretors, in the roome of Andronodorus and Themissius, that were lately flaine: meaning to substitute such in their places, as the Senators should have little cause to like. At the election were present a great rowt, not only of the poorer Citizens, but of fouldiers that preffed into the throng. One of the fe, named Epicides Pretor; another named Happocrates: and the leffe that the old Pretors and Senators approved this nomination, the more eager was the multitude; and by a generall 40 crie forced them to be accepted. These being made Pretors, did what they could to hinder the agreement that was in hand, between the Syracusians and the Romans. But having striven in vaine, and seeing that the People stood in searc of Ap. Claudius, and of Marcellus, that was lately come into Sieil; they gaue way vnto the time, and fuffered the old league of Hiero to be reconfirmed; which afterward they purpoled to dissolue by practice. The Leontines had some neede of a Garrison : and to them was fent Hippocrates the Pretor; attended, by fuch fugitives, and mercinary fouldiers, as were most burdensome to Syracuse. Thither when he came, hee beganne to doe many acts of hostilitie against the Romans: first in secret, afterward more openly and boldly. Marcellus, rightly understanding the purpose of these two brethren, sent 50 word unto the Syrzenfiams, that they had already broken the league; and that the peace would neuer be kept sincerely, will this turbulent paire of brethren were expelled the Island, Epicides, searing to sustaine the blame of his brothers proceedings, and more desirous to set sorward the warre, than to excuse any breach of peace; went himselfe vnto the Leonimes, whom he perswaded to rebell against the Syraenfians. For he faid, that fince they had all of late ferued one Mafter; there was little reason why the Leontines should not be enfranchised by his death, as well as the Syracultans, yea or much rather, all things confidered; linee in their fireets the Tyrant was flaine, and libertie first proclaimed. Wherefore, fince they of Syracuje were not contented, to enjoy the freedome purchased among the Leontines; but thought it good reason, that they should beare Dominion over those that had broken the chaine, wher with both the one, and the other were bound : his advice was, that fuch their arrogancie should be checked betimes, erest could get any colour of right by prescription. Hereunto occasion was given by one article of the league, made of late by the Romans and Syracusians. For it was agreed, That all which had been 10 Subject to HIERO and HIERONY-MVS, Should henceforth be Hasfals unto the state of Syracufe. Against this article, if the Leontines, would take exception, and thereby challenge their owne due; Epicides told them, that in this noneltie of change, they had fit opportunity to recouer the freedome, which their fathers had loft not many ages before. Neither was it vnreasonable, which this crafty Carthaginian propounded; if the Leontines had beene subdued by the same hand, which tooke libertie from the Syracufians. But feeing they had long fince yeelded unto Syracufe, and been subject vnto that Citie, by whatforme soeuer it was governed; this claime of libertie was rather seasonable than just. Neuerthelesse the motion of Epicides was highly approued in fo much that when messengers came soone after from Syracuse, 20 to rebuke the Leontines, for that which they had done against the Romans; and to denounce vnto Hippocrates & Epicides, that they should get them gone, either to Locri, or whither elfe they lifted, so that they staicd not in Sicil: word was returned, That they of Leontium had not requested the Syracusians, to make any bargaines for them with the Romans, nor thought themselves bound to observe the covenants, which others without wagrant had made in their names. This peremptoric answere was forth-with reported vnto Marcellus by the Syracusians : who offered him their affistance in doing justing upon the Leontines their Rebells; with condition that when the Towne was taken, it might be theirs againe. Marcellus required no better fatisfaction: but forth-with topke the businesse in hand; which he dispatched in one 30 day. At the first affault, Icontium was taken : all faue the Castle, whereinto Hippocrates and Epicides fled; and stealing thence away by night, conneied themselves into the Towne of Herbefus. The first thing that Marcellus did, when hee had wonne the Towne, was the same, which other Roman Captaines vsed after victorie; to feeke out the fugitive Roman flaues and renegados, whom hee caused all to die: the rest both of the Townsmen and Souldiers, hee tooke to mercy; for bearing also to strip or spoile them. But the same of his doings was bruted after a contrary fort. It was faid, that he had flaine, Man, Woman, and Child, and put the Towne to facke. These newes met the Syracusian Army vpon the way, as it was going to joyne with Marcellus, who had ended his businesse before. About eight thousand Mercinaries 40 there were, that had beene fent forth of Syracuse, under Sosis and Dinomenes two of the Pretors, to serue against the Leantines and other Rebells. These Captaines were honest men, and well affected to their Countrie: but the souldiers that followed them, had those diseases, with which all mercinaries are commonly infected. They tooke the matter deeply to heart, that their fellow-fouldiers (as now they termed those against whom they went) had beene so cruelly butchered; and hercupon they fell to mutinie; though what to demand, or with whom to bee angrie, they could not tell. The Pretors therefore thought it best, to turne their viquiet thoughts another way, and fet them aworke in some place else : for as much as at Leontium there was no neede of their fernice. So toward Herbefus they marched: where lay 50 Hippocrates and Epicides, the architects of all this mischiefe, denising what further harme they might doe; but now fo weakely accompanied, that they feemed vnable to escape the punishments belonging to their offences past. Hercof the two bretheren were no leffe well aware: and therfore aduentured vpon a remedy little leffe defocrate desperate than their present case. They issued forth of Herbesus vnarmed, with Olive branches in their hands, in manner of suppliants; and so presented themselves to the Armie. Sixe hundred men of Creete were in the vantguard; that had bin well vsed by Hieronymus; and some of them greatly bound vnto Hannibal; who had taken them prisoners in the Italian warre, and louingly dismissed them. These Cretans therefore welcomed the two brethren, and bade them be of good cheare; faying, that no man should doe them harme, as long as they could vie their weapons. Herewithall the Armie was at a stand; and the rumor of this accident, ranne swiftly from man to man, with generall approbation. The Pretors thought to helpe the 10 matter by feueritie; which would not ferue. For when they commanded thefe two Traitors to be laid in yrons: the exclamation was fo violent against them, that faine they were to let all alone, and returne, vicertaine what course to take, vito Megara; where they were lodged the night before. Thirher when they came, Hippoerates deuised a tricke; whereby to helpe himselfe, and better the vncertaine case wherein he flood. He caused lettersof his owne penning, to be intercepted by some of his most trustie Cretans; directed (as they made show) from the Syracusian Pretors, to Marcellus. The contents hercof were, That Marcellus had well done, in committing all to the fword among the Leontines: but that it farther behoued him. to make the like dispatch of all the Mercinaries belonging to Syracule; which were 20 offensiue, all of them in generall, to the libertic of the Citic, and the peace with Rome. When this counterfeit Epistle was openly rehearsed: the vprore was such. that Softs and his fellow Pretor, were glad to for fake the campe, and flie for their liues. All the Syracustans remaining behinde, had been cut in peeces by the enraged fouldiers, if the two artificers of the sedition had not faued their lines; rather to keepe them as pledges, and by them, to winne their friends within the Towne, than for any good will. They perswaded also a mischieuous knaue that had serued among the Leontines, to justific the bruit of Marcellus his crueltie; and to carrie home the newes to Syracufe, as an eye-witnesse. This incensed not only the multitude, but fome of the Senate; and filled the whole Towne with causelesse indignation. In 30 good time (faid fome) was the auarice and crueltie of the Romans detected: who, had they in like fort gotten into Syracuse, would have dealt much worse; where their greedy appetites might have beene tempted with a farre greater bootie. Whilest they were thus discoursing, and denising how to keepe out the wicked Romans, Hippocrates with his Armie came to the gates; exhorting the Citizens to let him in, vinleffe for want of helpe, they would be betraied to their enemies. The Pretors with the best and wisest of the Senate, would faine haue kept him out : but the violence the best and wisest of the Senate, would raine hause kept in most; but the violence of the souldiers to force a gate, was no whit greater, than the head-strong furie of those within the Towne; that laboured to breake it open. So he entred, and immediately fell vpon the Pretors; whom (being for faken by all men) hee put to the 40 sword, and made slaughter of them and their followers vntill night. The next day he went openly to worke: and after the common example of Tyrams, gaueliberty to all slaues and prisoners; and being fortified with adherents of the worst and baself fort, made himselse and his brother Pretors, in Title, but in effect, Lords of syrams.

When Markellius was advertised of this great alteration, hee thought it no time

When Marcelus was aduerthed of the signal attends, the content of the further iffue. He fent Embaffadours to Syreeafe; that were not admitted into the Hauen, but chased out as enemies. Then drew he necre with his Armie: and lodging within a mile and a halfe of the Towne, sent before him, some to require a parlee. These were entertained without the walls by the two new Pretors: to whom they declared, That the Romans were come thinker; not with purpose to doe hurt, but in fauour of the Syreaufans, which were oppressed by Tyrants; and to punish those, that had murdered and banished so many of the principal Citizens. Wherefore they required, that those worthy men, their Confederates, which were chased out of the Towne, might be suffered to returne and enjoy their owne; as also that the Authors of the great slaughter lately committed, might be deliuered vp. Hereto Epicides briefly answered, That if their errand had beene to him, he could have told what to fay to them; but fince it was directed vnto others, they should doc well to returne, when those to whom they were sent, had the government in their hands. As for the warre which they threatned; hee told them, they should finde by experience, that to besiege Syracuse, was an other manner of worke, than to take Leontium. Thus hee fent them gone; and returned back into the Citie. Immediately beganne the fiege, which endured longer than the Romans had expected. The quicke and easie winning of Leontium did put Marcellus in hope, that fo long a circuit of walls, as compassed Syracule, being manned with 10 no better kinde of Souldiers, than those with whom he had lately dealt, would in fome part or other, be taken at the first affault. Wherefore he omitted no violence or terrourin the very beginning; but did his best, both by Land and Sea. Neuertheleffe all his labour was disappointed; and his hope of prevailing by open force, taken from him by the ill successe of two or three of the first assaults. Yet was it not the vertue of the Defendants, or any strength of the Citie, that bred such despaire of hastie victorie. But there lived at that time in Syracuse, Archimedes the noble Mathematician: who at the request of Hiero the late King, that was his kinsman, had framed such engines of warre, as being in this extremitie put in vse, did more mischiefe to the Romans than could have beene wrought by the Canon, or any in- 20 struments of Gunne-powder; had they in that age beene knowne. This Archimedes discoursing once with Hiero, maintained, That it were possible to remove the whole earth out of the place wherein it is, if there were some other earth, or place of fure footing, whereon a man might stand. For proofe of this bold affertion, he performed some strange workes, which made the King entreat him to convert his studie vnto things of vse; that might preserue the Citie from danger of enemies. To fuch Mechanicall workes, Archimedes, and the Philosophers of those times, had little affection. They held it an imparie done unto the liberall sciences, to submit learned Propositions, vnto the workemanship, and gaine, of base handicrasts men. And of this opinion Plato was an author: who greatly blamed some Geometricians; that 30 feemed vnto him to profane their science, by making it vulgar. Neither must wee rashly taske a man so wise as Plato, with the imputation of supercilious austeritie, or affected fingularitie in his reprehension. For it hath beene the vnhappy fate of great inuentions, to be vilified, as idle fancies, or dreames, before they were published: and being once made knowne, to be under-valued; as falling within compaffe of the meanest wit; and things, that every one, could well have performed. Hercof(to omit that memorable example of Columbus his discoverie, with the much different forts of neglect, which hee vnder-went before and after it) in a familiar and most homely example, we may fee most apparent proofe. He that lookes upon our Enlish Brewers, and their Servants, that are daily exercised in the Trade; will thinke 40 it ridiculous to heare one fay, that the making of Malt, was an invention, proceeding from some of an extraordinary knowledge in natural Philosophic. Yet is not the skill of the inventors any whit the leffe, for that the labor of workmanship growes to be the Trade of ignorant men. The like may be faid of many handicrafts: and particularly in the Printing of Bookes; which being deuised, and bettered, by great Scholers and wife men, grew afterward corrupted by those, to whom the practice fell; that is, by fuch, as could flubber things eafily over, and feede their workemen at the cheapest rate. In this respect therefore, the Alchymists, and all others, that haue, or would feeme to haue any fecret skill, whereof the publication might doe good vnto mankinde; are not without excuse of their close concealing. For it is a 50 kinde of injultice, that the long trauels of an understanding braine, beside the losse of time, and other expense, should be cast away upon men of no worth; or yeeld leffe benefit vnto the Author of a great worke, than to meere frangers; and perhaps his enemies. And furely, if the paffion of Enuic, haue in it any thing allowable and naturall, as having Anger, Feare, and other like Affections: it is in some such case as this; and serueth against those, which would vsurpe the knowledge, wherewith God hath denied to endue them. Neuertheleffe, if we have regard vnto common charitie, and the great affection, that every one ought to be are vnto the generalitie of mankinde, after the example of him that suffereth his Sunne to shine wpon the inst and voinst: it will appeare more commendable in wife men, to enlarge themfelues, and to publish vnto the world, those good things that lie buried in their own bosomes. This ought specially to be done, when a profitable knowledge bath not annexed to it some dangerous cunning; that may bee peruerted by cuill men to a 10 mischieuous vse. For if the secret of any rare Antidot, contained in it the skill of giuing some deadly and irrecouerable poyson: better it were, that such a iewell remaine close in the hands of a wife and honest man; than being made common, binde all men to vse the remedie, by teaching the worst men how to doe mischiefe. But the workes which Archimedes published, were such as tended to very commendable ends. They were engins, ferning vnto the defence of Syracuje; not fit for the Syracustans to carry abroad, to the hurt and oppression of others. Neither did he altogether publish the knowledge, how to vie them, but referred so much to his owne direction; that after his death more of the same kinde were not made, nor those of his owne making were employed by the Romans. It sufficed vnto this worthy man, that 20 he had approoued, euen vnto the vulgar, the dignitic of his Science; and done especiall benefit vnto his Countrey. For to enrich a Mechanicall trade, or teach the art of murdering men, it was besides his purpose.

Marcellus had caused certaine of his Quinquereme Gallics to be fastened together, and Towers erected on them, to beat the defendants from the wall. Against these, Archimedes had fundrie deuices; of which any one fort might have repelled the affaylants: but all of them together shewed the multiplicitie of his great wit. He shot heavie flones and long peeces of timber, like vnto the yards of ships; which brake fome of the Gallies by their force and weight. These afflicted such as lay farre off. They that were come necret the walls, lay open to a continual voly of shot, which 30 they could not endure. Some with an yron graple were taken by the prow and hoi-fled vp, shaking out all the men, and afterward falling downe into the water. Some by strange engins were listed up into the ayre; where turning round a while, they were broken against the walls, or cast vpon the rockes: and all of them were so beaten, that they durft neuer come to any fecond affault. In like fort was the Land-armie handled. Stones and timber, falling vpon it like Haile; did not onely ouerwhelme the men, but brake downe the Roman engins of battery; and forced Marcellus to give over the affault. For remedie hereof it was conceived, that if the Romans could earely before day get neere vnto the walls: they should be (as it were) vnder the point blanck, and receive no hurt by these terrible Instruments; which

40 were woond up hard to shoote a great compasse. But this vaine hope cost many of the affaylants lives. For the shot came downeright vpon them: and beating them from all parts of the wall, made a great flaughter of them, all the way as they fled, (for they were vnable to stay by it) euen till they were gotten very farre off. This did so terrific the Romans; that if they perceived any peece of timber, or a ropes end, vpon the walls, they ranne away, crying out, that Archimedes his engins were readie to discharge. Neither knew Marcellus how to ouercome these difficulties, or to take away from his men, that feare; against the cause whereof he knew no remedie. If the engins had flood vpon the walls, subject to firing, or any such annoyance from without; he might have holpen it by some device, to make them vnser-50 niceable. But all or the most of them were out of fight; being erected in the streetes behinde the walls; where Archimedes gaue directions how to vie them. Wherefore the Roman had none other way left, than to cut off from the Towne all prouifion of victualls, both by Land and by Sea. This was a desperate peece of worke. CHAP.3. S.15.

For the enemies having fo goodly an Hauen; the Scain amanner free; and the Carthaginians that were strong by Sea, willing to supply them : were not likely, so foone to bee confumed with famine, as the beliegers to bee wearied out, by lying in Leaguer before so strong a Citic, having no probabilitie to carrie it. Yet, for want of better counsell to follow, this was thought the best, and most honourable

In the meane while, Himileo, Admirall of a Carthaginian Fleete, that had waited long about Sizil, being by Hippocrates aducrtifed of these passages, went home to Carthage, and there to dealt with the Senate, that fine and twentie thousand Foote, three thousand Horse, and twelve Elephants, were committed vnto his charge, 10 wherewith to make warre vpon the Romans in Sicil by Land. Hee tooke many Townes; and many, that had anciently belonged vitto the Carthaginians, did yeeld vnto him. To remedie this mischiefe, and to stay the inclination of men, which following the current of Fortune, beganne to turne vnto the Carthaginians; Marcellus with a great part of his Armie, rose from Syracuse, and went from place to place about the Island. Hee tooke Pelorus and Herbesus, which yeelded vnto him. He tooke also Megara by force and fackt it: either to terrifie others that were obstinate, especially the Syracustans, or else because Rome was at this time poore, and his Armie must have somewhat to keepe it in heart. His especiall desire was to have faued Agrigentum: whither hee came too late; for Himileo had gotten it before. 20 Therefore he returned back toward Syracufe; carefully, and in as good order as hee could, for feare of the Carthaginian that was too strong for him. The circumspe-Ction that he vsed, in regard of Humileo; stood him in good stead, against a danger that he had not mistrusted. For Hippocrates, leaving the charge of Syracuse vnto his brother, had lately issued out of the Citie, with ten thousand foot, and fine hundred horse, intending to joyne his forces with Himileo. Marcellus fell vpon him, ere either was aware of the other: and the Romans, being in good order, got an easie vi-Aorie, against the dispersed and halfe vnarmed Syracusians. The reputation heereof helped a little to keepe the Sicilians from rebellion. Yet it was not long, ere Himileo, ioyning with Hippocrates, ranne ouer al the Island at his pleasure, and presented bat- 30 taile to Marcellus, even at his Trenches; but the Roman wifely refused it. Bomilear also a Carthaginian, entred with a great fleet into the Hauen of Syracuse, and victualled the Citie. After this, the disposition of the Islanders changed so againe, that although another Legion was come from Rome, which escaped from Himileo, and fafely arrived at Marcellus his campe: yet many places revolted vnto the Carthaginians, and flue or betraied the Roman Garrisons.

In the midft of these troubles, Winter enforced both parts to take breath awhile: and Marcellus leaving some of his Armie before Syracuse, that he might not seeme to have given over the siege, went vnto Leontium, where he lay intentiue to all occasions. In the beginning of the Spring he stood in doubt, whether it were better to 40 continue the laborious worke of belieging Syracuse, or to turne all his forces to Agrigentum, against Himiles and Hippocrates. But it would greatly have impaired his reputation, if he had gone from Spracuse, as vnable to prevaile: and he himselfe was of an eager disposition, euer vn willing to giue ground, or to quit, as not faisible, an enterprise, that he had once taken in hand. Hee came therefore to Syracuse: where though he found all the difficulties remaining as before; and no likelihood to take the Citie by force or famine; yet was hee not without hope, that continuance of time would bring forth somewhat, which might fulfill his desire. Especially hee affaied to preuaile by treason; against which no place can hold out. And to this end he dealt with the Syracufian Gentlemen that were in his campe; exhorting them to 50 practife with their friends that remained in the Citie. This was not easie for them to doe, because the towne would harken to no pariee. At length a slaue vnto one of these banished men, making shew to runne away from his Master, got into Syracuse;

where he talked in private with some few, as he had beene instructed. Thus began Marcellus to have intelligence within the Citie: whence the Conspirators vsed to fend him aduertisement of their proceedings; by a fither-boat that passed forth in the night: but when they were growne to the number of fourescore, and thought themselues able to effect somewhat of importance: all was discouered; and they, like Traitors, put to death. In the meane while, one Damasippus a Lacedemonian, that had beene fent out of the Towne as an Embassador to Philip King of Macedon, was fallen into the hands of Marcellus. Epicides was very delirous to ranfome him: and many meetings were appointed for that purpole, not farre from the walls. To There, one of the Romans, looking vpon the wall, and wanting the more compendious arte of Geometrie, fell to numbring the stones: and, making an estimate of the height, judged it leffe than it had beene formerly deemed. Herewith hee acquainted Marcellus: who causing better notice to be taken of the place, and finding, that ladders of no extraordinarie length would reach it; made all things ready, and waited a convenient time. It was the weakest part of the Towne, and therfore the most strongly garded : neither was there hope to prevaile by force against Archimedes, if they failed to take it by furprise. But a fugitive out of the Towne brought word, that a great feast was to bee held vnto Diana, which was to last three dayes: and that, because other good cheare was not so plentifull within the Citie, as in for-20 mer times, Epicides, to gratifie the People, had made the more large distribution of Wine. A better opportunitie could not be wished. Wherefore Marcellus, in the dead of the Festivall night, came vnto the walls, which hee tooke by Scalado. Syracuse was divided into foure parts (or five, if Epipola were reckoned as one) each of which were fortified as distinct Cities. When therefore Marcellus had gotten some peeces, he had the commoditie of a better and fafe lodging, with good flore of bootie; and better opportunitie than before, to deale with the rest. For there were now a great many, as well of those in Acradinia and the Island, inner parts of the Towne, as of those that were alreadie in the hands of Marcellus, that beganne to harken vnto composition, as being much terrified by the losse of those parts, which the Romans 30 had taken and fackt. As for the weapons of Archimedes, little harme, or none they did, vnto those, that were sheltred under strong houses: although it may seeme, that the inner walls were not altogether vnfurnished of his helpe; since they held out a good while, and were not taken by force. The Roman fugitives, and Renegados; were more carefull than euer to defend the rest of the Citie: being sure to be rewarded with a cruell death, if Marcellus could prevaile. Hippocrates and Himileo, were daily expected; and Bomilear was fent away to Carthage, to bring helpe from thence: It was not long ere Hippocrates and Himileo came: who fell vpon the old camp of the Romans, whilest Epicides sallied out of Acradinia vpon Marcellus. But the Romans made such defence in each part, that the Affailants were repelled. Neuerthelesse, 40 they continued to befet Marcellus: whom they held in a manner as ftreightly befieged, as he himselfe did besiege the Towne. But the pestilence at length consumed; together with the two Captaines, a great part of the Armic, and caused the rest to distodge. The Romans were (though somewhat leffe) afflicted with the same pestilence, in so much that Bemileer did put the Citie of Carthage in hope, that he might betaken where he lay, if any great forces were fent thither. This Bomilear wanted no defire to doe his Countrie service : but his courage was not answerable to his good will. He arrived at Pachynns with a strong fleet: where he staied; being loth to double the Cape; for that the windes did better serue the enemie than him. Thisher failed Epicides out of Syracufe: to acquaint him with the necessities of the 50 Citie; and to draw him on. With much intreatie, at length hee came forward: but meeting with the Roman fleet, that was readic for him, he flood off into the deepe; and failed away to Tarentum, bidding Sicil farewell. Then durst not Epicides returne into Syracuse, but went to Agrigentum: where he expected the iffue; with a very faint hope of hearing any good newes.

Xxxxx 2

The Sicilian fouldiers, that remained aliue of Hippocrates his Armie, lay as neere as they could fafely, vnto Marcellus; and some of them, in a strong Towne three miles off. These had done what good they could to Syracuse, by doing what hurt they could vnto the Romans. But when they were informed, that the thate of Sicil was given as desperate by the Carthaginians: they sent Embassadours to treat of peace; and made offer to compound, both for themselues, and for the Towne. Hereunto Marcellus willingly gave care: for he had stated there long enough; and had cause to seare, that after a little while, the Carthaginians might come thither firong againe. He therefore agreed, both with the Citizens, and with the Souldiers. that lay abroad; That they should be Masters of their owne, enjoying their liber- 10 tic and proper lawes, yet fuffering the Romans to poffeffe, what socuer had belonged vnto the Kings. Hereuponthey, to whom Epicides had left his charge, were put to death; new Pretors chosen; and the gates even readie to be opened vnto Marcellus: when suddenly the Roman fugitiues disturbed all. These perceiuing their owne condition to be desperate, perswaded the other Mercinarie souldiers, That the Citizens had bargained onely for themselves, and betraied the Armie to the Romans. Wherefore they prefently tooke armes, and fell vpon the new-chosen Pretors: whom they flue; and made election of fixe Captaines that should command ouer all. But shortly it was found out, that there was no danger at all to the souldiers; excepting only the Fugitines. The treatie therfore was againe fet on foot, and wan- 20 ted little of conclusion: which yet was delaied; either by some feare of the Citizens, that had seene (as they thought) proofe of the Roman avarice in the fack of Epipole, Tyche, and Neapolis, the parts alreadic taken; or by some desire of Marcellus to get the Towne by force, that he might vie the libertie of a Conqueror, and make it wholly subject vnto Rome. Mericus a Spaniard was one of the fixe Captaines, that had beene chosen in the late commotion: a man of such faith, as vsually is found in Mercinaries, holding his own particular benefit aboue all other respects. With this Captaine, Marcellus dealt fecretly : having a fit instrument, of the same Nation, one Belligenes; that went in company with the Roman Embassadors, daily passing to and fro. This craftic Agent perswaded Mericus, That the Romans had alreadic got- 20 ten all Spaine; and that if ever he purposed to make his owne fortune good, either at home in Spaine, or any where elfe; it was now the onely time to doe it; by conforming himselfe to the will of the Roman Generall. By such hopes the Spanish Captaine was easily wonne, and sent forth his owne brother among the Syracusian Embaffadours to ratific the conenant with Marcellus.

This under-hand dealing of Marcellus against the Syracusians, cannot well be commended as honest: neither was it afterwards throughly approued at his comming to Rome. For the benefits of Hiero to the Romans had beene fuch, as descrued not to be requited with the ruine of his Countrie: much leffe, that the miferies of his people, oppressed (though partly through their owne follie) by an Armie of Mercina- 40 ries, should minister vnto the people of Rome, advantage against them. The poore Citizens could not make good their parts against the hired souldiers; and therefore were faine to yeeld vnto the time, and obey those Ministers of Hannibal, that ruled the Armic. But as long as they were free after the death of Hieronymus; and now of late, when they had gathered courage by the flight of Epicides: it had beene their chiefe care to maintaine amitie with the people of Rome. They had lately flaine many the principall of Epicides his followers; and many of themselves had also bin flaine, both lately and in former times, because of this their desire vnto the peace. What though it were true, that the Rascalitie, and some ill aduised Personsioyned with the fouldiers in hatred of the Romans, by occasion of the slaughter which they 50 heard to be done at Leontium, and afterward beheld in those parts of their owne Citie which was taken? Ought therefore the Roman Generall, in a treatic of peace held with the Syracusians, to make a bargaine under-hand against them, with a Capsaine of the Mercinaries? These things were objected against Marcellus, at his returne home. But the Senators thought it a great deale better, to comfort the Syracustans with gentle words, and promites of good viage in time to come, than roreflore the bootie, and giue ouer the Dominion of a Citie, fo great, wealthie, Brong, and many waies important. Neuertheleffe if we confider the many inconveniences and great mischiefes, whereunto Syracuse was obnoxious; both by cuill neighbors, and by that very forme of politie, after which it was gouerned: wee may truly affirme, That it received no small benefit, by becomming subject vnto Rome. For thereby it was not only affured against all forraine enemics, domeitical conspiracies, and fuch T yrants as of old had raigned therein; but freed from the necessitie of ba-10 nishing, or murdering, the most worthic Citizens; as also from all factions, intestine feditions, and a thousand the like miseries, that were wont to grow out of the lealousie, wherein they held their libertie in vaine. Neither enjoyed that Citie, from her first foundation, any such long time of happinesse, as that wherein it flourished, when it refled fecure under the protection of Rome; and was no more molefled, by the disease of ambition; whereof by Marcellus his victorie it was throughly cured. But such benefit, arising from wrongs done, serues not to make iniustice the more excusable: vnlesse we should approve the answere of that Theele, who being found to have stollen a silver cup from a sicke man, said, He never leaves drinking.

By the treason of Mericus, the Roman Army was let into possession of all Sira-20 cufe: wherin, the booty that it found, was faid to have been no leffe, than could have beene hoped for, if they had taken Carthage it selfe, that maintained warre by Land and Sea against them. All the goodly works and Imageries, wherewith Stracule was maruellously adorned, were carried away to Rome; and nothing left vintouched; faue only the houses of those banished men, that had escaped from Hippocrates and Epicides, into the Roman campe. Among other pittifull accidents; the death of Archimedes was greatly lamented, euen by Marcellus himselfe. He was so busic about his Geometrie, in drawing figures, that he harkened not to the noise, and vprore in the Citie; no, nor greatly attended the rude Souldier that was about to kill him. Marcellus took heavily the death of him; and caused his body to bee honourably 3º buried. Vpon his Tombe (as he had ordained in his life time) was placed a Cylinder and a Sphere, with an inscription of the proportion betweene them; which hee first found out. An Inuention of so little vie, as this may feeme, pleased that great Artist better, than the denising of all those engines, that made him so samous. Such difference is betweene the judgement of learned men, and of the vulgar fort. For many an one would thinke the monie loft, that had been spent vpon a sonne, whose fludies, in the Vniuerlitie had brought forth luch fruit, as the proportion betweene a Sphere and a Cylinder.

After the taking of Syracuse, all the Townes in Sicil yeelded vnto the Romans; except Agrigentum and a few places thereabout. At Agrigentum lay Epicides with 40 one Hanno a Carthoginian, and Mutines an African, that was lately fent from Hannibal. This Mutines, by many good preces of seruice, had added some credit to the beaten Carthaginian fide; and withall made his ownename great. By his perswessions, Hanne and Epicides adventured to meet Marcellus without the Towne, and not behave themselves as men expecting to be besieged. Neither was hee more valiant in counsell, than in execution. Once and againe he set vpon the Romans, where they lay encamped; and droue them fearefully into their Trenches. This bred envie in Epicides and Hanno: especially in Hanno, that having beene lately sent from Carthage, with commission and authoritie from the State thought himselfe wronged greatly by Hannibal; in that he had fent vnto him this Mutines, to be his Companion, and 50 to take vpon him, like as good a man as himseife. The indignitie seemed the greater, when Mutines, being to step aside vnto Heradea, for the pacifying of sometroubles there among the Namidians; aduised (as directing Hanno and Epicides) not to meddle with the enemie, vntill his returne. So much therefore the rather would Hanno fight: and offered battell vnto Marcellus, before he fought it. It is like, that a great part of the Roman Armic was left behinde in Syracufe, as neede required : which made the Carthaginians the better able to deale with those that came against them. But what seuer disproportion was between the two Armies; farre greater were the oddes betweene the Captaines. For how foeuer the people of Carthage would giue authoritie by fauour; yet could they not giue worth, and abilitie, in matter of warre. The Numidians, having before conceived some displeasure against their Captaines : and being therefore some of them gone away to Heraclea; were much more offended, when they faw that the vaine-glorious enuic of Hanno carried him vnto the fight, vpon a fool the defire to get victorie, without the helpe of Mutines their Countriman. Wherefore they fent vnto the Roman Generall, and bade him be con- 10 fident: for that it was not their purpose to shew themselves his enemies that day; but onely looke on, and fee the proud Carthaginians well beaten, by whom they had beene milused. They made good their promise; and had their desire. For Marcellus, finding likelihood of truth in their meffage, did fo luftily fet vpon the enemies, that he brake them at the first charge; and with the slaughter of many thousands, droug them backe into Agrigentum.

If Hanno could have been contented, to follow the directions of one, that was a better man of warre than himfelfe, and not have hazarded a battell without neede; the Romans would (hortly have been reduced into termes of great difficulty in their Sicilian warre. For Marcellus was shortly after to leave the Province; and soone 20 vpon his departure, there landed in the Ilanda supply of eight thousand soote, and three thouland Numidian horse, that were sent from Carthage. The same of this new Armie drew many of the Sicilians into rebellion. The Roman Armie, confifting (for the most part) of the Legions of Canna, tooke it very hainously, that no good feruice done, could bring them into the fauour of the Senate; but that, as banished men, they were fent farre from home, and not suffered to returne back to Rome with their Generall. Mutines had pacified his Countrimen the Numidians; and, like an honest man, did the best that he could for those whom he serued, without contending against the foolish pride of Hanno; finding that there was a great alteration; and a greater might have beene, if the Armie lately overthrowne had beene entire. 30 M. Cornelius, the Roman Pretor, vsed all diligence, both to pacific his owne men, and to hinder the Carthaginians. He recovered those inland Townes that had rebelled: and though he could not hinder Mutines from ouer-running all the Countrie; yet hee hindred the Countrie from revolting vnto Mutines. Aboue threefcore Townes, great and small, the Carthaginians held in Sicil: of which, Agrigentum was the principall, and farre bigger than any of the reft. Thence iffued Mutines as often as he pleased, in despight of the Romans: not only to the succor of his owne adherents, but to the great waste of those that followed the contrarie part. But Hasno, in stead of being pleased with all these good services, was filled more and more with enuie, against the man that performed them. He had (belike) received instru- 40 Etion from old Hanno at Carthage, not to fuffer Hannibal, or any Hannibalian, to have share in the honor of these Sicilian warres : which were therefore perhaps the more diligently supplied; whilest Italie was neglected, that should have been regarded more then all the rest. Wherefore, to shew his authoritie, and that it was not in the power of Hannibal, to appoint vnto him an Affistant, or Director: Hee tooke away from Mutines his charge, and gaue it to his owne sonne; thinking thereby to discountenance the man, and make him little effeemed, as one out of Office, among his Numidians. But it fell out quite contrary: and this spightfull dealing, occasioned the losse of whatsoever the Carthaginians held in Sicil. For the Numidians were so incensed by the indignitie offered vnto their Countriman, being such a braue Com- 50 mander, that they offered him their feruice to requite the wrong; and were thenceforth absolutely at his owne disposition. M. Valerius Lauinus, the Roman Consul, was newly come into the Province, when this fell out: and with him did Mutines enter into intelligence. For he could no longer brooke these indignities: but being, neither a Carthaginian, nor fauoured by those that bore all the sway in Carthage; He thought it the wifest way, to play the best of his owne game, and forsake that Citie, which was likely to perish by the cuill counsell that gouerned it. He did not therefore, as his Countrimen had lately done, content himselfe to see his Aduersaries reape the bitter fruits of their owne malicious ouer-weening: and to fuffer that harme, in doing whereof hee would not beare a part; but conspired against them to deliuer vp Agrigentum, and to helpe to expell them veterly out of Sicil. The Conful was glad of his friendship: and carefully followed his advertisements. Neither was there much cunning needfull, to the performance of that which Matines 10 had vnder-taken. For hee with his Numidians did forcibly feize vpon a gate; whereat they let in some Roman Companies that lay neere in a readinesse for the purpose. Hanno, when first hee heard the noise, thought it had beene no worse matter, than fome fuch tumult of the Numidians, as hee had beene well acquainted with of late. But when, making hafte to pacific the trouble, he faw and heard, the Romans intermixed, among those discontented followers of Mutines, forthwith he betooke himfelfe to flight: and fauing himfelfe, with Epicides, in a small Barke, set faile for Africk; leauing all his Armie and Adherents in Sicil, to the mercie of the Romans, that henceforward continued masters of the whole Iland.

Leainus the Consul hauing taken Agrigentum, did sharpe execution of justice 20 vpon all the Citizens. The principall of them hee fcourged with rods, and afterwards beheaded, as was the manner of the Romans: all the rest of them he fold for flaues, and confifcated their goods; fending home to Rome the monie that was raifed of the bootie. This was indeede a time, wherein Rome stood in no lesse necessitie of gold, than of steele: which may have beene the reason, why Leninus dealt so cruelly with the Agrigentines. Neuerthelesse the same of such seueritie bred a terrour among all the Dependants of the Carthaginians; fo that in great haste they fought to make their peace. About fortie Townes yeelded themselves quickly vnto the Romans; twentie were deliuered up by Treason; and fixe onely staied to bee wonne by force. These things done, Leuinus returned home to Rome: carrying 30 with him about foure thouland men from Agatirna; that were a companie of outlawes, bankrouts, and banished men, accustomed to line by spoile of others, in these troublesometimes. He bestowed them about Rhegium in Italie, where they might exercise their occupation against the Brutians; a theeuish kinde of people, that were enemies vnto those of Rhegium, and to the Romans. As for Mutines, he was well rewarded, and made Citizen of Rome: where he lived in good accompt; accompanying the two Scipio's in their journie against Antiochus, and therein doing (as it is faid) very especiall service. So by this enterprise of Sicil, the Carthaginians wasted much of their forces, that with greater profit might have beene emploied in Italie : leauing yet vnto the Romans, in the end of this warre, the entire possession of this Iland: 40 which they wanted when it beganne.

d. XVI.

How the warre passed betweene the Romans and HANNIBAL in Italie. from the taking of Capua to the great victorie at

with M. Falerius Lauinus, who succeeded him in the gouernement of Sicil, and was, at the time of his election, making warre against King Philip in Greece. Great complaint was made against the Conful Marcellus, by the Syracufians, for that which he had done vnto them : they alledging their great friendship to the people of Rome, in the time of their late King Hiero; and affirming, that their Citie did neuer willingly break the alliance, excepting when it was oppressed by such Tyrants, as were not greater enemies to Rome, than to all good men that lived in Syracuse. The Conful, on the other fide, reckoned vp the labours and dangers whereunto they had put him: willing them to bemoane themselves to the Carthaginians that had holpen them in their necessitie; and not vnto the Romans whom they had kept out. Thus 10 each part having some good matter to alledge, the Senate made such an end of the controuersie, as best agreed with the benefit of their owne Common-wealth: blaming the too much rigour of Marcellus; yet not restoring the bootie that hee had taken, nor making the Syracustans free from their subjection, but comforting them, with gentle words, and hopefull promifes, as hath been shewed before. The two new Confuls, Marcellus and Lauinus, were appointed to make warre, as their lots should fall out; the one in Italie; the other in Sicil. The Isle of Sicil fell vnto Marcellue: which Prouince he willingly changed with his Colleague; to the end that the Syracustans (whose cause had not as yet beene heard in the Senate) might not seeme hindred by feare, from vttering their grievances freely. Afterwards, when his bu- 20 finesse with them was dispatcht, hee gently undertooke the patronage of them: which remained long in his Familie; to the great benefit of their Country in times following. So Valerius, the other Conful, was fent into Sicil, whose doings there have beene alreadie rehearled : but Marcellus was emploied against Hannibal.

CHAP. 2. S. 16

Before the Confuls departed out of Rome, they were much troubled with preffing of Souldiers to the warre; and most of all, with getting Mariners for their Nanie. They were all of the poorer fort, that vsed to be emploied in Sea-seruices; especially in rowing. These could not line without present wages: neither was there monie enough in the Treasurie to give them pay. Wherefore it was ordained, that they should be set out at the expence of private men; who, in this necessitie of the 30 state, were driven to sustaine all publike charges. Hereat the People murmured: and were readie to fall into sedition; had not the Consuls deferred the matter vnto further confideration. The Senate could ill tell, what to determine or doe, in a case of slich extremitie. For manifest it was, that the multitude had alreadie endured so much, as well it could under-goe; and somewhat more, than could with honestie have been imposed vpon it. Neuerthelesse it was impossible to maintaine the warre against the Carthaginians, or to keepe the Macedonian out of Italie, without a strong fleet. Wherefore, somewere of opinion; That, since the common Treasure was fo emptie, the people must be forced, by right or wrong, to take the burden vpon them. At last the Consuls beganne to say, That no perswasions would be so effectu- 40 all with the people, as good examples: and that if the Senators would follow the Consuls, like it was, that the People also would follow the Senate. Wherefore they propounded, and it was immediately concluded, That every one of them should bring forth, and put into the Treasurie, all the monie that hee had; and that no Senator should keepe any vessell of gold, or plate whatsoeuer; excepting one salt-seller, and a boule wherewith to make their offerings vnto the gods; as also a Ring for himselfe, with such other tokens of ingenuitie for his wife and children, as every one did vse, and those of as small value as might be. This aduice of the Consuls was not more thankfully accepted by the Senate, than the ready performance thereof by the Senate was highly applauded; and halfily followed by the Gentlemen of 50 Rome. Neither did the Commonaltie refuseto doe that, which their betters had openly done before them. For fince the publike necessity could no otherwise be holpen; every one was contented, that his private effate should runne the same fortune with the Common-wealth; which if it suffered wrack, in vaine could any particular man hope to enjoy the benefit of his proper substance. This magnanimitie deferued well that greatnesse of Empire, whereof it was the foundation.

Convenient order being thus taken for an Armie and Fleet: M. seelins went forth of the Citie against Hannibal; and Leninus toward Sicil. The armie of Hannibal was greatly diminished, by long and hard service: neither did his Carthaginians seeme to remember him, and thinke upon fending the promifed supply, or any such proportion as he needed. His credit also among his Italian friends, was much weakned, by the loffe of Capua: which gave them cause to looke vnto themselves; as if in his helpe there were little trult to be reposed, when they should stand in need. This he 10 well perceived; yet could not tell how to remedy. Either he must thrust Garrisons into all Townes that he suspected, and therby so diminish his armie, that he should not beeable to keepe the field : or elfe hee must leave them to their owne fidelitie; which now beganne to wauer. At length his jealousie grew so outragious, that he facked, and wasted, those places that he was vnable to detend: thinking that the best way to enrich himselfe; and make unprofitable, to his enemies, the purchase from which he could not hinder them. But by this example, many were quite alienated from him; and fome of those, whom before he had least cause to doubt. The towner of Salapia yeelded vnto Marcellus: and betraied vnto him a gailant Regiment of Numidian horse, the best of all that served vnder Hannibal; which was a greater losse, 20 then the Towne it selfe. Blasus the author of this rebellion, could not bring his defire to effect; without getting the confent of one Dafius, that was his bitter enemie. Wherefore he brake the matter to this Dafius in private; and was by him accused vnto Hannibal. But when he was convented, and charged of Treason, he so stoutly denied it, and by way of recrimination, so vehemently pressed his accuser with the fame fault: that Hannibal thought it a matter deuiled out of meere malice; knowing well what enemies they were; and seeing, that neither of them could bring any proofe of what he affirmed. This notwithstanding, Blasius did not cease to presse his aduerfarie anew, and vrge him from time to time, with fuch lively reasons; that he who could not be believed by Hannibal, was contented at length to winne the favor 30 of Marcellus. Presently after this, the Conful tooke by force, Marones and Meles.

Townes of the Samnites: wherein hee flew about three thousand of Hannibal his

Hannibal could not looke to all at once: but was faine to catch advantages, where he might get them; the Romans now being growne stronger in the field than hee. The best was, that his Carthaginians, having wearied themselves with ill speede in many pettie enterprises, and laide aside all this while the care of Italie, to follow bufines of farre leffe importance; had now at length resoluted, to send presently the great supply, that had beene so long promised and expected. This if they had done in better season; Rome it selfe might have beene strucken downe, the next yeere af-40 ter that great blow received at Canna. But fince that which is past cannot be amended: Hannibal must force himselfe to make a good countenance; and tell his followers, that this mighty fuccour would come time enough. For Masanissa was at Carthage with fine thousand Numidians, ready to set saile for Spaine: whither when hee came, it was appointed, that Afdrubal should forthwith take his journic into Halie; of which there had beene so long talke. These newes did not more comfort Hanmibal and his followers, than terrifie the Romans. Wherefore each did their best: the Romans to preuent the threatning mischiefe, and winne as much as they could vpon Hannibal, before the comming of his brother; Hannibal, on the contrarie, to hold his owne, and weaken the Romans as much as he was able. He had intelligence, 50 that Cn. Fuluius, a Roman Pretor, lay necrevnto Herdonea to get the Towne by practice. It was not long, fince, neere vnto the same place, another Cn. Fuluius had lost his armie. Therefore Hannibal made great marches thitherward; and came to Herdones ere Fuluius heard newes of his approch. As foone as he came, he offered battaile to the Roman Pretor: who accepted it with more hafte than good speede. The Roman Legions made good refistance a while, till they were compassed round with the Carthaginian horse. Then fell they to rowt; and great slaughter was made of them. Fulusus himselfe, with twelve Tribunes or Coronels, were lost: of the common fouldiers that were flaine, the number is vncertaine; fome reporting feuen, others thirteene thousand. The Towne of Herdonea, because it was at point to have yeelded vnto Fulnius, Hannibal did fet on fire: and putting those to death that had practifed with the Enemie, carried away the multitude; whom hee bestowed among the Thursans and Metapontines. The Conful Marcellus hearing of this, wrote vnto the Senate: and exhorted them to be of a good cheare; for that he would shortly abate the enemies pride. Hee followed the Carthaginian apace; and ouer-taking him at 10 Numistro in the countrie of the Lucans, fought with him a battaile: which beginning at nine of the clock in the morning, lasted vntill night; and ended, by reason of the darknesse, with vncertaine victorie. Afterward Hannibal departed thence into Apulia, whither Marcellus followed him. At Venusia they met, and had many skirmilhes; but none of importance. Hannibal removed often; and fought to bring the enemie within danger of some ambush. But Marcellus, though he was very eager of battaile, would yet aduenture nothing, but by open day-light and vpon faire

Thus passed the time away, vntill Q. Fabius Maximus, and Q. Fuluius, he that lately had taken Capua, were chosen Consuls. Fabius, considering how much the Roman 20 affaires were bettered by the taking of Capua, purposed that yeere to besiege Tarentum: which if he could winne; like it was, that scarce one good Citie would afterwards remaine true to Hannibal. Wherfore he vehemently exhorted his Colleague. and Marcellus, to whom was continued the command of those Legions that served vnder him the yeere before) to presse the Carthaginian so hard, as he might have no leisure to helpe Tarentum. Marcellus was very glad of this charge: for hee thought no Roman fitter than himselfe, to deale with Hannibal in open field. Hee followed him therefore to Cannusium, and thence from place to place: defiring ever to come to battaile, but vpon equal termes. The Carthaginian had not minde to hazard much in fight: but thought it enough to entertaine his enemie with skirmilh; as 20 being desirous to keep his Army strong vntill the comming of Asarabal. Yet could he not avoide the importunitie of Marcellus; nor brooke the indignitie of being daily braued. He therefore bade his men to be luftie, and to beat foundly this hot-spirited Roman Captaine, that would neuer fuffer them to bee at quiet; vntill they once had cooled well his courage, by letting him bloud. Hereupon followed a battaile: wherein Hannibal had the victorie; tooke fixe Enfignes; and flue of the Romans almost three thousand, among which were some of marke. Marcellus was so impatient of this dishonour, that hee rated his men, as Pelants, and base cowards: telling them, that they were the first of the Roman Legions, which had beene beaten by Hannibal, by plaine force and manhood; without being circumvented by any stra- 40 tageme. With these, and many other the like words, which they were ashamed to heare, hee did so vexe them; that thinking themselves better able to endure any violence of the enemie, than such displeasure of their Generall; they belought him to pardon them, and leade them forth once against o fight. He did so: and placing thole Companies formost, that had lost their Ensignes the day before, bade them be carefull to winne a victorie; whereof the newes might beent Rome, before the report of their shamefull ouerthrow. Hannibal was angrie, to see that nothing could make this Enemie quiet: and therefore was readie to fight againe; fince all other motiues continued the same, and his men had beene heartned by the late victorie. But the Romans were stirred up with desire of reuenge, and of repairing their honor 50 loft, which affections gaue a sharpe edge vnto their valour: whereas the Carthaginians were growne dull, and wearie by seeing themselues disappointed of their hope; and the enemie, not withstanding their late victorie, as readie to molest them as before. In this second battaile Marcellus got the victorie : which hee purchased at so deare a rate; that neither hee, nor Hannibal, had great cause to waunt, the second night. For if eight thousand of the Carthaginians were slaine, and three thousand of the Roman side, in this next battaile, the difference was no greater, than euent o recompence the late received ouerthrow: especially since the number of the Romans that were wounded, was so great, as disabled Marcellus from pursing Hannibal; who disloded by night. Neuerthesselfies in sufficed, that Fabius the Consult hereby got leisure, to follow his businesses are the sum of the Hannibal, who disloded by night. CHAP.3. S.16.

Q. Fabius the Conful, hauing taken Manduris a Towne of the Salentimes, fate downe before Tarentum: making all preparation that feemed needfull to carrie it, either by affault or long lege. Of the Garrifons in the Towne a good part were Bratians, placed there by Hannibal, under a Captaine of their owne Nation. This Captaine fell in loue with a Tarentime wench; whose brother serued under Fabius. Hereof, thee gaue notice by letters to her brother, as thinking belike to draw him from the Roman side; by telling him how rich, and of what great accompt her louer was. But her brother made the Consul acquainted with these newes: and said, that if the Brutian were farre in loue, hee might perhaps be wonne, by intreatie of his Mistris, to doe what shee would have him. The Conful hearing this: and finding likelihood in the matter, willed his souldier to convey himselstein to the Townes as stigitive; and trie what good might be done. It fell out, according to his desire. The Souldier grew acquainted with this Brutian Captaine: and partly by his owne perfivations, partly by the flattering entreatie of his sister; wanne him to betray the 30 Towne to the Romans. When they had agreed ypon the businesse, and resolved how to other known. When they had a greet you for the The had a cquainted the Conful with his proceedings: telling him, in which part that Brutian kept watch, and what might conueniently be done. So in the night time, Fabius gaue an alarme to the Citie; especially about those parts of the wall, which were farthest from the place where he meant to enter. The Captaines in the Towne, prepared to make refishance in those places, where the noise did threaten them with greatest likelihood of danger. But Fabius himselfe, with the choice of his men, camein great filence to the quarter of the Brutians: who being wrough to y their Captaine, helped the Romans to get vp, and breake open the next gate; whereat the Armie was let in. The

but (as hapneth in like cases, where the maine considence is already taken away) not very obstinately. Nice, Democrates, and Philomenes, with those that before had let in Hannibal, ysed now the last of their courage in dying against the Roman. Carthalo, who commanded the Garrison within the Towne, offered himselse prisoner: hoping to be well ysed, because of hospitality that had passed betweene his Father and the Conful. But he was slaine by the way, ere he could come as Fabius. The Romans did put all indifferently to the sword: in such fort, that they spared sew of the Brutians.
This slaughter of the Brutians, was thought to have been made by appointment of the Conful, to the end that hee might seeme to have wonne the Towne by Force and not by treafon: though he thereby failed of his purpole; and neither had the glorie which he expected, nor preferued his reputation of faithfull dealing, and keeping his word. The bootie found in Tarentum was very great: whereof the Roman Treafurie, whither it was carried, had great neede. As for the Imageries, and other curiofities, that were in the Citie, Fabius was contented to let them alone; and being told of some Idols, that feemed worthiero be carried away, being very goodly pieces, in fuch habit and posture as if they were fighting : he said, Let vs leaue vnto the Tarentines their angrie gods.

Hannibal being gotten cleare from Marcellus, fell vpon those that besieged Caulonia. They fled at his comming: but hee was so neere, that they were faine to betakethem to a Hill, which served to no other purpose, than to beare off the first brunt. There they defended themselues a little while, and then they yeelded. When this businesse was done, hee hasted away to relieue Tarentum. But when hee came within fine miles of the Citic, he had newes that it was loft. This griened him : yet hee faid no more than this, The Romans have also their HANNIBAL; we have loft 10 Tarentum in such fore as we got it. That he might not seeme to turne back amazed, or in any feare of the victorious Conful; he incamped a few daies together, so neere as hee was vnto Tarentum: and thence departing to Metapontum, bethought himfelfe how to take Fabius in a trap. He caused the chiefe of the Metapontines to write vnto Fabius, and offer to betray into his hands, the Carthaginian Garrison; with condition, that he should in that respect, forgine them all offences past. These letters were fent by two yong men of the same Citie: who did their errand so well; that the Conful wrote back by them vnto the Metapontins, and appointed the day, when they should expect him. Hereof Hannibal was exceeding glad: and at good leisure, made readie his ambushes for the warie Fabius. But whether some secret no- 20 tice of the plot were given; or whether indeed (as it is related) some tokens in sacrificing, terrified the superstitious Roman; the journie to Metapontum was deferred. Hereupon the same two Messengers were emploied againe: but being apprehended, and threatned with torture, they discouered all.

This yeere was happie to the Romans, in all their warres: for they got every where; faue onely at Caulonia; where they loft a companie of fuch lewd fellowes, that it may feeme good fortune, to have so been rid of them. But their common pouertie, and disabilitie to maintaine their charge, continued, and grew greater than it was before. Thirtie Roman Colonies were then in Italie: of which, twelue refufed to contribute any longer to the warres. For it was confidered; that the Le- 30 gions of Canna, and those vnhappie Companies, that had beene beaten under the one and the other Cn. Fuluius; were transported into Sicil; where they lived, in a fort, as banished men. This grieued their friends at home, and made them reckon vp the more diligently those other miseries which they daily felt. Ten yeeres together they had beene exhaulted with leuies of men, and impolitions of monie: in euery of which yeeres they had received some notable overthrow. In this case the least that they could feare; or rather the best which they could hope; was, to fall into the hands of the enemie to bee made prisoners. For Hannibal did gently send home their people that was taken by him: whereas the Romans did banish from their homes, those that had escaped. It was therefore likely to come to passe with- 40 in a while, that they should be all confumed: since new Souldiers were daily pressed forth of their Townes; and the old ones neuer did returne. Such talke was frequent among those of the Colonies: especially where they that were transported into Sicil, had most compassionate friends. Wherefore it was concluded by the people of Ardea, Sutrium, Alba, and other good Townes, to the number of twelue, That they should boldly denie vnto the Romans, their fathers helpe. This was thought the likeliest way to obtaine peace: whereof otherwise they saw little hope, as long as Hannibal lived. When the Confuls heard the Embassadors of these townes make such declaration, and protest their disabilitie of giuing any farther help; they were much amazed. They willed the Embassadours to returne home, and bring a 50 better answere, for a fmuch as this was none other than treason: they bade them to consider, that the people were not Campans, or Tarentines, but the off-spring of the Romans; and no leffe partakers of the Empire, than they that inhabited the Mother-Citie. But all would not ferue: the Embassadours continuing to protest, that they had already done what they could; and that they had remayning, neither men, nor money. It was well for the Romans, that the other eighteene Colonies did not imitate these twelue; but showed themselves willing to vndergoe whatsoever should be layed vpon them, without shrinking under the burden. This their offer was fo highly pleafing to the Confuls; that the Embaffadors of those faithfull Colonies, were brought vnto the Senate, and produced into the Assembly of the people: where, with commemoration of all their former good feruices, this their present loue vnto the State was magnified, & thankes accordingly bellowed vpon them; with promife, that it should not be forgotten. As for the Embassadors of 10 thosetwelue Colonies, that refused to contribute; it was thought best, neither to retaine them in the Citic, nor yet to difmisse them nor take any notice of them at all; but leave them to their owne consideration of their ill deserving.

It may greatly be doubted, what the example of these twelve people would have wrought, in those that were so willing to helpe the State, if Asdrubal had been then comming into Italie. For then must the Romans have betaken themselves wholly to their owne defence; whereas now, to the great comfort of their subjects, they employed their forces in the conquest of Italie, with hopefull and fortunate successe. Neuerthelesse, they were faine to open their most privie treasurie; and thence take out the golde, that had beene layed up to serue them in cases of greatest extremitie.

20 Of the mony thus extracted, one quarter was delivered to Fabius the Conful, to let him well out against the Tarentines; all the rest was sent into Spaine to Scipio, for the maintenance of his Armie; and to prouide, that Afdrubal might not passe from thence into Italie. It is likely that Fabius did not found all his money : finding fuch casie successe at Tarentum, as was shewed before. But to stop the journey of Asarubal; neither the money sent into Spaine, nor any victories wonne by Scipio could suffice. Neuertheleffe it fell out happily for the People of Rome, that this yeare, and the next, were spent, before his comming; and they better prepared, than at lesse warning they could have beene, to entertaine him. Here it were not amisse to note, That fince the Romans, being in fo great necessity of money, were driven to furnish 30 the Armie in Spaine, with the greatest part of all their flocke that was left : it must needes bee, that either the bootie taken innew Canthage, was farre leffe then fame had reported it; or elfe that Scipio had not as yet wonne it: how soeuer Linie rather inclines to those, who say that he got it soone after his arrivall.

M. Claudius Marcellus, and T. Quintus Crispinus, were chosen Consuls after Fabius and Fuluius. In their yeere it was, that Afdrubal tooke his journey out of Spaine, though he came not into Italie untill the yeere following. After the great battaile at Canna, Hannibal had lost much time about Cuma and Naples, in seeking to make himselfe Master of a good haven, for the landing of those succours that were promifed from Carthage. The hope that he reposed in Philip, caused him to turne his prin-40 cipall care to the Easterne parts of Italie; where he made readie a faire entrance for the Macedonian, if hee had beene readie to come. But fince his hope was vanished, and the long promifed succour of Aldrubal was (though farre later then had beene expedient) readie to arrive: he began to deale with the people of Hetruria, through whose Countries his brother was to passe, that therein hee might make a partie against the Romans. The losse of Capua, Tarentum, and many other Townes, might haue terrified all other of the Italian Townes, from harkening to any follicitation of the Carthaginians. Yet the pourty of the Roman, and the wearines of their adherents, together with the fame of a greater Armie comming, then that which Hannibal brought into Italie; did embolde many of the Hetrurians, especially the Aretines, 50 to take such counsel as they thought most expedient for themseliues, without regard of their fidelitie to Rome. The Roman Senat, hearing the rumour of their conspiracie, sent Marcellus the new chosen Consul into Hetruria; whose comming did fo terrific them, that they rested quiet for a while. All the yere following they were deuiling how to breake out:as contrariwise the Roman Propretors; partly by terror of seucre judgements and inquisitions; and partly by the force of two or three Legions, with which they visited all suspected places, kept them honest against their wills; and tooke many Hostages for better assurance. The two Consuls had an carnest desire, to make strong warre vpon Hannibal without more temporising: perswading themselves, that in battaile they should be too strong for him. Crispinu had further his particular defire, to make his Confulship notable by the winning of some good Towne : as Fuluius and Fabius had gotten honour by Capua and . Tarentum. Therefore he went about the fiege of Locri; one of the best Cities which the Carthaginian then held in Italie: and brought thither all forts of engines; fen- 10 ding for a fleet out of Sicil to helpe him. But Hannibal was not flow to relieve the Citie: the fame of whole approch, made Crispinus desist from his enterprise and retire vnto his Colleague, that lay at Venusia. Thither followed Hannibal; to whom the Consuls daily offered battaile. This great man of warre had no neede to stand vpon his reputation: which was alreadic fo confirmed, that his refusing to fight, was not likely to be afcribed vnto feare; but rather deemed as part of his wisdome. He entertained the Consuls with many light skirmishes, and sought to take them at some advantage; reserving his owne numbers as full as he could, vnto a time of greater employment. In this lingring manner of Warre, Marcellus tooke no pleafure: but fought to compell the Enemie to battaile, whether he would or no. The 20 Admiral of the Roman fleet about Sicil, L. Cineius, was commanded againe to affaile the Towns of Locri: which might well enough be forced, if Hannibal continued as he beganne to trifle away the time at Venusia. To the same purpose a part of the Garrison that lay in Tarentum, was appointed to goe by Land to the affishance of Cincius. But Hannibal had an eye behinde him. He laid an ambush in the way, betweene Tarentum and Locri, whereinto the Romans fell and having lost above three thousand of their companie, were well glad, the rest of them, to quit their enterprise, and saue their owne lives within Tarentum. As for the Confuls, it was the defire of Hannibal, to waste their Armie by little and little: which to doe, hee neglected no aduantage. There lay betweene him and them an Hillock, ouer-growne 30 with wood, that seemed fit to cover a number of men: who lying there vndiscerned, might fall upon fuch, as should straggle from the Roman campe; and cut them off. Therefore he fent thither by night some companies of Numidians: whom hee willed to keepe themselves close, and attend their best advantage. To this piece of ground, the Confuls thought it fit to remove their Campe: Marcellus thinking that he neuer lay neere enough vnto Hannibal. Thither therefore both of them rode to view the place, accompanied with the sonne of Marcellus, a few Colonells, and other principall men; and not many more than two hundred horse, most of them Hetrurians. The Numidian Centinell gave warning of their approach to his fellowes; who discourred not themselves, until they had surrounded the Consuls 40 and their traine. The Confuls, as necessitie compelled them, defended themselues: hoping to be quickly relieved from their campe that was neere at hand. But the Hetrurians ranne away from them, at the first: and left them in that great danger, to the weake affiltance of no more than fortie horse-men, that were of the Colonie of Fregella. These Fregellans abode by the Consults; and did what they could to have brought them fafe off. But when Marcellus was stricken thorow with a Lance, and fell downe dead; then beganne euerie one to shift for himselfe, and escape as they might. Crispinus the other Consull, had his deaths wound, being stricken with two Darts; and yong Marcellus was likewise wounded; yet these two recovered their campe: The rest of the Colonells and Officers; together 50 with the Lictors that carried the bundles of Rods and Axes before the Confuls, were all flaine or taken. To the dead bodie of the Confull Marcellus, Hannibal gaue honourable Funerall, according to the custome of those times : and beflowing his afhes in a filuer pot, courred it with a crowne of gold; and so sent them to yong Marcellus, to be by him interred, where he thought good,

Presently after this, Crispinus bethought himselfe, how that the signer Ring of Marcellus was fallen into the custodic of Hannibal; who might vicit, to his owne purpofes, ere that which had hapned were well knowne abroad. Wherefore hee fent word vnto all the Townes about; that his Colleague was flaine, and that Hannibal had gotten his Ring: wishing them in that regard, to give no credit vnto any letters therewithall figured. This providence of Crifpinus was not more than requitite. For his Messenger was but a little before come to Salapia, when another 10 Melfenger arrived there fent from Hannibal, bringing letters in the name of Marcellis, and scaled with the captine Ring; whereof the contents were; That it was his purpose to come the same night vnto Salapia; where he willed, that the Souldiers of the Garrison should be in a readinesse, for such employment as he should thinke needfull. The device was plaine: and no leffe plaine was the revengefull minde; which he bare against that Citie; because of his braue Numdian companies, that had therein beene betraied. The Salapians hereupon bethought themselves, how to take their Enemie in his owne snare. They sent back the Messenger which was a Roman fugitive; without letting him perceive any figne of diffrust in them. This done, they prepared all things in a readinesse, for the entertainement of such 20 a friend. Late in the night he came thither; with a troupe of Reman fugitives armed Roman-like, leading the way. These all talking Latine together, called vnto the Watch, and bade open the gate; for the Conful was there. The gate was opened. faire and leifurely, and the Port-cullis drawne vp no higher than needes it must bee, to let them enter. But when fixe hundred of them were gotten in, downe fell the Port-cullis againe: and they that thought to have taken others, were taken themfelues; being laied at on all hands by the Salapians, that quickly made an ende with

Hannibal being thus ouer-reached with this stratageme, hasted away to Locri; whereunto Cincius the Admirall of the Roman fleet about Sicil, did Jay hard siege. 30 The sirst appearance of the Numidians, Hannibal his Vanteurrors, made the Romans in all consuled haste, runne to their ships: leaving all their engines, and whatsouer was in their campe, to the enemies disposition.

The Roman Senate hearing of these accidents, sent vnto Cristinus the surviving Conful, and requested him to name a Dictator, that might take charge of the Commonwealth, and dispatch the election of new Magistrates, with other businesse; whereunto himselfe was disabled by his hurts. Hee did so: and some after died, Then was it thought needfull, that newe Confuls should be chosen out of hand: for a finuch as two Roman Armies lay fo neere vnto the Enemie, without any Generall. Especially it was defired, that Election should be made of such men, as were 40 not onely valiant, but well aduised: fince the best, and most fortunate of their great Darers, M. Marcellus, by looling himfelfe fo ftrangely, had given them a faire warning, not to commit their Armie vnto rash heads. Among those that flood for the Confulthip, C. Claudius Nero, was the most eminent. Hee was of great Nobilitie, a good Souldier, and one, whose many seruices in this present warre, did forcibly commend unto the place. Yet he feemed a little too violent; and one, whose temper needed the allay of a more stayed wit. The fathers therefore endenoured to iovne vnto him in the Confulfhip M. Liuius: one that had borne the fame Office, long before. This M. Liuius had been Conful with L. Amylius Paulus, in the vecre foregoing the beginning of this warre. After their Confulfhip, wherein they did 50 good feruice, they had both of them bin called into judgement by the People; and this Linius codemned; Amylius hardly escaping. Though it hath bin once already noted; yet I cannot forbeare to remember it agains how it pleafed God, to vpbraid the vothankefull Romans, with the malicious judgement, given by their multitude vpon honorable mens For in the battaile of Canna, it was apparant, what lamentable effects, the memorie of their iniustice wrought: when L. Amilius rather chose to yeeld to the froward ignorance of his Colleague; and afterward to die in the greatell ouerthrow, that euer fell vpon the State of Rome, than by relifting the pernicious courses of Terentius Varro, to cast himselfe anew vpon the danger of the popular furie. As for M. Liuius, he is even now readie, and will so continue, to tell the People of their faults in a diuers manner. Eight yeeres together after his condemnation had hee beene absent out of the Citie, and lived in his Countrie Grange; vexing himselfe with the indignitic of his condemnation. Marcellus and Lauinus, being Confuls two or three yeeres agoe, had brought him into Rome: where he liued private in discontented fort as might appeare, both by his carelesnesse in ap- 10 parell, and by the wearing of his long haire and beard, which in that time were the badges of men afflicted. Verie lately he was compelled by the Cenfors, to poll his haire, and come into the Senate: where hee vsed to sit silent, and signifie his affent or diflike to what was proposed; either in short formall words, or in passing from fide to fide, when the house was divided. At length it hapned, that in some busines weightily concerning one that was his kinfman, he flood vp, and made a fet speech. whereby he drew all the Fathers to attention; and bade them enquire of him, and take better notice, what he was, and what he had beene. The Senate was much altered fince he had left it; many braue men were lost; new ones wereschosen; such as rather serued to fill vp the number, than to answere to the dignitic of the place: 20 and they that were left of ancient standing, had even spent their Vertues to no great effect. Wherefore, all began to fay; that it was great pittie, so worthy and able a man, as this Linius, had beene all this while forgotten; one, of whom the Common-wealth stood in great neede, yet had not vsed in this dangerous warre. Now feeing that the Confuls ought, one of them, to be chosen a Patrician, the other, of necessitie a Plebeian: and since, neither Fabius, nor Valerius Lauinus, being both of them Patricians, could be joyned with Claudius Nero: enery one was of opinion, that there could not be chosen and coupled together, two fitter men than C. Claudius. and this Marcus Linius. But Linie would not endure to heare of this. He said it was vnreasonable, that one condemned as a dishonest man, should afterwards be chosen 30 Ruler of the Citic. If they had done ill to trust him with one Consulship, what meant they then to offer him another? With these, and the like phrases he resisted their delires: till by perfivations, and examples rehearfed, of such as had patiently digetted injuries done by the People, and repaired good for cuill; he was contented to accept the honour.

Here we may behold a true figure of that Embleme, with which Themistocles checked the ingratitude of the Athenians: resembling himselfe to a Plane-tree, the branches and boughes whereof men breake in faire weather; but runne vnder it for shelter in a storme. Such vnthankefulnesse, to well-deseruing men, is not rarely found in the outragious multitude. Neither was the late example hereto much vn- 40 like, of Philip the second King of Spaine his dealing with the Duke of Alua. For although he had committed the Duketo prison, vpon some small offence conceived. without all regard of his former deferts: yet when his intended conquest of Portugal, required the service of a man, more then ordinarily sufficient; hee stood no longer vpon the scanning of late displeasures; but employed the same Duke, whom he had newly disgraced. Thus is wisdome often taught by necessitie.

It was a dangerous yeere to ward, when C. Claudius Nero, and M. Liuius were chofen Consuls. Afdrubal was alreadie come into France, and waited only, to have the waies of the Alpes thawed by warme weather, for his passage into Italy. The Romans v(cd at this time the service of three and twentie Legions: and wanted not employ- 50 ment, for many more, if they had knowne how to leuie and maintaine them. Of these which they had, foure scrued in Spaine, two in Sicil and two in Sardinia: the rest were so disposed, in severall parts of Italie, where need seemed to require, that only two Legions were left to each of the Confuls. But the Confuls were men of execution.

execution; and would not be tied to the punctual observance of what the S. nate thought fit. M. Liutus would not firre out of Rome, against so mightie a power as followed Aldrubal; untill he had first obtained, that hee might carry with him as many as could well be spared from other imploiments; and those, or the most of them, chosen Companies. It was true, that two Legions, appointed to serue vnder Lucius Porcius a Pretor of that yere, among the Stfalpine Gaules, might be reckoned as an additament to the forces of Livius; to whom the warre against Aldrubal was alotted. So might also two other Legions, that were among the Salentines, neere vnto Tarenti, vnder another of the Pretors, be accounted a part of Claudius his Ar-10 mie; that was fent against Hannibal. Neuerthelesse the Consuls, by the especiall instance of Liuie, did obtaine, that all might be left to their owne discretion. For newes came, that Afdrubal was alreadic paffing the Alpes; the Ligurians, who dwelt in the Countrie about Genua, with their Neighbour people, were in readinesse to ioyne with him; and L. Porcius fent word, that he would aduenture no further, then hee fafely might. When all was ordered, as themselves thought best, the two Consuls went forth of the Citie; each, his feuerall way. The People of Rome were now quite otherwise affected, than they had beene, when L. Amylius Paulus and C. Terentius Varro, were fent against Hannibal. They did no longer take vpon them, to direct their Generals; or bid them dispatch, and winne the victoric betimes. but ra-

20 ther they stood in seare; lest all diligence, wisdome and valour should proue too little. For fince few yeeres had passed, wherein some one of their Generals had not beeneflaine; and fince it was manifest, that if either of these present Consuls were defeated, or put to the worst; the two Carthaginians would forthwith ioyne, and make short worke with the other : it seemed a greater happinesse than could be expected, that each of them should returne home Victor; and come off with honour; from fuch mightie opposition, as he was like to finde. With extreme difficultie had Rome held up her head cuer fince the battaile of Canna: though it were fo, that Hannibal alone, with little helpe from Carthage, had continued the warre in Italie. But there was now arrived another sonne of Amilear; and one, that in his present Expe-

30 dition had feemed, a man of more sufficiencie than Hannibal himselfe. For, where as in that long and dangerous march, through barbarous Nations, ouer great Riuers, and Mountaines, that were thought vnpassable, Hannibal had lost a great part of his Armie: this Afdrubal, in the same places, had multiplied his numbers; and; gathering the people that he found in the way, descended from the Alpes like a rowling Snow-bal, farre greater than he came ouer the Pyrenees at his first fetting out of Spaine. These considerations and the like, of which seare presented many vnto them; caused the People of Rome, to wait vpon their Consuls out of the Towne; like a pensine traine of Mourners: thinking vpon Marcellus & Crispinus, vpon whom in the like fort they had given attendance the last yere; but law neither of them re-40 turne aliue, from a leffe dangerous warre. Particularly, old Q. Fabius gaue his accustomed aduice to M. Liuius, that he should abstaine from giving, or taking battaile, untill he well understood the Enemies condition. But the Consul made him a froward answere, and said, That he would fight the very first day; for that he thought it long, till he should either recouer his honour by victorie; or by seeing the ouerthrow of his owne vniust Citizens, satisfie himselfe with the joy of a great, though not an honest, reuenge. But his meaning was better than his words.

Of the overthrow that Astrubal received in Spaine, by Scipio, a little before hee tooke his journie into Italie; fuch mention hath alreadie been made, as agreed with the report of that noble Historian Linie. Yet I thinke it not amisse to adde in this

50 place, what may be gathered out of the remaining fragments of Polybius his historie except. E. concerning that accident. Afdrubal had wreftled with many difficulties in Spaine; Polyblift. 106 by reason of those Captaines that were sent from the citic of Carthage, to ioine with 511. him in the administration of that Province: they being, as it may feeme, of the Hannonian faction; which is to fay, thus farre forth Traitors, that they preferred the ad-

nantage of their own fide, before the good of their Common-wealth. In what particulars they wronged this worthic some of Amilear, and how they hindred his courfes undertaken, it cannot bee knowne: fince of those bookes, wherein Polybius hath exactly handled these matters, there are to vs remaining onely a few broken pieces. But by the foightfull dealing of Hannoin Sieil with Natines, a better man of warre than himfelie, whom Hannibal had fent into the Hand: we may conceine. that against the brother of Hannibal it was thought needfull, by these mischieuous Partifans of Hanno, to vie the violent opposition of more carnell malice. Neuertheleffe AGrabal was a good Patriot: and therefore endured patiently fuch indignities, as Mutines could not long digeft. His journie into Italie being resolued vpon; he lay to with part of the Armie at Betala, not farre from the mines of filuer; whence he was to furnish his Expedition. Thither came Scipio: and draue him out of his Campe. though he were strongly lodged, before the other Carthaginian Captaines could, or would, come to his affillance. The ouerthrow feemes not to have beene fo great, as it must have been supposed, if no way lay open to those that fled. Rather it appeares, that Afdrubal dealt like a provident man, and feeing that his Campe was likely to be forced, fent away all his monie, with his Elephants before him; but flaied behinde himfelfe to fuftaine the Romans awhile, untill his carriages might bee out of danger, Herein he had his defire. Afterwards, he gathered his broken troups together and retired in fuch fort, that Scipio thought it not good to purfue him, and 20 fo passed ouer Tagus. Then taking vnto him the forces assigned for his Expedition, he marched away toward the Pyrenees; leaning the care of Spaine vnto his brother Mago, and to Afdrubal the some of Gesco; that thought himselfe the fittest man for the administration thereof. Faine would Scipio have stopped him on his journie, by fending to defend against him the ordinarie way of the Mountaines. But whether Afdrubal tooke another way, or whether he forced the guards that Scipio had fet to keepe the Pyrenees (as the defence of hard passages commonly forts to no good effect) he was not letted in his voiage by any such impediment. Comming into Gaule, and following the steps of his brother Hannibal: he found the Nations that lay in his way, so well affected, either to him or to his monie, that no passages were defen- 30 ded against him, nor any fort of resistance made; but he, and his Armie, well entertained, and their numbers much increased, by accesse of such as were desirous to take his pay. Of these had the better choice: for that he was driven to Winter in their Countrie; whilest that the passages of the Alpes were closed up with Ice and Snow. The Mountaines likewise, that had so greatly molested Hannibal in his journic over the Alpes; were casily won to take part with Astrobal, when he travailed through their Countrie. For these poore men, at the first comming of Hannibal. were verily perswaded, that it was his purpose to robbe them of their cattaile; and to make spoile of that little wealth, which they had painefully scraped together out of the desolate rocks. But now in processe of time, they were better informed. 40 Therefore understanding, that there were two mightie Cities, farre diffoyned afunder, which made warre vpon each other, by Land, and Sea; and that the Alpes did only lie in their way: they gladly condescended, to take their part in the fortune of the Inuaders. The like affection, vpon greater cause, was afterward found in the Cifalpine Gaules. The Liqurians also iouned with Afdrubal: and so would the Hetrurians have done; if he had arrived in their Countrie. There was no other Roman Armie neere, then L. Porcius with his two Legions; of whom there was no great feare. Therefore did Afdrubal fet vpon Placentia a Roman Colonie: in hope to make his comming the more terrible, by the defiruction of that Towne. But there hee loft a great deale of time, and finally was driven to quit the enterprise: by vndertaking which, he gave the Roman Confuls leifure to make readie for him; and caused his brother Hannibal (who vpon the first bruit of Afdrubal his so timely, and easily passing the Ales, was about to leave his wintring camps, and go forth to meet with him) to fit ftill awhile, as well aware, that Placentia would not be taken in hafte.

C. Claudius

C. Claudius Nero the Roman Conful, made what speede bee could, to meet with Hannibal, and stop him from ioyning with his brother. He had about fortic thoufand foot, and fine hundred horfe; with which he daily offered battaile to the Carthaginian; and had of him the better in many skirmishes. Hannibal was once driven to make a tedious march from the borders of the Salentines and Applicans, into the Countrie of the Brutians, there to encrease his forces; which were otherwise too weake for the journic intended. Afterward comming to Grumentum, a Towne of the Lucans; he there fought vnprosperously with Nero the Consul. Neuerthelesse he got off, and marched away to Venusia. But Nero followed him; and had there to againe the better of him. Wherefore he was driven to returne to Metapontum: where joyning with Hanno, that had made ready a good Armie; hee affaied againe to make way by force to his brother. So he passed onward, and came agains to Venulia, having Nero Hill at his heeles. Thence wenthe over the River Aufidus to Canasium, where he sate downe, not farre from the place, in which he had obtained his most memorable victorie. There also did Nero sit downe by him: and both of them rested, without making offer to fight. It seemed perhaps vnto Hannibal, who knew the Countrie very well; that his brother might, with little impediment, ouer-come the way to Canufium : where if he could once againe deale with both the Confuls, and all the Roman forces together, he hadreason to hope for such another victorie, 20 as once he had gotten in the same open Countrie. If this had so fallen out : Rome would have beene vndone for euer. But the Carthaginians should not have needed to wish any second victorie, in the naked Champans about Canne; if such an armie, as this which Asarubal now brings, had come to fecond Hannibal, when hee was in his full strength; and the Romans not able to keepe the field. Wherefore this wor-

his full fitength; and the Romans not able to keepe the field. Wherefore this worthy Generall had good reason afterward to say, that Hanno was the man, who by delaying the supply, did beat him out of Italie; which else no power of the Romans could have done.

Whilest X fro waited vpon the Carthaginians, and thought it enough to hinder them from meeting with the Armie that was comming to their fuccour: he was advertised of Ashabal his approch; by Letters and Messengers intercepted, as they were going to stamibal. These gaue notice, that Askabal had left the siege of Placentia, and drew onwards apace: being already come within two hundred miles of his brother; notwith handing all opposition that could bee made by Linie the Conful. Of these newes Claudius Noro was nothing joyfull. For if Hannibal could once be joyned as head, vnto that great body of an Armie, which Askabal brought with him; it was most apparant, that how severe the fortune of Rome should auoid, for home, would enforce the Latines, and other faithfull Aflociates, to faint under the burden; as twelue of the thirtie Roman Colonies had already done. Wherefore he ear feolued, that it were better to make any desperate aduenture, than to suffer the consumation of two such malevolent Planets: whose pestilent influence, if not on the suddaine, yet within sew yeres, was like to worke most lamentable effect. It seemed apparant, that his Colleague was unable to flay the progress of states in either were there any good Legions in a readines, that could doe service in such a needfull case; excepting those, that were already employed under the two Consuls. Here you hee concluded, that it was not expedient for him to tie himselfs to his owne charge, which was the warre against Hamnbas but rather that it behoued him, to helpe where more necessities required; and to carry part of his forces wro his Colleague. This rould not be without much danger. Yet since the meeting of the two Carthaginian bretheren, was farre more dangerous to the Roman Common-wealth;

the present, any great calamitie; yet the very continuance of so strong a warre at 50 Carthaginian bretheren, was farre more dangerous ton known to have a fire more dangerous to the tone was of the lefte importance. Sixe thou fand foot, and a thou fand borfe he therefore tooke, that were the very choice of his Armiesand making shew, as if he would only step a fide, to doe fome small piece of service neere at hand; away he posted as fast as heecould.

affit his fellow Conful. His Messengers ranne before him, to give warning to all Townes by which he was to passe, that they should be ready to meet him, with vi-Etualls, and all other necessaries for his Armie, Linius the other Consular that time. lay incamped, neere vnto Sena Gallica; and Afdrubal within halfe a mile of him. In fixe daies Nero had finished his journie thither; and when he drew neere, sent Mcsfengers before him, to give notice of his comming. Livie thought it fittest that he should stay in some place of couert vntill darke night, and then enter secretly into the campe: left the Enemic, perceiuing this accesse of strength, should accordingly frame his counsailes. This was done : and a token given, that the Colonells, Captaines, and all Souldiers, aswell horse as foot, that Nero had brought with him; 10 should bee lodged and entertained by men of their owne fort. Their Companie was somwhat increased by Voluntaries that joyned with them on the way. Neuerthelesse, it was not needfull, that the Quarter which received them, should bee enlarged; fince they had brought with them nothing but their armes. The next day they held a Counfaile of warre: wherein fome were of opinion, that it was best for these new-arrived Companies, to refresh themselves a few daies after their wearie iournie, before they should be drawne forth to battaile. But against this, Nero was very earnest: and befought his Colleague, to make vse of him out of hand; that he might betimes returne to his owne Campe, ere Hannibal should have notice of his absence. The souldiers also of Nero, were full of spirit; perceining that the honour 20 of the victorie was like to be theirs: for a smuch as the battaile would not have beene undertaken, without this their comming to helpe. Finally, it was agreed when the Counsaile brake vp, that the signe of battaile should be hung out; which was commonly a purple coate ouer the Generalls pauilion.

Afarubal was no leffe willing than the Romans to come to battaile, having long defired it, and hitherto not found occasion before. But when he had put his men in order, and was riding before the head of his Armie, to behold the Enemies countenance: it seemed to him, that they were more than they had beene; and some of their armes and horses looked as though they had wanted dreffing, after a long iournie.Hercupon he beganne to with draw his Armie backe into the Campe: and 30 gaue order, that if no prisoners could bee taken, by whom he might bee certified of the truth; yet should there good observation be made, whether the enemies campe were enlarged, or no; or what other alteration could be noted, that might shew their forces to be increased. The campe, as hath beene said, was not extended : but the trumpet, that founded only once in the quarter of L. Porcius the Pretor, did now, contrary to former custome, found twice in the quarter of Livins the Conful Hereat Afdrubal greatly mused: and being well acquainted with the Roman orders; held this for a sure token, that the other Consul was there arrised. How this might be. if Hannibal were aliue, and in good case, he was not able to coniecture : but thought it the best way, to goe leisurely to worke; till he might be better informed. Vpon 40 confidence in his owne forces, he had not cared hitherto, how neere hee lay to the Romans; nor troubled himselfe perhaps with ouer-strongly fortifying his owne Campe. Yet when hee now perceived, that somewhat was fallen out beside his expectation, hee changed his resolution; and held it no dishonour to remoue a little further off. So he distodged secretly by night, intending to get over the River Metaurus; whereby to keepe himselfe as long as he could, from necessitie of battaile. But whether it were so, that his guides did steale away from him in the dark, so that he could not finde the way to the Foords 3 or whether his carriages were too heanie, and hindred his speede: farre hee had not gone, ere the Consul Nero was at his heeles with all the Roman horse, and staied him from passing any further. Soone af- 50 ter came L. Porcius with the light armature: whom the other Conful followed anon with all the Legions; in good order, and ready for battaile. Asdrubal, seeing himfelfe ouer-taken with necessitie to fight; omitted no care and circumspection. His Gaules, in whom he reposed least confidence, hee placed in his left wing vpon a Hill, which the Enemie should not, without much difficultie, becable to climbe: in the right wing he stood himselfe, with his Africans and Spaniards; his Ligarians he placed in the midst, and his Elephants, hee bestowed in the front of his battailes. On the Roman side, Nero had the leading of the right wing; Liuius of the left; and Portius of the battaile. Both Romans and Carthaginians well understood, how much depended upon the fortune of this day; and how little hope of fastic there was unto the vanquished, Only the Romans herein seemed to have had the beter in conceipt, and opinion; That they were to fight with men delirous to have sled from them. And, according to this presumption, came Liuius the Consul with a proud bravery, to to give charge on the Africans: by whom he was so sharply entertained, that the vices.

To gue that gother and the maner of the Reman fight. The Ligarians allo were a well acquainted with the maner of the Reman fight. The Ligarians allo were a hardy Nation, and not accussomed to give ground; which they needed the lesse, or were able now to doe, being placed in the midst. Limin therefore, and Porcins, sound strong opposition: and with great flaughter on both sides, prevailed little or nothing. Besides other difficulties, they were exceedingly troubled by the Elephants, that brake their first rankes; and put them in such disorder, as the Roman Ensignes were driven to fall backe. All this while Claudius Nero, labouring much in vaine against a steep Hill, was vaable to come to blowes with the Gaules; that shood op-

20 posite vnto him, but out of danger. This made Asiarubal the more consident; who seeing his owne left wing safe, did the more boldly and siercely make impression on the other side, you the left wing of the Romans. But Nero, perceiving that the place wherein he stood, was such as would compell him to remaine idle till the fight were ended; tooke a part of his forces, and led them round behinde the forces of Portius and Linius: which having compassed, he sell youn Asiarubal, and charged him in the slanke. Here beganne the viscorie to be manifed on the Roman side. For Nero, sinding none to resist him in front, ranne all along the depth of Asiarubal his battaile: and falling you the skirts thereof, disordered the Ememies, and putal to row. Of the Spaniar distreas therefore and Assiarubal at one uery side, the greatest part 30 was slaine. The Ligarians and Gaules escaped as they could; and sauce themselues owas tlaine. The Ligarians and obases the date as the constraint and obases the four were taken aline: the reft were flaine; fome by the Enemies weapons; others by their owne guides that rode them. For when any of them, being fore wounded, beganne to waxe varuly, and rush backe vpon their owne battailes following them: the guide had in readinesse a Mallet, and a Chizzell, wherewith he gaue them a stroke betweene the cares, in the joynt of the necke, next vnto the head; wherewith he killed the beast vpon the suddaine. This speedy way of preuenting such harme as the Elephants, being hurt, were wont to doe to the squadrons sollowing them; is said to have beene the device of Astrabal himselfe; who died in this battaile.

nimene; who died in this battaile.

Great commendations are given to Afarabal, both by Polybius, and by Liuie.

He is faid at all times to have the wed himselfe worthy of Amilear his father, and Hamibal his brother; to have fittinen with great patience, against many difficulties, whereinto he fell by the meanes of those Captaines, that were sent from Carthage into Spaine; to have performed in this last battaile all duties of a worthy Generall; and sinally when hee saw the losse irreparable, to have ridden manfully into the thickest of his Enemies; where sighting brauely, hee was slaine. Of the number that died with him in this battaile, the report of Liuie, and of Polybius, doe very much disagree. For Liuie saith, that the Carthaginians had no lesse an overthrow, than was that, which they gave to he Romania Canne; that fifties thousand of 50 them were flaine, flue thouland & foure hundred taken prisoners; and aboue soure thouland Roman Citizens, whom they had captiues with them, deliuered, and set at libertie. He saith also, that of the Romans and their Associates there were flaine eight thousend, and of the bootie, that it was exceeding great; not only in other kindes; but in gold and filuer. Concerning the bootie; Polybius hath no mention of it.

Likely

Likely it is to have beene as rich as Lusie reporteth it; for Afdrubalcame well stored with monie. But Polybus (who had no desire to make this battaile of Metaurus, a paralel vnto that of Canne) reports no more than about ten thousand of the Carthaginian side, and two thousand of the Roman, to have beene slaine. The number of the prisoners he doeth not mention: but only saith, That some of the Carthaginian Princes were taken aline; and that all the rest died in the battaile. Whereby it may seeme, that they were all Burehmes: to rassume as they preferred the honour of themselves, and of their Countrie, about their lines.

The joy of this victorie was no leffe in Rome, than had been the feare of the euent. For cuer fince it was knowne in what fort Nero had left his Armie; the whole 10 Citie was troubled, as much as lately at Hannibal his coming thirher. Men thought it strange, that the Consul should make such a great adventure, as thus to put the one halfe of all the Roman forces, vnto hazard of the Dice. For what if Hannibal should chance to have notice of this his departure; and either pursue him, or set vpon the Armie that staied behinde, much weakned, and without a Generall? Thus did they talke; yet referuing their censure vnto the successe; with libertie to approue or condemne, according to the issue. In the meane while the People filled the Market-place; the Women ranne to the Temples, with Vowes and Prayers; and the Senators were daily in counfaile, waiting still ready at hand upon the Magistrates: as if some great matter were likely to fall out, that would require every 20 ones helpe. In briefe, they were all so full of melancholy, that when first newes of the victorie came, there were not many that would beleeue it. Afterwards when Messengers arrived from the Consuls, with Letters contaying all that had passed: there was not only great and joyfull concourse of all sorts of men vnto the Temples, but the very face of the Citie was altered; and men from thenceforth beganne to follow their prinate businesse; making contracts one with another (which they had long forborne to doe) and attending their owne affaires in such wife as if Hannibal were already driven out of Italie.

Nero returning to his campe, threw forth openly the head of Adrubal before the Carthaginians: and producing his African prisoners bound; sent two of them 30 loose to give Hannibal notice of what had hapned. These two prisoners might haue serued well enough to certifie Hannibal of this misaduenture, without doing wrong to the dead body of Aferubal: especially since Hannibal, in honourable, and farre different manner, had given buriall to Gracehus and Marcellus; yea to all the Roman Generalls, whose carkasses fell into his hands. But it may seeme, that howsoener the People of Carthage wanted much of the generous disposition, which was found among the Romans, in their love vnto the Commonweale; yet in dealing with Enemies, they were farre more civill, and leffe prone to the infolencie of reuenge. The best excuse of this outrage done by Nero, is, that hee hoped much more by the suddenterrour of such a spectacle, than by the simple relation of that 40 which had passed, to make a deepe impression of searcinto the Carthaginians. It may also be said, That he forgot himselfe, being ouer-joyed with the greatnesse of his prosperitie. For it was the battaile of Metaurus that weighed downe the ballance, and turned the Tide of the Roman fortune: which being then at the lowest Ebbe, ceased not afterwards to flow, till it could not be contained within any banks. Hannibal having lost in this vnhappy fight (besides that worthy Gentleman his Brother) all the hope that fo long fustained him in Italie; with-drew himselseinto the Countrie of the Brutians: and thither hee caused all the Lucans that were of his partie to remoue; as likewise all that dwelt in Metapontum. For he wanted mento defend to many places as he held at the present, because they lay too farre a funder. 50 Wherefore he drew them all into a leffer compaffein the vimoft corner of Italie; it being a Countrie of much fastnesse, and the people exceedingly devoted to his feruice. In this bufineffe Nero gave him no memorable impediment: either because Hannibal was too strong for him, having all his forces vnited; or because it is likely that this remove of the Lucans and Metapontines, was not before the end of Summer, when their haruest was gathered in ; at what time the Senate called him home to Rome. M. Liuius the other Conful tarried among the Cifalpine Gaules vntill the end of Summer; there to fet things in such order as he thought requisite: which done, hee wrote vnto the Senate, that there was no more neede of him and his Armic in that Province; but that L. Porcius, with the two Legions that were there before, might very well discharge the place. For this cause, hee desired leave to returne home; and that he might bring his Armie with him. The Senate well vnderflood his meaning: which was, to have the honour of triumph, as he well de-10 ferued. But forasmuch as it was well knowne, what interest Nero had in the late vi-Aorie: order was given, that not only Linie with his Armie should come home; but likewise Nero; though leaving his Armie behinde him, to confront Hannibal. So the honour of triumph was granted to them both: in the pompe whereof Linie made the greater shew, as riding in a Chariot, and followed by his Souldiers; because in his Prouince, and vpon his day of command, the victorie was gotten; his Armicallo being present at the triumph. But Nero that rode on horse-backe, and without fuch attendance, was the more extolled both by the People and Souldiers; by whom, the victorie was in a manner wholly afcribed vnto his great worth. Neither wanted L. Veturius Philo, and Q. Cecilius Metellus, Lieutenants to the Generalls, 20 the due acknowledgement of their good feruice. For they were commended vnto the People, as men worthy to bee chosen Consuls : and Consuls they were chosen for the yeere following. But nothing was done by them, worthy of memorie, in their Consulship. Neither indeede from this yeere, which was the thirteenth of the present warre, untill the eighteenth yeere wherein it ended, was there any matter of importance wrought in Italie; faue only the taking of Local from the Carthaginians by surprise. For Hannibal wanted strength, wherewith to make any great offer: and the Romans had little minde to prouoke him; but thought it well that hee was quiet. Such opinion had they conceived of him; that though all about him went to ruine; yet in him alone they thought there was force enough to hold him-30 selfe vpright. And furely very notable are the commendations given vnto him by Polybius; whom Liuie therein followes: That making warre vpon a People, of all other the most warlike, hee obtained so many victories by his owne good conduct: and that leading an Armic, compounded of fo many fundry Nations, Africans, Spamiards, Gaules, Carthaginians, Italians, and Greekes; which were, neither in Language, Lawes, Conditions, or any other thing, one like to another; hee held them all in fuch good order, that they never fell to sedition among themselves, or against their Generall. But that which Liuie addes hereto, is yet perhaps of greater admiration: That he sustained his Armic, without helpe from other places, from this time forward, vpon the hungry soile of the Brutians: which, when it was best manured in 40 time of peace, could hardly suffice to nourish the Inhabitants. It is therefore apparant, that by his proper worth and vertue, he kept his Armie in such order and obedience, rather than by any greatnesse of reward and bootie: since, after the death of Afdrubal, he madenoinuation vpon the wealthier parts of Italie; but held himselfe ftill among the poore Brutians. Where we must leave him, vntill he be drawne into Africk by Scipio; whose doings will benceforth entertaine, and leade vs, vnto the end of this Warre.

How P. CORNELIVS SCIPIO the Roman, made entire conquest of Spaine.

How the Carthaginians were driven by Scipio from the Continent into the Isle of Gades.

AGO, & ASDR VBAL the sonne of Gesco, tooke vpon them the charge f of Spaine, when Marabal the fonne of Amilear departed thence into Lulie. These agreed together, that Mago should make a voiage to the Baleares; there to leuic a supply of men and Asfarabal with draw himof Spaine, when Afdrubal the sonne of Amilear departed thence into felfe into Lustania (which is now Portugal) whither the Romans had ill meanes to follow; being altogether vnacquainted in those parts. Mago had soone ended his businesse, and returned into Spaine: where hee met with one Hanno (the fame perhaps that had lately beene emploied in Sicil) who brought new forces out of Africk, and came to succeede in place of Astrobal the Barchine. It is not vnlikely 20 that Spaine was now the better, and more readily furnished with men, and all things needfull from Carthage; when that fonne of Amilear, whose authoritie had beene greatest, was thence departed. For hereby might the factious diligence of old Hanno apprope it selfe, against that noble race of Warriors; when it should appeare, that things did prosper much the better by being left vnto the handling of other men. Whether it were vpon defire to make good some such opinion raised of him at home, or whether upon confidence in the forces that he brought ouer: Hanne tooke the field, and led Mago with him; as purpoling afresh to set vpon the Romans. So he entred into the Countrie of the Celtiberians, not very farre from new Carthage: where, by monie, and other perswasions, he leuied about nine thousand men.

P. Scipio in the meane while contained himselfe in the Easterne parts of Spaine: attentine, as it may feeme, to the proceedings of Afdrabal the fonne of Amiliar; against whom, he is reported by some Writers to have sent part of his forces into Italie, to the affiltance of C. Claudius Nero, and M. Linius the Confuls. But hearing of the leuie made by Hanno and Mago, among the Celtiberians: he fent M. Syllanus the Propretor, with ten thousand foot and fine hundred horse. Syllanus got intelligence by some fugitive Celtiberians, who became his guides, that their Countrimen encamped apart from the Carthaginians in great diforder: as men fearing no danger, because they were at home. Wherefore as closely as he was able, he drew neere to thefe Celtiberians: and falling upon them on the fuddaine, gaue them fuch an ouer- 40 throw, that Hanno and Mago comming to their fuccour, in stead of heartning & reinforcing them, became partakers of the loffe. Mage faued himselfe, with all the horse, and old Companies of foot, which were about two thousand; and in ten daies journey brought them fafe to Afdrubal. The rest of the Africans were either flaine or taken: among whom, Hanno had the ill lucke to be taken prisoner; though he kept himselfe out of the fight until all was lost. As for the Celtiberians, they knew better how to make shift; & saucd most of themselves by running into the woods.

It could no otherwise bee, but that Scipio was much troubled with the danger wherein Italie flood, by the comming thither of Aldrubal. Ten thousand foot and eighteene hundred horse he did therefore send out of Spaine (as it is reported by 50 fome Authors) to the defence of his owne Countrie: or was perhaps about to fend them; and thereupon remained at new Carthage, intentine to the necessitie & fucceffe of his Countrimen at home. But when he had word of the great victory at Metaurus, which fell out long before the end of this Summer, then might hee well aduenture, to take in hand the entire conquest of Spaine; which must needs be much alienated from the Carthaginians, by the report of such an ouerthrow. The Spanish Souldiers that served under Hannibal, and those that had beene sent over into Africk; were as pledges heretofore, by whom their Countrie was held obnoxious to the Carthaginians. But when it was noised abroad, That all which had followed Afdrubalinto Italie, were fallen into the hands of the Romans; and that Hannibal with his Armie, was closed vp in a streight, whence he could not get out: then did it greatly behoue the Spaniards to conforme themselves vnto the will of the Victors. That it was the successe of things in Italie, which gaue such confidence vn-10 to Scipio; it is the more probable, because hee tooke not this great enterprise in hand, untill the Summer was almost spent. Afdrubal therefore yied the benefit of the scason, and by disposing his Armie into many Garrisons, hindred the Enemie, from doing any great exploit before Winter. So the very length of way, and the time of the yeere, caused Scipio to returne backe : without any other matter performed, than that his Brother L. Scipio tooke by affault the Towne of

CHAP.3.S.17.1.1.

Against the next yeeres danger, Afdrubal prepared a great Armic and spared not coft, nor trauaile, in ftrengthning himselfe, for the triall of his last fortune in Spain. With seventie thousand foot, foure thousand horse, and two and thirtie 20 Elephants, he tooke the field: which number I beleeue, that he could hardly haue raifed, without boldly denying the truth of those reports that came from Italie. Scipio thought his Roman Legions too weake to encounter with such a multitude. Wherefore hee judged it needfull to vie the helpe of his Spanish friends. But the death of his Father and Vncle, that were cast away by the treason of such falle Auxiliares; made him on the other side very doubtfull, of relying vpon those, that might perhaps betray him in his greatest neede. Yet since one Colchas, that was

thousand foot, and fine hundred horse for his service: hee resolved to make vse of those, and some few others; that might helpe to make a shew; and yet not bee 30 able to doogreat harme, if they would reuolt. So with flue and fortie thousand foot, and three thousand horse, he sought out the Enemie; neere to whom hee incamped. At his first comming, Mago and Mafanissa fell vpon him; with hope to take him unprepared, whileft hee was making his lodgings. But hee layed certaine troups of horse in couert: which breaking vpon them vnexpected; caused them to fall off. They made at first an orderly retrait: but being more hardly pressed, they fhortly betooke themselues to plaine flight. After this encounter, which added some courage to the Romans, and abated the presumption of the Carthaginians; there were daily skirmishes betweene the horse and light armature, on both sides; wherein was nothing done of importance. Afdrubal drew forth his Armie, and arranged 40 it before his Trenches: the like did Scipio; each of them to shew that he durst fight;

yet not proceeding any further. Thus they continued many daies: Afdrubal being ftill the first that issued forth in the morning; and the first that, in the euening, withdrew himselse into his Trenches. The Spanish Auxiliaries were placed on both fides in the wings; the Carthaginians were in the midst, with their Elephants before them; and opposite to these on the other side were the Roman Legions. When they had in this order confronted one another, though at farre distance, many daies together: it grew to be the common opinion, that they should shortly meet in the same forme; and be matched on each part, with the Enemies, long before deligned. But Scipio, when hee purposed indeed to fight, altered the forme of his Armie; and 30 withall, came forth earlier then he had been wont. He caused his men and horses, to be well fed betimes in the morning before day; and then sent forth his horse and light armature, to traine out the Carthaginians with their bellies emptie: vling herein the same trick, whereby he might remember, that Hannibal had beaten his father in the battaile of Trebia. His Roman Legions he bestowed in the wings; his Spaniards, in the battaile. Adrubal fent forth his horse in all haste, to entertaine the Romans s whilest he himselfe arranged his men, in their wonted order, at the Hill foot, vpon which he encamped. In the skirmilhes of the horse it could not be discerned which part had the better: fince being ouer-pressed on either side, they had a safe retrait vnto their foot; and one troupe seconding another by course, returned to charge. This fight was protracted by Scipio to a great length because his men, having well fed themselues, were like to hold out better then the Enemie. But about noone, he caused his wings to advance a good pace; leaving their battaile of spaniards farre behinde them, that came on leifurely, according to direction. The Spanish Mercinaries that flood in Afdrubal his wings, were no way comparable, saue only in num- 10 ber, to the Latine and Roman Souldiers, that came against them; for they were fresh Souldiers, leuied in haste, and fighting only in respect of their pay. Being therefore charged in front by the Legions, and in flanke, at the same time, by the Roman Velites, and by some cohorts, that were appointed to wheele about for the same purpole: they were forely prefled; and with much difficultie made relistance. The Carthaginians would faine have succoured them; but that they durst not stirre out of their places, because of the Spanish battaile which was coming against them; though it were as yet farre off. Thus the best part of Afdrubal his Armie stood idle, vntill the wings were broken. For, had he adventured to meet with the Spaniards, hee must have cast himselfe into the open space that lay before him betweene the Ro. 20 man wings: to the depth whereof when he had arrived, he should have found himfelfe inclosed in such fort, as was the Consul Paulus 27 the battaile of Canna. Wherefore he did onely employ his Elephants; which did, according to their manner, no greater harme to his Enemies, than to his Friends. When they were chafed with wounds, they could no longer be ruled by their guides: but ranne, as chance led them, and troubled both parts 3 or those perhaps the more, that were the more vnwilling to kill them. In processe of the fight: the Romans, who had well refreshed their bodies in the morning, endured luftie; when the others beganne to faint with trauell and heate of the day. Wherefore perceiving their advantage, they followed it the more holly: and gave not over, till they had forft the enemie to change his 30 pace and runne from him. Afdrubal did his best to have made an orderly retrait; and afterward againe, to have caused his men turne head, at the Hill foot. But the Romans would not fuffer the victorie to be so extorted from them: neither was it calle to put fresh courage into the vanquished; led by the obstinate passion of teare which harkens to no perswasion. The Campe of Afdrubathad that day beene taken; if a ftorme of raine, which fell violently on the fuddaine, and bred fome superstition in the Romans, had not caused them to give

The same night, Asarubal gaue no rest to his men: but caused them, hungrie, and overlaboured as they were, to take paines in fortifying the Campe; wherein 40 hee feared to be affaulted. But little affurance could be have in the firength of his Trenches; when he had lost the hearts of his Spanish Souldiers. One Attanes, that was Lord of the Turdetani, fled from him to the Romans, with a great Band of his subjects: many followed this example; and soone after, two strong Townes were yeelded up to Scipio, and the Garrisons betraied. It seemes that the peruerse fortune of this late battaile, whereupon Afdrubal had fet his reft, bred in the Spaniards a disposition, to beleeve the more easily those reports which they heard from Italy. For henceforward, they never did good office to the Caribaginians. Afdrubal, perceiuing this, withdrew himselfe, and marched away, faster than an ordinarie pace, toward the Ocean Sea, Scipio followed the next morning: & ouertaking the Cartha- 50 ginians with his horse, caused them so often to make stand, that they were at length attached by the Roman Legions. Here beganne a cruell flaughter: for there was no resistance made, but all fell to rout, saue onely seven thousand, that with Astrobal himselfe recouered a very strong piece of ground, which they fortified in haste.

CHAP.3.S.17.1.1. This place he made shift awhile to defend but wanting there necessaries to sustaine himselse long, he was for laken by some of those few, that continued hitherto partakers of his fortune. Wherfore he resolued to make shift for one and stealing from his Companie by sight away to the Sea-fide, that was not farre thence; he tooke shipping, and set saile for Gades. When Scipio understood that Adrubal was thus gone: he left Syllanus with ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse to beliege their Campe (which was not taken in hafte, for Mago and Masanissa staicd in it) whilest he with the rest of the Armie did what was needful in the Countrie abroad. It was not long; ere Mago and Masaniffa followed Asarubal to Gades: and their Armie dispersed 10 it selfe; some flying ouer to the Romans; other taking what way they liked. So vpon all the continent of Spaine, there were only three Townes left, Illuturgi, Caftulo, and Afapa, that made countenance of warre against the Romans: of which only Car fulo had in it a Carthaginian Garrison; confishing of such as had saued themselves by flight in the late ouerthrowes. Hereby it seemes, that the report of those Historians was ill grounded, who faid, that Castulo yeelded long fince vnto the Romans; though Hannibal tooke a wife in that Citie. For this was one of the last three Townes that held out on the Carthaginian side. Illiturgi had sometimes beene inclinable to the Romans; if not aitogether at their denotion. Yet after the death of the two elder Scipio's, following too earnestly the Carthaginian fortune; it not onely rebelled; but 20 with great crueltie betraied, and flue, the poore men that escaped thicher from the ouerthrowes. Astapa was a Towne, that had fill adhered to the Carthaginians; and, which was worse, had thriuen by spoile of the Romans and their Confederates. Wherefore (though not vntill the next yeere) Scipio went against these, and tooke himsefe Illiturgi and Castulo: Illiturgi by affault, and with a generall slaughter of the Inhabitants; Castulo, by treason of one Cerdubelius. Astapa was taken by Lucius Marcius; or rather destroyed by the Inhabitants. For a great pile of wood was raised in the Market-place: whereinto was throwne all the gold, and filter, with what focuer else was precious; the women and children standing by it under a sure guard; that should kil and burne them if the Romans got into the Towne. This prouison being 30 made: all the Inhabitants that could be are armes, rushed forth desperately, and fell vpon the Roman campe; where striuing beyond their power, they were every one flaine. Then was the Towne forth-with fet on fire, by those that had taken charge to doe it : and many of the Romans confumed with the flame; whileft they rushed ouer-hastily to catch the gold, and silver, which they saw lying on the pile readie Af lrubal, being beaten into the Iland of Gades, found no cause of long stay there: but returned home to Carthage, with feuen Gallies; leaving Mago behinde him, to wait vpon occasion, if any should be offered. He visited in his way home, Syphan King of the Mifafil, apeople of the Namidians; hoping to winne him to the friend-

40 Thip of the Carthaginians. But he met with Scipio, as it were with his cuill Angel, in the Kings Port : who, landing at the same time, carried Syphax quite another way. For Scipio, having driven the Carthaginians out of Spaine, did foorth-with bethinke himselfe, how to finish the warre; by putting them to the like distresse in Africke. Hercunto it seemed, that the helpe of syphax would be much available: a king that had many times fallen out with the Carthaginians, and fustained much hurt by their procurement; of which in all likelihood he might easily be moued to seeke reuenge. He had also beene beholding to P. and Cn. Scipio, that fenr him ouer a Captaine into Africke; who instructed him so well in marshalling his forces, as he therby often became victorious. Vpon these reasons the Numidian King sent Embassadors to 30 Rome, and made league with the Citie, in a time of great extremitie. So that hereby P. Scipie conceived hope of laying a good foundation to the warre, which he intended in Africk; vpon the friendship of this ill Neighbour to the Carthaginians. For which cause he sent ouer C. Lalius his Embassadour, to deale with Syphax: who declaring that the Carthaginians did very ill in Italie, and had nothing now at all to doe in Spaine; casily perswaded the King to take part with those that had the better. and were without question his better friends. Only Syphax requested that the Roman Generall should visite him in person, to conclude the League; by which hee Was to enter into conditions of more importance, than in any former Treatic. Hereto Scipia condescended; thinking the friendship of so great a King, that was neighbour to Carthage, and not farre distant from Spaine, well worthy of the aduenture. So with two Quinquereme Gallies he tooke Sea : and arrived in the Kings Port, at the same time, with A/drubal. This would have beene very dangerous to him, had he beene discried by his Enemies further at Sea: but in the Hauen, they forbare to make offer one vpon the other. Syphax might well be proud; feeing at 10 one time, two such Captaines of two most powerfull Cities, came to desire his friendship. He would have brought them to treat of peace: but the Roman excufed himselse, by want of such commission from the Senate. He seasted them together: and shortly dismissed Scipio, with whom he readily entred into conenant: which in time of performance, he as readily brake.

†. II.

Funerall games held by Scipio. A Duell between two Spanish Princes, A digression, concerning Duells.

SC1 F I oreturning into Spains, and resting that winter, tooke vengeance the next yeere, vpon those of Illiturgi, Cassula, and Assis, as hath beene said before. The Conquest of the Countrie being then in a manner at an end; he performed at new Carthage, with great folemnity, some Vowes that he had made, and honoured the memorie of his Father, and Vncle, with funerall games, especially of those that fought at sharpe, according to the manner of the times. Neither was it needfull, that he should trouble himselfe with preparing slaues for that spectacle, to hazard their liues as was vied in the Citie of Rome: for there were enow, that either offe- 30 red themselues as voluntaries, or were sent from their Princes; to give proofe in fingle combat, of the valour that was in their feuerall Countries. Some also there were, that being in contention, which they could not, or would not otherwise end, agreed to referre the decision of their Controuersies, to triall of the sword, in single fight. Among these, the most eminent, were, Corbis, and Orsua, Cosen-germans: that concended for the principality of a Town called Ibes. Corbis was the elder, and the elder brothers sonne: wherfore he claimed the Lordship, as eldest of the house; after the manner of our Irish Tanistrie. But the father of Orsua stood lately seized of the Principality: which though himselfe received by the death of his elder brothers yet this his fonne would not let it goe back; but claimed to hold it as heire vnto his 40 father, and old enough to rule. Faine would Scipio have compounded the matter. But they answered peremptorily, That all their friends, and kindred, had alreadic laboured in vaine, to take vp that quarrell; and that neither God, nor Man, but only Mars, their God of battaile, should be Vmpire betweene them. So they had their wills: and the elder, who was also the stronger, and more skilfull at his weapon, eafily vanquished the foole-hardinesse of the yonger.

Such combats have beene very ancient; and perhaps more ancient, than any other kinde of fight. We reade of many performed before the Warre of Troy, by Theseus, Hercules, Pollux, and others: as also of two at the Warre of Troy; the one betweene Paris and Menelaus; the other, betweene Hettor and Alax. Neither want there examples of them among the Hebrewes: whereof that betweene Dauid and Goliah; and others performed by some of Davids Worthics, against those that challenged them; are greatly celebrated. Vnto the same kinde appertaines the fight, betweenetwelue of the Tribe of Iuda, and as many of the Bemamites. The Romans had many of them: whereof that was principall, in which they ventured their Dominion vpon the heads of three brethren the Horatij, against the three brethren Curiaty that were Albans. The combat of Manlius Torquatus; and shortly after, of Valerius Corninus with two Champions of the Gaules, which challenged any Roman; were of leffe importance, as having onely reference to braverie. In England there was a great combat fought, betweene Edmond Ironfide and Canutus the Dane, for no leffe than the Kingdome. The vse of them was very frequent in the Saxon-times; almost vpon enery occasion, great or small. In the raigne of Edward the third, who fultained the party of Mountfort against the Earle of Bloys, contending for the Duchie

10 of Brittaine; there was a fight, for honour of the Nations, between thirtie of the Britons, and thirtie English: two of which English, were Caluerlie a brane Captaine; and that Sir Robert Knolles, who afterwards became a renowned Commander in the French warres, and did highly honour his bloud, whereof the Lord Knolles is descended. It were infinite to reckon the examples of the like, found in English, French, and Italian Histories. Most of them have beene combats of brauerie, and of gayete de cure.as the French terme it; for honour of seuerall Nations; for loue of Mistresses; or what socuer else gaue occasion vnto men, desirous to set out themselves. But befides those of this fort, there are two other natures of combats; which are, either vpon accusation for life; or vpon triall of Title and Inheritance, as in writ of right.

20 And of this latter kinde, was that, of which wee spake even now, betweene Corbis and Orlua. Vnto these (me thinkes) may be added, as of different condition from the rest, the combat vpon Wager; such as were that betweene Danid and Goliab; or that betweene the Horatij and Curiatij: in which, without regard of Title, the Dominion of Nations, one ouer the other, is aduentured upon the head of Champions. Vpon an accusation for life, there was a combat appointed betweene the Lord Hen. Ac. 11. Ric. 2di. rie of Boulinbrooke Duke of Hereford, and Moubray Duke of Norfolke. There was a combat performed by Sir Iohn Anfley and one Cattrington: whom Anfley charged Ao.3, Ric. 2dd with treason; and proued it vpon him, by being victorious. The like was fought betweene Robert of Mountfort and Henrie of Essex. The like also, betweene a Nauar- Ao.9. Henr. 2die

30 rois, and one Welch of Grimsby, who the Nauarrois accused of treason: but, being beaten in fight, confessed that hee had belied him; and was therefore drawne and hanged. Whether our triall by battell doe determine, that the false accuser, if hee be vanquished, shall suffer the punishment which had beene due to the offender, if the accusation had beene proued; I cannot affirme. But we enery where find, That if he which is accused of treason, or, according to the customes of Normandie, of Murder, Rape, or burning of Places (offences punished by death) bee ouer-come; He shall suffer the paines appointed for those crimes. In combats for triall of right, it is not fo: neither is the Appellant or Defendant bound to fight in person, but hee may trie it by his Champion, as did Paramor and Lowe, or offered to doe, in the 40 raigne of Queene Elizabeth. And in this case, he that is beaten, or yeeldeth, looseth only his cause, not his lie. Neither are the combats, vpon accusation, or triall of right, fought in open field, as are those of brauerie; but in Campe close, that is, within railes. Now this triall by combat was so ordinarie in France, before the time of St. Lewes, and Philip the faire his grand-child, as enery Lord of Fee, Ecclefiafticall or Temporall, had power to grant it within his owne Iurisdiction. And it seemeth, that the French Kings, and other Lords, made their profit hereby. For in the * Me- * Si howings de morialls of the Chamber of Accompts, is found an Article to this effect: That if a combat Loraice Vadia were once accepted, and after, by confent of the Lord, were taken vp, each of the parties should pay two shillings fixe pence; but if it were performed, then should the 50 partie vanquished for seit an hundred and twelve shillings. And vponthis custome grew the French Prouerbe, which they vie when any man hath had an hard or vniust iudgement; saying, That bee was tried by the Law of Loray, or Berne; on le battu paye l'amende, where he that is beaten giues the recompence. Of these frequent trials by battaile, that great learned man Tuo, Bishop of Chartres, did often complaine, and fpecially specially against the French Church-men: as appeares by * his letters to the Bishop of Orleans, to the Arch deacon of Paris, to Rembert Arch-bishop of Sens, and to others; wherein he rebukes the judgement of their Churches, that had ratified fuch challenges of combat. But this libertie, and kinde of triall, was retrencht by Saint Lewes, and Philip the faire; fo that no man should decree, or grant it, saue the King rant nubis, quod himselfe. It hath fince beene granted, though more sparingly, by the French Kings; quisimmiles as to the Lord of Carouges against Laques le Gris; and to Iulian Romero the Spaniard, against Moro, his Countriman: wherein Sir Henrie Kneuet, Father of the Lord Kneuet milition comitity now living, was Patron to Romero that had the victorie, and lastly to the Lord of Chaft. Now in those Challenges, vpon accusation of Treason, Murder, or other ofbare promosatio. fence descruing death, (and in those only) the rule held, That le defendeur estoit tenu de proposer ces dessenses per une dementir; The Desendant was bound to pleade not guiltie, by giving the accuser the Lie: otherwise it was concluded, that the Defendant did tailiblement confesser le crime : silently confesse the crime. But alter such time as Francis the French King, vpon some dispute about breach of Faith, had sent the Lie vnto the Emperour Charles the fift, thereby to draw him to a personall combatieuery pettie Companion in France, in imitation of their Master, made the giving of the Lie mortalitie it selfe; holding it a matter of no small glorie, to haue it said, That the meanest Gentleman in France, would not put vp, what the great Emperour Charles the fift had paciently endured.

From this beginning is deriued a challenge of combat, grounded vpon none of those occasions that were knowne to the Ancient, For the Honour of Nations, the Triall of Right, the Wager vpon Champions, or the Obication and Refutation of capitall offences, are none of them, nor all of them together, the argument of halfe fo many Duells, as are founded vpon meere private Anger, year vpon matter feeming worthie of anger in the opinion of the Duellifts. So that in these daies, wherein enery man takes vnto himselfe a Kingly liberty, to offer, accept, and appoint perfonall combats; the giving of the Lie, which ought to be the Negation only in accufations for life is become the most fruitfull root of deadly quarrels. This is held a word to terrible, and a wrong to vnpardonable, as will admit no other recopence, 30 than the bloud of him that gives it. Thus the fashion, taken up in haste by the French Gentlemen, after the patterne of their King, is grown to be a custome: whence we have derived a kinde of Arte and Philosophie of quarrel; with certaine grounds and rules, from whence the points of honour, and the dependencies thereof, are deduced. Yeathere are (among many other no leffe ridiculous) fome fo myfficall curiolitiesherein, as that it is held a farre greater dishonour, to receive from an enemy a flight touch with a Cane, than a found blow with a Sword; the one, having relation to a flaue; the other to a fouldier. I confesse that the difference is pretie: though, for my owne part, if I had had any fuch Italionated enemie in former times. I should willingly have made with him such an exchange; and have given him the 40 point of honour to boot.

But let vs examine indifferently the offence of this terrible word, the Lie; with their conditions who are commonly of all other the most tender in receiving it. I fay, that the most of these, who present death on the points of their swords to all that give it them; vie nothing to much in their convertation and course of life as to speake and sweare falsly. Yea it is thereby, that they shift and shuffle in the World, and abuse it. For how few are there among them, which, having assumed & sworne to pay the monies and other things they borrow, doe not breake their word and promise, as often as they ingage it? Nay, how few are there among them, that are not Lyers by Record, by being fued in some Court or other of Instice, vpon breach of word, or bond? For he which hath promifed, that he will pay monie by a day; or promised any thing else, wherein he faileth; hath directly lied to him, to whom the promise bath beene made. Nay, what is the profession of love that men make nowa daies? What is the vowing of their feruice, and of all they have, vied in their or-dinarie complements, and (in effect) to every man whom they bid but good-morrow, or falute, other than a courteous and courtlike kinde of lying? It is (faith a wife French-men, deriding therein the Apilli custome of his Countrie) une marche & complot fait ensemble the Je mocquer, mentir, & piper les uns les autres ; A kinde of merchandize, and complot made among them, to mock, belie, and deride each other : and so farre now-a daies in fashion, and in vie; as he that vseth it not, is accounted either dull, or Cynicall. True it is not with standing (omitting the old distinctions) that there is great difference betweene these mannerly & complementall lies, with those which are somtime perswaded by necessity vpon breach of promise; and those which men 10 vie out of cowardize and feare: the latter confessing themselves to be in greater awe of men, than of God; a vice of all other filled the most villainous. But now for the Lie it felfe, as it is made the subject of all our deadly quarrells in effect : to it I say, That who o giues another man the Lie, when it is manifest that he hath lied, doth him no wrong at all ; neither ought it to be more hainoufly taken, than to tell him, that he hath broken any promise which he hath otherwise made. For he that promileth any thing, tells him, to whom he hath promifed, that hee will performe it: and in not performing it, he hath made himselfe a Lier. On the other lide, He that gives any man the Lie, when him selfe knowes that he, to whom it is given, bath not lied; doth therein give the Lie directly to himselfe. And what cause have I, if I 20 fay that the Sunne thines when it doth thine, and that another fellow tells me I lie, for it's mid-night; to profecute such an one to death; for making him selfe a soolish Ruffian, and a Lier in his owne knowledge? For he that gives the Lie in any other dispute, than in defence of his Loyaltie, or Life; gives it impertinently, and Ruffianlike. I will not denie but it is an extreme rudenesse to taxe any man in publike with anyntruth: (if it be not pernicious, and to his prejudice against whom the vntruth is vttered) but all that is rude, ought not to bee civilized with death. That were, more to admire and imitate a French custome, and a wicked one, than to admire and to follow the counfaile of God. But you will fay, That these discourses sauour of cowardize. It is true; if you call it cowardize, to feare God or Hell:whereas he that 30 is truly wife, and truly valiant, knowes that there is nothing else to be scared. For against an Enemies sword wee shall finde ten thousand seuen-penie-men (waged at that price in the warres) that feare it as little, and perchance leffe, than any profeft Sword-man in the World. Diligentissima in tutela sui Fortitudo; Fortitude is a diligent preserver of it selfe. It is (faith Aristotle) a mediocritic between doubting and daring. Sicut non Martyrem pana: sic nec fortem pugna; sed causa; As it is not the punishment that makes the Martyr : fo it is not fighting that declares awaliant man; but fighting in a good cause. In which whosoeuer shall resolutedly end his life, resolutedly in respect of the cause, to wit, in defence of his Prince, Religion, or Countrie : as hee may justly bee numbred among the Martyrs of God; fo may those that die with malicious

40 hearts, in private combats, be called the Martyrs of the Devill. Neither doe weindeede take our owne reuenge, or punish the injuries offered vs, by the death of the injurious. For the true conquest of reuenge is, to give him, of whom we would bee reuenged, cause to repent him: and not to lay the repentance of another mans death on our owne consciences; Animafq, in vulnere ponere; And to drowne our soules in the wounds and blood of our enemies. Hereupon you will againe aske me, if I condemne in generous and noble spirits the defence of their honours, being prest with injuries? I Tay that I doe not; if the injuries bee violent. For the Law of Nature, which is a branch of the eternall Law: and the Lawes of all Christian Kings and States; doe fauour him that is affailed, in the flaughter of the Affailant. You will secondly aske

50 me, Whether a Noble-man, or a Gentle-man, being challenged by Cartel by one of like qualitie, bee not bound in point of honour to fatisfie the challenger in private combat? I answere that he is not because (omitting the greatest, which is the point of Religion) the point of the Law is directly contrarie and opposite to that, which they call the point of honour; the Law which hath dominion oner it, which can Sir Thomas

judge it, which can destroy it; except you will stile those Actes honourable, where the Hang-man gives the Garland. For, seeing the Lawes of this Land have appointed the Hang man to second the Conqueror; and the Lawes of God appointed the Deaill to second the conquered dying in malice : I say that he is both base, and a foole, that accepts of any Cartel to accompanied. To this perchance it will bee anfwered, That the Kings of England, and other Christian Kings, have seldome taken any fuch advantage ouer men of qualitie; who vpon even termes have flaine their private enemies. It is true, that as in times of trouble and combustion they have not often done it; so did our Noble-men and Gentle-men in former ages, in all important injuries, fue vnto the King, to approue themselues by battaile and publique 10 combat. For as they dared not to braue the Law: fo did they disdaine to submit themselves to the shamefull revenge therof; the same revenge (because it detesteth murder) that it hath declared against a common Cut-pursse or other Theeues. Nav let it be granted that a pardon be procured for such offenders; Yet is not the Manflaier freed by his pardon. For the fetwo remedies bath the partie grieued not withstanding; that is, to require justice by Grand Affize, or by battaile, vpon his appeale, which (faith S'. Thomas Smith) is not denied; and he further faith (for I vie his owne wordes) That if the Defendant (to wit, the Man flaier) be convinced either by Great Affize or by Battaile, vpon that appeale; the Man-flaier shall die, notwithftanding the Princes pardon. So fauourable (faith the famelearned Gentleman) 20 are our Princes, and the law of our R calme, to justice, and to the punishment of blood violently shed. It may further be demanded, how our Noble-men & Gentlemen shall be repaired in honour, where an enemie, taking the start either in wordes or blowes, shall lay on them an infamie vnsufferable? I say that a Marshalls Court will easily give satisfaction in both. And if wee hold it no disgrace to submit our felues for the recourrie of our Debts, Goods, and Lands, and for all things elfe, by which the liues of our felues, our wines, and children, are fustained, to the Judges of the Law; because it may bee fellonie, to take by violence euen that which is our owne: why should we not submit our selues to the Judges of honour in cases of honour; because to recouer our reputation by strong hand, may be murder? But yet 20 againe it may be objected, That the loffe of honour ought to be more fearefull vnto vs, than either the loffe of our goods, of our lands, or of our lines; and I fay fo too. But what is this honour, I meane honour indeede, and that which ought to bee fo deare vnto vs. other than a kinde of historic, or fame following actions of vertue. actions accompanied with difficultie or danger, and vnder-taken for the publike good? In these he that is imploied and trusted, if he faile in the performance, either through cowardize, or any other base affection; it is true that he looseth his honor. But the acting of a private combate, for a private respect, and most commonly a friuolous one, is not an action of vertue; because it is contrarie to the law of God, and of all Christian Kings: neither is it difficult; because euen and equall in persons and 40 armes: Neither for a publike good, but tending to the contrarie, because the loffe or mutilation of an able man, is also a losse to the Common-weale.

Now that a Marshall of England bath power to sauceuery mans same and reputation, as farre as reputation may fustaine injurie by wordes, I thinke no man doubteth. For to repent vs of any ill words that we have given, and to confesse that we have done him wrong to whom we have given them, is a sufficient satisfaction; and as it may fall out, more than sufficient. For hee that gives ill words in choller, and fuddenly denies them, or repents himselfe of them upon aduisement; bath the disaduantage in point of reputation. Concerning blowes, which are indeede not to be given but to those that are service, whether sufficient recompense will bee made 50 for them, it shall appeare by a notable example of a most worthy Gentleman Mounfieur de Plesis, that was firicken in France not long fince by a Baron of the fame Nation. The fatisfaction which was given him by a judgement of the Constable and Marshalls of France, was this. In the open Court, wherein the Constable gaue judgement, M.de Pless was set in a chaire vnder the degrees where the Constable and Marshalls sate: the Baron, who had given him the blow, didkneele before him on both his knees, holding in his right hand a fword with the point towards him felfe; and in his left hand the like cudgell or baltinado, wherewith he had stricken M. de pless; both which weapons he delineted into Pless hands, submitting himselfe to fuch reuenge, as it should please him to take with either of those weapons, the Constable and Marshalls having formerly lest it to the will of Plessas, to vie his owne difcretion in the reuenge of his owne wrongs. Now whether the Baron had reason to please himselfe, as one beforehand in point of honour, who strucke M.de Plessa, like 10 a Ruffian comming behinde him, and (hauing advantage of companie, and his horses ready) shifted himselfe away on the suddaine, but being afterward taken, was taught to repent him lelfe in this shamefull manner ; Or whether Monsieur de Plesis (of whose valour no man doubted) had not farre juster cause to rest satisfied, since he might at his pleasure have beaten or wounded his enemie, but forgaue him; let any wise man judge. To this if it be said, That the Baron was constrained to make his submission; that his repentance was enforced and not voluntarie; and therefore no difgrace vnto him: I answere, that one may say as well, that it is no difgrace to a Theefe, when he is brought to the Gallows, to repent him of the Robberies by him committed, because his repentance also is constrained. And it is true, that en-20 forced repentance is no difgrace in respect of the force, but in respect of the fact : which(but for our finnes to God) makes all repentance shamefull; because all forced repentance is inflicted upon vs for somewhat vnworthy of a Gentleman and of an honest man. Nay voluntarie repentance it selse, as it hath relation to men, ariseth either out of the feare of the ill that may be fall vs or out of the acknowledgement of our owne weakenesse. Certainely, as wise men, and valiant men, doe rather deride pettie injuries or suddaine injuries, that are not offered from malice forethought. then reuenge them: fo men, apt to quarrell, doe commonly suspect their owne valour; and rather defire, that thereby the world should beleeue them to be of great

30 indeede to be a valiant man, scornes to hunt after the opinion. Now the same power which the Constable and Marshalls of Erance have, bath alfo a Marshall of England, or his Deputies; by whose judgement, in all disputes of honour, euery mans reputation may be preserued; wee may therefore as well submit our selues to the Judge of honour in all disputes of honour, as wee doe submitour selves in all controversies of livelihood and life, to the Iudges of the Law. And, out of doubt, the institution of this Court of Cheualrie in England, in France, and elsewhere; was no lessecharitable than politike. For the bloud of man, violently spilt, doth not bring forth honie-bees, as that of Bulls doth, which fling but the fingers or the face : but it produceth that monstrous Beast, Revenge, which hath stung 40 to death, and eaten vp of seucrail Nations, so many noble personages; as there is nothing more lamentable, nor more threatning the wrath of God vpon supreme daring, than know any such resolution in themselues. For he that knowes himselse

Gouernours, than the permission.

His Majestie therefore (which Henrie the fourth of France also endeuoured) hath done a most Kingly and Christian-like deede in Scotland, which the most renowned of all his Predecessiours could neuer doe: in beating downe, and extinguishing, that hereditarie prosecution of malice, called the deadly fend; a conquest, which shall gine him the honour of Prudence and Kingly power, for euer-more. And we have cause to hope, that his royall care shall be no leffe happy in preuenting the like mischiefe, which threatens England, by the audacious, common, and braue, yet outragious va-

Vnto this that I have spoken oflying, and ofman-slaughter, it must becadded, That each of these are of great Latitude, and worthy of reproofe and vengeance proportionably, more or leffe, in their feuerall degrees. There is much difference betweene Lies of necessitie vpon breach of promise, or complementall lies; and Sam 21.

fuch pernicious lies, as proceed from feare and cowardize, or are vttered by false witnesses: the former fort, being excusable by weakenesse or leuitie; the latter, being altogether detestable. No leffe, if not more, difference there is, betweene killing of a man in open field, with euen weapons; and that killing, which the Scriptures call killing by guile, dolo or per insidias; thoughour Lawes doe not much distinguish them in punishment. For in the latter, God, forsaking his owne priviledge, commandeth, that the guilefull murderer bee drawne by force, from the protection of his Altar, Neither is every guilefull murder performed by the fword, nor by overt violence: but there is a guilefull murder also, by poisoning; and by the pen, or by practice. For such distinction is found, betweene comming presumptionsly youn a to and 21.0.14. man, to flay him with guile; and lying in wast for blood, privily, for the innocent, without a canfe, vpon hope of spoile, after such manner as the net is spreadefore the eyes of the birds. Francis the first, Queene Marie of England, and the Kings Majestie now raigning, haue given notable testimonic of their justice, vpon three Noble men, who committed guilefull murder. Of the first kinde, King Francis vpon the Lord of Talard: who being (faith the French Historian) de haute & ancienne lignee, & supporte de plusieurs grandes alliances; who being of high and ancient linage, and supported by diners great alleances, of which the Cardinall of Bellay (in especiall fauor with the King) was one, was notwithstanding deliuered ouer into the hands of the Hang-man. Queene Marie, vpon a noble man of her owne Religion, and in many other respects 20 very deare vnto her. His Maiestie, vpon a Baron of Scotland; whose house was no leffe ancient and faithfull, than himfelfe valiant, and greatly friended both at home and abroad. Of killing guilefully by poison, and of punishment following such wicked Artifans; euery Agehath had too many examples. Of guilefull killing by the pen (that I may not speake of any English Judge) the Authour of the French Recherches gives vs two notable inflances : the one of des Elbars, who (faith Pasquire) fit mourir Montaigu grand Maistre de France, pour contente l'opinion de celuy dont il estoit lors idolastre ; & Dieu permit que depuis il fut pendu & estrangle ; Who caused Montaigu great Master of France to die, to content his minde (to wit, the Duke of Burgoyne) whom at that time Efbars worshipped as his Idol: but God permitted, that he himselfe was soone af- 30 ter hanged and strangled. The other was of the Great Francis the first, vpon his Chancellor Poret: who, to satisfie the Kings passion, practised the destruction of the Admirall Chabot, a man most nobly descended, and of great service. For as in other men, so in Kings, the passion of love growes old, and weares out by time. So the Kings affection being changed towards the Admirall, hee charged him with some offences which hee had formerly committed. The Admirall, prefuming vpon the great good service which hee had done the King in Piemont, and in the defence of Mar feilles against the Emperour; gave the King other language than became him; and defired nothing fo much, as a publike triall. Hereupon the King (it being eafic to prouoke an ill disposition) gaue commission to the Chancellor, as President, and 40 other Indges, vpon an information of the Kings Aduocate, to question the Admiralls life. The Chancellor, an ambitious man, and of a large conscience, (which is rare in men towards the Law) hoping highly to content the King; wrought with fome of the Judges with fo great cunning; with others, with fo sharpe threats; and with the rest, with so faire promises; as, albeit nothing could be proued against the Admirall, worthy of the Kings displeasure; yet the Chancellor subscribed, and got others to subscribe, to the forfeiture of his Estate, Offices, and Libertie, though not able to preuaile against his life. But what was the Chancellors reward (the King hating fallhood in fo great a Magistrate) other than his owne degradation, arraignement, and condemnation? Belle leconcertes (laith Pasquire) à tont Iudge pour demourer 50 answered vnto his friends, if any bewailed his calamitie as vndeserued, That hee was tried, according to his owne defire, by the Lawes of his Countrie, and by the Iudges of Parliament, yet the Kings justice, surmounting all other his passions, gaue backe vnto him his Honour, his Offices, his Libertie, and his Estate.

t. III.

The last Acts of Scipio in Spaine. His returne to Rome where be is chofen Conful.

The last busines that troubled Scipio in Spaine, grew by the rebellion of the People and murinic of his Soulding TV City ple, and mutinie of his Souldiers. He fell dangeroufly ficke, in fuch fort, that the rumor of his death ranne currant throughout Spaine. This encouraged Mandonius and Indibilis, pettic Kings, that had for laken the Carthaginians, and followed Scipio awhile before, to take armes against the Romans. They were vainely perswaded. that after the Carthaginians were driven out, they themselves should become the mightiest in all Spaine. But seeing now, that things were no way answerable to the greatnesse of their hopes; they thought it best, to take the present advantage, and 20 hammer out their owne fortunes. So they rallly fell vpon the Sueffetani and Sedetani, Confederates of the Romans; and wasted their Countrie. Part of the Roman Armie lying at Suero, in stead of making head against these Rebells, grew to be affected with the like difference. They had not reaped fuch profit of their Roman conquefts. as might fatisfie their defires; or as they thought easie to bee gotten, if they might be their owne Carners. Wherefore, when the death of Scipto was reported, they thought, that the time ferued very well, to enrich themselues with spoile of the Countrie. Many outrages they committed: and, which was greatest of all, driving away their Colonells, that should have bridled their furie; they chose out of their owne number two base fellowes, Albius Calenus, and Atrius V mber, to be their Com-30 manders. These tooke vpon them all the Ensignes of Proconfuls, or Propretors; as if this their election had beene like to that, wherein Lucius Martius was chosen by the Souldiers, after the death of the two Scipio's. But whilest they were deuising, what exploits they might do, for the enriching of themselves, in a time of such combuftion; as was expected; there arrived more certaine newes, that Scipio was both aliue, and in good health. There came also new Colonells, sent vnto them from their Generall: who mildly rebuking their want of confideration, and feeming to bee glad that they had no further ouer-shot themselves; led them to Carthagera; there to receive their pay. Before their comming, Scipio had resolved to doe exemplarie justice on the principall offenders; and to put the whole multitude of them 40 in feare, of what they had descrued. Therefore hee caused Syllanus to make readic the Companies which lay before in the Towne, as it were to make an Expedition againe Mandonius, and Indibilis ; He caused Albius and Atrius with somethirtie other of their Complices, to be fecretly apprehended in their lodgings; He called the Mutiners to affembly; and having them vnarmed as they were, encircled round by Syllanus and his Companies, prepared for the purpose; hee bitterly inueighed against them all, as Traitors. This done; Albius, and Atrius, with the other prisoners, were haled to the stake; where they were whipt, and beheaded, as was the Roman cultome toward such offenders. The rest of the Souldiers, to the number of eight thousand, were caused to take their oath of obedience anew; and received e-50 uery man his pay when he was fworne,

Mandonius and Indibilis continued in armes; notwithstanding that they had certaine word of Scipio his life and health. Well they could have beene contented to be quiet: but by the severitie vsed to the Roman Souldiers; they stood in feare, as being Spaniards, and greater offenders, of harder measure. Scipio went against them; and found them in a Valley, that was scarce large enough to hold all their Armie. In the entrance thereof hee fought with them: and fending Lelius with all his horle to fetch a compasse about the Hills, and charge them in reare; he ouerthrew them. Indibilis and Mandonius had after this no hope remaining, to preserve themselves and their estates, otherwise than by making submission. Mandonius therefore came to Scipio : and humbly crauing pardon, both for himselfe, and for his brother Indibilis, obtained his request; yet so, that they were taught to acknowledge themselves lesse free Princes, then they formerly had beene.

Afterward Scipio went toward Gades: and was met on the way by Masanista; 10 who fecretly promifed to doe him all feruice, if the People of Rome would fend him to make Warre in Africk. Vnto Mago that lay in Gades, came directions from Carthage; that letting all care of Spaine alone, he should thence depart with his fleet into Italie; and there wage an Armie of Gaules, and Ligurians, to joyne with Hannibal. For this purpose, was monie sent vnto him from Carthage; and he himselfe laid hold vpon all that he could finde in the Towne of Gades; without sparing either private men, the common treasurie, or the Temples. In his voyage thence, hee landed at Carthagena; hoping to have taken it by furprise. But hee failed in the attempt; and was so beaten to his ships, that he returned back to repose himselfe awhile at Gades. The Gaditanes, offended with the robberies and spoile that hee had made at his ta- 20 king leaue of them, would not fuffer him to enter againe into their Citie. By this hee forefaw, that it would not bee long ere they became Roman. Wherefore fending Messengers into the Towne, to complaine of this vncourteous dealing, hee allured their Magistrates forth vnto him; whom, notwithstanding all the excuse that they could make, he whipt, and crucified. This done, he followed his former intended voyage; bidding Spaine farewell for euer.

The Isle and Citie of Gades, was yeelded to the Romans, presently after the departure of Mage. Then did Scipio deliuer vp the Province, to those that were fent from Rome to succeede him therein: and himselfe with ten ships returned home. At his comming to Rome he made fuite for the honour of a triumph. But it was denied 20 him : for that it had as yet beene granted vnto no Proconful; excepting to fuch, as received that dignitie after a Consulship, as it were by prorogation. But to make amends for this repulse: the election of new Consuls being then in hand, by generall voice of the Citie P. Cornelius Scipio was chosen Consul; and P. Licinius Crassus joyned with him. This Crassus, being high Priest, or Bishop of the Romans; might not, by the custome of those times, goe farre from the Citie; as being to intend the matters of their supersition: though Cafar, and others, who in ages following held the same Office; were staied by no such religious impediment, from being farre, and long absent. Hereby it came to passe, that Scipio desiring to have the Warre transferred into Africk, was inno danger to loofe that honourable charge, by any 40 mischance of lot, in the division of Provinces; for that his Colleague was not capable of emploiment fo farre off.

SCIPIO obtaines leaue to make warre in Africk. His preparations. Of MA-SANISSA who toyned with Scipio. The victories against ASDRVBAL and SYPHAX.

CNAP.3. S.18.

VB. CORNELIUS SCIPIO, and P. LICINIUS CRASSUS, entring into their Confulship, held a meeting of the Senate in the Capitol: wherein it was decreed, that Scipio (hould bee allowed, to beflow part of the money which he had brought out of Spaine into the treasurie; vpon the setting forth of solemne plaies, that he had vowed to make,

whilest he was busied in his Spanish warres. This helped well to reniue the memoric of his victories already gotten; and to give hope vnto the People of greater victories in the warre, which he intended to make in Africk. To the same purpose, did the Spanish embassages availe much in the Senate, especially that of the Saguntines: who magnified his actions, highly and deferuedly, faying, That they were the most happie of all their Countrimen, since they being present, had seene him chosen Cousul, and should carry home such joyfull newes. The Saguntine Embassadours were louingly entertained by the Senate; as their faith to Rome, though costly it were both to them, and to the Romanes, had well deserued. Neuerthelesse, when Sci-20 pio proposed, that Africk might be decreed vnto him for his Province: there wanted not many, cuen of the principall men, that vehemently gainefaid him. Of these was Q. Fabius Maximus, the chiefe: who seemes to have been troubled with that discase; which too often causeth men renowned for long approued vertue, to looke asquint vpon the actions of those, that follow them in the same kinde. Hee alleaged many reasons against the purpose of the Consul: whereof the chiefe were, That the treasuric was vnable to sustaine the charges of a warre in Africk; and that it was exa tremely perillous to hazard so great forces, where they could not at pleasure bee recalled vnto the defence of Rome it selfe, if need required. Hereunto he added many words concerning the danger wherein Italie flood, not only of Hannibal, but of Ma-30 gohis brother, that was arming the Ligurians: as also concerning the honour of the Conful; which would (he faid) be greater in fetting Italie free from enemies, than it could be in doing any harme to Africk. Neither did he forget, both to eleuate the Spanish warres, as of leffe moment than the intended voiage against Carthage; nor withall to lay great blame vpon Scipio, for having fuffered Afdrubat to passe into Italie: shewing, that it was greatly to be feared, lest the like might happen againe; and that a new Armie, notwithstanding the good successe of Scipio (if it hapned to bee good) might be fent from Carthage, to the vtter endangering of Rome, whilli the Roman forces were employed abroad. But the maine point which he vrged, was, That neither the Senate had ordained, nor the People commanded, Africk to be that yere 49 a Prouince: which the Consulneuerthelesse propounded in such wise, as if it were a matter already concluded, and no longer to be argued. Scipio on the other fide, infified vpon this one point; That it was better to make an offenflue, than a defenflue warre: especially against such as the Curthaginians; who being ill provided of able men at home, did furnish themselves by helpe of money, with levies made abroad. As for the care of Italie, he doubted not, but P. Licinius his Colleague would bee as well able to discharge it now, as others had done in times of greater danger. So promiling to draw Hannibal into Africk, for defence of his owne home: and taxing as ciuilly as he could, the enuy of Fabius, which with flood such a gallant enterprise, he proposed the matter againe vnto the Senate. Much altercation there was about the 30 manner of his proceeding: for a fmuch as it was noy fed abroad, that if he could not bring the Senate to his minde, he would carry it by the People. This offended many of the Ancients: who refented in this honourable man a little spice of that arrogancie, which in following ages, grew to be much hotter in those that had commanded long abroad. But in conclusion, Scipio teferred himselfe wholly vnto the Senates

Want of money, and no great liking to his voiage, made the Roman Senate have little care to furnish out Scipio to the warre, by him intended upon Africke. Herewithall it fellout, that Migo, comming on the fuddaine from the Baleares to Genua, and winning the Towne, bred a feare of no leffe terrible inuation vpon Italie, than that which Afdrabal had lately made. He could not indeed raife any great Armie of the Ligurians; for that he found them distracted with civill warres. Therefore he was driven to make choice of his partie; and to helpe those whom hee thought fit- 10 test for his turne, against the others. This troublesome businesse, though it occupied more of his time than he could willingly have spared; yet it got him reputation by his victories; and made the vnsteadie Gaules readie to enter into his pay. Hereupon the differfed Legions of the Romans, that under Proconfuls, and Pretors, lay readie to be employed where need should require; were directed vnto the borders of Lombardie and Ligmia, there to make head against Mago. But all his menaces passed away in vapour. For a fleet either comming to his aide from Carthage, or by him fent thither (the report is vucertaine) loaden with the bootie that he had taken; fell into the hands of the Roman Pretor, that governed in Sardinia. This did much difable him : and though after a while, there came letters from Carthage, together with 20 store of money, heartning him in his proceedings: yet some impediments which he found, and that fatall voiage of Scipio into Africke, disturbed all; and made him be re-

Against Hannibal, was nothing done this yeere. Neither was any thing done by him, of which the Roman Historians have beene pleased to take notice. Onely it is faid, that he spent the Summer by the Temple of Juno Lacinia, where hee raised an Altar, with a huge Title of all that he had performed, grauen in Punike, and Greeke letters. Such accompt of winnings past, is commonly in Gamesters that are at the height of their fortune, a cause of remission, and carelesnesse; in those that are vpon the losing hand, a cause both of the same for the present, and shortly after of deje- 30 ction, when they finde a notable change. A great peftilence, infelting both the Carthaginian and the Roman Campe, is faid to have beene the occasion of this yeeres idlenesse, which fell not out much amisse for the Citie of Rome, that was maruailoufly empouerished by this warre; and had alreadie tryed the vtmoft way to defray the charges, which grew insupportable. To relieue the present necessitie, it was well thought vpon, that a great part of Campania (not many yeeres fince confifcated) should bee fold, or let out: in which bargaine, that the Citie might receive no losse; the tenth part of the fine was ordained as a reward, vnto the detectors of lands concealed.

Of this, or other money, none was given to Scipio. Neither was hee allowed to 40 make prefle of Souldiers for his African voiage; neither did hee ouer-much labour to obtaine it. That which the Senate refused, the People did for him: or rather they did it for themselves; that were therein wifer than the Senate. It is viually found in Councells of estate, that the busic, or obstinate heads of a few, doe carrie all the rest. And many times men make a surrender of their owne judgements, to the wisedome that hath gotten it selfe a name, by giving happie direction in troubles forepast. Therefore, hee that reposeth himselfe vponthe aduice of many, shall often finde himselfe deceived: the counsaile of those many being wholly directed by the empire of a few, that ouer-fway the reft. Q. Fabius was accounted the Oracle of his time: for his warie nature forted well with the businesse, 70 that fell out in the chiefe of his employment. Vnto him therefore Q. Fuluius adhered, with other of the Senators, that were growne olde in following one courfe; from which they could not shift, as the change of times required. But the People (who though they could not well aduife, and deliberate, yet could well apprehend apprehend) embraced the needfull refolution of Scipio: in luch fort, that belides his Roman forces, he had from divers parts of Italie about seven thousand Voluntaries. Hee had also prouision from the seuerall Townes; Corne, Iron, Canuas for failes, Axes, Beede-hookes, Hand-mills, and the like implements, Firre for building of thips, many thousands of Targets, Helmets, and Speares of all kindes: enery place furnishing him with that commoditie, which it best could affoord. Vnto this willingnesse of the People, the diligence of Scipio was correspondent. In the compasse of fine and fortie daics, hee had both feld his Timber, built, and lanched twentie Trireme, and ten Quinquereme Gallies; wherewith hee transported his Armie into 10 Sicil. In Sicil he found, besides other forces, two Legions, that had served at Canne: which were olde Souldiers, and (as hee himfelfe well knew) not guiltie of the ouerthrow; for which they had long vnder-gone a heavie censure. They had served under Marcellus and Lauinus, at the taking of many Cities, and firong peeces: in which regard, they were like to be of good vie to him in Africk, where would bee flore of fuch emploiment. For increasing the number of his horse, hee pressed three hundred Sicilians, all wealthie young men, and fuch as loued well their cafe. These he afterwards discharged from the Warre, highly to their contentment : but with condition, that they should deliuer their Horse and Armes, to as many Roman Gentlemen, which he brought ouer with him for the purpose. Whileft hee 20 was prouiding, to have things in a readinesse for Africk, the banished Locations that followed the Roman fide, made him acquainted with an intelligence, whereby they hoped to recouer their Citie. Some handicrafts men, that wrought for the Carthaginians in one of the Citadells of Locri (for there were two in the Towne) being taken prisoners by the Romans, promised to betray the place, if they might be ransomed, and rewarded. Scipio being aduertised of this, gave order to have the attempt made by night: which happily succeeded; and that Citadell was surprifed. The other Citadell was strongly defended by the Carthaginian Garrison, which fent to Hannibal for aide. The Romans in like fort, fearing left their owne paucitie should make them too weake for Hannibal, craved helpe of the Conful Scipio. The 30 Townesmen were doubtfully affected: but the best, and most of them inclining to the Romans, kept Hannibal out; whom the comming of Scipio caused thence to depart; and caused likewise the Carthaginian Garrison to abandon the other Citadell. Many outrages were committed by the Roman Souldiers, that were left by Scipio in custodic of the Towne. Wherefore a vehement complaint was made by the Loerians unto the Roman Senate; not onely against those of the Garrison: but much more against Pleminius the Captaine, who gaue bad example, and was worse than all the reft. Belides many Murders, Robberies, Rapes, and other Villanies: the Temple of Proferpina, that had a great fame of fanctitie, was spoiled by these barbarous Thecues. The Lograns therefore aduled the Senate to make prefent a-

40 mends to the Goddesse for this facriledge : saying, that the like had neuer been committed, without notorious vengeance by her taken upon the Authors. The Senate gaue good eare to this complaint, comforted the Locrians, and redreffed the injuries done vnto them, fent for Pleminius, with other principall the offenders, whom they cast into prison, & vsed according to their deferts: as also they restored vnto Proferpina her money twice told. But old Q. Fabius was not herewithall contented. He laid much of the blame vpon Scipio, that had placed such a manin Locri; and had not carefully harkened to the complaints made against him, but suffered him to runne on in these his wicked courses. By the sharp investive that Fabius made others tooke courage to speak what they pleased, as well against the demeanor of Scipio, as against

50 the diffolutenesse of his Armie, which lay, as they said, idle in Sicil, neither mindfull of any feruice toward, nor fit for it if neede should require. Finally, things were so farre vrged, that ten Legates were fent ouer into Sicil, together with the Pretor appointed for that Iland; two of the Tribunes, and one of the Ædiles; who should examine these matters; and either cause the Generall to returne into Italie, or continue him in his charge, as they thought fit. The end of all was: they found him so well prepared against Carthage, as that they hastned him on his journie, and gaue him high commendations at their returne.

Scipio had alreadic emploied Lalius in Africk; rather to make discoucrie, than to worke any other great effect of warre. He tooke a great bootie: and struck no little terrour into the Carthaginians; who faw their affaires to bee vpon termes of change. But the greatest fruit of his journie was, That speaking with Masanifa, he will informed himselfe of the state of Affrick; and knew what was to bee expected of those two Kings, that had promised to joyne with the Romans at their landing.

Concerning Masanisa his revolt from the Carthaginians, and his compact made to vnder-hand with the Romans: Linie doth protesse, That there was no such evident cause thereof at the present; but that the long continuance of his faith and constancie, in following times, must helpe to proue, that this his change was not without fome good cause. But Appismus (an Historian farre inferiour to Linie, both in Worth and Time) gives one reason so probable of this, and many accidents thereto belonging, as that it carries with it a great appearance of necessary tructh. Only the doubt is, How it could any way come to passe; that the knowledge of such a matter should haue escaped the diligence of Linie, if it had beene true : vnlesse we should beleeue, that he wifully forbare to rehearfe a Tragedie; the forrow whereof would cause * Appian, Alex men to thinke amisse of Scipio. How socuer it was, thus * Appian tells it: and many 20 circumstances of things done confirme it. Afdrubal, the sonne of Gifco, had a faire daughter, whom both King Syphax and Majaniffaloued. Mafiniffa, being brought vp at Carthage, and being with all a goodly gentleman of person, and excellent in qualitics, was chosen by Astrabal to be his sonne-in-law. When the virgin was betrothed vnto him, he went into Spaine, and there did great service. But afterwards, the Carthaginian Senate thought the mariage of Afdrubals daughter to be a matter of State: and bestowed her vpon Syphax; without standing to acquaint her father or Masanifa therewithall. This they did, for that Syphax was the more mightie Prince; and for that the indignitie of the repulse, had made him become their enemie. Hereof Majaniffa was aduertifed: and forthwith entred into intelligence with Scipio, fecretly as he 30 thought; yet not fo fecretly, but that some notice was taken of it: which would have cost him his life, had he not with great circum/pection conneighed himselfe home into his fathers Kingdome. Thus farre forth we may beleeve Appianus: all the narration well cohering with things path, and following. Only it feemes, that how focuer Sophonisha the daughter of Afdrubal, was promifed by the Carthaginians vnto Syphax: yet fince this their courtesie proceeded from feare, He thought it wisdome to continue and increase the same their searc, by making faire promises to the Romans; untill A s DRVBAL had fent for his daughter from Carthage, and the marriage was confummated. In other matters concerning the warre it felfe, wherein Appian differs much from Liuie, and from Polybius, whom (as appeares by the broken pieces of his works 40 remaining) Linie did follow; it will be no offence, to take little heed vnto his reports. Masanisa was the sonne of Gala, a King of the Numidians: whose father dying, the

Liu,lib.29.

Crown descended by order of the Country, vnto Defalces the brother, not vnto Mafanissathe sonne. But this Vncle of Masanisa shortly died : and his elder sonne, who tooke possession of the Kingdome, was vanquished, and slaine in battaile by a Rebel. that made himselfe Protector over the yonger which was a child. The Traitor fortified himselfe against Mafanissa, whose returne hee feared; by Alliances with the Carthaginians and Syphax. But all would not ferue: He, and his Pupill, were dispossessed of their Estates by Masaniffa; that was a skilfull Warriour, and well beloued for the memorie of his father Gala. The Carthaginians in reason should have beene 50 glad, that Masanisa, who had done them notable service, was thus confirmed in his Estate: had they not beene guiltie of the injurie by them done vnto him; whilst his Vncle or Coulin raigned, and hee seemed vnlikely to stand them in any stead. But Syphax, by their procurement, and perhaps by his owne malice towards his Corriual, warred vpon him; and ouer-charging him with numbers, draue him out of his Kingdome. Neuertheleffe Majaniffa fiill retayned the hearts of his people: and thereby remained firong enough, to infest both Syphax and the Carthaginians; though he was often put in distresse, by great forces that were sent against him. He therefore keeping much about the leffer Syrtis, betweene the borders of the Carthaginians and the Nation of the Garamants, expected the comming of the Romans: yet fo, as he made long roades over all the Countrie, even as farre as to Hippo; and when Lelius arrived thereabouts, exhorted and encouraged him to haften on Scipio

to the inualion of Africk. But Syphax, in whose great aide and succour was reposed more hope of good succeffe, than could be expected from the good will of poore Majaniffa; fent an Embaffage into Sicil about the fame time, which was little pleafing vnto Scipio. He excufed himselfe of his promise lately made: and signified his alliance with the Carthaginians; adding, That hee could not choose but fight for the defence of Africke, wherein he was borne and raigned; and for defence of his beloued wives Countrie, if it were inuaded. Neuerthelesse hee promised to remaine a Neuter; so long as the Romans and Carthaginians held warre abroad, farre enough from Africk, as hitherto they had done. This meffage haftened scipio in his Expedition, much more than any perswasion could have done. For the promised assistance of Syphax had not a 20 little advanced his enterprile; in procuring both the affent of the Senate, and the forwardreffe of many Aduenturers. Left therefore the fayling of this hope, should worke too great a change in common opinion; He thought it the best way to preuent all discourse, and set the warre undertaken immediatly on foot. The Embasfadours he dismissed in all haste, with letters to their King: wherein hee willed him to consider, that what hee had promised hee had also sworne; and therefore should doe well to make it good. Having fent them away, Hee called his Souldiers together, and bade them make ready for the voyage; which he intended no longer to deferre. For, said he, Masaniffa hath beene with Lelius: and Syphax hath newly sent to me; greatly wondring voon what I should thus stay; and saying, that they will 20 provide for themselves, if I faile their expectation by tarrying any longer. This fine tale preuented all further inquilition, that might else haue beene made concerning themeflage of these Embassadours; whose followers had beene seene walking vp and downe S, racuse. And left any thing should afterwards breake out, that might hinder the bulineffe, Scapio immediatly fent about his fleet vnto Lilybaum : and requesting by letters M. Pomponius, that was Pretor in Sicil, to meete him there; hasted thither with his Armie. At Lilybeum he agreed with the Pretor, about the division of the Legions betweene them; which to leave behinde for defence of the Iland; and which to carrie with him into Africk. What numbers hee transported, it is not certaine: some Historians reckoning only ten thousand foot, and two and twentie 49 hundred horse; others increasing them to fine and thirtiethousand, horse and foot. Concerning his directions for embarking, and other matters belonging to their courfe, I holdeit needlesse to set them downe: since they were points of ordinarie care, and which it is like that neither he, when he tooke his voyage into Spaine, nor o. thers vpon like occasions, have omitted; they being also word for word fet downe by an Historian, who borrowed them from Livie, and fitted them to a Prince of

This Roman Armie landed in Africk, neare vnto a Fore-land then called the faire Promontorie: which how farre it was from Carthage, or toward what point of the Compasse, I cannot precisely affirme; because it is uncertaine, whether it were that 50 Cape or Head-land which borethe name of Mercurie, and lay to the Noth-east of Carthage; or whether that of Apollo, which lay Northerly from Carthage, and by West. The comming of Mafanissa vnto Scipio at his first arrivall, helpes to confirme the opinion of Xylander: who thinkes the faire Promonorie to have beene the fame, that was also called Mercuries Cape, fince with little difficultie Mefaniffa might come thither Aaaaaa 3

thither from the leffer Syrtis, whereabout was his common abiding. But for a fmuch as without any memorable impediment, soone after his arrivall, Scipio encamped bcfore Vtica, that stood Westward from Carthage beyond the River Bagradas: it may rather feeme, that hee landed within the Promontoric of Apollo; whence the way to Ptica was not long. This is also strongly proued; for that out of Carthage were fent, the next day, fine hundred horse to trouble him in his disembarking. Neither was it so hard for Masanisa, that round about the Countrie with a troupe of horse, to finde out the Romans, though they landed farre from the place to the which hee vfually reforted, like as before he had met with Lalius at Hippothat was farther off: as it would have beene for Scipio, with his Armie and Carriages, to ouer-come the 10 trouble of a long journie, and tetch a great compasse to Vica, by Land; when he might have disembarqued nearer vnto it. Neuerthelesse it may passe as a conjecture, That Scipio came first of all to Emporia, a plentifull Region about the leffer Syrtis; fince he gaue charge to the Matters of his thips, at the fetting forth from Lily baum, to shape their course for that coast. The Countrie thereabout was very rich, and fit for fullenance of an Armie: neither were the Inhabitants warlike, or well prouided to make relitance. Thus much perhaps Mafan ffa had fignified vnto Lalus, when he fpake with him at Hippo: thinking that the Romans, how focuer they made braue promifes, would not come ftrong enough to fight at head. But when hee faw their fleet and Armie to be luch, as not only ferued to inuade the Lands of Carthage, but 20 threatned a conquest of the Citie, and whole Estate: then might hee better adule them to fet faile for Viica, and make warre vpon the Enemies at their owne doores.

The Circhaginians had at that time neither any Captaine of great worth at home, nor better Armie than of raw Souldiers; that were levied, or to be levied in hafte. Aférabal the fonne of Gifco, the fame that had lately beene chased out of Spaine by Scipio, was their best man of warre. And good enough perhaps he was thought by Hinne and his fellowes, of whose faction he was : or it ought were wanting in him, yet his Riches and Nobilitie, together with the affinity of King Syphax, made him pailcable. He was at that present with the King his sonne-in law, working him (no doubt ) against the Romans : when letters were brought from Carthage, both to Sy- 30 phase and to him, informing them of the Invalion: entreating the one of them to give affiltance; and commanding the other to make his repaire vnto the Citic, where he was cholen Generall. But ere these could be readie, Scipio had beaten the troupe of Carthaginian horse, that were sent out of the Citie to disturbe his landing; and flaine Hanno a yong Gentleman, that was their Leader. He had also taken and facked a Towne of the Carthaginians: wherein, besides other bootie, hee tooke eight thou and prisoners; all which he conveighed abourd his Hulks or ships of burden, and fent them backe loaden into Sicil. Hee tooke likewife a Towne called Salera; which he held and fortified. In Saleralay another Hanno, with foure thousand Numi iau horse: whose service being fitter for the field, than for defence of walled pla- 40 ces: made Scipie to perceive the viskilfulneffe of their Leader, that had thus houled them. Wherefore he fent Ma/aniffa before him: who rode vp to the gates; and, by making a Branado, trained out the improvident Hanno fo farre, that hee drew him vnto a place, where the Romans lay in wait for him. The victoric was eafily gotten; and Hanno either taken, or flaine. With those that fled, the Romans entred pell-mell into the Towne; which prefently they made their owne. Thence went Scipio to Vica, a Citie of great importance, * of which mention hath beene formerly made; and fate downe before it. Fortie dayes hee spent about it: assailing it both by Land and Sea, and vfing all his engines of batterie whereof he had plentic; yet was in no likelihood of preuailing. And now the Summer was quite spent: so that it was time 50 for him to choose a place, and fortifie his Winter-campe; which must bee well stored against the vecre following. Whilest thus necessitie veged him to leave Vtica: and shame of taking the repulse in his first great enterprise, rather than any hope of better successe, caused him to stay there: Astrubal and Syphan gaue him the honour of a faire pretence to leave the fiege. Afdrubal had made a Levie of thickie shoufand toot, and three thou and horse; yet adventured not with this ill-trained Armie to draw neere vnto the Romans, before the comming of Sypham. Sypham brought with him vnto Carthage fittle thouland foot, and tenne thouland horle; which joyning vnto the forces of Afdrubal, they marched brauely toward Scipio; who thereby tooke occasion to dislodge. He chose for his Winter-campe the bankes of an Inlet, that had good harbour for his Nauie. His foot-men he lodged on a Promontorie, joyning to the Continent by an arme of Land: his horfe-men he bestowed vpon lower ground, on the other flore; in the bottome of the Creeke he mored his flips; and there hee quartered the Mariners, with all that belonged viito the fleet. The whole Campe he strongly fortified; and so attended the season of the yeere, when it should serue him againe to fight. Or cattaile and other bootie Masanissa had brought in great flore; by driving the Countrie, before the comming of Afdrubal and Syphax. Corne also he had gotten some: and great store was sent him from Sicil and Sardinia. Likewise apparrell for his Souldiers, was sent from home, or from Sardinia: though scarce enough to serve turne; for that it was a matter of more cost. The ships that brought these things, he freighted homewards with such part of his bootie, as hee could belt spare; especially with Captines to be fold for flaves. Afdrubal and Syphax encamped necre vnto Scipio: not lo ilrongly fortifying themselves, 20 as did the Romans; either for that they wanted the feuere inflictution, which the Romans vied in discipline of Warre; or for that they prefumed upon their multitude, against which they found in Scipio no disposition to allue foorth of his strength, and fight So the Winter pailed without altion.

When Spring drew neere; Sapro thought it good to affay his old friend the Normidian King, if perhaps he might bee wonne by perlwafions to to fake the Carthaginisms. It was confidered, that those Barbarians were naturally vinconiant; and particularly, that Spphax had given proofe of before this of his much leuite. It might therefore be hoped, That having wearied himfelfe, by lodging a whole Winter in the Campe: and being peraduenture no leffe wearie with fatietie of his wife, who so had cauled him to enter into this warre: Hee might bee mooned with a little entreatieto with-draw himfelfe home into his Kingdome, and reit a Neuter. But it is not tieto with-draw himfelte home into his Kingdome, and reita Neuter. But it is not vulktely, that fuch a triend as this King, that beene highly entertained and honored in the Cirie of Carthage, which was necre at hand, as often as during this Winter it had pleafed him, or as he had beene inuited, to make a flep thither and repose himfelite awhile; his wife Queene Sophonishalying also there at the same time, to cherish him in his resolution. How locuer it were, 3: phix did only make an our time of peace; propounding it as reasonable, That Hannish should bee recalled out of Italie by the Carthaginians; and that the Romans in like fort should quietly depart out of Africk; and so make an end of the Warre, wherewith now both Africk and Europe

40 were disquieted. Vnto this would not Seipwat the first giue care: yet being press de carnessly by many messages from Syphax, and destring to continue the inter-course of Embassladours: He beganne to make shew, as it he would consider of the motion. He was given to vnderstand by those whom he had sent vnto the King, That the Enemies had their Campes without any great desence of earth, sull of woodden Cabbins, and courerd with boughes: and that the Namidans, such of them as came first with Syphax, vsed coverings of Mats and Reedes; others, that came later, had that ched their lodgings with drie boughes and leanes; vnder which they lay carelessly without their Trenches. Vpon this advertisement he bethought himselse, That it would not be hard tor him to set their camps on fire; and thereby give them.

30 a notable ouerthrow. Without helpe of fome fuch thratageme, Hee forefaw that it would be a worke of great difficultie for him, to proceede in his warres when time should ferue. It was a plaine open Countrie wherein hee lay, and the Enemies had great aduantage of him in number, especially in horse, which, yeon such ground, could not be resisted by the Roman Legions. The longer therefore that he though

*1.ib.5.cap.2. $.3. vpon the matter; the more needfull he found it for himfelfe, to make some sudden attempt voon their Campe. To this end he sent many Embassadours, vnder pretence of treating about the Peace; but indeede of purpose to discouer all that might concerne the intended surprise. With these Embassadous he sent, as Attendants, many old Souldiers disguised like saues; that wandring (as it were) idlely vp and downe the Campe, might observe the waies and entrances, with whatsoever else was needfull. When hee had learned as much as hee defired : vpon the fudden hee fent word to Syphax, that it was vaine to hold any longer Treatie, for a much as he could not get the confent of his Councell of warre; without whole approbation, all that himselfe could doe was no more, than the good will of one man. This he did, to the 10 end that, without any breach of faith, hee might put his designe in execution. The Truce being thus cut off: Afdrubal and Syphax were very penfine; as having lately perswaded themselues, that their trouble was almost at an end. But since it could be no better, they beganne to deuise, by what arte they might draw Scipio out of his campe; and prouoke him to battaile in those Plaines. This if they could doe; they hoped to make his Councell of warre repent as greatly the refufall of peace, as did M. Atilius after the like prefumption. But if he should refuse to come foorth of his Trenches: what elfe remained than to beliege him? which they themselues were well able to doe by Land; and the Carthaginian fleet should doe by Sea, that was making readie for the purpole. By such discourses these two comforted themselves; 20 recompencing in conceipt the loffe of their hopes past, with that of victorieto come. But herein they were extremely and worthily disappointed: for that, consulting about the future, they prouided not against present danger; but continued in the fame negligence, which was growne vpon them by the long discourse of peace. As for Scipia, Hee was not idle: but made preparation out of hand, as it were to doe tomewhat against Vica. Two thousand Souldiers he had made readie; and appointed to take the same peece of ground, whereon hee lay against Vicea before. This he did, partly to keepe secret that which he had in hand, lest being suspected by his owne Souldiers, the Enemie might happen to have notice of it partly to hinder those of Vices from setting vpon the few, that hee purposed to leave behinde him in 20 his campe. He caused his men that night to suppe well and betimes; that they might be readie for the journie. After supper, he appointed such Companies as he thought fit, vinco the defence of his Campe; all the rest of his Armie he led forth, about nine of the clocke at night. The Carthaginians lay from him seuen miles and an halfe: whom he purposed to vndertake himselfe with the one halfe of his armie; the other halfe he committed vnto Lalius and Masanissa, whom hee lent before him to set vpon the Campe of Syphax, that was farther off. It was his meaning, that the campe of Syphax should be on a light fire, ere he would meddle with the Carthaginians. For the fire might seeme to have taken hold by casualtievpon the Namidians, that lay farther off: whereas if it first appeared in the Campe of Afdrubal, it would bee suspe- 40 Eted as the doing of enemies; and give Syphax warning to looke vinto himselfe. To this end therefore Scipio marched faire and foftly; that Lelius and Masanista, who had a longer journie, and were to fetch a compasse about for searc of being discoucred, might have time to get before him, and doe their feat. It was about two or three of the clock in the morning, when the campe of syphan beganne to blaze: which not only the Numidians, but their King him felfe, imputed vnto cafualtie; as thinking themselves safe enough from Enemies, for that the Carthaginians lay interposed betweenethem and the danger. Wherefore as if there were no more to doe, fome, starting halfe asseepe; and others, that had sitten up late at drinking; ranne out of their Cabbins to quench the fire. But fuch was the tumult, that they neither could to rightly understand in what case they were; nor give remedie to the mischance, as it was supposed. Many were smothered, and burnt in the slame, which grew greater and greater many, leaping into the Trenches for feare of the sudden mischiefe, were trampled to death by the multitude that followed them. They that escaped the fire, fell vpon the Enemies sword, which was readie to receive them. Especially Masanissa, that be it knew the Countrie, did great execution vpon them; having laid all the wayes, by which he forefaw that they would feeke to cleape. The Carthaginians perceiuing this fire, thought none other than that it was a pittifull mischance: fo that some ranne out to helpe the poore Numidians; carrying only what would ferue to quench the fire. Others ranne vp to the Rampart : where, feareleffe of any danger towards themselues, they tood beholding the greatnesse of the flame, and lamenting the misfortune. This fell out right as Scipio would have it. Hee therefore loft no time: but letting vpon those that were running towards the Mumidians, to he killed some, and pursued the rest back into their campe; which in a little while he made to burne as bright, as did that of Syphax. Afdrubal seeing this, and knowing that the Romans were there, did not Hand to make relistance, but shifted onely for himselfe, and escaped with a few of his horse about him. If Hannibal, or any of the Barchine faction, had been etaken in fuch a manner : it is more than probable, that old Hanno would have judged him worthy to be crucified. It would then have been faid, that with leffe than one halfe of thirtie thousand men, hee might at least haue giuen some bad recompence, to them that were taking paines in kindling these fires, had he not beene only carefull how to faue his owne fearefull head. Neuerthelesse Polybius acknowledgeth, and it is most likely to have been true, That if Afarubal, Exemple Pol. 20 or any of those about him, would have firmen to shew valour, when the campe was ib.14. once on fire: He should not thereby have done any manner of good, because of the heare the cries of somany thousands that perished by fire and sword, or to behold the cruell flame that confumed them; which (as Polybius affirms) none that hath being is able to describe. It is enough to say, That of those many thousands very few did escape; which accompanied Astrabal and Syphax in their severall waies of flight. Besides these also there were some scatterers, especially of the Numidians, that saued themselues in the darke; but they were not many; as after shall appeare. Surely it must needes have been every hard to tell, how many were burnt or otherwise made 30 away; and what numbers escaped in the darke of night. Wherefore Linie, who in the rest of this Relation, as often elsewhere, doth follow Polybius; may seeme to haue followed some lesse wor by Author, and him no good Arithmetician, in cafting vp the fumme. For hee reckons onely two thousand foot, and fine hundred horse, to have escaped fortie thousand to have perished by sword or fire; and aboue fixe thousand to have been taken prisoners: the whole number of all which together, is farre short of fourescore and thirteene thousand, which were in these tumult and consternation. I shall not neede to tell what a searefull thing it was, to

Asdrubal, putting himselfe into the next Townethat was very strongly fortified; thought there to finde the Romans worke, untill the Carthaginians at good lei-49 fure might repaire their Armie. He had with him no more than two thousand foot, and fine hundred horse : which he thought sufficient to defend the Towne : if the Townsmen would not be wanting to themselues. But he found the Inhabitants of the place very earnest in contention, whether it were better to fight, or to yeeld. Vnto this disputation, hee well foresaw that the arrivall of Scipio would soone give an end. Wherefore, lest they should lay hold upon him, and seeke the Victors fauour by deliuering him vp; Heshrunke away betimes, and made all halte to Carthage. As for the Towne, which hee left, it opened the gates to Scipio, at his first comming: and thereby preserved it selfe from all manner of losse. The two next Townes adjoyning would needes bee valiant, and make countenance of warre: but 50 their strength not being answerable, they were soone taken by Scipio; who abandoned them to the pleasure of his Souldiers. This done, hee returned to the siege

The Carthaginians were fore troubled, as they had good reason; when, in stead of either Peace or Victorie, which they lately hoped for, they heard newes of such a lamentable ouerthrow. Necessitie enforced them to make hastic prouision for the future: but how to doe it, few of them faw any meanes. Some gaue aduice to craue peace of Scipio: others, to fend for Hannibal out of Italie; but the most, and they which finally prenailed, were of opinion, That notwithit anding the loffe of this Armie, they might well defend themselves against the Romans, by raysing new forces: especially, if Stephan would not leave them. It was therefore concluded. That they should bend all their care this way, leuying in all haste another Armie; and sending Embassadours to deale with Syphax, who lay then at a Towne called Abba, not passing eight miles from Carthage. Immediately the same their infortunate Commander, A [drubal the fonne of Gi/co, was imployed to make new leuies of men: 10 and Oucene Sophonisha went forth with Embassadors to her husband Syphax; who having gathered together as many as he could of his subjects that had escaped from the late flaughter, was thinking to returne into his owne Kingdome. Sophonisbalaboured fo with her husband, that at length she wonne him to her owne desire. And it fell out at the same time, that foure thousand Spaniards, waged by the Carthaginians, were brought ouer to ferue in Africk. Of these were made such braue reports; as if their courage, and the armes which they vied, were not to be relifted. Euen the multitude within Carthage believed these tales, and were more glad than they had cause to be; which is great wonder, since in one Age, the whole Countrie of Spaine had been twice conquered; first, by the Carthaginians themselues, and after by the 20 Romans. But with Syphax these tales prevailed much: which the Carthaginian Embaffidours helped with a lie; faying, that there were come ten thousand of these terrible Spaniards. Vpon this confidence, the people of Carthage and their friends gathered fuch spirit, that in thirtie daies they made up an Armie, consisting wellneare of thirtie thousand men; reckoning the Spaniards, and Syphax with his Numidians, in the number. So they encamped in a Region called the great fields, about fiue daies journie from Vtica. Scipio hearing of this, came from Viica thither, to visit them: leaving behinde him his impediments, with some part of his Armie; to make a shew of continuing the siege. Two or three daies after the meeting of both Armies, passed away in skirmish; without any great thing done. It had now beene 30 time for Afdrubal to follow the example of the Roman, Fabius, and seeke to wearie out the Enemie by delaies. But either (which is likely) he was a farre worfe Commander, or else it was not in his power to give such directions as best pleased himfelfe. The fourth day the Armies met in battaile: wherein the Romans were marfhalled by Scipio after their wonted manner; having their Italian horse in the right wing; and Masanissa with his Numidians in the left. On the contrarie side, of drubal and his Carthaginians had the right wing; Syphax, the left; and the Spaniards, the Battaile. The victoric was gotten without many blowes: for the vntrained followers of Syphax and Aldrubal, could not fustaine the first charge of the Italians, or of Mafanissa. Onely the Spaniards fought a long time, even till they were all in a manner 40 flaine: rather as men desperate, and not hoping for mercie, since they were thus come ouer to fight against Scipio, who had otherwise deserved of them; than vpon any likelihood or conceit of victory. This their obstinacy was beneficiall vnto those that fled; for that it hindered the Romans from making any great pursuit. Hereby Aldrubal, and Syphax elcaped: Aldrubal, to Carthage; and Syphax home, to his owne Kingdome: whither his wife was either gone before, or immediatly followed him.

Scipie, having thus gotten the malterie of the field, took counfaile about the profection of the Warre. It was refolued upon as the beficourie, That hee himfelfe, with part of the Armie, should attempt the Cities round about him; and that Mayo fanifia, with his Numidians, and Lelius, with some of the Remin Legions, should follow after Syphas; not permitting him to take rest within his owne Kingdome, where easily else hee might repaire his forces, and put them to new trouble. This aduice it feemes than Massimise and who have both the qualitie of the Namidians;

and what good might bee done among them, by the reputation of a victoric. The leaft that could be expected, was his relitiution into his owne Kingdom, vfurped by Sphase; which to accomplish, it no lesse concerned the Romansat the present; than it did himselfe. According to this order concluded, Lesius was sent away with Masairist and scipio stayed behinde, carrying the water from Towneto Towne. Many places yeelded for searce; many were taken by lorce; and all the subjects of Carthage wauered in their fidelitie; as if the time were now come, wherein they might take notice of those vnreasonable burdens, which their proud Masters had laid ypon them for maintenance of the water in Spaine and Italie. What to doe in this case the Carthagimians could hardly resolue. Fortune was their Enemie; they had lost their

To Carthaginians could hardly refolue. Fortune was their Enemie: they had loft their Armies, and many of their Townes: neither durit they make bold to trouble their owne fubjects with any violent exaction of menor money; who neuertheeffe of their owne free will were likely to gine little helpe. Very much it griened them, to fend for Hamibal out of Italie: yet linee there was no other hope remaining, than in him and his good Armie; it was decreed, that Embaffadours should bee forthwith fent to call him home. Some there were that gaue aduice, to set out a sleet against that of Scipio, that rode before Viea, weakely manned, and casse to the taken, whilst scipio himselfe was bussed in the Inland Countries. Some were of opinion, That it should be their principall care, to fortifie by all meanes the Citie of Carthage: vpon 20 the fafetie whereof they said that all depended; adding, that whilest they were

20 the fafetie whereof they faid that all depended; adding, that whileft they were true, and at vnitic among themfelues, they might well enough fubfiff, and expect those opportunities, with which Fortane (doubtleffe) would present them. These counsailes were not rejected: but order was forthwith taken, both for all things concerning defence of the Citie, and for the attempt youn the Roman fleet at Viica. Neuerthelesse it was considered, that hereby they should onely protract the warre: without any way aduancing their owne affaires towards likelihood of victorie; no, though it should fall out, that all the shippes at Viica might be etaken or destroyed. Wherfore the determination held concerning Hamibal, That he should immediately come ouer into Africk, as the last refuge of Carthage. The Councell was no soon oner broken yp, than all the Senators betooke themselues to the execution of that which was decreed: fome, to fortification of the Towne: fome, to make readic the Fleet; and fome, appointed thereunto, forthwith to embarque themfelues for Italie. In this their trepidation Scipic comes to Times, a Citie in those daies very strong, and standing in prospect almost of euery part of Carshage. This place, or rather some desencible piece adjoyning, he easily tooke; the Garrison for laking it, and running away as sooneas he drew necre. But whiles thee was about there to incampe, and fortise himselste against the Citie, He might perceive the Carshagnian steet setting forth, and making towards Fries. What this meant, he readily conceived: and stood in great searce, lest his owne ships, that were very ill prepared for Sea-sight (as being 40 heauily loden with engines of batterie, and wholly disposed in such order, as was most convenient for affaulting the Towne) should make bad resistance, against a fleet appointed for that special service. Wherefore he halted away towards Fries, to affish with his presence in this needfull case. It sellout well, that hee had sent his carriages, and all the great bootie which he drew along with him, thither before, at his going to Times. For had not he now made great expedition, he should have come uado; presenting themselues in order of battaile, as if the Romans would have put 50 forth to Sea against them. But Scipio had no such intent: He thought it would bee sufficient, if hee could preserve his Gallies. As for the pleasure of their bruwerie at Sea: it should little availe the Carthaginians, if they got nothing by it, and lost their whole Estate by Land. Wherfore he tooke his ships of burden, and fastning them together with cables; in soure ranks, one behind another, made a four-fold bridge ouer too late. Neither could be indeede have beene there in due time, if the Carthaginians had vsed such diligence as was convenient. But they rested one night in harbour by the way; and at their comming to Vtice, they tarried awhile to make a bra-

the Channell of the Hauen; whereon he placed a thousand of his choice men. with flore of Darts and other casting weapons, to make defence. Some open spaces hee left, whereat his Frigots, and other small Vessells, might runne out and back againe vpon any aduantage or neede: but these he couered with plancks; vsing the masts and yards of his ships in stead of rafters, to joyne all together, that his men might help one another, and the bridge it selfe not be torne asunder. Scarce was this worke finished; when the Carthaginians, seeing none iffue forth against them, came into the Hauen. The fight betweene them and the Romans, that were in the Hulkes, was rather like to the affaulting of a wall, than to any Sea-fight. For they that flood vpon the bridge, had fure footing, and threw their weapons downwards with their whole 10 ftrength and violence; which the Carthaginians out of their Gallies, that were lower and vinfteadie, could not doe. But the Roman Frigots and long Boats, adventuring foorth from behinde the Bridge, were greatly ouer-borne by the force of the Gallies; and were one occasion of that small losse which followed. They that stood vpon the Bridge were neither able to relieue them: nor yet could freely below their weapons among the Carthaginians, as before; for feare of hurting these their friends. that were entangled and mixed among the enemies. The Carthaginians had brought with them grapling hookes, hanging at Iron chaines. These they threw vpon the masts and yards which serued as Arches to joyne the bridge together: then rowing backwards, they tore all afunder; in such fort that one ship followed another, and 20 all the first ranke was broken, or defaced. The Defendants had no other way, than to faue themselves as hastily as they could, by shifting into the next ranke of ships, that lay behinde them vntouched. Neither did the Carthaginians trouble themselves any further in this laborious worke: but having haled away fixe ships of burden, and towed them out of the Hauen, returned home to Carthage. Their wel-come was greater then their victorie: because among so many grieuous losses, onely this exploit had succeeded well; though it were of small importance.

Whilest things thus passed about Carthage; Lalius and Masanissa, in their journie against Syphax, found as good successe as could be defired. The same of the victories alreadie gotten, restored Masanissa to his Kingdome, without further contention: 30 the Masafili, his subjects, joyfully receiving him; and for saking the Vsurper. But here they stayed not: neither indeede would Syphax permit them to be quiet. Hee had such abundance of men and horses, that he felt not greatly the losses past: and, therefore being follicited by Afdrubal and Sophonisba, hee prepared againe for warre. But besidethe instigation of his beloued wife; the losse of the Mafafyli would let him take no rest: neither was it the purpose of Lalius and Masanista, to give him any breathing time. It is common in men, to depart no leffe vn willingly from that which they have gotten by extortion, than from their proper inheritance: but to thinke all alike their owne, whereof they are in possession; be the title vnto some part neuer so vnjust. Hereunto alludes the fable of the yong Kite; which 40 thought that shee had vomited up her owne guts, when it was onely the garbage of fome other fowle, that she had hastily swallowed, and was not able to digest. But whether or no, Syphax, like the young Kite, beleeved the Kingdome of the Mafafyli to be part of his entrailes: Lalius and Mafanissa will shortly give him somwhat, that shall make him cast his gorge. For to this purpose chiefly are they come so farre. It concerned the Romans to dispossesses (if it might be) that King: whose false and hollow friendship towards them, had beene connerted into strong enmitic; as also to fet in his place another, who might doe them such good offices, as Syphax had lately done unto the Caribaginians. How casily this might be effected, Masaniffa knew best: as being well acquainted with the nature of those Countries; wherein, even to this 50 day, though there be many strong Townes, yet the fortune of a battellis enough, to translate the Kingdome from one Competitor to another. So they met with Syphax, who came against them with no lesse an Armie, than his former, and marshalled in the Roman order; according to the skill, which he had learned of the Roman Centurion, Centurion, long agoc lent vnto him out of Spaine fron Cn. Scipio. But though hee could teach his men how to march in order; yet could hee not teach them to fight couragiously. They were a rabble of all forts, gathered up in halte; and few of them had feene warre before. Encamping neare vnto the Romans, it fell out, as commonly, that some small Troupes of Horse on both sides, encountred one another in the mid-way; and they that had the worst, were seconded by other of their fellowes. By continuance of the skirmish, more and more were drawne out from either Campe: fo that at length Syphan, vnwilling to dishearten his men by taking any foile at their first meeting with the Enemie, came vp with all his Horse, which were the best part of his forces, and therewith overcharged Masanilla, whose numbers were farrelesse. But whilest he was prosecuting his hope of victorie : some Roman Squadrons of Foot came against him through their owne Troupes of Horse; which fell to the fides, and made a lane for them. So their Battaile standing now more firme, than a little before; Syphax was vnable, though hee laboured much in vaine to make them give ground. Masanissa likewise, and his Troupes, grew confident vpon this affistance: and charging afresh the Enemie, that could not make way forward, caused him to give backe. Herewithall the Legions came in fight: which terrified fo the Numidian Horse, that they beganne presently to disband. Faine would Syphax have stayed them from flight; and to that end made head in person 20 against the Romans; with hope, that his men would be ashamed to leave him. Butit fell out vnhappily, that he was cast from his Horse, which received a wound; and so taken prisoner. Of others that were flaine or taken, the multitude was not great. It fufficed, that they for sooke the place, and fled and that their King, vpon whom all depended, was in the Romans hand. Mafaniffa told Lelius, That this victoric should make an end of the Numidian warre, if presently they hasted away to Cirto the chiefe Citic of the Kingdome; whither hee himfelfe defired to bee fent before with the Horse, carrying Syphax along with him. Hereunto Lalius agreed. Masanissa comming to Cirta, before any newes of the Kings mischance was there arrived, called out the chiefe of the Citie to parlee : wherein by many faire promifes and threats, but e 30 specially by shewing vnto them Syphax bound, he prevailed so far, that the gates were forthwith opened vnto him; and enery one strone to get his fauour, that was like to be their King hereafter. Among the rest, Queene Sophonisha yeelded her selfe into his hands : and vehemently befought him, that shee might not be deliuered up vnto the Romans. Her youth, and excellent beautic, so commended her suit, that Masamills forthwith granted it; and to make good his promife, married her himselfe that very day: thereby to preuent Lelius and Scipio from determining otherwise of her. fince the was his wife. But Lelius, when he came thither, tooke the matter hainoufly; fo that at first he would have haled her away, together with Syphax and other prisoners, and have sent her vnto Scipio. But being over-entreated by Masanissa, he 49 fuffered the matter to rest a while as he found it, and referred all to Scipio's discretion: to whom hee fent away Syphax and other Captiues immediatly; following fhortly after himselse with Majarissa, when they had done what was needefull in the

Kingdome.

At the comming of Syphax there was great toy in the Roman Campe: the mightie Armies which he had lately brought into the field: and his entertainment of Scipio and Afarabal, both at one time, when Roma and Carthage together fought his friendfine; with fuch other commemoration of his paft and prefent fortune; miniftring to euery onea large argument of difcourfe. Scipio demanded of him, what had moued him, not only to for fake the Roman friendfine, but to make warre vpon to them, vnprouoked. He briefely answered, That his wife had moued him so to doe: calling her a Euric, and a pefilient creature: and faying, That Mafanis[awas no wifer than himselfe3 since hee had now taken the same woman to his wife, who would shortly draw him to the same courses. Hereas Scipio was greatly troubled: and Bbbbb hos shood flood in great doubt, lest this perilous woman should deprine him of Masanissa, as thee had done of Syphax. It was not long, ere Mifaniff a and Lelius came vnto him: both of whom together hee louingly welcommed; and highly commended in publique, for their notable feruice in this Expedition. Then taking Mafaniffa apart, he brake with him, as touching Sophonisba: letting him understand, that the Romans had title to her head; and that the was a mischieuous enemie of theirs. Wherefore hee entreated him to moderate his affections; and not to deface the memorie of his great services alreadie done; ( for which he should be highly rewarded to his owne contentment ) by committing a great offence vpon little reason. Malaniffa blushe, and wept; and finally promifed to be gouerned by Scipio; whom hee nevertheleffe 10 entreated to thinke upon his faith given to Sophonisba, that the should not be delinered into the Romans power. So he departed to his owne Tent, where, after some time fpent in agonie, he called vnto him a feruant of his that had the cultodie of his povfon ( which Princes then yfed to have in readines, against all mischances that might make them vnwilling to liue:) and tempering a potion for Sophonisba, sent it vnto her with this meffage; That gladly he would have had her to live with him as his wife: but fince they who had power to hinder him of his delire, would not yeeld thereto, he fent her a cup, that should preserve her from falling alive into the handes of the Romans; willingher to remember her birth and effate, and accordingly to take order for her felfe. At the receit of this Message and Present, shee onely said, That if her Husband had no better token to fend vnto his new wife, the must accept of this; adding. That theemight have died more honourably, if thee had not wedded to lately before her Funerall. And herewithall shee boldly dranke off the poison. Thus Livie reports. But Appear varies from this; and fets it downe agreeably to that which hath beene spoken before, concerning the pracontract betweene Masaniffa and sophonisha. Hee faith, That after the taking of Syphan, Embaffadors from Circa met with Lalius and Mafaniffa vpon their way thither, yeelding vp their Citic, and the Kings Palace: and that Sophonisba, for her owne private, fent meffengers to excuse her marriage with Syphax, as made against her will, by compulsion of those in 30 whose power the was. Majaniffa readily admitted this excuse; and accepted her to wife. But when Scipio had received information from Syphax, how cunning in perfwalion Sophonisha was; and that all her thoughts laboured for the good of Carthage; he fell out about her with Maniffa at his returne; and challenged her, as a part of the bootic belonging to the Romans. Mafaniffa faid, the was his owne wife. and vnto him betrothed many yeares before. But Scipio would not heare of this: or if it were true; yet he faid it was no reason, that Mafanissa should keepe her in posfession, as long as it was disputable, vnto whom she might appertaine. Wherefore he willed him first of all to produce her, and then afterwards to make his claime vnto her; wherein he should have no wrong. Herewithall bee sent to fetch her away: 40 and Misnilla accompanied the messengers, as it were to deliver her; but making her acquainted with the necessitie, gaue vnto her a cup of poison, wherewith shee ended her life, before they came that should have apprehended her. So hee shewed unto the Romans her dead bodie; which he royally enterred. The fudden violence of Ma/anissa his love, and the readic consent of Sophonisha to marrie with him: adde not so much credit vnto this relation of Appear, as doth the want of all other euident cause ( which a Liuie notes ) of the sudden falling out betweene bim and the Carthaginians; under whom he had bin trained up, & done them great service. Howfocuer it were : Scipio, hearing of this tragical accident, lent for Majaniffa, and comforted him as well as he could; lest his melancholic should lead him to some incon- 50 uenience. Hauing thereforegently rebuked him for his rafhnesse, he brought him foorth in presence of the Armie: where extolling his noble acts, and shewing how highly he had deferued of the Citic of Rome, he proclaimed him King; and gaue vnto him a Crowne of gold, with other royall ornaments. This was indeed the readie way to dinert his thoughts from the ladde remembrance of that which was past, vnto the more cheerefull contemplation of good fortune, that beganne to fmile

This was the first time that the Romans tooke vponthem to create or proclaime a King. Which honour though Masanissa well deserved: yet would not the Title haue redounded vnto his great benefit; neither should he haue beene much beholding to them for it, if he had not by their meanes recourred possession of his Countrie, together with the greatest part of Syphax his Dominions. It seemes not vnlike-10 lie, that had he remained a Neuter in these warres, and sustained himselse with his Troupe of Horse, in such fort as hee did before the comming of the Romans; hee might neuerthelesse have recoursed his proper inheritance, by the love of his owne subjects, without other helpe, when Syphax had once or twice beene vanquished. As for the enlargement of his Kingdome, it was not more than hee deserved : neither were the Romans then in case, to make a conquest of Numidia for themselves; neither could they have wished a fitter opportunitie, than of such a man, vpon whom to beflow it that was their affured friend, and passable withall among the Numidians, as being (for the Mafafyli were a Numidian Tribe ) a great Prince of the same Nation. Yet this liberalitie of the Romans, was noy fed abroad as very glorious: and the Ro-20 mans themselues, in a politicke fort of gravitie, tooke highly vpon them; as if even their faluting him by the name of King, had been a matter of great consequence. Hee thriued indeed well after it: and by their maintenance waxed mighty in times following, encroaching vpon his neighbours on all sides; but most of all vpon the State of Carthage, whereat they were little displeased. Hence it grew that Vermina the some of syphax (of whom wee shall shortly speake more) which held some piece of his Fathers Kingdome, desiring friendship of the Romans, and promising by all meanes to deserve their love, requested therewithall, that they would call him King. But though it were fo, that neuer any before him had made this a matter of fuit : yet the Roman Senate was puntilious herein ; and answered very grauely , That 30 it was not their custome to give the honour of that appellation, saue onely vnto such Lindas. Kings, as had greatly descrued of their Citie. Thus they made it a matter of State: and in processe of time grew so proud of this their imaginarie prærogatiue, that they imputed as a lingular benefit vnto Kings, that no way depended vpon them, the falutation by b that name; though it were not accompanied with any other fauour or b. cefertain. profit thence redounding.

The Carthaginians desire Truce : and breake it.

He Carthaginians were extremely dismaied, when they heard of the great calamitie, that was befalne their good friend Syphax; and vnderflood that Ma(aniffa, the ir mortall enemie, had got possession of his Kingdome. To increase their feare, Scipio returned againe to Tunes in view of their Citie: where hee made an ende of that Fortification, which hee had begunne at his last being there. The Carthaginians had neither forces, nor courage, to withftand him . but their hearts fo failed them, that they sent forth vnto them thirtie Embassadors, Princes of the Citie, which were their 50 Prinie Councell, to make fuit for peace. These being admitted into the presence of Scipio, did not only prottrate themselves on the ground; but kissed the effect of him, b. Example? is and of those that say in Connecll with him.

and of those that sate in Councell with him. Answerable to this base adoration was their speech that followed. They con-Bbbbbb 2

fessed themselves to have vniustly broken the Peace between them and Rome; and to have deserved what soeuer punishment it should please the Romans to inflict vpon them. Yet they humbly befought Scipio and the reft, that in common regard of those misfortunes, whereto all men are subject, they would show mercie vnto the Citie of Carthage, and let it remaine, as a Monument of their elemencie; which, by the follie of her Citizens, had now twice deferued to be ouerthrowne. Herewithall they did not forget, to lay the blame vpon Hannibal: who without their appointment had begunne the warre; and was maintained in his doings by a Faction, without the good liking of the whole Citie. By this it appeares, that these Embassadors were no Barchines: but rather, that they were Hanne and the choice of his companie; 10 who had now their long defired worke in hand, of fuing vnto the Romans for peace. Whatfocuer they were, it must needes be that they were most infolent men over those that were subject vnto their power: for they would not have made such adoration vnto the Romans, in their owne necessitie; vnlesse they themselves had expected the like, where they had the advantage.

It was not vnknowne to Scipio, or to his affiftants, in what poore cafe the Citic of Rome then was ; and how vnable to defraig the charges of continuing the warre. Neither were the Carthaginians, notwithstanding the losse of so many Armies, in fuch ill cafe, as the Romans themselves had very lately beene. For they had monie enough, wherewith to wage more men: they had a Citie farre stronger than Rome; 20 and they had the Sea free. But they wanted the Roman resolution; and therefore distrusted the walls of Carthage; though Vtica, a weaker Citic, had all this while held out against Scipio, and could not yet be forced by him and his Armie, though so often victorious in the field. Scipio therefore accepted their submission, and told them. That though he came into Africk, to make a Conquest, and not a Peace: yet having the Conquest as it were in his hand, hee would not denie to grant them the Peace, which they defired; for thereby should all Nations understand, that the people of Rome did follow the rule of justice, both in making warre, and in concluding it. The conditions which he imposed upon them, were these: That they should render up vnto him all prisoners that they had taken, together with all Renegado's and fugi- 30 tiue flaues: That they should withdraw their Armies out of Italie and Gaule: That they should not meddle in Spaine, nor yet in any Iland between Italie & Africk: That they should deliuer up all their ships of warre, saue twentie; and That they should pay a great fumme of monie, with certaine hundred thousand bushels of Wheat and Barlie. To confider of these Articles, hee gaue them three dayes : and when they had approved them, he granted a Truce; that they might fend Embassadours vnto the Roman Senate.

This done, Ma(aniffa was dismissed, and went home into his Kingdome, as if the warre had beene alreadie at an end. Syphax was a little before fent with Lalius vnto Rome: where the fame of these victories filled men with joy; and gaue hope, that 40 the long endured miseries would be shortly at an end. Wherefore all the Temples were fet open, and an holy day appointed for thank sgiuing and supplication to their Gods. Lalins was accompanied with Embassadors from King Masanissa: who gratulating the happie successe of the Romans in their African Warre, and giving thanks vnto the Senate for the benefits done by Scipie vnto their Mafter, made request for the Numidians, fuch as were now his subjects and prisoners in Rome, that they might be bestowed upon him; who by rendring them to libertie, should doe an act very plaufible, that would make him gracious among his people in the beginning of his reigne. The Roman Senate were not behinde with Mafaniffa in complement: but shewing themselves to be highly pleased with all that Scipio had done, and should so doe for him; they called him King againe; released his Numidians that were captiues; and fent him two purple Caffocks, that had each of them one gold button; with fuch other Prefents, as in time of their pouerty might ferue to testifie their good will. Scarcely were thefe and Lelius gone from Rome; when the newescame, that Embassadours from Carthage were arrived to delire peace. These Embassadours were not admitted into the Citie, but were lodged without: vntill Lelius being fent for, came backe from Offia, to bee prefent when their demands were to bee heard. Then was audience given them in the Temple of Bellona; that flood in the suburbs. The errand of these Embassadours, was Peace: but the meaning of them and of their Citic, was onely to winne time, and get respite from warre; vntill Hannibal and Mage should come out of Italie, either to chace the Romans out of Africk, or to obtain peace for Carthage, by terror of their great names and Armies, vpon more easie con-10 ditions. Wherefore they made an idle discourse of the League, that was concluded betweene them and Luctatius Catulus, at the end of the former warre. This League they faid, all things well confidered, did still remaine in force: neither had there fince beene any warre at all, betweenethe people of Rome and the Carthaginians. For it was onely Hannibal, that, without any leave from Carthage, had of his owne head belieged and razed the Towne of Saguntum; and after that adventured in like fort, without Commission, to passe the Alpes, and trouble (as he had done ) the quiet of Italie. This being for their Message was none other, than to desire, that the League before spoken of, made in the time of Catulus, might hereafter stand in force; as indeed it hitherto did, and ought to doe. The Senators had cause to wonder at this 20 tale; hearing these Embassadours make (as it were) a jest of a warre, that had beene fo terrible. Wherefore they asked them a great many queltions, concerning that Peace made by Luctatius, and other passages following between the two Cities. But they excused themselves by their age: (for they were all yong men ) and said, That those things were beyond their knowledge and remembrance. Forthwith it appeared, That all was but collusion, and that they fought no other than to gaine time; untill they might repaire the warre. Wherefore they were lent home in companie of Lalius; without any conclusion at all of peace; and, in effect, without answere. This notwithstanding, we find in Polybius, That the Senate receiving advertisment except & Polyb. from Scipio, of that which had pailed betweene him and the Carthaginians in this Lis. 30 Treatie of peace, approued the conditions by him propounded; and gaue him licence thereupon, to proceede vnto conclusion. This may with good reason bee beleeued: fince it was not vnknowne, that if the warre continued, all these goodly hopes must rest vpon the most vaccrtaine issue of one battaile betweene Hannibal and Scipio: wherein if fortune should be averse to them, their forces in Africk were no better than quite loft.

Matters thus hanging in suspence, before the Carthaginian Embassadours came backe from Rome: a Fleet out of Sicil, wherein were two hundred ships of burden, and thirtie Gallies, being bound for Africk to victualle the Roman Campe, was ouertaken by foule weather at Sea; and hardly escaping wracke, was dispersed, and dri-40 uen aground in diners parts of the Bay of Carthage, euen in view, and under command of the Citie. There was at that time, as we finde in Appian, and may gather Aoo, de bello out of Polybius, a great dearth of victuails in Carthage: which caused the people to Punico. crie out vpon their Magistrates, that they should not let such a bootic escape them; faying that the danger of famine was greater and worse, than of breaking Truce. Whether it were so that hunger vrged them, or that they yeelded to their owne greedie desires: the multitude in Carthage understood (as it seemes) that all this discourse of peace in hand, was no better than meere mockerie; and therefore cared not for observation of particular points, when they meant deceit in the whole. It was excerpt & Polyto the manner in Carshage, as likewise in Alexandria, for all the Rascalitie, together with Lis. to women and boyes, to be medling in vprores: the clamours of the boyes being in fuch tumults no leffe violent, than of the men. Wherefore it is no maruaile, if little regard were had of reason, or of honour, in any such commotion. A Fleet was sent out vnder Afdrubal, to gather vp the dispersed Roman ships of burden ( for the Gallies, by force of Oares, recouered the station whereto their Campe adioyned) and Bbbbbb 3 bring them into Carthage : which was done. Scipio was hereat much offended : not only for the loffe, and for that the Towne was thereby releeved; but for that by this breach of truce, he forefaw the intention of the Carthaginians to renew the war. and put him to more trouble. Wherefore he sent Embassadours vnto them : both to require fatisfaction for the injurie done; and to deterre them from entertaining any other hope, than in the peace which they had so much desired. These gauethe Cartinginians to vndersland, That Letters were come from Rome vnto Scipio, with allowance to conclude the peace; upon those conditions which hee had propounded. But (faid they ) we hold it //range, That yee, who fo lately have cast your selves to the ground before vs, and killed our feet, after an unufuall manner of humilitie, confessing your 10 Selves to have perficiently broken the league that was betweene vs, and thereby to have deferued such punishment as is due unto Rebels; should so soone forget what yee then uttered, and runne headlong againeinto the same crimes, for which yee acknowledged your selues worthie to be destroyed having only recourse unto our mercie. We are not ignorant, that it is the confidence which ye repose in HANNIBAL that thus emboldens you. Tes were it not amisse. that yee should consider, how long bee bath beene pent up in a corner of Italie, among the Brutians: where he is in a manner befieged, and unable to stirre: fo that yee are like to finde his below wanting in your greatest need. Or let it bee supposed, that he were now in Africke. and readie to give us bat taile; yet should it well agree with your wis dome, to doubt what might befall, remembring that he is a man and not insincible. Now if it should happen that he were 20 ouercome; what refuze have yee left unto your felues against hereafter? What gods will yee either sweare by, to bee beleeved, or call upon in your miserie? What wordes, and lamentable gesture will yee hence foorth wse, to move compassion? Surely yee have alreadie wa-Ited all your forces of persuation, and shall not againe deceive us, if ye resuse the grace whereof at the present ye are capable. It is no maruell though the Carthaginians were angrie, when they heard themselues vpbraided with the base demeanour of their Embasfadours. For it was not the general opinion of the Citie, that the Truce was broken by themselves: though it had pleased Hanno, or such as were of his faction, to gratifie the Romans with all manner of submission; and to renounce not onely their hope of the future, but all inftification of matters past. And indeed it seemes, that 30 the Roman Embassadours were very much delighted, in the rehearfall of that point which was Jeelded vnto them; as knowing that thereon depended the justice of the quarrell. But the Carthaginians tooke this in so ill part, that hardly they could refraine from doing violence vnto the men, who had vsed vnto them such insolent speeches. Yet the furic of the multitude was in some fort appealed; either by Hanno, whom Appian (I know not why) calls Hanno the great; or by the very reucrence, due unto the place of those that had uttered such liberall words. So they were dismissed in friendly fort, though it were without answere to their Proposition. There were allo two Galies appointed for their fafe Conuoy home; though with little intent of good vnto their persons. As drubal was then in the mid-way, as men sailed from 40 Carthige towards Vica. Hee, whether onely desirous to please the Multitude, of whose disposition he was informed, or whether directed by publike order, to cut off these Embassadours in their way homeward: lay waiting for them behinde a Cape. that was a little beyond the mouth of the River Bagradae. Their Convoy hauing brought them on the way, as farre as to the mouth of Bagradas, withed them a good Voyage; and so tooke leave of them, as if they had beene then in safety; fince the Roman Campe was even in fight. The Embassadours tooke this in ill part: not as fearing any danger toward; but thinking themselves too much neglected. foralmuch as their attendants did so abruptly leave them. But no sooner had they doubled the Cape, than Afdrubal fell vpon them in such manner, as they might well 50 discerne his purpose; which was to have stemmed them. I hey rowed hard therefore: and being in a Quinquereme, that had more bankes of Oares, than had any Gallie of Aldrubal; they flipt away, and made him ouer-shoot himselfe. Yet he gaue them chace; and had well-neare surprised them. But they discouered some Roman Companies on the shore over against them, and therefore adventured to run their vessell aground: whereby they saved their owne lives; though a great part of their companie were slune, or hurt. This practice of the Carthagmann was inexcusable; and for the same cause perhaps were the Citizens heartned in such a dishonourable attempt, by those that were desirous to continue the warre; that thereby they might be driven to studie nothing else, than how to get the victorie, as having none other hope remaining. Yet likely it is, that the same scare, which had caused them to make such carried suit for peace, would also have caused them to be better adulted, than thus to abandon all hope of Treatie; had they not been given to vn-10 deritand, that Hannibal was alreadic landed in Africk, in whom they reposed no small considence; but verily perswaded themselves, that he would change their fortune, and teach the Romans to hold themselves contented with more easile conditions, than were those that Sepie, in the pride of his fortune, had of sate propounded.

In what fort HANNIBAL (pentibe time after the battaile of Metaurus. The doings of MAGO in Italie. HANNIBAL and MAGO calledout of Italie. How the Romans were duserly affected by HANNI-BALS departure.

Ver fince the loffe of that battaile at Otteturus, Hannibal remained in the Countrey of the Brutians; waiting for another supplie from Carthage. The Roman Confuls that succeeded vnto Clau ins and Linus, by whom Afarbal was ouercome and slaine, were contented to bee quite all their yeare. Neither did Licinius the Colleague of Scipio ought worthe of remembrance against Hannibal: being hindred by the pestilence that was in his Armic. Sempronus the Conful who followed Licinius, and Cn. Seron situs Capio, who followed Sempronus, were carnelly bent to have done somewhat: but their diligence was in a manner fruitesse. In some skirmishes with Hannibal, but their diligence was in a manner truttette. In tome skirmlines with Hamnous, they had the better; in fome, the worfe; and a few poore Townes they got from him, as it were by itealth, his care being more to preferue his Armie, than to keepe those places that were weake.

The Romans had at this time so many great pieces of worke in hand, that their chiefe enemie was become, not the chiefe part of their care. Their thoughts were mainly bent yon Africk, wherin they were at no standard manages to maintaine the Armic, which (as was hoped) should bring the warret oa short and happie conclusion. They shood neuerthelesse in much scare of Mago, the brother of Hamibal: who tooke exceeding paine among the Ligavians and Saulestoraise an Armie, wherewith to kindle anew the warre in Italie, that beganne to waxe colde. Assign solicited alforthe Harvarians; and sound them so readie to stirre in his behalfe, that if he could haue entred their Country strong; traight haue proued no lesse needfull for Saipie to returne home out of Africk, than shortly it was for Hamibal, to make speed vnto the defence of Carthage. The sedangers caused the Romansto employ one of their Confusior Proconsuls, with an Armie, among the Herrarians; another among the Gauler; and a third among the Ligavians: for samuch as it was vncertaine, vpon which side Mago would breake out. Being thus busseled, it is no wonder though they forbore to our charge Hamnbal with any great power.

On As for Mago; when things were in some readines for his setting forwards, he met in the Countrie of the Inflatians, which is about CMilan, with M. Cornelius the Roman Proconsul, and P. Quintilius Yarus one of the Praxors. With these hee sought a battaile, wherein though his vertue shewed it selfe worthie of his stather and brethren; yet his sortune was Carthaginian. The sightcontinued a long while doubt-full; in such fort that the Roman Commanders began to distrust the iffue. Wherefore Quintilius the Prætor, taking vnto him all the Roman Horfe, thought to have haken the Enemies to peeces. The Legions at the fame time gave a loud shout; and strained themselues hard; as if at that brunt the victorie should have beene carried before them. But Mago opposed his Elephants to the Horse : the service of those bealts being fitter for such vse, than against the Squadrons of Foot. The figure, sent, and braying of these Elephants, did so affright the Horse, that they started aside, and were scattered ouer the field; their Riders being vnable to mannage them. Hereby the Numidians got advantage vpon them: whose manner of fight was more availeable against those that were loose, than against the Troups that were close and thick. 10 Then fel the Elephants upon the Legions: which entertained them after the accustomed manner, with a showre of darts, and killed foure of them; causing all the rest to giue backe. This not with standing, the same Legions were so vehemently pressed by the Enemie; that more for shame of running away, than by any great force to make refistance, they held their ground. The Proconful therefore brought up those forces, which he had kept vnto the last, to succour where need should most require. Against these Mago employed some of his Gsules, whom hee had in readinesse for the like occasion. But these Gaules discharged their parts very ill. They were soone beaten off; and recoiled so hastily, that they brought feare vpon all the rest. When Mago faw that his men beganne to fhrinke, Hee put himfelfe in the head of his 20 Armie; and held them so well to it, that keeping their order, they made a faire Retrait, with their faces toward the Enemie. But at length he received a grienous wound in his thigh; whereof shortly after hee dyed. He was taken vp, and carried out of danger by some of his owne men: the rest of them, after little further resistance, prouided every one for himselfe: So the Romans obtained victorie, not without great cost; as purchasing the death of about fine thousand enemies, with the loffe of two thousand and three hundred of the Prætors Armie, besides those that dved of the Proconfuls Legions; also belides divers Colonells, Captaines, and Gentlemen of marke, that fell in this hote peece of feruice. Neither were there any prisoners taken; whereby it may seeme that the Enemies did not fall to rout, be- 20 fore they had recovered some ground that might affure them from pursuit. How euer it were, this victorie would have much imported for the affurance of Italie, if the State of Carthage could longer have permitted these valiant somes of Amilear to abide therein. But Mago with-drawing himfelfe (by caffe journies, because of his wound) into Liguria, found there Embassadours from Carthage attending him: who gaue him to understand the pleasure of their Citie, which was, That both he and Hannibal should presently repaire home with all their forces; not staying any longer to thinke vpon the conquest of Italie, fince Carthageit selfe was readie to bee log. He obeyed this Commandement, and embarqued shortly his Armic; but dyed of his wound about Sardinia, in the way homewards.

About the same time Hannibal received the like command from Carthage to returne into Africk. He heard it with great imparience; gnashing his teeth, and groining and hardly keeping in the teares, that were readie to burth out, whilest the Embassaddurs were delivering their errand. When their message was done; Hee told them, That this was yet plaine dealing. For, said He, They that now direstly bit ince some home, hand long agee done their best to hale mee out of italies through more closely and crookedly they went to worke, by slopping the supply; that should have enabled mee to mannage these went to worke, by slopping the supply; that should have enabled mee to mannage these was to work to be track to be the start of the start of the start of the start of a start of the star take he flew; not sparing those that fled into the Temple of Iuno Lacinia, which had been held an inviolable Sanctuarie vnto that day. He was indeed then wholly transported with rage; and departed out of Italie no less passioned; than men are wont to bee, when they leaue their owne Countries to goe into exile. Hee looked backe vnto the shore: accusing both gods and men; and cursing his owne dulnesse, in that he had not led his Armie from Canna, hotte and blouded as it was, directly unto the wals of Rome. With such vexation of spirit Hee quitted the possession of Italie; wherein he had lived almost halle his time.

wherein he had lived almost halfe his time. If it could have beene foretold vnto the Romans, in the first beginning of this war, with what exceeding joy in times following they should entertaine the newes of Hannibal his departure out of Italie: they would (I thinke) leffe earnestly have preffed the Carthaginians to fend him over thither. When fure advertisement was brought vnto the Citie, that Hannibal was gone with all his Armie: an Holiday was appointed for thankigining vnto their gods; and extraordinarie great facrifices publikely made, for joy of fuch happic tidings. Yet old Q. Fabius was of opinion, That the danger did still remaine the same, though the place were changed: for that Hannibal, at his comming into Africk, would finde P. Scipio other manner of worke, than he had beene troubled with at any time before; and would doe greater matters in his owne Countrie, than euer he was able to performe abroad in a land of strangers. 20 The remove of the warre from their owne dores, and the conceit of that victorie for which they hoped; was enough to make them prefume further, than at other times they would have done. When therefore the Saguntine Embassadors brought vnto them a great maffe of Golde and Silver, together with some Agents of the Carthaginians taken by them in Spaine: onely the Carthaginian prisoners were accepted; the treasure was rendred backe vnto the Saguntines that had surprised it. Vpon like confidence of the future, a little before this, order was taken for the repayment of those monies, that had beene borrowed in time of more necessitie from private nies, that for want eyther of meanes, or of good will, had refused to giue aid to the 30 Romans. They were commanded, and enforced, to giue double the number of Foot to that which they had beene wont to fer out for the warres, with a proportion of Horse answerable to the verie most of their abilitie. So consident were the Romans growne (though their wealth were not as yet sucable to the greatnesse of their spirit) youn the good successe of the Batraile at Metanin; and the hopes which they reposed in Scipio. All this notwithstanding, when they considered more necrely of that which might happen; and were informed, that the terrible Armie, whereof table had beene sew dayes since discharged, was landed safe in Africk; they began to revolue a thousand fearefull natters in their heads, and to stand in doubt, less Q. Fabins (who died about the same time) would bee tound at trie. Prophet. For be-40 thinking themselves of that which might comfort them in their hopes; they sound

men. Hence also proceeded the seuere chastisement, laid vpon those twelue Colo-

40 thinking themselues of that which might comfort them in their dopes; they Young in the victories againft Syphax and Afarubaln Opecialities of lich great worth, as might promise the like successed against another manner of Generall, followed by other manner ofmen, than were either of those two. The Namidian King had beene wont to bring into the sield a rascall multitude of halfe-scullions, that were good for nothing; being himselfe a sit Captaine for such solutions. Likewise Assault the solutions of Office, was a Commander well thought of by the Carthaginian Senate; but otherwise one, that in the field was onely good at sating himselfels by a swift retrait. But now there came an Armie ofmen, hardened from their child-hood with incredible patience, stefaed many hundred times in Roman bloud, so and wearing the spoiles not onely of good solutions, but of brave Captaines, by so and wearing the spoiles not onely of good souldiors, but of brane Captaines, by them saine. Such talke vied the people of Rome, saying, That Scipio was like to meet in battaile, with many that had slaine Roman Practors, yea and Consuls, with their owne hands; with many, that had beene first in getting ouer the Trenches of severall Roman Campes, or in winning the tops of wals at the siege of Townes; briefly, that he should now bee opposed by an Armie, as good as had euer serued in watre, and following the dreadfull Name of Hannibal.

d. XXI.

HANNIBAL in Africk prepares to fight with Scipios treates with him about peace in vaine; loofeth a battaile at Nadagara, and perswades the Carthaginians to sue for peace. Of the peace granted from Rome to Carthage.

ANNIBAL disembarqued his Armic at Leptis, almost an hundred miles from Carthage, Ealtward from the Headland of Mercurie, and fomewhat more than one degree to the South. He was ill prouided of Horse, which it was not easie for him to transport out of Italie. Therefore it behoued him to land, as he did, somewhat farre from the Ene-

mic ; that hee might furnish himselfe with this and the like needfull helpes, against the day of battaile. From Leptis he passed on to Adrumetum, and so along through the In land Countrie; gathering friends unto him by the way. Tycheus a Numidian Prince, and familiar friend of Syphax, was said to haue in those dayes the best Hor- 20 ses of service, that were to be found in Africk. Him therefore did Hannibal allure vnto his partie : making him understand, that if the Romans got the victorie, it should bee casie for Masanissa, by their countenance and helpe to oppresse both him, and as many other of the neighbour Princes as hindred his prospect. This Argument, and the same of him that vsed it, prevailed with Tycheus; who shortly after brought vnto the Carthaginian two thousand Horse. Appian further addes, That Mezetallus, (the same who had made himselfe Protectour ouer Masaniffa his Cousins; and was Head of a Family, and adverse to the Numidian Kings of that race) brought vnto Hannibal another thousand Horse: as likewise that Vermina the sonne of Syphax, holding a great part of his Fathers Kingdome, began at the same time to affaile the 30 places that yeelded obedience to Masanissa. This Vermina, as we finde in Linie, came with more than fixteene thousand men (for he lost more than so manie) to succour Hannibal when it was too late.

The Carthaginians were at this time in such hard estate, or (at least) so impatient of the flate wherein they were; that they could not attend the leifure of those preparations, which would have made the victorie affured. When they confidered the worth of Hannibal, and the greatnesse of his Acts: it offended them to thinke, that they had beene so base, as to make humble suit vnto the Romans for Peace; whilest they had such a braue Champion aliue, to maintaine their cause by warre. But when they bethought themselves of their owne sufferings, which, for want of 40 Roman magnanimitie to endure them, appeared greater than indeede they were: then cried they out carnellly, that it was no time to linger, but presently to fight; that so they might see an end of these troubles, either good or bad. And to this purpose, they sent their Mandates to Hannibal: requiring him, without any further protraction, to doe what he could doe out of hand. Hannibal made answere, That they were his good Lords, and had power to dispose of him and his Armie: but since he was Generall of their forces, He thought it reasonable, that they should suffer him to doe as a Generall ought to doe; and to choose his owne times. Neuerthelesse, to giue them satisfaction, Hee made great marches to Zama; and there encamped.

The breach of Truce, made by the Carthaginians: The violence, done to his 50 Embassadours: and the newes of Hannibal his being landed in Africk; made Scipio to vnderstand the resolution of the Carthaginians, which was, not to yeeld vnto any conditions unprofitable for themselves, as long as they were able to make relistance. Wherefore hee fent vnto Masanissa and informed him of all that was fallen out;

praying him to come away with speed, and lay all other businesse a-part. Ten Roman Companies, of Horse and Foot together, Mafanissa had with him , that were lent vnto him by Scipio, to doe him service in the establishing and cularging of his Kingdome. But he well understood, that tho fe and many more belides all his owne forces would little availe him; if Hannibal should drive the Romans out of Africk. Whereforetaking such order as hee could vpon the sudden, for the safetic of his owne Kingdome; with fourethousand Horse, and fixe thousand Foot, hee made all haste vnto Scipio.

Soone after the beginning of these new troubles, the Carthaginian Embassadours 10 that had beene at Rome, returned backe under the conduct of Leitus and Fulusus: who brought them fafe into the Roman Campe. There when they arrived, and understood what had lately passed, especially how their Citizens had behaued themfelues towards the Roman Emballadours: they made little doubt, how their owne heads should answere for such notorious outrage. To confirme them in this

M. Bebius one of the late Embassadours that had beene in Carthage, being left by Scipio to take charge of the Campe, laid hands upon them, and detained them; fending word vnto his Generall, who was gone abroad to make warre in the Countrie, that he had them in his power, and that now the Carthagimans might bee repaid in 20 their owne Coyne, for the injurie by them lately done. Scipio was very glad to heare of this; and commanded Babius to vie them with all possible courtelle, and fend them safe home. By thus doing He brake the hearts of his Enemies; and caufed them to acknowledge themselves, (which was a great victorie) farre leffe honourable than the Romans. This not with handing, He made more cruell warre vpou them than before: taking their Townes by force; and putting them to facke, without hearkning to any Composition. It was the manner of the Romans, as often as they tooke a Towne by aliault, to putall that came in their way to the fword, whatfoeuer they were, without regard. This they did, to make themselues terrible: and the better to worke such impression in the mindes of those, with whom they 30 had to doe, they vsed oftentimes to kill the very Dogges and other Beasts, that ranne Except & Palph athwart them in the streets; hewing their bodies afunder, as men delighted in shedding of bloud. This being their practife at other times; it is likely, that now they omitted no pecce of crueltie; when they meant to give proofe of their vehement indignation, and reuengefull mindes, for the injuries received. Hence it partly grew, that the Carthaginians were so carnett in pressing Hannibal to fight. Hannibal being encamped at Zama, sent foorth his Scowts and Spies, to discouer where the Romans lay; what they were doing; and as much as might be of their demeanour. Some of these were taken, and brought vnto Scipio: who in Head of trusfing them vp, gaue them free leaue to view his Campe at pleasure; appointing one

40 to conduct them vp and downe, and show them what socuer they delited. This done, He gaue them libertie to depart; and fent them away fafe vnto their Generall. Hannibal vnderstanding this, admired the braueric and courage of his Enemie: with whom on the sudden he grew desirous to haue an Enter-view, and personall conference; and fignified so much vnto him, by a messenger sent of purpose. Of this motion the Roman liked well: and returned answere, that Hee would meet him shortly in place convenient. The next day Mafaniffa came with his Armie: whom Scipio taking with him, remoued vnto a Towne called Nadagara; neare vnto which hee fat downe, in a place otherwise commodious, and close by a water that might opportunely serue his Campe. Thence he sent word vnto the Carthaginian, That the time 50 and place did fitly ferue, if He had ought to fay to him. Hannibal thereupon remoued from Zama, and came within foure miles of the Enemie: where hee encamped well to his owne good liking in all things else; excepting that his men were driven to take much paines, in fetching their water somewhat farre off. Then was order taken for their meeting: and the two Generals, each of them with a troupe of Horse, rode foorth of their Campes, till they came vnto a pecce of ground; which was before well fearched, for feare of ambush. There they will their followers to fland off: and themselues, with each of them one Interpreter, encountred each other in the mid-way betweene their Companies. They remained a while filent. viewing one the other with mutuall admiration. Then beganne the Carthaginian, faluting the Roman, to deliuer his minde to this effect: That it had beene better both for Carthage and for Rome, if they could have limited and contained their ambition within the shores of Africke and of Italie; for that the Countries of Sicil and of Spaine, about which their fathers and themselves had striven, were no sufficient recompence for so many Fleets as had beene lost, and of so much bloud as had beene to shed, in making those costly purchases. But since things past could not bee recalled: He faid, That it was meet for them to consider, vnto what extreme dangers their owne Cities had beene exposed, by the greedie desire of extending their Empires abroad; and that it was even time for them now at length, to make an end of their obstinate contention, and pray the gods to endue them with greater wisedome hereafter. And to such peaceable disposition He affirmed that his owne yeares, and long triall of Fortune both good and euill, had made him inclinable. But much he feared, that Scipio, by want of the like experience might rather fixe his minde vpon vncertaine hopes, than vpon the contemplation of that mutabilitie, whereto all humane affaires are subject. Tet ( said He ) mine owne example may peraduenture suffice to 20 teach thee moderation. For I am that Same HANNIBAL, who after my victorie at Canna wanne the greatest part of Italie: and deuised with my selfe, what I should doe with your Citie of Rome; which I hoped verily to have taken. Once I brought mine Armie to your walles, as thou hast since brought thine to ours of Carthage: but now, see the change! I stand here entreating thee to grant vs peace. This may serue as a document of Fortunes instabilitie. I fought with thy Father , Scipio: Hee wa the first of the Roman Generals, that ever met mee in the field. I did then little thinke; that the time would come, that I (hould have fuch businesse, as now at the present, with his sonne. But this is even one of Fortunes Pageants. whereof shee hath many: And thou maist have experience of the like in thy selfe, who knowes how soone? Thinke upon M. ATILIVS. If hee would have hearkened unto such 20 persuasions, as Inow ve to thee; hee might have returned home to Rome an happy man. And so mailt thou doe now, if any reasonable offer will give thee satisfaction. How saist thou? Canst thou be contented, that all Spaine, Sicil, Sardinia, and what soeuer Hands else are situate betweene Italic and Africk, be abandoned by the Carthaginians for ever; and left unto the Romans, to beare Dominion therein? Thou shalt have glorie enough by effecting thus much : and the Romans may well be glad of fuch a bargaine. As for vs : our owne quiet fall henceforth quie vs contentment. And the fame contentment of ours, shall make vs fatthfully observe the Peace with you. But if thou thinkest all toolittle, I must desire thee to ponder well how great an hazzard thou must undergoe, for the obtaining of avery little more, than that which thou mail have without contention. It is now in thing owne power, to lay holde upon 40 good Fortune, if it please thee: say but till to morrow night and thou must take such fortune, as it shall please the gods. The issue of battaile is uncertaine, and many times beguileth expectation. Men and steele we shall each of us bring into the field : but of the victory, neither of vs hath assurance. Let vs therefore without more adoe, make peace. And doe not tell me. that some falle-hearted Citizens of ours dealt fraudulently of latein the like Treatie: It is I HAMNIBAL that now defire peace with thee which I would never doe, if I thought it not expedient for my Countrie. And thinking it expedient, I will alwayes maintaine it: like as I have maintained onto my power, as long as the gods did not envie mee, the Warre by me begunne. Hereunto Scipio made answere, That it was no ambitious desire of ruling in Sicil and in Spaine, which had mooued the Romans to enter into this or the former 50 Warre: but that the defence of the Mamertines, and afterwards of the Saguntines, their confederates, had caused them to put on those armes; which the gods by the final liffue of the Warres had approved, and would approve to bee most just. As for the mutabilitie of Fortune: he faid, that he was not thereofignorant; and that without any note of infolence, or ouer-weening, he might well refuse the conditions offered. For was it not plaine, that all thefe Countries, with which the Carthaginians now fo willingly departed, were alreadie wonne from them by the Romans? If, faid He; thefe Conditions had beene propounded whileft as yet yee detained some part of Italie, they might peradventure not have beene rejected. But as the case now stands, I see no reason, why I should remit unto you any one peece of those my former demands; to which the Carthaginians have veelded alreadie, and thought mee to deale graciously in being jo moderate. Rather I fay, that the inturies which they have done me fince, have made them unworth eo; obtaining peace vpon fo friendly termes. But I cannot blame thee, HANNIBAL, though thou wouldest be 10 glad to make thy Citizens understand, from how much of their burden they are by thy meanes ealed. Onely thou must thinke, that in tike fort it concernes me in honour, not to let them be eainers or fauers by the wrongs which they have done of late. Thou knowest well that befides those offers which thou here hast made, they were well contented to restore unto vs ran-Some-free all prisoners that they have of ours; to pay us pue thousand Talents; to deliver up their Callies : and to deliner hoftages for affurance of faire dealing. And must they now be discharged of all this, by their breach of Truce; their spoiling of our Fleet; and their violating our Embassadours & Not so. But if they can be contented, besides all this, to make such amends as I shall require, for these injuries newly done : then will I take aduice with my Councell what answere to give you; otherwise, you may even prepare for warre, and blame your

20 owne solves, for that I have denied you peace. Hereupon they brake off: and returned each to his owne Campe, with no other newes than warre; bidding their Souldiers prepare for a battaile, wherein should be decided the quarrell betweene Rome and Carthage. The next morning at breake of day they iffued into the field: a notable Match, and fuch as hath very feldome beene found; whether we regard the Generals; their Armies; the two Cities that contended; or the great importance of the battaile at hand. Scipio ordered his men after the Roman manner: placing first the Haftaty, divided into their Maniples, or small Battalions, with a reasonable distance betweene them: Not farre behind these followed the Principes, likewise divided; and so after them the Triarij. But herein 3 o Scipia altered a little the ordinarie custome of the Romans: He placed not the Maniples of his Principes opposite vnto the void spaces betweene the Hastaty, that so the Hattaty, as was viuall, might tall backe betweene the Principes; but hee placed them directly one behind another, as it were, in File. This Hee did because of the Elephants; whereof Hannibal had many. For of those beasts the danger was lesse, whilest there was open way to let them through. Therefore hee tooke fuch order, that when they had passed through the spaces betweene the first Battalions, they should not come vpon the Principes in Front . Vnto his Velites or those of the light armature, that were to beginne the fight, Hee gane direction, that when they found themselves over charged, eyther by the Enemies, or (which was most to bee sea-40 red) by the Elephants, they should runne backethrough those lanes that were betweene the Maniples; and that those which were swiftest, or otherwise bestable, should continue on their flight, vntill they were got behind all their owne Armie; thereby leaving roome enough vinto those that were wounded, or cast behinde, to faue themselues on the word ground, that was betwixt the first and second, or the fecond and third Battailes, without cloying up the way betweene the Maniples, forcible. He bade them remember what they had atchieved, fince their comming sointo Africke. He told them, That if this day were theirs, the warre was at an end: and that their victorie in this warre, thould make them Lords of all the World; for that afterwards, none would be found able to relift them. On the contrary; if they were beaten, he asked them whither they would fly. They were farre from home, yea and farre from their owne flanding Campe : neyther was there any place in which he defired to keepe open. His Italian Horschee placed in the left wing vnder

C. Lalius. In the right wing was Mafaniffa with his Namidians. He himlelfe riding

vp and downe, exhorted his men todoe valiantly; vling words not many, but verie

Africk, that would give them shelter; if they sell into the Carthaginians hands, they knew what to expect. And therefore there was none other way, but Death or Victory vollesse they would live like wretched saues wider most mercilesse Emmies. In such necessitie, he said, that they which consider themselves to be, and take resolution answerable thereunto, have never beenek nowne to faile of getting victory.

Hannibal on the other fide placed his Elephants, that were more than fourescore. in Front of his Battaile. Next behind these, he made his Vantguard all of Mercinaries, Ligurians, Gaules, Baleares, and Moores. Then followed his Battaile: which was of Carthaginians and Africans, more interessed in the quarrell than were those Mercinaries; though not fo good fouldiers: but to helpe (if it might be) their want 10 of courage, they had with them foure thousand Macedonians, lately fent from King Philip. More than the space of a furlong behind these came his Rereward, consisting of those braue Souldiers which had served him in his Italian warres; and were the onely men, in whom he reposed any confidence. Opposite to Lalius, in his owner right wing he bestowed the Carthaginian Horse. Tycheus and the Numidians he placed in his left wing against Masanilla. He was indeede farre too weake for the Enemie in Horse, both in number and in goodnesse. For Tychans and Mezetullus had no more than three thousand; and those not so well exercised, as were the source thouland of Masanisa. The Carthaginians also were no more, nor none other than fuch as could be levied in the hafte of a few dayes; and the remainder of those, that 20 had of late beene often vanquished, and accustomed to fly. But it was no time for Hannibal, neyther had hee perhaps authoritie, to make these his companions alight and serue on foote, setting better men in their saddles. All that he could have done, was to flay a little longer, and expect more helpe. Had Vermina the sonne of Syphae come thither, as he did in few dayes after, with fixteene thouland and vowards, the most of them Horse: the advantage of number might have served well to supply all other defect . Yet fince the Lords of Carthage would brooke no delay: Hannibal must be faine to comfort himselfe, with the hope that hee reposed in his old Italian Souldiers; whose vertue had wrought preater wonders, when it was more frongly opposed. He encouraged therefore his men, with words agreeable to their severall 30 conditions; promiting vnto the Mercinaries bountifull rewards; threatning the Carthaginians with ineuitable feruitude, if they loft that day; but especially animating his old fellow-fouldiers, by the thany victories which they had obtained against farre greater numbers. He bade them to looke vpon the Enemies; and make an estimate, whether they were any thing like so many, as that huge Armie which they had flaughtered at Canna. He willed them to remember, That it was one P. Scipio, even the father of this man, whom they had first of all compelled to runne away. He told them, that these Legions which they yonder beheld, were, for the most part of them, the very work of the Romane Souldiers; even fuch, as for their daftardly flight out of fundry battailes, could no longer be trufted to beare Armes in their owne 40 Countrie. As for the rest: they were your men, the sonnes of Cowards, and bred vp in the continual feare of those weapons, by which their fathers were daily slaine or chaced. Wherefore he entreated these his old companions, upon whose vertue he meant wholly to repose himselfe, that they would this day striue to make good their honour; and to purchase the same of menangincible

Such exhortations vied the two Generalisabefore the fight. When they drew neare together this Numidian: Horfemen on hopelisides beganne to skirmish. The Trumpets, and other infruments of warre, sounded to battaile: and Hannibid commanded his Elephants to breake who the Rammet. Afthele Elephants (as they were alwayes an uncertaine kinde of helps) those that shoot neere unto the point of 50 the left wing, turned backe fonfeine: and kanne, upon their owne. Numidian Horfe; which they aftrighted and displaced. Assignified phing this gaue charge upon the fame Numidian; and not suffering them to strily shem falues; drave them quite out of the field. The reft of these beats made aggress spoile of the Roman Felixes, whom they followed into the spaces betweene the Maniples: but without any harme to the Battalions themselues; which gaue them open way, accordingly as Sciipio had well prouided. Diuers of them receiuing many wounds, and growing therewith furious, could no longer be gouerned: but ranne backe ypon the right point of their owne battaile, and beyond that into the open field. Herewithall they disordered the Carthaginian Horse which were in that wing: against whom they gaue to Lalius the same advantage, that Majaniff abad against the Numidians; which hee vied in like fort. In the meane while, the Battels of soctaduanced, and drew neere together with a flow and stately pace, till they were almost within a wapons caltar what to time they gaue a shout, and ranne one at the other. The Mercinaries for a time see.

10 time they gaue a shout, and ranne one at the other. The Mercinaries for a time seemed both in audacitie, and in quicknesse, to have the better of the Romanes; wounding many, and doing more harme, than they tooke. But the Romanes; wounding many, and doing more harme, than they tooke. But the Romane discipline after a while, preuailed against the boisterous violence of these vntrained Barbarians. Whereunto it helped not a little, that the battell of the Principes, following somewhat neere after the Histary, encouraged their fellowes; and shewed themselues readie, if neede were, to relieue them. Contrariwise, the Mercinaries received no manner of helpe or constort, from those that should have seconded them. For the new-leuied Carthaginass and Assistance, when they saw their hired souldiers give backe, did also themselues retrieved: This caused the Ligarians, Saules, and the rest, to thinke themselues betrayed: whereupon they inclined wnto slight. The Carthaginian Batternians.

to themselues betrayed: whereupon they inclined with olight. The Carthagiman Battaile was herewith more terrified than before, so as it refused to giue way wrote the Mercinaries for their safe retrait; and yet withall torbore to make head against the Enemies, that pursued them. It was no time to aske them what they meant by this: Feare and Indignation caused those that were at once chaced by the Romanes, and betrayed, as they thought, by their owne fellowes, to turne their Armes with an heedlesse furie against both the one and the other. Thus were many of the Carthaginians beaten downe and slaine, through their owne indiscretion, by their owne Mercinaries. The Romane Haitay in like fort, sighting with desperate men in a throng, had their hands so full of works; that the Principes were laine to come up

30 vnto them, and helpe to ouer-beare this great medley of enemies, that were together by the eares among themfelues. In this place was made a great flaughter, both of the Mercinaries and of the Carthaginians: which bindering one another could neither fight, not eafly flie. Such of them as efcaped, ranne towards Hannelait who kept his ground, and would not fittre one foote, to helpe or faue thefe Runne-awaies. He caufed his men to bend their Pikes at those of his owne fide, that would haue rushed vpon him: whom hee thereby compelled to turne asside beyond his Battaile, and faue themfelues in the open field. The ground, ouer which the Romanes were now to march, ere they could meete with Hannibal, was coured with such thicke heapes of dead bodies and weapons, and so slipper y with bloud: that Seipio beganto stand 40 in great doubt, left the orders of his Battalions should be dissoluted in passing that

40 in great doubt, left the orders of his Battalions should be dislosted in pathing that way. In such case, if he should fight with that warlike Armie, which he saw before him, remayning yet entire, and without seare expecting him; He might be well assured to receive a notable overthrow. Hee caused therefore the Hasitary to make a stand there where they were, opposite vinto the maine battaile of the Hannibalians. Then drawing up his Principes and Triary: Hee placed them, when they had overcome the bad way, all in one Front with the Hasitary, and made of them his two Cornets. This done, he advanced towards Hannibal: who entertained him after another manner, than over he had been received in his life before. All the dayes worke till now, seemed to have been only a matter of pattines; in regard of the sharpe to Consilie, that was maintained between ethe sentable Souldiers. The Romanes were

5 Conflict, that was maintained betweene the fenotable Souldiers. I he Romanes were encouraged, by their hauing preuaited all the day before: They were allo fairre the more in number. But the fe old Souldiers of Hammbul were frells; and (perhaps) the better men. They fought with fuch oblinate resolution, that no man gaue backe one foote; but rather chose to die vpon the ground, whereon he stood. So that, after the content of the stood of the stood.

ter a long time, it was uncertaine which part had the worfe: valeffe it may feeme, that the Romanes were beginning to shrinke; for as much as the returne of Majanifla and Lelius from pursuit of the Enemies Horse, is said to have beene most happie and in a needfull time. These vpon the sudden charged the Hannibalians in Rere; and ouerbearing them by meere violence, compelled them to fall to Rout.

In this Battaile there dyed of the Romanes fifteene hundred and vowards; on the Carthagmian fide, aboue twentie thousand, besides as many that were taken; of whom, Sopater Captaine of the Macedonians was one. The lingular skill that Hannibal shewed in this his last fight, is highly commended by Polybius; and was acknowledged, as Liuie reports, by Scipio himfelfe. But the Enemies were too firong to for him in Horle: and being enjoyned, as hee was, by the State of Carthage to take battaile with fuch disaduantage, he could worke no maruels. He saued himselfe with a few Horle; and flayed not in his journey, till he came to Adrumetum. Thence was he fent for to Carthage; from which he had beene ablent fixe and thirtie yeares. At his comming into the Senate He faid plainly, That there was none other way left. than to take such peace as could be gotten. Wherefore the Carthaginians, not knowing what other course to take, resolved to send Embassadours againe; and trie the fauour of Scipio, whose Armes they could not now resist.

Scinio having spoiled the Enemies Campe, returned backe to Vtica: where hee found P. Lentulus newly arrived, with fiftie Gallies and an hundred Shippes of bur- 20 den. With this Fleet, and that which hee had before, Hee thought it best to make towards Carthage: rather of purpose to terrific the Citie, than with any hopeto take it. His Legions he committed vnto Cn. Octavius, whom he willed to meet him there by land. Then fending Lelius away to Rome with newes of the victorie, He fet faile from Vica towards Carthage. He was encountred on the way by ten Embaffadours from the Citie: who bearing vp with the Admirall Gallie, beganne to vse the pittiful gesture of suppliants. But they received none other answere, than that they should meet him at Tunes, where He would give them audience. So rowing along before the Citie: and viewing it more in brauerie, than with meaning to attempt it; He returned backe to Vica, and called backe Off aniis thither, with whom 30 in person Hee set forwards to Tunes. As they were in their journie thither, they heard the newes, that Vermina the sonne of Syphax, was comming with an Armie of more Horse than Foot, to the succour of those that were alreadie vanquished. This Vermina feemes to have beene both careleffe of getting intelligence how things paffed, and very defective in all other duties requisite in the Commander of an Armie. Part of the Roman Foot, with all their power of Horse, was sent against him : which did not onely beat him, but so compasse him in, that hee hardly escaped himselfe with a few; leaving fifteene thousand of his followers dead behinde him, and twelve hundred taken priloners. If this good companie had beene with Hannibal at Nadagara, they should have beene farre better conducted, and might well have changed 40 the Fortune of the day; which the Carthaginian loft, by default of Horse. But God had otherwise determined. It is not to bee doubted, that this victorie, though it were no great accesse vnto the former; yet served well to daunt the Carthaginians, and imprint in them the greater feare of Scipio. When he came to Tunes, there met him thirtie Embassadours from Carthage; whose behauiour though it was more pitifull than it had beene before; yet procured it leffe commiseration, by reason of their late false dealing, after they had in like fort humbled themselves. Neverthelesse it was confidered, what a long and laborious worke it would proue, to beliege the mightie Citie of Carthage. And particularly Scipio flood in great doubt, left the honor of this warre, if it were protracted, should bee taken out of his handes; and given to 10 one of the Confuls. Cn. Seruilius Capio, that Conful who had charge of the warre against Hannibal, at such time as he departed out of Italie: was bold to passe ouer into the He of Sicil (as it were in chace of Hannibal by him terrified and driven away) with a purpose thence to have proceeded into Africk, and taken from Scipio the Command of the Armiethere. But a Dicator was chosen of purpose, to restraine the ambition of this Conful Seruilsus. After him followed Tiberius Claudius, who made fuite for the same Prouince of Africk : and was therein so earnest, that though neyther the Senate, nor People, would grant him his defire; yet hee needes would begoing, procuring onely leane of the Senate, that hee being Conful might ioyne with Scipio, were it with no more than equall authoritie. But ere Hee could have his Fleete and all things in a readinesse for the journey, wherein no man cared to further him: Winter came on, and hee was onely tolt at Sea with foule weather, first vpon the Coast of Hetruria, and afterwards by Sardinia; where his Consulship

10 expired, and so he returned home a private man. Then came the joyfull newes to Rome, of the victoric obtained against Hannibal, and that the warre was now even at an end . Yet was Lentulus the new Conful to pathonate, in defiring Africk for his Prouince, That hee faid hee would fuffer nothing to paile in the Senate, vntill hee had first his will. Much adoe there was about this: and after many contentions, both in the Senate, and before the People, at last it was ordered, That if Peace were granted, it should be granted by Scipio; if the warre continued, Scipio should haue command therein by Land, and the Conful at Sea. The ambition of these men, caused Scipio to give the more favourable answere vnto the Carthaginian Embassadours. Hee willed them to consider what they had deserued: and in regard

20 thereof to thinke themselves well dealt withall, in that hee was contented to leave vnto them their libertie and their owne Lawes, without appointing any Gouernour ouer them, or Garrison to hold them in subjection; leaving also vinto them their possession Africk, such as they were at the beginning of this warre. As touching the rest hee was at a point, That, before hee cyther granted them Peace or truce, they should make satisfaction for wrongs which they had done, whileft the late Treatic was in dependance. Hereunto if they would yeeld; then required Hee That immediatly they should deliver up unto the Romanes all Prisoners, Fugitines, and Renegados, that they had of theirs: likewife all their Gallies, excepting ten: and all their Elephants: That they should make no warre at all thence-forth out of Africk, neither

3 Oyet within Africk, without licence of the Romanes : That the Countries, Townes, goods whatfocuer, belonging any wife unto MASANISSA, or to any of his Anceftors, which were in their possession, should be all by them restored unto him : That they should finde corne for the Romane Armie, and wages for their Auxiliaries, during the time of Truce, untill the Peace were fully concluded: That they should pay ten thousand Talents of Silver, in the terme of fifty yeares, by two hundred Talents a yeare; and that for observance of Conditions, they should give an hundred hostages, such as Scipio would choose, being none of them under foureseene yeares of age, nor aboue thirtie.

With these conditions the Embassadors returned home; and reported them vnto the Citie. They were verice unpleasing; and therefore one Gifco flood up to speake

40 against them: and exhorted the People, who gaue good attention, that they should not condescend vnto such intolerable demands. But Hannibal perceining this and noting withall what fauourable audience was given to this vaine Oratour, by the vnquiet yet vnwarlike Multitude; was bold to pull him downe from his standing, by plaine force. Hereat all the People murmured; as if their common libertie were too much wronged, by such insolence of this presumptuous Captaine. Which Hannibal perceiving, role vp and spake vnto them : saying, That they ought to pardon him, if he had done otherwise than the customes of the Citic would allow; forasmuch as he had beene thence absent ever since he was a Boy of nine yeares old, vntill he was now a man of fine and forty. Haning thus excused himselfe of the disor-50 der, He discoursed vnto them concerning the Peace and perswaded them to accept it, as wanting abilitie to defend themselves; had the demands of the Enemie beene yet more rigorous. Finally vpon good aduice, they refolued to yeeld vnto the Conditions propounded by Scipio: to whom they payed out of hand five and twentie thousand pound weight of Siluer, in recompence of damages, and injuries by them Cccccc 3

done to his Fleet and Embassadours. Scipio granted them Truce for three moneths; in which time they might negotiate with the State of Rome, about confirmation of the League. But herewithall Heagaue injunction, that they should neyther in the meane while send Embassadours any whither else, nor yet dismisse any Embassadours to them sent; without first making him acquainted what they were, and what their errand was.

At this time Hanno, and they of his Faction, were become wife and honorable nen, by the miferies whereinto Carthage was fallen through their malicious Counfailes. Afdrubal, furnamed the Kid, a venerable man, and great friend of Hanno. was chiefe of the Embassages which they sent to Rome for obtaining peace. They 10 went thither in company of Scipio his Embassadours; who related vnto the Senate and People these joyfull newes. About the same time arrived at Rome Embassadours from Philip King of Macedon: who, together with the Carthaginians, were faine to wait awhile for audience, till the election of new Confuls then in hand was finished; and order taken, for the Prouinces of them, and the new Prætors. Then were the Macedonian Embassadors called into the Senate: who first answering vnto some points, wherein the Romanes had lately fignified vnto their King that they found themselues grieued; returned the blame vpon those Greekes themselues, that had made their complaint at Rome. Then accused they M. Aurelius: who being one of the three Embañadours, that had lately beene fent from Rome vnto King Philip, 20 tarried in Greece behinde his fellowes; and there lenying men, made warre vpon the King, without any regard at all of the League, that was betweene him and the Romans. Further they defired of the Senate, That one Sepater, a Macedonian Gentleman, with other of their Countrimen, that had lately ferued Hannibal for Pay, and being taken Prisoners in Africk, were kept in bonds by Scipio; might be released. and delinered vnto them. Vnto all this M. Furius, whom Aurelius had fent to Rome for that purpose, made a sharpe answere. Hee said, that the Greekes which were confederate with Rome, endured fo many injuries at the hands of Philip, that M. Aurelius was faine to flay behinde, to helpe them as he might; which else were like to be brought under the Kings subjection. As for Sopater: He affirmed him to be one 30 of the Kings Counsaile, and vericin ward with him; one that served not for money, but carried money with him, and foure thousand men, sent from the King to the ayde of Hannibal. About these points when the Macedonian Embassadour's could make vnto the Senate no good answere: they were willed to returne, and tell their Master, That warre hee sought, and warre hee should finde, if hee proceeded as hee had begunne. For in two maine pointes Hee had broken the League, that was betweene him and the Romanes : first, in that hee had wronged their Confederates; and secondly, in that hee had ayded their Enemies against them with men

These quarrels with Philip, that promised to open a way into Greece and the Ea-40 sterne Countries, helped well the Carthaginian Embassadours in their sollicitation of Peace. They appeared a very reucrend company, when they entred into the Senate: and Asknubal about the rest was much respected, as one, whose good offices had kept the Romanes from necessitie of sending Embassadours to Carthage, you the like errand. He liberally granted, that the justice of the quarrell had beene wholly on the Romanes side; saying that it was the sault of some violent men, through which the Peace was broken. Yet could he not altogether excuse the Citie; that had beene too vehement in the prosecution of bad counsaile. But if Hanna and himselse might have had their wills: the Carthaginians, cuen at the best of their Fortune, should have granted the peace which they now desired. Herewithall hee commended the 50 moderation of the Romanes, as no small argument of their valour; by which alwaies they had beene victorious. To the same effect spake therest of the Embassadours: all of them entreating to have the Peace ratified; though some with more lamentable words than others, according to the dinerstric of their stile. They had patience enough to endure such reproofe of Perjurie, as they themselues might have laid vpon the Romanes; if their diligence and fortune had beene such as the Romanes was. Among the reft, when one of the Senators demanded, by what gods they would sweare to keepe the peace hereaster: Astrobal made answere; Euro by the same gods, that are so secure runts those that violate their Leagues.

Lensing the Conful interpoling the authoritie of his Office, would have hindred the Senate from proceeding unto conclution of peace 3 for that hereby Hee was like to lofe the honour, which he purpofed to get by making warrein Africk. But the matter was propounded unto the people, in whom refted the Sourraigne Command of Rome; and by them referred wholly unto the pleafure of the Senate. So it was decreed, That Seipio with the Delegates fent unto him from Rome of purpofe, should make a League with the Carthagiman, youn fuch Conditions as feemed best: which were none other, than the same which he had alreadie propounded. For this fauour, the Carthagimian Embassadours humbly thanked the Senate; and craued licence, that they might valite their Countrimen, which were prisoners in Rome: afterwards, that they might ransome and carrie home with them some, that were their especiall friends; of whom they gaue in writing almost two bundred names. Whereupon the Senate ordained, that two hundred of those Prisoners, which the Embassadours would choose, should be sent ouer into Africa, and be freely visitored to life the sent of the sent of the sent of the sent out of the sent of the sent out of 20 bertie by Scipio, when the peace was fully concluded. So they tooke leave, and returned home, in company of the ten Delegates, that were appointed by the Senate to joyne with Scipio in Commission.

At their comming into Africk, the Peace was given, and accepted, without any controuers or disputation. The Prisoners, Fugitiues, and Renegados, were deliuered vp to Scipio: likewise the Gallies, and the Elephants. Scipio tooke more vengeance vpon the Renegados, than vpon the Fugitiues; and vpon those of the Romanes, than vpon the Litines or other Italians. The Latines hee beheaded: the Romanes hee crucissed. About the sirtle payment of their money; the Carthagines were somewhat troubled. For though perhaps their common Treasurie could

30 haue spared two hundred Talents for the present: yet since the pension was annuall, and to continue sitie yeares; it was thought meete to lay the burden you the Citizens. At the collecting of the summe there was piteous lamentation, as if now the Romane yoke had begunne to pinch them; so as many, cuen of the Senatours, could not sorbeare weeping. Contrariwise Hannibal could not refraine from laughter. For which when hee was checked by Assaulated and tolde. That it worst of all besemed him to laugh, since hee had been the cause why all others did weepe; Hee answered, That laughter did not always proceed from toy; but sometime from extremitie of indignation. Tet said Hee, My laughter in more selambles, and less when your teares. For yee sould have weep, when yee gaue wp your Shippes and Ele-

40 phants, and when see bound your owne hands from the ofe of Armes; without the good leave of the Romanes first obtained. This miscrable condition keepes as under; and holds as in assured featured. But of the senters yee had no seeing. Now, when a little money is wrange out of your prinate puries, yee have the reof some sense. God grant that the time come not hereafter, wherein yee shall asknowledge, That it was the very least part of your niferie, for which yee have shed these teares. Thus discoursed stambal wrote these, who tashing the bitter fruits of their owne malicious counsaile, repented when it was too late; and in sead of cursing their owne disorders, which had bred this gricuous discasses and in the physicion, whose noble endeauours had been employed in procuring the remedie.

50 Scipio being to take leave of Africk, produced Affaniffa, and magnified him in prefence of the Armie, with high commendations not vndefertredly. To him also hee configned over those Townes of King Sophar, which the Romanes at that prefent held: wherein, to say truth, he gave him but his due; and that which otherwise hee knew not well how to bestow. But the love of the Romanes, and friendship of

Scipio, was fully answerable, now and hereafter, to all the deferuings of this Numician King. About Carthage there refled no more to be done. Wherefore the Romanes embarqued themselves for Sicil: where when they arrived at Lilybaum, Scipio with fome part of his Armie tooke his way home to Rome by land; and fent the reft before him thither by Sea. His journey through Italie was no leffe glorious than any Triumph: all the people thronging out of the Townes and Villages, to doe him honour as he passed along. He entered the Citie in Triumph : neither was there ener before, or after, any Triumph celebrated with fo great joy of the people, as was this of Scipio; though, in brauery of the pompe, there were others in time shortly following, that exceeded this. Whether Syphax were carried through the Citie in this 10 Triumph; and died foone after in prison: or whether he were dead awhile before: it cannot be affirmed. Thus much may be anowed, That it was a barbarous cufrome of the Romanes, to infult ouer the calamities of mightic Princes, by leading them contumeliously in Triumph; yea though they were such, as had alwaies made faire and courteous warre. But hereof we shall have better example, ere the same Age passe. It was neyther the person of Syphax, nor any other glory of the spectacle, that so much beautified the Triumph of Scipio; as did the contemplation of that gricuous warre past, whereof the Romanes had beene in a manner without hope, that ever they should set Italie free. This made them looke cheerefully vpon the Author of fo great a conversion; and filled them with more joy, than they well could 20 moderate. Wherefore they gaue to Scipio the Title of the African: stiling him by the name of that Prouince which he had fubdued. This honorable kind of furname. taken from a conquered Province, grew afterwards more common, and was vsurped by men of leffe defert: especially by many of the Cafars, who sometimes arrogated vnto themselves the title of Countries, wherein they had performed little or nothing; as if fuch glorious Attributes could have made them like in vertue vnto Scipiothe African.

uer-ruled, in mannaging the affaires of our daily life. It may bee observed in the change of Empires, before those times whereof we now write, how the Assyrians or Chaldeans inuaded the kingdome of the Medes, with two hundred thousand foote and threefcore thouland horse: but sayling in their intended conquest, they became fubiect within a while themselues vnto the Medes and Perstans. In like manner Darius, and after him Xerxes, fell vpon the Greekes with fuch numbers of men, as might haue seemed reifftlesse. But after that the Persians were beaten home, their Empire was neuer secure of the Greekes : who at all times of leasure from intestine warre deuised vpon that conquest thereof, which finally they made under the great 10 Alexander. If Nabuchadons for with his rough old fouldiours, had undertaken the Medes: or Cyrus with his well trayned Armie, had made the attempt vpon Greece; the issue might, in humanereason, haue beene farre different. Yet would it then haue beene expedient for them, to employ the trauell and vertue of their men, rather than the greatnesse of their names, against those people; that were no lesse valiant, though leffe renowned, than their owne. For the menacing wordes vsed by Grus, and some small displeasures done to the Greekes (in which kind it may bee, that Nabucho dono for like wife offended the Mides and Persians) were not so qualleableto victory, as to draw on reuenge in the future. Great Kingdomes, when they decayin strength, suffer as did the old Lyon, for the oppression done in his youth; 20 being pinched by the Wolfe, gored by the Bull, yea and kickt by the Affe. But Princes are often carried away from reason, by misse understanding the language of Pame; and despiting the vertue that makes little noise, aduenture to prouoke it against themselues, as if it were not possible that their owneglory should be soyled by any of leffe-noted excellence. Against the same stone, whereat Xerxes, and before him (as I take it ) Euilmerodach, had itumbled ; Pyrrhus the Epirer hath dailh his foot. Hee was not indeed the King of all Greece; though most of marke, and a better fouldiour than any other Greekish King, when he entred into war against the Romans. This war he vidertooke as it were for his mindes fake: having received no injurie; but hoping by the glory of his name, and of the Greekes that ferued vnder him, to 30 preuaile focalily against the barbarous Romans, that they should onely serve as a step to his further intended conquests, of Sicil and Africk. But when the Romans, by their victory against Pyrrhus; had found their owne vertue to bee of richer mettall, than was the more shining valour of the Greekes; then did all the brauery of the Epirot (his Elephants and what soener else had served to make him terrible ) serve onely to make the Romans, in time following, tothinke more highly of the mselues. *For fince they had ouercome the best Warriour in Greece, euen Him; that, being *The Kingoi ror inice truy had sacredate a year after make himselfe Lord of Greece and Mace- Spaines pretended insure thus beaten by them, could in a year after make himselfe Lord of Greece and Macedon: what should finder them from the conquest of all those vnwarlike Prouinces, cible Nauie, which in compaffe of twelue yeeresa Macedonian King of late memory, had won? being beaten 40 Certainly there was hereunto requilite no more, than to bring to their owne deuo out of the bring to their owne deuo on the bring to their owne deuo on the whole Country of Greece: all the reft, this donc, takes to the would follow of it felfe. How to deale with the Greekers Philip and Alexander had of Spaine and Spaine and House of Spaine and shewed a way: which, or perhaps a better, they might learne, by getting more ac-

When therefore the first Punick war was ended, which followed soone after the gathered towars of Pyrrhus and of the Tarentines: then were the Romans at good leifure to hear- getter twee warsor ryrram and ortice I are not contertaine any good occasion, that should bee on neuer made ken after newes in Greece; and to entertaine any good occasion, that should bee on neuer made that fide presented. They had also then a strong Fleet : and were become, though ayor his prenot other wife very skillfull Mariners, yet good fighters at Sea. So it fell out as hap-parations after 50 pily as could be wished, that the Illyrian Queene Tenta made at the same time cruell warre vpon the Greekes: walting their Country, and facking their Townes, only because they were vnable to relist, though they had done her none offence. Into this quarrell if the Romans were destrous to enter; the Queene was not flow to give them cause. And their happy accomplishing of that war which they made with c. Lib.5, db.a.

Her, was, in their owne opinion, a matter not vnworthy to make their Patronage to be defired by the Greekes. But no fuch thing happened: though they fent Embaffadours, as it were to offer themselves; by signifying, that for the love of Greece they . had undertaken this Illyrian warre. Thus began the first acquaintance betwixt the Greekes and Romanes: which afterwards encreased very hastily, through the indiscretion of King Philip the Macedonian; whose businesse with them being now the subiect of our storic, it is meet that we should relate (though somewhat briefely) the beginning of his reigne, and his first Actions.

It was like to proue a bufie time in the world, when, within the space of source yeares, new Kings began to reigne in the most of all Countries knowne; and three 10 of them yong boyes, in three of the greatest Kingdomes. This happened from the third yeare of the hundred thirty ninth Olympiad, vnto the third of the Olympiad following. For in this time died Seleueus Ceraunus King of Asia and Syria, in whose roome succeeded his brother Antiochus, afterwards called the great. Ptolemie Philopator succeeded in the Kingdome of Agypt vnto his father Euergetes. And Philip the fonne of Demetrius, being fixteene or seuenteene yeares old, received the Kingdome of Macedon, together with the Patronage of the Acheans and most of the Greekes; by the deccase of his Vncle Antigonus Roson, that was called the Tutor or Protector. About the same time also was the like change in Cappadocia, Lacedamon, and the Countries about Mount Taurus. For Ariarathes then beganne his reigne in Cappadocia. Ly- 20 curgus found meanes to make himselse King over the Lacedamonians, whose Common-weale, fince the flight of Cleamenes, had continued in a manner headleffe; and Acheus, a kinsman of Antiochus, but a Rebell vnto him, occupied the Regions neare vnto Mount Taurus, and kept a while the State of a mighty King. Lastly, in the fecond and third yeares of the hundred and fortieth Olympiadit was, that open war brake out betweene Rome and Carthage; and that Hannibal began his great Inualion vpon Italie. Those troubles of the Westerne world, which were indeed the greatest, we have alreadic followed vnto an end : Of Antiochus, Ptolemie, and the rest, we shall speake hereafter, when the Romanes finde them out.

Philip, soone after the beginning of his reigne, came into Peloponnesus; greatly de- 30 fired of the Athems, and many others his dependants. That Country, having freed it selfe by the helpe of Antigonus from the danger (accounted great) of an easie subiection vnto Cleomenes: was now become no leffe obnoxious to the Macedonian, than it should have beene to the Spartan; and therewithall it lay open unto the violence of the Atolians, who despised even the Macedonian Kings, that were Patrons therof. These Atolians were no men to be idle; nor were much addicted to any other Art, than warre. Therefore wanting employment, they fell upon the Meffenians that were their owne Clients, and excepting the Eleans, that were anciently of their confanguinitie) the onely good friends which they had at the present in Peloponne sus. Their inualion was no leffe vnexpected, then it was vniust: whereby with greater 40 ease they made spoile of the Countrey; finding none prepared to make resistance. The Acheans, were called by the Meffenians to helpe: which they did the more willingly; because the Ætolians passing without leave through their Territorie, had (as was their manner) done what harme they lifted . Olde Aratus couldill abide these Ætolians; as both knowing well their nature, and remembring the injuries, wherewith most vingratefully they had required no small benefits done to them by the Acheans. He was therefore so hasty to fall vpon this their Armie, that hee could hardly endure to flay a few dayes untill the time of his owne Office came; being chosen Prætor of the Acheans for the yeare following. But his anger was greater than his courage: and he shewed himselse a man fitter (as hath beene alreadic no- 50 ted of him) for any other feruice, than leading of an Armie. He suffered them to passe quietly along with their bootie, through a great part of the Countrie, wherein he might easily have distressed them; and afterwards pressed them so neare, when they had recourred ground of aduantage, that they casily defeated all his Armie.

CHAP.4. S.I. of the Historie of the World.

So they departed home rich, and well animated to returne againe. As for the Acheans; they got hereby onely the friendship of the Meffenians: with whom, by licence of King Philip, they made confederacie. Shortly after, the Atolians invaded Peloponnesus againe; having no more to doe, than to passe ouer the narrow Streights of the Corinthian Bay, called now the Gulle of Lepanto, where they might land in the Country of the Eleans. There toyned with them in this their fecond Innation a great number of the Illyrians: who neglecting that condition imposed vpon them by the Romans, of fetting out no ships of warre vnto the Coast of Greece; made bold to feeke aduentures againe, and did great mischiefe. Demetrius Pharius, a creature of chap. 3. 5. 1. to the Romans, commanded a part of these Illyrians: who shortly repented him of this his voyage; which caused him to lose his Kingdome, as is shewed before. But this Demetrius went another way, and tell upon the llands of the Cyclades in the Egean Sea: whence returning, he did some good offices for King Philip or his friends. The rest of the Illyrians under Scerdilaid., or Seerdiletus, having gotten what they could else-where by rouing at Sea, accompanied the Atolians into Peloponnes who madegreater hauocke in the Countrienow, than in their former Expedition; and returned home, without finding any relistance.

Of these things great complaint was made vnto Philip, when he came to Corinth. And because men were desirous to satisfie themselves with some speedie reuenge: 20 there were that vrged to have some gricuous punishment laid vpon the Lacedamonians: who were thought under-hand to have favoured the Ætolians, in meere despight of the Acheans and Macedonians, by whom themselves had lately beene subdued. It is true, that the Lacedamonians had beene so affected: and (which was worse) at the arrivall of Philip, they slue such friends of his, as having checked their inclination, seemed likely to appeach them of the intended rebellion. Neither durst they well commit themselves to judgement: but entreated the King, that he would abstaine from comming to them with an Armie: fince their Towne was lately much disquieted with civill discord, which they hoped soone to appeale, and meant alwayes to remaine at his deuotion. Philip was callly fatisfied with this: not for that 30 he (or rather old Aratus, who then wholly gouerned him) did miffe-vnderstand the Lacedemonians: but for that a greater worke was in hand, which ought not to be interrupted. There met at Corinth, in presence of the King, the Embassadours of the Acheans, Beetians, Phocians, Epirots, and Acarnanians: all complaining voon the Atolians: and desiring to have warre decreed against them, by common affent. Philip fent his letters vnto the Atolians: requiring them to make ready their answer in some convenient time , if they could alleadge any thing in excuse of that which they had done. They returned word, that a Diet should be holden at Rhium for that purpole: whither if it pleased him to come or send, hee should be well informed of them and their whole meaning. The King prepared to have beene there at the day. 40 But when the Ætolians understood this for certaintie, they adjourned the Councell vnto a further time: faying. That fuch weightic matters ought not to be handled,

Bue in the great Parliament of all Atolia. This tricke of Law notwithstanding, open warre was proclaimed against them. And they, as it were to shew how well they had described it, made election of Scopes to be their Prator, that was Author of these Inwillows made on Pelsponne is; and the onely man, in a fort, vpon whom they must bave laid the blame of these actions, if they would have shifted it from the publike. After this, Philip went into Mucedon , where he prepared builty for the warre against the year of lowing. Healfo affayed the Hyrian, Scot dilaidas, with faire words and promiles: whom he cally won from the Liolian fide, for afmuch as the Etoli-

5 0 and had coulened him of his share, when he was partner with them in their late robberies. In like fort the Acheans, who had first of all others proclaimed the warre in their owne Country, sent vnto the Acarnanian, Epirots, Meffenians, and Lacedamomeins: requesting them forthwithto declare themselves, and to denounce warre vinto the Atolians, without flaying (as it were) to await the event. Hereunto they received

Philip fent his letters vnto the Atolians: requiring them to make ready their answer in some convenient time ; if they could alleadge any thing in excuse of that which they had done. They returned word, that a Diet should be holden at Rhium for that purpole: whitherit it pleased him to come or fend, hee should be well informed of them and their whole meaning. The King prepared to have been there at the day. 40 But when the Etolians understood this for certaintie, they adjourned the Councell vnto a further time: faying, That fuch weightic matters ought not to be handled, frue in the great Parliament of all Ætolia. This tricke of Law not with standing, open warrejwas proclaimed against them. And they, as it were to shew how well they had described it, made election of Scopes to be their Prætor, that was Author of these Invalions made on Pelsponne is; and the onely man, in a fort, vpon whom they muft have laid the blame of these actions, if they would have shifted it from the publike. After this, Philip went into Macedon , where he prepared builty for the warre a gainft the yeer of blowing. He also affayed the Illyrian, Seer dilaidas, with faire words and promiles: whom he cally won from the Etolian fide, forafmuch as the Etolian 50 and had coulened him of his share, when he was partner with them in their late robberies In like fort the Acheans, who had first of all others proclaimed the warre intheir owne Country, fent vnto the Acarnanian, Epirots, Meffenians, and Lacedamomeins:requesting them forthwithto declare themselves, and to denounce warre vitto the Etolians; withour flaying (as it were) to await the event. Hereunto they received diuerse answeres, according to the qualities of those with whom they dealt. The Acarnanians, a free hearted and valiant, though a small Nation, and bordering vpon the Ætolians, of whom they flood in continual danger; faid, that they could not honeftly refuse to show their faithfull meaning in that warre, which was concluded by generall affent. The Epirots that were more mightie, were neuerthelesse more cunning and referred : so that they stood vpon a needlesse point; and desired to bee held excused, vntill Philip (of whose meaning they needed not to have made any doubt) should first proclaime the warre. The Meffenians, for whose cause the warre was undertaken, excused themselves, by reason of a Towne which the Atolians held vpon their borders, and faid, that they durft not be ouer-bold, vntill that bridle 10 were taken out of their mouthes. As for the Lacedemonians; the chiefe of them fludied onely how to mannage that treason, for which their Citie had beene so lately pardoned: and therefore dismissed the Embassadours of the Confederates, without any answere at all. They had three yeares together continued subject against their wils to the Macedonians, expecting fill when Cleomenes should returne out of Agypt to raigne ouer them againe; and maintaine, as he was wont, the honour of their Citie. In this regard they chose not any Kings; but were contented with the rule of Ephori. Of these there were some, that thought the publike safetic to consist, in holding their faith with the Macedonian that had preferred them : And hereto they referred all their counsailes; being perhaps not a little moued with respect of the 20 benefit, which might redound vnto themselves, by adhering firmely to those which at the present bore rule ouer them. Others, and those the greater part, were still deuising, how to make all readie for Cleomenes against his returne; and therefore fought to ioyne with the Atolians, which were the most likely to give him strong affistance. The Macedonian faction had the more authoritie, and durst more freely speake their mindes: but the contrary fide was the more passionate; and spared not by murders, or any other violent courses, to set forward their desire. Neyther did it fuffice, that about the fotimes there came certaine report of Cleomenes his death. For it was the liberty and honour of Sparta, which these intended: fancying vnto themseluesthe glory of their Ancestors in such Ages past, as were not like to come againe. 30 Cleamenes was, they knew, the most able man to restore them vnto their greatnesse and lustre; which once he had in a manner performed: But since he was dead, and that, without injury to his well-deferring vertue, they might proceed to the election of new Kings: Kings they would have, and those of the race of Hercules, as in former times; for that without such helpes, they must continue little better than subjects vnto the Macedonian, and farre leffe by him respected, than were the Acha-Ang, Thus were they transported, by contemplation of their old Nobility and fame. Some of the most working spirits among them, procured the Atolians to send an Embassie to Sparta: which propounded the matter openly vnto the people; whereof no one of the Citizens durft haue made himselfe the Author. Much disputation 40 and hot there was, betweene those of the Macedonian partie and these their oppofites: in fuch wife that nothing could be concluded; vntill by maffacre or banishment of all, or the chiefe, that spake against the Atolians, the diversitie of opinion was taken quite away. Then forthwith a League was concluded between the Lacedamonians and Atolians : without all regard of the Macedonians or Achaans ; who had spared the Citie, when they might have destroyed it. Then also they went in hand with the election of new Kings: wherein their diligence was so nice, and so regardfull of their ancient Lawes, as touching the choofing of the one King; that we may justly wonder, how they grew so carelesse in making choyce of the other. In the one of their Royall Families they found Agespolis, the some of Agespolis the son 50 of King Cleembrotus: and him they admitted to raigne ouer them; as heire apparant to his Grandfather. This Agespolis was a yong boy, standing in neede of a Guardian; and had an Vncle, his fathers brother, that was fit for the Gouernment. Yet because the Law required, that the sonne, how yong soeuer, should have his fathers whole right and title: the Lacedamonians, though standing in neede of a man, were fo punctuall in observation of the Law; that they made this childe their King, and appointed his Vncle Cleomenes to bee his Protector. But in the other branch of the Royall family, though there was no want of heires; yet would not the people trouble themseliues about any of them, to examine the goodnesse of his Claime; but made election of one Lyeurgus, who having no manner of title to the kingdome, bestowed upon each of the Ephoria Talent, and thereby made himselse be falured King of Sparts, and a Gentleman of the race of Hercules. This Lycurgus, to gratific his Partisans, and to approuch is worth by Action; invaded the Countrie of the Argines: which lay open and vngarded, as in a time of peace. There hee did great spoile, and wannediners Townes; whereoftwo hee retained, and annexed unto the State of Lacedemon. After such open hostilitie, the Lacedemonians declared themselues on the Atolian side; and proclaimed warre against the A-

of the Historic of the World,

Thus the beginnings of the warre fell out much otherwise, than the Achams and their Confederates had expected, when they first made preparation. Philip was not readie: the Epirots gaue vncertaine answere: the Messenians would not stirre: all the burden must lie vpon themselues and the poore Acainanians, whom the Atolians, by favour of the Eleans, could invade at pleasure, as they were like to doe; and 20 by helpe of the Lacedamonians, could affaile on all parts at once. It was not long ere the Atolians, palling over the Bay of Corinth, surprised the Towne of Agira: which it they could have held, they should thereby grieuously have molested the Acheans; for that it Rood in the mid-way betweene Agium and Siegen two of their principall Cities, and gaue open way into the heart of all their Countrie. But as Ægira was taken by surprise : so was it presently lost againe, through greedinesse of spoile; whilest they that should have made it their first care to assure the place vnto themselues, by occupying the Cittadell and other peeces of strength, fell heedleffely to ranfack private houses, and thereby gaue the Citizens leave to make head, by whom they were driven with great flaughter backe vinto their Fleet. About 30 the same time, another Atolian Armie landing among the Eleans, fell vpon the Westerne Coast of Achaia; wasting all the Territoric of the Dymeans and other people, that were first beginners of the Achean Confederacie. The Dymans and their neighbours made head against these Inuaders; but were so well beaten, that the enemiegrew bolder with them than before. They fent for helpe vnto their Prætor, and to all the Townes of their Societie. In vaine. For the Acheans having lately beene much weakened by Cleomenes, were now able to doc little of themselues : neither could they get any strength of Mercinaries; for a smuch as at the end of Cleomenes his war, they had couctoully with held part of their due from those that served them therein. So through this disabilitie of the Acheans, and insufficiencie of their 40 Pretor; the Dymeans, with others, were driven to with-hold their contribution heretolore made for the publike feruice, and to convert the monie to their owne defence. Lycurgus also with his Lacedamonians, began to winne vpon the Areadians; that were confederate with Philip and the Achieans. Philip came to the borders of the Atolians, whilft their Armic was thus employed a farre off in Peloponnesus. The Epirots ioyned all their forces with him: and by such their willing readines, drew him to the fiege of a Frontier peece, which they defired to get into their owne hands, for that, by commoditie thereof, they hoped shortly to make themselues Masters of Ambracia. There he spent fortie dayes, ere he could end the busines; which tended onely to the benefit of the Epirots. Had he entred into the 50 heart of Atolia at his first comming; it was thought that he might have made an end of the war. But it happens oft, that the violence of great Armies is broken vpon small Townes or Forts: and not seldome, that the importunitie of Associates, to have their own desires sulfilled, converts the preparations of great Kings to those vies for which they neuer were intended; thereby hindering the profecution of their naine destignes. Thus was our King Henrie the cight led aside, and quite out of his way, by Miximilian the Emperour to the siege of Townsy: at such time as the French King Lensethe ewelfth, hearing that the strong Circie of Terwin was soft, and that of his Cauellerie, wherein rested his chiefe considence, two thousand were beaten by the Ente of Essex with seuen hundred English; was thinking to withdraw himselfe into Brittaine, in search that Henrie would have come to Paris.

The stay that Philip made at Ambracus, did wondrously embolden the Atolians: in such fort, as their Prætor Scopus adventured to lead all their forces out of the Countrie; and therewith not onely to ouer-runne Theffalie, but to make impression into Macedon. He ranne as farre as to Dium, a Citic of Macedon vpon the Agean 10 Sea: which being for faken by the Inhabitants at his comming, Hee tooke, and razed to the ground. Hee spared neither Temple, nor any other of the goodly buildings therein, but ouerturned all: and among the reft, he threw downe the Statua's that were there erected, of the Macedonian Kings. For this he was highly honoured by his Countrimen at his returne; for a funch as hereby they thought their Nation to be growne terrible, not onely (as before) vnto Peloponne (us, but euen to Macedon it selfe. But this their pride was soone abated; and they rewarded shortly at home in their owne Countrie, for their paines taken at Dium. Philip having difpatched his worke at Ambracus, made a strong inuasion vpon Atolia. Hee tooke Phoetia, Metropolis, Oeniade, Paanium, Elaus, and diuers other Townes and Castles 20 of theirs: of which hee burnt some, and fortified others. Hee also beat the Atolians in fundrie skirmishes; and wasted all the Countrie ouer, without receiping any harme. This done, while he was about to make a cut ouer the Streights into Pelaponnelus, and to doe the like spoile in the Countrie of the Eleans, whereto he was vehemently sollicited by the Achaan Embassadours : newes came out of Macedon. that the Dardanians were readie with a great Armie to fall vpon the Countrie. These Dardanians were a barbarous people, divided by Mount Hamus from the Northerne part of Macedon; and were accustomed to seeke bootie in that wealthie Kingdome. when they found their owne times. Having therefore intelligence, that Philip was about to make a journie into Peloponne (us: the y purposed in his absence, which they 30 thought would beelong, to get what they could for themselves in his Countrie; as had beene their manner vpon the like advantages. This made the King to difmiffe the Achean Embassadours, (whom hee should have accompanied home with his Armie) and to bid them have patience untill another yeare. So Hee tooke his way home: and as he was passing out of Acarnania into Epirus, there came to him Demetrius Pharius with no more than one Ship; that was newly chaced out of his Kingdome by the Romans. This Demetrius had lately shewed himselfe a friend to Antigonus Dolon, in the warres of Cleomenes: and returning in his last Voyage from the Cyclades, was readie, at their first request, to take part with Philips Captaines. These, or the like confiderations, made him welcome vnto the Macedonian King: whose 40 Counfailor he was euer after. The Dardanians hearing of the Kings returne, brake vp their Armie; and gaue ouer for the present their invasion of Maceden, towardes which they were alreadie on their way.

All that Summer following the King rested at Lariss in Thessise, whiles this people gathered in their Haruest. But the Evolums rested not. They auenged themeleuse you the Epiros: whom for the harmes by them and Philip done in Etolia, they requited with all extremities of warre, among which, the most notable was the ruine of the samous Temple of Dodona. When Winter grew on, and all thought of warre until another yeare was laid asside: Philip sole a journie into Peloponnessis, with sue thousand Foot, and about sour source hundred Horse. As soone as hee was 50 within Corinth; He comanded the Gates to be shut, that no word might bee carried foorth of his arrivall. He sent privily for old Aratus to come thirther vinto him; with whom he tooke order, when, and in what places, hee would have the Arbaran Souldiors readie to meet him. The Enemies were then abroad in the Countrie, with fomewhat more than two thousand Foot and an hundred Horse; little thinking to meete with fuch opposition. Indeed they had little cause to feare: fince the Acheans themselves were not aware that the King was in their Land with his Macedonians; untill they heard, that there two thousand Eleans, Etolians, and their fellowes, were by him surprised and all made prisoners, or slaine. By this exploit which hee did at his first comming, Philip got very much reputation: as likewise hee purchased both reputation and loue, by divers actions immediatly following. He wanne P/ophis, an exceeding strong Towne, in the borders of Arcadia; which the Eleans and Aetolians then held. Hee wanne it by affault at his first comming : wherein it much auailed him, that the Enemie, not beleening that he would vindertake such a peece of worke at fuch an vnfeafonable time of the yeere, was carelesse of prouiding even fuch flore of weapons, as might have ferued to defend it. I he Towne was preferued by the King from facke; and given to the Acheans, of his owne meere motion, before they requested it. Thence went he to Lifton, which yielded for very feare; hearing how easily he had taken Pfophis This Towns also he gaue to the Acheans. The like liberality he vsed towards others; that had ancient title vnto places by him recovered. Then fell he vpon the Countrie of Elis, where was much wealth to bee gotten: for that the people were addicted to bulbandrie, and lived abroad in Villages; cuen such as were of the wealthier fortamong them. So he came to the 20 Citie of Olympia: where having done facrifice to Iupiter, feasted his Captaines, and refreshed his Armie three dayes, Hee proceeded on to the spoile of those, that had taken pleasure to share with the Aetolians, in the spoiles of their other-wise-deseruing neighbours. Great abundance of Cattaile hee tooke, with great numbers of flaues, and much wealth of all forts; fuch as could bee found in rich villages. Then fell he in hand with the Townes whereinto a great multitude of the Countric-people were fled. Some of these were taken at the first assault. Some yeelded for feare. Some preuented the labour of his journie, by fending Embassadours to yeeld before hee came. And some that were held with Garrisons against their wils, tooke courage to let themselves at libertie, by seeing the King so neare; to whose Patro-

30 nage there in the best ook them selected. And many places were spoiled by the Elolian Captaines; because they distributed their ability to hold them. So the King wanne more Townes in the Countrie, than the sharpeness of Winter would suffer him to stay there dayes. Faine he would have fought with the Etolians: but they made such hast from him, that he could not our toke them, wrill they had couered them solves within the Towne of Samuean; where they thought to have been safe, But Philip assaulted them therein so foreibly, that hee made them glad to yield the place; obtaining licence to depart, wich their lines and arms. Hauing performed so much in this Expedition, the King reposed bimselfes a while in Megalopolis; and then removed to Argos, where he spent all the rest of the Winter.

then remoued to Argas, where he pent an interted the value.

Before the Kings arrivallin Peloponna (a), the Lacedamonians with Lyeurgu their new King, hadgotten somewhat in Arcadas; and threatned to doe great matters. But when they were admonished, by the calamitet hat fell vpon the Eleans, of the danger hanging outer their owne heads; they quitted their winnings and withdrew themselues home. This Lyeurgu, as hee had no other right to the Kingdome of Sparta, than that which be could buy with monie; so was hee neither free from danger of conspiracies made against him snor from those jealousties, with which Vsurpersare commonly perplexed. There was one Chilon, of the Royall bloud, that thinking himselife to haue best right vnto the Kingdome, purposed to make way thereunto, by malfacre of his opposites; and afterwards to consist the minselse, by propounding vnto the Multitude such reformation of the State as was most popupropounding vnto the Multitude fuch reformation of the State as was most popular; namely, by making an equall distribution of all the Lands among the whole number of the Citizens, according to the ancient inflitution of that Commonwealth. He wanne to his partie some two hundred men; with whom hee sell vpon the Ephorias they were together at supper, and slew them all. Then went heto Lyangus curgus his house: wo perceiving the danger, stole away and fled. It remained that he should give account of these doings to the people, and procure them to take part with him. But their mindes being not hereto prædisposed; they so little regarded his goodly offers, as even whilft he was vling his best perswasions, they were consulting how to apprehend him. Chilon perceived whereabout they went, and shifted presently away. So hee lived afterwards among the Acheans a banished man, and hated of his own people. As for Lycurgus, he returned home: and suspecting thenceforth all those of Hercules his race, found meanes to drive out his fellow King yong Agesipolis; whereby he made himselfe Lord alone. His doings grew to be suspected, in such fort as once he should have beene apprehended by the Ephori. But though 10 his actions hitherto might have beene defended; yet rather than to adventure himfelfe into judgement, hee chole to flie for a time, and fojourne among his friendes the Atolians. His wel-knowne vehemencie in opposition to the Macedonians, had procured vnto him such good liking among the people, that in his absence they beganne to consider the weakness of their owne surmises against him; and pronouncing him innocent, recalled him home to his Estate. But in time following, Hee tooke better heed vuto him felfe: not by amending his condition (for he grew a Tyrant, and was so acknowledged ) but by taking order, that it should not bee in the power of the Citizens to expell him when they lifted. By what actions hee got the name of a Tyrant : or at what time it was, that he chaced Agelipolis out of the Ci- 20 tie : I doe not certainly finde. Like enough it is, That his being the first of three vsurpers, which followed in order one after another, made him to bee placed in the ranke of T yrants, which the last of the three very justly deferued. Whatfoeuer he was towards fome private Citizens : in the war against Philip, He behaued himselfe as a prouident man, and carefull of his Countries good.

ò. I I.

How P II I I I was miffeaduifed by ill Counfailors: Who afterwards wrought treafon againft him, and were iuftly punifhed. Hee inuadeth the Ætolians a second time: And forceth them to sue for peace: Which is granted vnto them.

Hilest the King lay at Argos, deuising vpon his businesse for the yeare following; some ambitious men that were about him, studied so diligently their ownegreatnesse, as they were like to haue spoiled all that he tooke in hand. Antigonus Doson had left vnto Philip such Gounsailors, as to him did seeme the fittest men for governing of his youth. 40

The chiefe of these was Appelles; that had the charge of his person, and ordering of his Treasures. This man, seeming to himselfe a great Politician, thought that he should do a notable peece of service to his Prince; if he could reduce the Achaems unto the same degree of subjection, wherein the Macedonians lived. To bring this to passe, during the late Expedition hee had caused some of the Macedonians to thrust the Achaems out of their lodgings, and to strip them of the bootie that they had gotten. Proceeding surther, as occasion sell out, He was bold to chastice some of that Nation; causing his Ministers to take and whippe them. Is any of them offered (as there were some of them that could not refraine) to helpe their fellowes; them hee laid by the heeles, and punished as Mutiners. Hereby hee thought to bring it to passe by little and little, that they should be equalified with an habite of blind obedience; and thinke nothing vnish that pleased the King. But these Achaems were tenderly sensible in matter of libertie: whereof if they could have been contented to suffer any little diminution, they needed not have troubled the Macedonians to helpe them in the warre against Cleamenes: They bemoned themselves vato old Arasus; and belought him to thinke vpon some good order, that they might not bee oppreffed by degrees. Aratus foorthwith dealt carnelly with the King; as in a matter more weightie, than at first it might seeme. The King beltowed gracious words vpon those that had bene wronged; and forbid Apelles to follow the course begunne. Hereat Apelles was inwardly vexed, though he diffembled his cholier for atime. He thought fo well of his owne Project, that he could not endure to lay it afide; being perhaps vnable to doe the King any valuable feruice, in butineffe of other nature. Hee purposed therefore hereafter to beginne at the head; since, in bito ting at the taile, the filh had thot away from his mouth. It could not otherwise bee than that among the Acheans there were lome, who bore no heartic affection to Aratus. These be enquired out : and sending for them, entertained them with wordes of Court; promiting to become their especiall friend, and commend them vnto the King. Then brake he his purpose with the King himselse : letting him know, that as long as he continued to make much of Aratus, He must be faine to deale precisely with the Acheans, and, asit were by Indenture, according to the letter of the Contract: whereas if he would be pleased, to give countenance vnto those others whom he himselfe commended, then should the Acheans, and all other Peloponnesians, bec quickly brought to conforme themselves vnto the dutie of obedient Subjects. By 20 fuch perswasions, He drew the King to be present at Agium, where the Achaems were to hold election of a new Prætor. There with much more labour, than would haue beene needfull in a businesse of more importance; the King, by faire word; and threatnings together, obtained so much, That Eperatus, a very insufficient man, but one of Apelles his new Fauorites, was chosen Prætor, instead of one more worthie, for whom Aratus had laboured. This was thought a good introduction vnto greater matters that should follow. The King from thence passed along by Patrus and Dyma, to a very strong Castle held by the Eleans, which was called Tichos. The Garrison yeelded it up for feare, at his first comming: whereof hee was glad; for that hee had an earnest desire to bestow it vpon the Dymeans, as hee pre-

The King thought it ftrange, that all this while he heard of no meffengers from the Eleans, to fue for peace. For at his departure out of their Countrie the last Winter, hee had let look one Amphidamue a Captaine of theirs, that was his Prisoner; because hee found him an intelligent man, and one that undertooke to make them forfake their alliance with the £tolans, and joyne with him upon reasonable termes. This if they could be cotented to do, He willed Amphidamus to let them understand, That he would render unto them freely all prisoners which hee had of theirs; That he would defend them from all forrein inuation; and that they should hold their libertic entire, liuing after their owne Lawes, without paying any manner of Triblettic entire, liuing after their owne Lawes, without paying any manner of Triblettic entire, liuing after their owne Lawes, without paying any manner of Triblettic entire, liuing after their owne Lawes, without paying any manner of Triblettic entire, liuing after their owne Lawes, without paying any manner of Triblettic entire, liuing after their owne Lawes, without paying any manner of Triblettic entire, liuing after their owne Lawes, without paying any manner of Triblettic entire, liuing after their owne Lawes, without paying any manner of Triblettic entire, liuing after their owner lawes to be added.

40 bite; or being kept under by any Garrison. These Conditions were not to be despited, if they had found credit as they might have done. But when Philip came to the Castle of Tiehos, and made a new invasion vpon their Countrie: then beganne the Eleans, (that were not before over-hastlie to beleeue such haire promises) to suffered Amphidamus: as a Traitour, and one that was set on worke for no other ende, than to breed a mutuall diffidence between ethem and the Atolians. Wherefore they purposed to lay hands vpon him, and send him Prisoner into Atolians. But hee perceived their inteht, and got away to Dyma: in good time for him/esses, in better for Aratus. For the King (as was said) marualling what should be the casse, that he heard no news from the Eleans, councailor, thereby tooke occasion to supplant Aratus.

50 by Amphidamus: Apelles, his Countain, interest own counters in their heads, as the faid that old Aratus, and his fonne together, had fuch devices in their heads, as tended little to the Kings good; And long of them he faid it was, that the Eleans did thus hold out; For when Amphidamus was difmiffed home, the two Arati (the father and the fonne) had taken him asside and given him to vnderstand, that it would Ddddd 2

be very prajudiciall to all Peloponnesus, if the Eleans once became at the deuction of the Macedonian; And this was the true caufe, why neither Amphidamus was very carefull in doing this message, nor the Eleans in hearkning to the Kings offers. All this was a falle lie; denifed by Apelles himfelfe, vpon no other ground than his owne malice. Philip had no fooner heard his tale, but in a great rage hee fent for the two Arati; and bad Apelles rehearfe it ouer againe to their faces. Apelles did fo, and with a bold countenance, talking to them as to men already convicted. And when he had faid all the rest, ere either Philip or they spake any word; Hee added this clause as it were in the Kings name: Since the King hath tound you fuch vngratefull wretches; it is his meaning to hold a Parliament of the Achaans; and therein having made it to knowne what yee are, to depart into Macedon, and leave you to your selucs. Olde Arstus granely admonished the King; That when soeuer hee heard any accusation. especially against a friend of his owne or a man of worth; He should forbeare a while to give credit, vntill he had diligently examined the businesse. For such deliberation was Kingly, and hee should never thereof repent him. At the present hee faid there needed no more, than to call in those that had heard his talke with Amphidemus; and especially him that had brought this goodly tale to Apelles. For it would be a very abfurd thing, That the King should make himselfe Authour of a report in the open Parliament of Achaia, whereof there was none other evidence, than one mans res, and anothers no. Hereof the King liked well; and faid that he would make 20 sufficient inquirie. So passed a few dayes: wherein whilest Apelles delaied to bring in the proofe, which indeed he wanted; Amphidamus came from Elis, and told what had befaine him there. The King was not forgetfull, to examine him about the conspiracie of the Arati: which when hee found no better than a meere denice against his honourable friends; Hee entertained them in louing manner as before. As for his love to Apelles, though it was hereby formewhat cooled; yet by meanes of long acquaintance and daily employment, no remission therein could

The vnreftfull temper of Apelles, having with much vehemencie brought nothing to passe, began (as commonly Ambition vseth) to swell and grow venomous 20 for want of his free motion. Hee betakes himfelfe to his cunning againe; and as before, being checkt in his doings with those of the vulgar, hee had prepared a snare for the Arati; so fayling of them, he thinkes it wisedome to lay for the King himfelfe, and for all at once which were about him. In fuch manner fometime, the Spider thought to haue taken the Swallow which draue away Flies out of the chimnie; but was carried (net and all) into the Ayre by the bird, that was too ftrong to be caught and held by the subtile workemanship of a Cob-web. Of the foure that next vnto Apelles were left by Antigonus in chiefe place about Philip; Taurion, his Lieutenant in Peloponne sa, and Alexander Captaine of the Guard, were faithful men, and fuch as would not be corrupted. The other two, Leontius Captaine of the 40 Targuetiers, and Megaleas chiefe of the Secretaries, were easily wonneto bee at Apelles his disposition. This Politician therefore studied how to removue the other two from their places, and put some Creatures of his owne into their roomes. Against Alexander He went to worke the ordinarie way, by calumniation and prinie detraction. But for the supplanting of Taurion hee vied more finenesse; loading him with daily commendations, as a notable man of warre, and one, whom for his many vertues, the King might ill spare from being alwayes in his presence. By such Art he thought to have removed him, as wee fay, Out of Gods blessing into awarme Sunne. In the meane feafon Aratus retired himfelfe; and fought to avoid the dangerous friendship of the King, by forbraring to meddle in affaires of State. As for the 50 new Prætor of Achaia, lately chosen by such vehement instance of the King; He was a man of no dispatch, and one that had no grace with the People. Wherefore a great deale of time was loft, whilest Philip wanted both the monie and the Corne, wherewith he should have beene furnished by the Acheans. This made the King vnderstand his owne errour; which he wisely sought to reforme betimes. He perswaded the Abbans to rejourne their Parliament from Ægium, to Sieyon the Towne of Aratu. There he dealt with the old man and his sonne: perswading them to forget what was past; & laying all the blame upon Apelles, on whom thenceforth he intended to keepe a more diligenteye. So by the trauell of these worthy men, Hee easily obtained what hee would of the Abbans. Fifty talents they gaue him our of hand; with great flore of Corne: and surther decreed, That so long as he himselse in person followed the warres in Peloponnessus, he should receive ten talents a moneth. Being thus enabled, he began to provide shipping, that so hee might into under the Æsoliams, E'euns, and Lacedamonians, that were maritime people, at his pleafure, and hinder their excursions by Sea.

It vexed Apelles beyond measure, to see things goe forward so well without his helpe; euen by the minitery of those whom hee most hated. Wherefore hee entered into conspiracie with Leanting and Asegulaus binding himselfe and them by oath, to crosse and bring to nought, as well as they were able, all that the King should take in hand. By so doing, they thought to bring it to passe, that very want of abilitie to doe any thing without them, should make him speake them taire; and beglad to submit himselse to their directions. The King it is like had stood in some awe of them whiles he was a childe, and therefore these wise men perswaded them to see the submitted of the seed
His fleet and Armie being in a readines : Philip made countenance, as if he would haue bent all his forces against the Eleans ; to whose aid therefore the Atolians sent men, little fearing that the mischiefe would have fallen as soone after it did, vpon themselues. But against the Eleans and those that came to help them, Philip thought itenough to leave the Acheans, with some part of his and their Mercinaries. He 30 himselfe with the body of his Armie putting to Sea, landed in the Isle of Cephallenia: whence the Atolians, dwelling over against it, vsed to furnish themselves of shipping, when they went to roue abroad. There he belieged the Towne of Palas, that had been very seruiceable to the Enemie against him and his Confederates; and might beevery vie-full to him, if hee could get it. Whilest hee lay before this Towne, there came vnto him fifteene ships of warre from Scerdilaidas; and many good Souldiers, from the Epirots, Acarnanians, and Meffenians. But the Towne was obstinate; and would not be terrified with numbers. It was naturally fenced on all parts faue one, on which fide Philip carried a Mine to the wall, wherewith he ouerthrew two hundred foote thereof. Leontius Captaine of the Targettiers, was ap-40 pointed by the King to make the affault. But hee, remembring his couenant with

40 pointed by the King to make the assault. But hec, remembring his couenant with Appelles; did both wilfully forbeare to doe his best; and caused others to doe the like. So the Macedonians were put to foile, and many slaine; not of the worlf souldiers, but such as had gotten ouer the breach, and would have carried the Towne, if the Treason of their Captaine, and some by him corrupted, had not hindered the victory. The King was angry with this, but there was no remedie; and therefore he thought vpon breaking vp the siege. For it was easier vnto the Townes-mento make vp the gap in their wall, than for him to make it wider. Whiles he shood thus perplexed, and vncertaine what course to take: the Messen and Aurmanians lay hard vpon him, each of them desirous to draw him into their owne Countrey. The Mufferians alleadged, that Lycurgus was busic in wasting their Countrey: vpon whom the King might come vnawares in one day; the Eresian windes which then blew, seruing fitly for his Nauigation. Hereto also Leonius perswaded; who considered that those windes, as they would cassily carrie him thirther, so would they detaine him there perforce (blowing all the Dog-dayes) and make him spend the Summer to small purpose. But Aratus gaue better counsaile, and prevailed. Hee shewed how vositting it were, to let the Atolians ouer-run all Theffalie againe, and fome part of Macedon, whilest the King withdrew his Armie farre off to seeke small aduentures. Rather, he faid, that the time now served well to carry the warre into Actolia; fince the Prator was gone thence abroad on rouing, with the one halfe of their strength. As for Lycurgus; hee was not strong enough to doe much harme in Peloponnesus: and it might suffice, if the Acheans were appointed to make head against him. According to this aduice, the King sets saile for Aetolia; and enters the Bay of Ambracia, which divided the Actolians from Acarnania The Acarnanians were glad to see him on their borders; and ioyned with him as many of them as 10 could beare armes, to helpe in taking vengeance vpon their bad neighbours. Hee marched vp into the in-land Countrie: and taking some places by the way, which he filled with Garrisons to assure his Retrait; Hee passed on to Thermum, which was the Receptacle of the Aetolians, and fureft place of defence in all extremities. The Country round about was a great Fastnesse, enuironed with rockie Mountaines of very narrow, steepe, and difficult ascent. There did the Aetolians vie to hold all their chiefe meetings, their Faires, their election of Magistrates, and their solemne games. There also they ysed to bestow the most precious of their goods, as in a place of greatest securitie. This opinion of the natural strength, had made them carelesse in looking vnto it. When Philip therefore had ouercome the bad way, there 20 was nothing elfe to doe than to take spoile: whereof hee found such plentie, that hee thought the paines of his iournie well recompenced. So hee loaded his Armie: and consuming all that could not be carried away, forgot not to raze a goodly Temple, the chiefe of all belonging vnto the Aetolians; in remembrance of the like their courtelie, shewed vpon the Temples of Dium and Dodona. This burning of the Temple, might (questionlesse) more for the Kings honour haue beene forborne. But perhaps he thought, as Monsieur du Gourgues the French Captaine told the Spaniards in Florids, That they which had no faith, needed no Church. At his returne from Thermum, the Atolians laid for him: which that they would doe, hee beleeved before; and therefore was not taken vnawares. Three thousand of them there were 20 that lying in ambush fell vpon his skirts: but hee had laide a Counter-ambush for them of his Illyrians; who staying behind the rest, did set vpon the backes of the Atolians, whilest they were busily charging in Rere the Armie that went before. So with flaughter of the enemie, he returned the same way that he came: and burning downe those places that he had taken before, as also wasting the Country round about him, Hee fafely carried all that hee had gotten aboord his Fleet. Once the Actolians made countenance of fight, issuing out of Stratus in great brauerie. But they were beaten home faster than they came, and followed to their very gates.

Theioy of this victorious Expedition being enery way complete, and not deformed (as commonly happens) by any finister accident; it pleased the King to 40 make a great feast vnto all his friends and Captaines. Thither were inuited among the rest Leontius, with his fellow Megaleas. They came, because they could not choose: but their heavie lookes argued, what little pleasure they tooke in the Kings prosperitie. It grieued them to thinke, that they should bee able to give no better account unto Apelles, of their hindering the Kings businesse; since Apelles himselfe, as will be showed anon, had plaied his owne part with a most mischieuous dexteritie. The forrow and indignation, which they could ill diffemble in their faces, brake out after supper, when they had warmed themselues with drinke, into open riot. Finding Aratus on the way home to his Tent: they fell to reuiling him, throwing stones at him, so that they caused agreat vprore; many running in (as 50 happens in such cases) to take part with the one or the other. The King sending to inquire of the matter, was truly informed of all that had paffed. Which made him fend for Leonius and his fellowes. But Leonius was gotten out of the way: Megaleas, and another with him, came. The King began to rate them for their dif-

order; and they, to give him froward answeres; insomuch as they faid at length, That they would neuer give ouer, till they had rewarded Aratus with a mischiefe as hee described. Hereupon the King committed them to ward. Leontine hearing of this, comes boldly to the King, with his Targettiers at his heeles; and with a proud grace demanded, who it was that had dared to lay hands vpon Megalens, yea and to cast him into prison? Why, said the King, It was even I. This resolute anfwere, which Leontius had not expected, made him depart both fad and angrie; feeing himfelfe out frowned, and not knowing how to remedie the matter. Shortly after. Megaleas was called forth to his answere, and was charged by Aratus with mato ny great crimes. Among which were, The hinderance of the Kings victorie at Pa-

lea, and the Compact made with Apelles: matters no leffe touching Leontius, that flood by as a looker on than Megaless that was accused. In conclusion, the presumptions against him were so strong, and his answeres thereto so weake; that he, and Crinon one of his fellowes, were condemned in twentie Talents: Crinon being remanded backe to prison; and Leontius becomming Bayle for Megaleas. This was done voon the way home-ward, as the King was returning to Corinth.

Philip dispatched well a great deale of businesse this yeere. For as soone as he was at Corinth, he tooke in hand an Expedition against the Lacademonians. These and the Eleans had done what harmethey could in Peloponnesus, while it the King was 20 ablent. The Acheans had opposed them as well as they could; wi. hill successe: yet fo, as they hindered them from doing such harme as else they would have done. But when Philip came, hee ouer-ran the Countrie about Lacedemon; and was in a manner at the gates of Sparta, ere men could well believe that he was returned out of Ætolia. He tooke not in this Expedition any Cities, but made great waste in the fields: and having beaten the enemie in some skirmishes, carried backe with him to Corinth a rich bootie of Cattell, flaues, and other Countrie-Spoile. At Corinth hee found attending him, Embaffadors from the Rhodians & Chians: that requested him to let Greece at quiet, by granting peace vnto the Atolians. They had gracious audience: and he willed them to deale first with the £tolians; who, if they would 30 make the same request, should not finde him vnreasonable. The Etolians had sped ill that yeere: neither saw they any likely hopes for the yeeres following. The Armie that they had fent forth to wast The falle and Macedon, found such opposition on the way; that not daring to proceed, it returned home without bringing any thing to effect. In the meane season they had beene grieuously afflicted, as before is shewed, by Philip in the center of their owne Countrie. All Greece and Macedon was up in armes against them, and their weake Allies the Eleans and Lacedemonians. Neither was it certaine, how long the one or other of these their Peloponnesian friends should becable to hold out; fince they were not strong enough to keepe the feild, but had alreadic suffered those miseries of war, which by a little continuance would 40 make them glad, each, to seeke their owne peace, without regard of their Confederates. Wherefore the Etalians readily entertained this Negotiation of peace : and taking truce for thirtie dayes with the King, dealt with him by intercession of the same Embassadours, to entreat his presence at a Diet of their Nation, that should bee held at Rhium; whither if he would vouchfafe to come, they promifed that hee should finde them conformable to any good reason.

Whilest these things were in hand; Leontius and Megaleas thought to have terrified the King, by raifing fedition against him in the Armie. But this device forted to no good effect. The fouldiours were easily and quickly incensed against many of the Kings friends; who were said to be the cause, why they were not rewarded 50 with so much of the bootie, as they thought to belong of right vnto them. But their anger spent it selfe in a noise, and breaking open of dores; without further harmedone. This was enough to informe the king ( who casily pacified his men with gentle words) that some about him were very false. Yea the fouldiours themselues, repenting of their insolence, desired to have the Authors of the tumult fought out, and punished according to their deserts. The King made shew as if he had not cared to make such inquisition. But Leontius and Megaleas were fore afraid, left the matter would loone come out of it selfe to their extreme danger. Wherefore they sent vnto Apelles, the Head and Archetect of their treason; requesting him speedily to repaire to Corinth, where hee might stand betweene them and the kings displeasure. Apelles had not all this while beene wanting to the bustneffe, vndertaken by him and his treacherous companions. He had taken vpon him, as a man that had the Kings heart in his owne hand: and thereby was hee growne into fuch credit, that all the Kings officers in Macedon and Theffalie addreffed themselves vnto him; and received from him their dispatch in every businesse. Likewise 10 the Greekes in all their flattering Decrees, tooke occasion to magnifie the vertue of Apelles; making flight mention (onely for fashion sake ) of the king; who seemed no better than the Minister and Executioner of Apelles his will and pleasure. Such was the arrogancie of this great man, in fetting himfelfe out vnto the people : but in mannaging the kings affaires, he made it his speciall care, that monie, and all things needfull for the publicke service, should be wanting. Yea he enforced the king, for very neede, to fell his owne Plate and houshold vessels: thinking to resolue these and all other difficulties, by onely faying, Sir, be ruled wholly by mee, and all shall be as you would wish. Hereto if the king would give affent; then had this Politician obtained his hearts defire. Now taking his journie from Chalcis in the Isle of Eubæa, to 20 the Citic of Corinth where Philip then lay : hee was fetcht in with great pompe and royaltie, by a great number of the Captaines and fouldiours; which Leontins and Megaleas drew forth to meete him on the way. So entering the Citie with a goodly traine; he went directly to the Court, and towards the Kings Chamber. But Philip was well aware of his pride; and had vehement suspition of his falshood. Wherfore one was fent to tell him, that he should waite a while, or come another time; for the king was not now at leifure to be spoken with. It was a pretie thing, that such a check as this made all his attendants for fake him, as a man in diffrace; in fuch fort that going thence to his lodging, he had none to follow him faue his owne Pages. After this, the King vouchsafed him now and then some slender graces: but in consultations, 30 or other matters of privacie, he vied him not at all. This taught Megaleus to looke vnto himselfe, and runne away betimes. Hereupon the King sent forth Taurion his Lieutenant of Peloponnesus, with all the Targettiers, as it were to doe some peece of feruice, but indeed of purpose to apprehend Leontins in the absence of his followers. Leontius being taken, dispatched away a messenger presently to his Targettiers, to fignifie what was befallen him : and they foorthwith fent vnto the King in his behalfe. They made request, That if any other thing were objected against him, hee might not be called forth to triall before their returne : as for the debt of Megaleas, if that were all the matter, they faid that they were readie to make a purse for his discharge. This affection of the souldiours, made Philip more hastie than else 40 he would have beene, to take away the Traitors life. Neither was it long, creletters of Megaleas were intercepted, which he wrote vnto the Ltolians; vilifying the king with opprobrious wordes; and bidding them not to hearken after peace, but to hold out a while, for that Philip was even readie to finke vnder the burden of his owne pouertie. By this the king vnderstood more perfectly the falshood, not onely of Megaleas, but of Apelles; whose cunning head had laboured all this while to keepe him so poore. Wherefore hee sent one to pursue Megaleas, that was fled to Thebes. As for Apelles, he committed both him, his sonne, and another that was inward with him, to prison; wherein all of them shortly ended their lines. Megaleas alfo, neither daring to stand to triall, nor knowing whither to flie, was wearie of his 50 owne life; and flew himfelfe about the same time.

The Ltalians, as they had begun this warre vpon hope of accomplishing what they lifted in the Nonage of Philip: fo finding that the vigour of this yong Prince, tempered with the cold aduice of Aratus, wrought very effectually toward their oouerthrow; they grew very desirous to make an end of it. Neuertheleile being a turbulent Nation, and readie to lay hold vpon all advantages: when they heard what was happened in the Court, the death of Apelles, Leontius, and Magaleus, together with some indignation thereupon conceived by the Kings Targettiers, they began to hope anew, that these troubles would be long lasting, and therevpon brake the day appointed for the meeting at Rhium. Of this was Philip nothing forie. For being ingood hope throughly to tame this viquiet Nation; He thought it much to concerne his owne honour, that all the blame of the beginning and continuing the warre should rest vpon themselves. Wherfore he willed his Confederates, to lay a-10 fide all thought of peace, and to prepare for war against the yeere following; wherein hee hoped to bring it to an end. Then gratified he his Macedonian fouldiors, by yeelding to let them winter in their owne Countrie. In his returne homeward, he called into judgement one Ptolemie, a companion with Apelles and Leontius in their Treasons: who was therefore condemned by the Macedonians; and suffered death. These were the same Macedonians, that lately could not endure to heare of Leontius his imprisonment: yet now they thinke the man worthic to die, that was but his adherent. So vaine is the confidence, on which Rebels vie to build in their fauour with the Multitude.

During his abode in Macedon, Philip wan some bordering Townes; from which 20 the Dardanians, Etolians, and other his ill neighbours, were accustomed to make rodes into his kingdome: when hee had thus prouided for fatetie of his owne; the Ætolians might well know what they were to expect. But there came againe Embaffadours from the Rhodians and Chians, with others from Ptolemie King of Egypt, and from the Citic of Byzantium, recontinuing the former follicitation about the Peace. This fashion had beene taken vp in matters of Greece, cuer since the Kings that raigned after Alexander, had taken upon them to fet the whole Countrie at libertie: No sooner was any Prouince or Citie in danger to be oppressed, and subdued by force of war, but prefently there were found intercellours, who pittying the effusion of Greekish bloud, would importune the stronger to relinquish his aduan-30 tage. By doing fuch friendly offices in time of neede, the Princes and States abroad fought to binde vnto them those people, that were howsoener weake in numbers, yet very good fouldiours. But hereby it came to passe, that the more froward fort, especially the Etolians, whose whole Nation was addicted to falshood and robberie, durst enter boldly into quarrels with all their neighbours : being well affured, that if they had the worst, The love of Greece would be sufficient to redceme their quiet. They had, fince the late Treatic of peace, done what harme they could in Peloponnefus : but being beaten by the Acheans, and standing in feare to bee more foundly beaten at home, they defired now, more carneftly than before, to make an end of the warre as foone as they might. Philip made fuch answere to the Embassa-40 dours, as he had done the former yeere; That he gaue not occasion to the beginning of this warre, nor was at the present either afraid to continue it, or vnwilling to end it : but that the Atolians, if they had a defire to live in reft, must first be dealt withall, to fignifie plainly their determination, whereto himselfe would returne such anfwere as he should thinke fit.

Philip had at this time no great liking vnto the Peace, being a yong Prince, and in hope to increase the honour which he daily got by the warre. But it happened in the middest of this Negotiation, that he was advertised by letters out of Macedon, what a notable victorie Hannibal had obtained against the Romans in the battraile at Thrasymene. These letters he communicated vnto Demetrius Pharius : who greatly 50 encouraged him to take part with Hannibal; and not to fit still, as an idle beholder of the Italian warre. Hereby he grew more inclinable than before vnto Peace with the Atolians: which was concluded shortly in a meeting at Naupactus. There did Agelans an Etolian make a great Oration: telling , how happic it was for the Greekes, that they might at their owne pleasure dispute about finishing war betweene them-

felues, without being molefted by the Barbarians. For when once either the Romans, or the Carthaginians, had fibdued one the other; it was not to bee doubted, that they would forthwith looke Eaftward, and feeke by all meanes to fet footing in Greece. For this cause he faid it were good, that their Countrie should be at peace within it selfe: and that Philip, if he were desirous of war, should lay hold on the opportunitie, now fitly serving, to enlarge his dominion, by winning somewhat in Italie. Sich aduice could the Lettinians then give, when they stood in seare of danger threatning them at hand: but being soone after wearie of reft, as accussomed to enrich themselves by pillage, they were so farre from observing and following their owne good counsel, that they invited the Romans into Greece, wherey they brought to themselves and the whole Countrie, (but themselves before any other part of the Countrie) under service of strangers. The Condition of this Peace was simple, That tracery one should keepe what they held at the present, without making resitution, or any amends for damages pass.

Philip, at the perfunsion of Demetrivs Pharivs, enters into League with Hannib al, against the Romans. The Tenour of the League between Hannib al and Philip.

His being agreed vpon: the Greekes betooke themselues to quiet courses of life; and Philip, to prepare for the bulinesse of Italie, about which hee consulted with Demetriae Pharius. And thus passed the timeaway, till the great battaile of Canna: after which hee toyned in League with Hamsibal, as hath beene shewed before. Demetrius Pharius bore great malice vnto the Romans; and knew no other way to bee auenged vpon them, or to recouer his owne lost Kingdome, than by procuring the Macedonian, 30 that was in a manner wholly guided by his counsaile, to take part with their enemies. It had otherwise beene farre more expedient for Philip, to have supported the weaker of these two great Cities against the more mightie. For by so doing, hee should perhaps have brought them to peace youn some equal termes; and thereshould be a support of the country of the c

by, as one there a tarte weaker there, made in his friendlhip. The iffue of the fed each of them to be defirous of chiefe place in his friendlhip. The iffue of the countails which he followed, will appear e foone after this. His first quarrell with the Romans; the trouble which they and the Leacus did put him to in Greece; and the Peace which they made with him for a time, you Gonditions that might easily be broken; have been related in another place as belonging vnto the second Punick 40 warre. Wherefore I will onely here set downer the tenour of the League betweene Him and Carthage; which may seeme not vnworthie to be read; if onely in regard of the formeit selfe then yed; though it had beene ouer-long to have beene inserted into a more busine peece.

THE OATH AND COVENANTS BETWEENE HANNIBAL, GENERALL OF THE

CARTHAGINIANS; and XENOPHANES,

In like manner shall King PHILIP and the Macedonians, and other the Greekes his Associates, bee saued and preserved by the Carthaginian. Armies, and by the Uticans, and by all Cities and N ations that obey the Carthaginians, and by their Associates and Souldiers, 10 and by all N ations and (ities in Italie, Gaule and Liguria, that are of our Alliance, or (hall hereafter ionne with Vs in 1. talie. Wee shall not take counsaile one against the other, nor deale fraudulently one with the other. Withall readinesse and good will, without deceit or subtiltie, We shall be enemies vnto the enemies of the Carthaginians, excepting those Kings, 20 Townes, and Hauens, with which We have alreadie league and friendship. Wee also shall be enemies to the enemies of King PHILIP, excepting those Kings, (ities, and Nations, with which VVee have alreadie league and friendship. The war that VVe have with the Romans, have Ye also with them, untill the Gods shall give us a new and happie end. Ye (hallaide Us with those things whereof VVee have neede, and 30 shall doe according to the Couenants betweene Us. But if the Gods shall not give vnto You and Us their helpe in this warre against the Romans and their Associates; then if the Ro. mans offer friendship, VV e shall make friendship in such wife that Ye shall be partakers of the same friendship, With Condition, That they shall not have power to make war vpon you: Neither shall the Romans bee Lords over the Corcyraans, nor over those of Apollonia, nor Dyrrachium, nor over Pharus,nor Dimalle,nor the Parthini,nor Atintania. They (hall also render unto DEMETRIUS PHARIUS all those that belong vnto him, as many as are within the Romans Dominions. But if the Romans (after such peace made) shall make war upon Ye or Vs We will succour one another in 50 that warre, as either shall have neede. The same shall be observed in warre made by any other, excepting those Kings, Cities, and States, with whom Wee hold alreadie league and friendship. To this League if VVe or Ye shall thinke fit to adde or detrast, such addition or detraction shall bemade by our common consent.

ò. IIII.

How PHILIP yeelded to his naturall vices being therein foothed by DEMETRIVS PHARIVS. His desire to tyrannize upon the free States his Affociates: With the troubles, into which hee thereby fell, whileft he bore a part in the fecond Puniske warre. He poisoneth ARATVS: and growes hatefull to the Ach.eans.

Itherto Philip had carried himfelfe as a vertuous Prince. And though with more commendation of his wifdome, he might have offered his friendship to the Romans, that were like to be oppressed, than to the Carthaginians who had the better hand: yet this his meddling in Carthaginians who had the better hand : yet this his meddling in the Punicke warre, proceeded from a royall greatnesse of minde, with a delire to secure and increase his owne estate, adding therewithall reputation to his Countrie. But in this businesse he was guided (as bath beene said) by Demetrius Pharius: who, looking throughly into his nature, did accommodate himselfe to his desires : and thereby shortly gouerned him, euen as he listed. For the vertues of Philip were not indeed such as they seemed. He was lustfull, bloudie, and tyrannicall : desirous of power to doc what hee listed, and not otherwise listing to doe what hee ought, than so farre foorth, as by making a faire shew he might breede in 30 men fuch a good opinion of him, as should helpe to serve his turne in all that hee tooke in hand. Before he should busie himselfe in Italie, hee thought it requisite in good policie, to bring the Greekes that were his Affociates vnder a more absolute forme of subjection. Hercunto Apelles had aduised him before; and hee had liked reasonably well of the course. But Apelles was a boisterous Counsellor, and one that referring all to his owne glory, thought himselfe deepely wronged if he might not wholy hauchis owne way, but were driven to await the Kings opportunitie at better times. Demetrius Pharius could well be contented to obserue the Kings humours: and guided, like a Coach-man with the reines in his hand, those affections which himselfe did onely seeme to follow. Therefore hee grew daily more and 49 more in credit: fo as, without any manner of contention, bee supplanted Aratus: which the violence of Apelles could never doe.

There arose about these times a very hote Faction among the Messenians, betweene the Nobilitie and Commons: their vehement thoughts being rather diuerted (as happens often after a forrein warre) vnto domesticall obiects: than allayed and reduced vnto a more quiettemper. In processe of no long time, the contention among them grew so violent, that Philip was entreated to compound the differences. Hee was glad of this: resoluing so to end the matter, that they should not hencefoorth striue any more about their Gouernment : for that he would assume it wholly to himselse. At his comming thither, hee found Aratus busic among them 50 to make all friends, after a better manner than agreed with his owne secret purpose. Wherfore he consulted not with this reuerend old man: but talked in private with fuch of the Messenians as repaired vnto him. He asked the Gouernours, what they meant to stand thus disputing : and whether they had not Lawes, to bridle the infolence of the vnruly Rabble: Contrariwife, in talking with the heades of the popular Faction, He said it was strange, that they being so many, would suffer themselues to be oppress d by a few; as if they had not hands to detend themselues from Tyrants. Thus whilest each of them presumed on the Kings affishance; they thought it best to goe roundly to worke, ere he were gone that should countenance their doings. The Gouernours therefore would have apprehended fome seditious Oratours, that were, they faid, the stirrers vp of the multitude vnto sedition. Vpon this occasion the People tooke Armes: and running vpon the Nobilitie and Magistrates, killed of them in a rage almost two hundred. Philip thought, it seemes, that it would be casie to worrie the sheepe, when the Dogges their guardians were staine. But his fallhood and double dealing was immediatly found out. Neyther did the to yonger Aratus forbeare, to tell him of it in publike, with very bitter and difgracefull words. The King was angrie at this. But having alreadie done more than was commendable, or excusable; and yet further intending to take other things in hand wherein hee should neede the helpe and countenance of his best friends; Hee was content to smother his displeasure, and make as faire weather as he could. Hee led old Aratus aside by the hand; and went vp into the Castle of Ithome, that was ouer Messene. There he pretended to doe facrifice and facrifice he did. But it was his purpose to keepe the place to his owne vse; for that it was of notable strength, and would scrue to command the further parts of Peloponnesus, as the Citadell of Corinth, which hee had alreadie, commaunded the entrance into that Countrie. 20 Whilest hee was therefore sacrificing, and had the entrailes of the beast deliuered into his hands, as was the manner; He shewed them to Aratus, and gently asked him, whether the tokens that he saw therein did signific, That being now in possesfion of this place, hee should quietly goe out of it, or rather keepe it to himselfe. He thought perhaps, that the old man would have foothed him a little; were it onely for defire to make amends, for the angrie words newly spoken by his sonne. But as Aratus flood doubtfull what to answere, Demetrius Pharius gaue this verdict: If thou bee a South ayer, thou maist goe thy wayes, and let slippe this good advantage : If thou be a King, thou must not neglect the oportunitie, but hold the Oxe by both his hornes. Thus he spake, resembling Ithome and Acrocorinthus vnto the two hornes of Peloponnesus. 20 Yet would Philip needes heare the opinion of Aratus: who told him plainly. That it were well done to keepe the place, if it might be kept without breach of his faith vnto the Messenians: But if, by seizing vpon Ithome, Hee must lose all the other Castles that hee held, and especially the strongest Castle of all that was left vnto him by Antigonus, which was his credit; then were it farre better to depart with his fouldiers, and keepe men in dutie, as hee had done hitherto, by their owne good wils, than by fortifying any strong places against them, to make them of his friends

To this good aduice Philip yeelded at the prefent:but not without some dislike, thencesorth growing betweene Him and the Arati; whom he thought more fro-49 ward than befeemed them, in contradicting his will. Neyther was the old man defirous at all, to deale any longer in the Kings affaires, or be inward with him. For as he plainly discovered his Tyrannous purposes: so likewise he perceived, that in resorting to his house. He had beene dissoned with his sonnes wife. Hee therefore staid at home: where at good leisure he might repent, that in despight of Cleamenes, his owne Countriman, and a temperate Prince, he had brought the Macedonians into Pelopome (us.

Philip made a Voyage out of Pelaponne fu into Epirus, whetein Aratus refuled to beare him companie. In this journie He found by experience what Aratus had lately told him; That vnhoneft counfailes are not fo profitable in deed, as in appearance. The Epirots were his followers and dependants; and fo they purposed to continue, But Hewould needes have them to to remaine, whether they purposed it or not. Wherefore to make them the more obnoxious vnto his will, Hee seized vpon their Towne of Oricum, and laid siege to Apollonia; shaning no good colour of these doings: but thinking himselfe strong enough to doe what hee listed, and not feeing whence they should procure friends to helpe them. Thus in stead of settling the country, as his intended Voyage into Italie required: He kindled a fire in it which he could neuer quench; writill it had laid hold on his owne Palace. Whiles the was thus labouring to bind the hands that should have sought for him in Italie: M. Valetius the Roman came into those parts; who not onely maintained the Epirors against him, but procured the Ætolians to breake the Peace, which they had lately made with him.

Thus began that warre; the occurrents whereof wee have related before, in chap.3.5 13. to place whereto it belonged. In mannaging whereof though Philip did the offices of a good Captaine: yet when leifure ferued, He made it apparant that he was a vicious King. He had not quite left his former defire, of oppreffing the libertie of the Mef-(ensans; but made another journie into their Countrie, with hope to deceiue them, as before. They understood him better now than before; and therefore were not hastie to trust him too farre. When he saw that his cunning would not serue, Hee went to worke by force; and calling them his Enemies, inuaded them with open warre. But in that warre hee could doe little good; perhaps, because none of his Confederates were delirous to helpe him in such an enterprise. In this artempt vpon Messene he lost Demetrius Pharius; that was his Counsailor, and Flatterer, not his 20 peruerter; as appeares by his growing daily more naught in following times. The worse that he sped, the more angriche waxed against those, that seemed not to fauour his iniurious doings. Wherefore by the Ministerie of Taurion, his Lieutenant. he poyfoned old Aratus; and shortly after that, hee poyfoned also the yonger Aratus: hoping that these things would neuer haue beene knowne, because they were done secretly, and the poylons themselves were more sure, than manifest in operation. The Sicyonians, and all the people of Achsia, decreed vnto Aratus more than humane honours, as Sacrifices, Hymnes, and Processions, to bee celebrated euery yeere twice, with a Priest ordained vnto him for that purpose; as was accustomed vnto the Heroes, or men, whom they thought to bee translated into the number of 30the gods. Hereuntothey are faid to haue beene encouraged by an Oracle of Apollo: which is like enough to have beene true; fince the helpe of the Deuill is neuer failing to the increase of Idolatrie. The louing memoric of Aratus their Patron, and singular Benefactor, could not but worke in the Acheans a marueilous diflike, of that wicked King which had made him thus away. He shall therefore heare of this hereafter, when they better dare to take counfaile for themselues. At the present, the murder was not generally knowne or beleeued: neither were they in case to sublist, without his help that had comitted it. The Atolians were a most outragious people, great darers, and shamelesse robbers. With these the Romans had made a League: whereof the Conditions were soone 40 disulged, especially that maine point, concerning the disission of the purchase which they should make; namely, That the Æiolians should have the country and townes; but the Romans the spoile, and carrie away the people to sell for slaues. The Achaans, who in times of greater quiet could not endure to make streight alliance with the Atolians, as knowing their vnciuill disposition; were much the more averse from them, when they perceived how they had called in the Barbarians (for such did the Greekes account all other Nations except their owne) to make hauocke of the Country. The same consideration moved also the Lacedamonians, to stand off awhile. beforethey would declare themselues for the Atolians; whose friendship they had embraced in the late warre. The industrie therefore of Philip, and the great care 50 which he seemed to take of the Acheans his Confederates, sufficed to retaine them:

50 which he fermed to take of the Acheans his Confederates, turned to retain etnems; especially at such time, as their ownenceessitie was thereto concurrent. More particularly he obliged wnto himselfethe Dymeans, by an incessimable benefit reconcing their Towne, after it had been etaken by the storms; and Actolians; and redering their Towne, after it had been etaken by the storm, that had been carried away ming their people wheresoeuer they might bee found, that had been carried away Eccese 3. Captines,

Captiue, and fold abroad for flaues. Thus might he have blotted out the memorie of offences past; if the malignitie of his naturall condition had not other whiles broken out, and given men to vnderstand; that it was the Time, and not his Vertue, which caused him to make such a shew of goodnesse. Among other soule acts, whereof he was not ashamed; He tooke Polycratia the wife of the yonger Aratus, and carried her into Macedon : little regarding how this might ferue to confirme in the people their opinion, that he was guiltie of the old mans death. But of fuch faults he shall be told, when the Romans make warre upon him the second time: for of that which happened in this their first Inuasion, I holde it superfluous to make re-

Of PHILOPOMEN Generall of the Acheans : and MACHANIDAS, Tyrant of Lacedamon. A battaile betweene them, wherein MACHANIDAS is flaine.

T happens often, that the decease of one eminent man discouers the vertue of another. In the place of Aratus there stood vp Philopamen: 20 whose notable valour, and great skill in Armes, made the Nation of the Acheans redoubtable among all the Greekes, and carelesse of such protection, as in former times they had needed against the violence of their neighbours. This is that Philopamen: who being then a yong man, and having no command; did especiall service to Antigonus at the battaile of Sellasia against Cleomenes. Thence-forward untill now he had spent the most part of his time in the Ile of crete: the Inhabitants whereof being a valiant people, and feldome or neuer at peace betweene themselues; He bettered among them his knowledge, and practice in the Art of warre. At his returne home, Hee had charge of the Horse: wherein he carried himselfe so strictly, trauailing with all the Cities of the Confede- 20 racic to have his followers well mounted, and armed at all pieces: as also he so diligently trained them vp in all exercise of service, that hee made the Acheans very strong in that part of their forces. Being after chosen Prætor or Generall of the Nation, Hee had no lesse care to reforme their militarie discipline throughout, whereby his Countrie might be strong enough to defend it selfe, and not any longer (as in former times) need to depend vpon the helpe of others. Hee perswaded the Acheans to cut off their vaine expence of brauerie, in apparrell, housholdstuffe, and curious fare, and to pellow that cost vpon their Armes: wherein by how much they were the more gallant, by so much were they like to proue the better Souldiours; and suteable in behaulour, vnto the pride of their furniture. They had serued hi- 40 therto with little light Bucklers, and slender Darts, to cast afarre off: that were vsefull in skirmishing at some distance, or for Surprises, or sudden and hastic Expeditions; whereto Aratus had beene most accustomed. But when they came to handie ftrokes, they were good for nothing: fo as they were wholly driven to relie vpon the courage of their Mercinaries. Philopamen altered this: causing them to arme themfelues more weightily, to vse a larger kind of shield, with good swords, and strong pikes, fit for service at hand. He taught them also to fight in close order; and altered the forme of their embattailing : not making the Files so deepe as had beene accustomed, but extending the Front, that he might vse the scruice of many hands.

Eight Moneths were spent of that yeere, in which hee first was Prætor of the 50 Acheans; when Machanidas the Tyrant of Lacedamon caused him to make triall, how his Souldiers had profited by his discipline. This Machanidas was the succesfor ynto Lycurgus; a man more violent than his fore-goer. He kept in pay a strong Armie of Mercinaries : and he kept them not onely to fight for Sparta; but to hold the Citie in obedience to himselfeperforce. Wherefore it behoued him not to take part with the Acheans, that were fauourers of libertie; but to firengthen himselse by friendship of the Etolians: who, in making Alliances, tooke no turther notice of Vice or Vertue, than as it had reference to their owne profit. The people also of Lacedamon, through their inucterate hatred vnto the Argines, Acheans, and Macedonians; were in like fort (all or most of them) inclinable to the Etolian Faction. Very vnwifely. For in feeking to take reuenge vpon those, that had lately hindered them from getting the Lordinip of Peloponnefus; they hindred themselues thereby from recourring the Mastrie of their owne Citie. This affection of the Spartans, toto gether with the regard of his owne fecuritie, and no fmall hope of good that would follow, suffered not Machanidas to be idle, but made him alwayes ready to fall vpon his neighbours backes, and take of theirs what he could, whileft they were enforced, by greater necessitie, to turne face another way. Thus had hee often done, especially in the absence of Philip: whose sudden comming into those parts, or some other opposition made against him, had viually made him taile of his attempts. At the present He was stronger in men, than were the Acheans; and thought his owne men better Souldiours than were theirs.

Whilest Philip therefore was busied else-where, hee entred the Countrie of the

Mantineans: being not without hope to doe as Cleamenes had done before him; yea 20 and perhaps to get the * Lordship of Peloponnesus, as having stronger friendes, * Except. è and weaker oppolition, than Cleomenes had found. But Philopamen was readie to Politicalist entertaine him at Mantinea; where was fought betweene them a great battaile. Flat in vita The Tyrant had brought into the fielde vpon Cartes a great many of Engines; wherewith to beate vpon the Squadrons of his Enemies, and put them in disorder. To preuent this danger, Philopamen sent foorth his light armature a good way before him; so as Machanidas was faine to doe the like. To second these, from the one and the other side came in continual supplie; till at length all the Mercinaries, both of the Achans and of Machanidas, were drawne vp to the fight: being so far advanced, each before their owne Phalanx, that it could no 30 otherwife be discerned which pressed forward, or which recoyled, than by rising of the dust. Thus were Machanidas his Engines made unserviceable, by the interpolition of his owne men; in such manner as the Canon is hindered from doing execution, in most of the battailes fought in these our times. The Mercinaries of the Tyrant prevailed at length: not onely by their advantage of number, but (as Poly-Polybibid. bius well observeth) by surmounting their opposites in degree of courage; wherein vfually the hired fouldiers of T yrants exceed those that are waged by free States. For as it is true, that a free people are much more valiant, than they which live oppreffed by T yrannie, fince the one, by doing their best in fight, have hope to acquire somewhat beneficiall to themselves, whereas the other doe fight (as it were) 40 to affure their owne feruitude; fo the Mercinaries of a Tyrant, being made partakers with him in the fruites of his prosperitie, have good cause to maintaine his quarrellas their owne; whereas they that ferue vnder a free State, have no other motiue to doe manfully, than their bare stipend. Further than this, When a free State hath gotten the Victorie: many Companies (if not all) of forrein Auxiliaries are presently cast; and therefore such good fellowes will not take much paines to bring the warre to an end. But the victorie of a Tyrant, makes him stand in neede of more such helpers: because that after it he doth wrong to more, as having more Subjects; and therefore stands in searc of more, that should seeke to take revenge vpon him. The stipendaries therefore of the Acheans, being forced to give ground, so were veged to violently in their retrait by those of Machanidas, that shortly they be-tooke themselves to flight; and could not bee staid by any perswasions of Philopamen, but ranne away quite beyond the battaile of the Acheans. This difaster had beene sufficient to take from Philopamen the honour of the day; had hee not wifely observed the demeanour of Machanidas, and found in him that errour which might restore the victorie. The Tyrant with his Mercinaries gaue chace unto those that fled : leaving behind him in good order of battaile his Lacedamonians; whom hee thought sufficient to deale with the Acheans, that were alreadie disheartned by the flight of their companions. But when this his rashnesse had carried him out of fight; Philopamen advanced towards the Lacedamonians that flood before him. There lay betweene them athwart the Country a long ditch, without water at that time; and therefore passable (as it seemed ) without much difficultie, especially for Foot. The Lacedamonians aduentured ouer it, as thinking themselves better souldiers than the Achaans, who had in a manner alreadie loft the day. But hereby they greatly disordered their owne Battaile; and had no sooner the foremost of them re- 10 couered the further banke, than they were stoutly charged by the Acheans, who draue them headlong into the ditch againe. Their first rankes being broken, all the rest began to shrinke: so as Philopamen getting over the ditch, easily chaced them out of the Field. Philopamen knew better how to vie his advantage, than Machanidas had done. Hee suffered not all his Armie to disband and follow the chace: but retained with him a sufficient strength, for the custodie of a bridge that was ouer the ditch, by which he knew that the Tyrant must come backe. The Tyrant with his Mercinaries returning from the chace, looked very heavily when he faw what was fallen out. Yet with a lustic Troupe of Horse about him Hee made towards the bridge: hoping to find the Achaans in diforder; and to fet vpon their backes, as they 20 were carelessely pursuing their Victorie. But when he and his Companie faw Philopamen ready to make good the bridge against them; then beganne euerie one to looke, which way he might shift for himselfe. The Tyrant, with no more than two in his companie, rode along the ditch fide; and searched for an easie passage ouer. He was eafily discovered by his purple Cassocke, and the costly trappings of his Horse. Philopamen therefore leaving the charge of the bridge vnto another, coafted him all the way as he rode, and falling vpon him at length in the ditch it felfe, as he was getting ouer it, flew him there with his owne hand. There died in this Battaile on the Lacedamonians fide about four ethousand more than four ethousand were taken Prisoners. Of the Achean Mercinaries, probable it is that the losse was 30 not greatly cared for fince that War was at an end, and for their monie they might hire more when they should have need.

PHILIP bauing peace with Rome, and with all Greece, prepares against Asia. Of the Kings of Pergamus, Cappadocia, Pontus, Paphlagona, Bithynia; and their Linages. Of the Galatians.

Y this victorie the Acheans learned to thinke well of themselues. Neither needed they indeed after awhile (fuch was their discipline, and continuall exercise) to account themselves in matter of war inferiour to any, that should have brought against them no great oddes of number. As for the Macedonian, He made no great vse of them: But when he had once concluded peace with the Romans and Ætolians, He studied how to enlarge his Dominion Eastward fince the fortune of his friends the Carthaginians declined in the West. He tooke in hand many matters together, or very necrely together, and some of them not honest: wherein if the Acheans would have done 50 him feruice; they must, by helping him to oppresse others that neuer had wronged him, have taught him the way how to deale with themselves. He greatly hated Attalus King of Pergamus, who had joyned with the Romans and Atolians in warre against him.

This Attalus, though a King, was scarce yet a Noble-man, otherwise than as he was ennobled by his owne, and by his Fathers vertue. His fortune beganne in Phis leterus his Vncle: who being guelded, by reason of a mishap which hee had when he was a child, grew afterwards thereby to bee the more eneemed; as great men in those times reposed much confidence in Eunuches, whose affections could not be obliged vnto wines or children. He was entertained into the familie of Docimsus, a Captaine following Antigonus the first; and after the death of Antigonus, he accompanied his Master, that betooke himselfe to Lysmachus King of Thrace. Lysmachus had good opinion of him; and put him in truit with his monic and accompts. But 10 when at length hee flood in feare of this King, that grew a bloudie Tyrant: Hee fled into Asia, where he seized upon the Towne of Pergamus, and nine thousand talents belonging to Lysimachus. The towns and monie, together with his owne seruice, He offered vnto Seleucus the first, that then was readie to give Lysmachus battel. His offer was kindly accepted, but never performed; for that Seleucus having flaine Lysimachus, died shortly after himselfe, before he made vie of Phileterus or his monic. So this Eunuch till retained Pergamus with the Countrie about it; and reigned therein twentie yeeres as an absolute King. Hee had two brethren: of which the elder is faid to have been a poore Carter; and the yonger perhaps was not much better; before such time as they were raised by the fortune of this Eunuch. Philete-20 rus left his Kingdome to the elder of these, or to the sonne of the elder called Eumenes. This Eumenes enlarged his kingdome; making his advantage of the diffension, betweene Seleucus Calinicus and Antiochus Hierax, the fonnes of the fecond Antiochus. He fought a battaile with Hierax, neere vnto Sardes, and wan the victorie. At which time, to animate his men against the Gaules that served under his Enemie, he ysed a pretie deuice. facrificed, had cleanly taken the print of the letters, He published this vnto his Ar-mic as a Miracle, plainely fore-lhewing that the gods would bee affiliant in that

Battaile, After this victorie, he grew a dreadfull enemie to Selencus: who never durst attempt to recover from him, by warre, the Territorie that hee had gotten and held. Finally, when hee had reigned two and twentie yeeres, hee died by a furfet of ouermuch drinke; and left his Kingdome to Attalut, of whom wee now entreat, that was some vnto Attalus the yongest brother of Phileterus. Attalus was an vndertaking Prince, very bountifull, and no leffe valiant. By his owne proper forces Herestored his triend Ariarathes the Cappadocian into his Kingdome, whence he had been expelled. He was grieuoufly molefled by Acheus: who fetting up himfelfe as King against Antischus the great, reigned in the leffer Asia. He was belieged in his owne Citic of Pergamus: but by helpe of the Tecto/aga, a Nation of the Gaules, whom hee 40 called ouer out of Thrace, He recouered all that he had loft. When these Gaules had once gotten footing in Asa, they never wanted employment: but were either entertained by some of the Princes reigning in those quarters; or interpoled themfelues, without inuitation, and found themselves worke in quarrels of their owne making. They caused Prusias King of Buthynia to cease from his warre against Byzantium. Whereunto when hee had condescended; they neverthelesse within awhile after invaded his Kingdome. Hee obtained against them a great victorie; and vsed it with great crueltie, sparing neither age nor fexe. But the swarme of them increasing; they occupied the Region about Hellespont: where, in seating themselves, they were much beholding vnto Attalus. Neuerthelesse, presuming afterwards 50 vpon their strength; they forced their neighbour Princes and Cities to pay them tribute. In the sharpe exaction whereof, they had no more respect vnto Attalus than to any that had worse deserved of them. By this they compelled him to fight against them: and Heebeing victorious, compelled them to containe themselues within the bounds of that Province, which tooke name from them in time follow-restore the victorie. The Tyrant with his Mercinaries gaue chace vnto those that fled : leaving behind him in good order of battaile his Lacedamonians; whom hee thought sufficient to deale with the Acheans, that were alreadie disheartned by the flight of their companions. They caused Prastas King of Bubynia to cease from his warre against Byzantum. Whereunto when hee had condescended; they neuertheleffe within awhile after invaded his Kingdome. Hee obtained against them a great victorie; and vsed it with great crueltie, sparing neither age nor fexe. But the swarme of them increafing; they occupied the Region about Hellespont: where, in seating themselves, they were much beholding vnto Attalus. Neuertheleffe, prefuming afterwards 50 vpon their strength; they forced their neighbour Princes and Cities to pay them tribute. In the sharpe exaction whereof, they had no more respect vnto Attalus than to any that had worle deferued of them. By this they compelled him to fight against them: and Hee being victorious, compelled them to containe themselves within the bounds of that Province, which tooke name from them in time following, and was called Galatia. Yet continued they still to oppresse the weakest of their neighbours; and to fill up the Armies of those, that could best hire them.

The Kings reigning in those parts, were the posteritie of such, as had saved themfelues and their Provinces, in the flothful reigne of the Perfians; or in the bufic times of Alexander, and his Macedonian followers. The Cappadecians were vericancient. For the first of their line had married with Atoffa, fister vnto the great King Cyrus. Their Countrie was taken from them by Perdicess, as is shewed before. But the son of that King, whom Perdiceas crucified, espying his time while the Macedonians were at civill warres among themselves; recovered his dominion, and passed it over to his off-spring. The Kings of Pontus had also their beginning from the Persian 10 Empire; and are faid to have iffued from the royall house of Achamenes. The Paphlagonians deriued themselves from Pylamenes, a King that affisted Priamus at the warre of Troy. These, applying themselves vnto the times, were alwayes conformable vnto the strongest. The Ancestors of Prusias had begun to reigne in Bithynia. some few generations before that of the great Alexander. They lay somewhat out of the Macedonians way: by whom therfore, having other employment, they were the leffe molested. Calantus, one of Alexanders Captaines, made an Expedition into their Countrie; where hee was vanquished. They had afterwards to doe with a Lieutenant of Antigonus, that made them somewhat more humble. And thus they shuffled, as did the rest, vntill the reigne of Prusias, whom wee haucalreadie some- 20 times mentioned.

d. VII.

The Towne of Ciostaken by PHILIP, at the instance of PRVSIAS King of Bithynia and cruelly destroyed. By this and like actions, PHILIP growes hatefull to many of the Greekes: and is warred woon by ATTALVS King of Pergamus, and by the Rhodians.

R v s 1 As as a neighbour King, had many quarrels with Attalus, whose greatness the uspected, Hetherefore strengthned himselfe, by taking to wife the daughter of Philip; as Attalus, on the contrarie fide, entred into a strict Confederacie with the Esolians, Rhodians, and other of the Greekes. But when Philip had ended his £tolian warre, and was deuiling with Antischus about sharing betweene them two the Kingdome of Egypt, wherein Ptolomie Philopater a friend vnto them both was newly dead, and had left his sonne Ptol. Epiphanes a yong child his heire; the Bithynian entreated this his Father-in-law to come ouer into Asia, there to winne the Towne of the Ciani, and be-40 flow it vpon him. Prufias had no right vnto the Towne, nor just matter of quarrell against it: but it was fitly seated for him; and therewithall rich. Philip came; as one that could not well denie to helpe his Sonne-in-law. But hereby hee mightily offended no small part of Greece. Embassadours came to him whilest hee lay at the fiege, from the Rhodians, and divers other States : entreating him to for fake the Enterprise. He gaue dilatorie, but otherwise gentle answeres: making shew as if he would condificend to their request; when he intended nothing lesse. At length hee got the Towne: where, euen in presence of the Embassadours, of whose sollicitation he had seemed so regardfull, Hee omitted no part of crueltic. Hereby hee rendred himselfe odious to his neighbours, as a perfidious and cruell Prince. Espe- 50 cially his Fact was detected of the Rhodians: who had made vehement interceffion for the poore Ciani; and were aduertifed by Embassadours of purpose sent vnto them from Philip, That, howfocuer it were in his power to winne the Towne as foone as he listed: yet in regard of his love to the Rhodians, Hee was contented to give it ouer. And by this his elemencie the Embassadours said, that he would manifest vnto the World, what slanderous tongues they were; which noyled abroad fuch reports, as went of his fallshood and oppressions. Whilest the Embassadours were declaming at Rhodes in the Theater to this effect; there came some that made a true relation of what had hapned: shewing that Philip had sacked and destroyed the Towne of Cios, and, after a cruell flaughter of the Inhabitants, had made flaues of all that escaped the sword. If the Rhodians tooke this in great despight, no lesse were the £tolians inflamed against him: fince they had fent a Captaine to take charge of the Towne; being warned before by his doings at Lysimachia and Chalto cedon (which he had withdrawne from their Confederacie to his owne) what little trust was to be reposed in the faith of this King. But most of all others was Attalus moued, with confideration of the Macedonians violent ambition, and of his owne cflate. He had much to lofe; and was not without hope of getting much, if he could makea strong Partie in Greece. He had alreadic, as a new King, followed the example of Alexanders Captaines, in purchasing with much liberalitie the love of the Athenians; which were notable Trumpetters of other mens vertue, having loft their owne. On the friendship of the Ætolians he had cause to presume ; having bound them vnto him by good offices, many and great, in their late warre with Philip. The Rhodians that were mightie at Sea, and held very good intelligence with the Asyp-20 tians, Syrians, and many other Princes and States, Hec calily drew into a streight Alliance with him ; by their hatred newly conceived against Philip.

Vpon confidence in these his friends, but most of all in the readic assistance of the Rhodians, Attalus prepared to deale with the Macedonian by open warre. It had been vnseasonable to procrastinate, and expect whereto the doings of the Enemie tended since his desire to fasten upon Asia was manifest, and his falshood no lesse manifest, than was such his desire. They met with him shortly not farre from Chios, and fought with him a battaile at Sea: wherin though Attalus was driven to runne his owne ship on ground, hardly escaping to land: though the Admiral of the Rhodians tooke his deaths wound : and though Philip after the battaile tooke harbour 30 vader a Promontorie, by which they had fought, so that he had the gathering of the Wracks vpon the shore: Yet for a smuch as He had suffered farre greater losse of ships and men, than had the Enemie: and since He durst not in few dayes after put forth to Sea, when Attalus and the Rhadians came to brane him in his Port; the honour of the victorie was adjudged to his Enemies. This not withflanding, Philip afterwards belieged and wanne some Townes in Caria: whether onely in a brauerie, and to despight his opposites; or whether upon any hopefull desire of conquest; it is vncertaine. The stratageme, by which he wonne Prinoffus, is worthie of noting. He attempted it by a Myne: and finding the Earth fo fionie, that it relisted his worke, He neuerthelesse commanded the Pyoners to make a noyse under ground; 40 and secretly in the night-time Hee raysed great Mounts about the entrance of the Myne, to breed an opinion in the belieged, that the worke went marucilously forward. At length he sent word to the Townssimen, that by his vnder myning, two acres of their wall flood onely vpon woodden props: to which if he gaue fire, and entred by a breach, they should expect no mercie. The Prinassians little thought, that he had fetcht all his earth and rubbish by night a great way off, to raise vp those heapes which they faw; but rather that all had beene extracted out of the Myne. Wherfore they suffered themselves to be outfaced; and gave up the Towne as loft, which the Enemie had no hope to winne by force. But Philip could not flay to lettle himselse in those parts. Attalus and the Rhodians were too strong for him at 50 Sca, and compelled him to make hafte backe into Macedon; whither they followed him all the way in manner of pursuit.

a. VIII.

The Romans, after their Carthaginian warre, seeke matter of quarrell against PHILIP. The Athenians, upon flight cause, proclaime warre against PHILIP; moued thereto by A T T A L V S; whom they flatter. PH1 LIP winnes divers Townes: andmakes peremptorie answere to the Roman Embassadour. The furious refolution of the Abydeni.

Hefe Asiatique matters, which no way concerned the Romans, yet serued well to make a noyle in Rome ; and fill the peoples heads, if not with a delire of making warre in Macedon, at leaft with a conceit with a delire in making warre in Macedon, at leaft with a conceit of the Control Strate was perfectly that it were expedient so to doe. The Roman Senate was perfectly informed of the flate of those Easterne Countries; and knew, that there was none other Nation than the Greekes, which lay betweene them and the Lordship of Asia. These Greekes were factious, and seldome or neuer at peace. As for the Macedonian, though length of time, and continual dealings in Greece euer fince the Reignes of Philip and Alexander, had left no difference betweene him and the Naturals: yet most of them abhorred his Dominion, because He was original- 20 ly for footh a Barbarian: many of them hated him vpon ancient quarrels: and they that had been most beholding vnto him, were neuerthelesse wearie of him, by reason of his personall faults. All this gaue hope, that the affaires of Greece would not long detaine the Roman Armies: especially since the divisions of the Country were fuch, that eueric pettie Estate was apt to take counsaile apart for it selfe; without much regarding the generalitic. But the poore Commonaltie of Rome had no great affection to such a chargeable enterprise. They were alreadic quite exhausted, by that grieuous war with Hannibal: wherein they had given by Loane to the Republike all their monic; neither had they as yet received, neither did they receive vntill fifteene or fixteene yeeres after this, their whole summe backe againe. That part of 30 paiment also which was alreadie made, being not in present monie, but much of it in Land: it behoued them to rest awhile; and bestow the more diligence in tilling their grounds, by how much they were the leffeable to bestow cost. Wherefore they took no pleasure to heare, that Attalus and the Rhodians had sent Embassadors to follicite them against Philip, with report of his bold attempts in Afa: or that M. Aurelius, their Agent in Greece, had fent letters of the same tenour to the Senate, and magnified his intelligence, by fetting out the preparations of this dangerous enemic, that follicited not onely the Townes vpon the Continent, but all the Ilands in those Seas, visiting them in person, or sending Embassadours, as one that meant shortly to hold warre with the Romans vpontheir owne ground. Philip had indeed 40 no fuch intent:neither was he much too ftrong either of himselfe, or by his alliance in Greece, to be refisted by Attalus and the Rhodians, especially with the helpe of the Ætolians their good friends, and (in a manner) his owne professed enemics. But such things must be published abroad, if onely to predispose men vnto the warre, and giue it the more honest colour.

Philip was a man of ill condition; and therfore could not thrine by intermeddling in the affaires of those, that were more mightie than himselfe. He was too vnskilfull, or otherwife too vnapt, to retaine his old friends: yet would he needes be fecking new enemies. And he found them fuch, as he deserved to have them: for he offered his helpe to their destruction, when they were in miserie, and had done se him no harme. It behoued him therefore, either to have strained his forces to the vtmost in making warre vpon them; or, in delisting from that injurious course, to haue made amends for the wrongs past, by doing friendly offices of his owne accord. But He, having broken that League of peace which is of all other the most naturall, binding all men to offer no violence willingly, vnleffe they think them felues justly prouoked; was afterwards too fondly perswaded, that he might well be secure of the Romans, because of the written Couenants of peace betweene him and them. There is not any forme of oath, whereby such articles of peace can be held inusolable, faue onely by the water of Styx, that is, by Necessitie: which whilest it bindes one *Sir Fr. Bacon partie, or both vnto performance, making it apparent that he shall bee a loser who de Sap. veternm. flarts from the Conditions; it may follong (and follong onely) becorefumed, that there shall be no breach. Till Hannibal was vanquished, the Romans never hearkened after Philip: for necessitie made them let him alone. But when once they had peace with Carthage, then was this River of Styx dried vp; and then could they fweare as * Mercurie did in the Comedie, by their owne felues, even by their good "Plant Amo fwords, that they had good reason to make warre upon him. The Voyage of Sopa. Phil. ter into Africke, and the present warre against Attalus; were matter of quarrell as much as needed : or if this were not enough, the Athenians helped to furnish them

The Athenians, being at this time Lords of no more than their owne barren Territorie, tooke state vpon them neuerthelesse, as in their ancient fortune. Two yong Gentlemen of Acarmania entring into the Temple of Ceres, in the dayes of Initiation, ( wherein were deliuered the mysterics of Religion, or rather of Idolatrous super-20 flition, vainly faide to becauaileable vnto felicitie after this life) discouered themfelnes by fome impertinent questions, to be none of those that were initiated. Hereypon they were brought before the Officers; and though it was apparent, that they came into the place by meere errour, not thinking to have therein done amiffe; yet, as it had beene for some hainous crime, they were put to death. All their Countrymen at home tooke this in ill part; and fought to revenge it as a publike injurie, by warre vpon the Athenians. Procuring therefore of Philip some Macedonians to helpe them, they entred into Attica: who wasted it with fire and sword; and carried thence away with them a great bootie. This indignitic flirred up the high-minded Athemians; and made them thinke vpon doing more, than they had abilitie to performe. 20 All which at the prefent they could doe, was to fend Embassadours to King Attalus; gratulating his happie successe against Philip, and entreating him to visit their Citic. Attalus was hereto the more willing; because he understood, that the Roman Embaffadours, houering about Greece for matter of intelligence, had a purpose to bee there at the same time. So he went thither, accompanied, besides his owne followers, with some of the Rhodians. Landing in the Piraus, hee found the Romans there, with whom he had much friendly conference: they rejoycing that he continued enemy to Philip; and He being no leffe glad, when he heard of their purpose to renew the warre. The Athenians came foorth of their Citie, all the Magistrates, Priests, and Citizens, with their wives and children, in as folemne a pompe as they could deuise, to 49 meet and honour the King. They entertained the Romans that were with him, in very louing manner: but towards Attalus himselfe they omitted no point of obfernance, which their flatteric could fuggeft. At his first comming into the Citie they called the people to Assembly: where they defired him to honour them with his presence, and let them heare him speake. But he excused himselfe; saying, That with an euill grace he should recount vnto them those many benefits, by which he studied to make them know what love he bore them. Wherefore it was thought fit, that he should deliver in writing, what he would have to be propounded. He did fo. The points of his Declaration were; first, what he had willingly done for their fake: then, what had lately passed betweene him and Philip: lastly, an exhortation 50 vnto them, to declare themselves against the Macedonian, whilest he with the Rhodians, and the Romans, were willing and readic to take their part: which if they now refused to doe, He protested, that afterwards it would bee vaine to crane his helpe. There needed little entreatie: for they were as willing to proclaime the warre, as Hec to desire it. As for other matters, they loaded him with immoderate honours: and ordained, That vnto the ten Tribes, whereof the bodie of their Citizens consisted, should be added another, and called after his name; as if Hee were in part one of their Founders. To the Rhodians they also decreed a Crowne of Gold, in reward of their vertue; and made all the Rhodians free Citizens of Athers.

Thus beganne agreat noy so of warre, wherein little was lest vnto the Romans for their part; Midlus and the Rhodians taking all youn them. But while these were vainly mil-spending the time, in seeking to draw the Abolians to their partie; that contrarie to their olde manner were glad to bee at quiet: Philip wanne the Townes of Maromea and Abnus, with many other strong places about the Hellespont, to Likewise passing over the Hellespont, Hee layd siege vnto Abylus; and wanne it, though Hee was saine to say there long. The Towne held out, rather upon an obstituate resolution, and hope of succour from Antalus and the Rhodians, then any great ability to desent it selfe against so might ea memie. But the Rhodians sent this ter onely one Quadrireme Gallie and Attalus no more than three hundred menssare too weake an aide to make good the place. The Roman Embala sadours wondred much at this great negligence, of them that had taken so much vpon them.

These Embassadours c. Claudius, M. Emplius, and P. Sempronius, were sent vnto Ptolemie Epiphane: King of Ægypt, to acquaint him with their victorie against Hm-20 mibal and the Carthoginan; as also to thanke him for his fauour vnto them showed in that warre; and to desire the continuance thereof, if they should neede it against Philip. This Ægyptian King was now in the third or fourth yecre of his Reigne, which (as his Father Philipator had done before him) Hee beganne a very young boy. The courtesse for which the Romans were to thanke him, was, That out of Ægyptine had lately beene supplied with Corne, in a time of extreme Dearth; when the misseries of Warre had, made all their owne Proninces vnable to resecute them. This message could not but bee welcome to the Ægyptian; since it was well knowne, how Philip and Antiochus had combined themselues against him; conspiring to take away his Kingdome. And therefore it might in reason 30 bee hoped, that Hee, or his Councell for him, should offer to supplie the Romans with Corne: since this their Macedonian Expedition concerned his Estate no selfse than theirs.

But as the errand was for the most part complementall: so had the Embassadours both leifure, and direction from the Senate, to looke vnto the things of Greece by the way. Wherefore they agreed, that M. Amylius the yongest of them should steppe aside, and visit Philip, to trie if he could make him leaue the siege of Abydin; which elle He was like to carry. Emylius, comming to Philip, telles him, that his doings are contrarie to the League that Hee had made with the Romans. For Attalia and the Rhodians, vpon whom Hee made warre, were Confederate with Rome: and 40 the Towne of Abydus, which Hee was now befieging, had a kind of dependancie vpon Attalus. Hereto Philip answered, That Attalus and the Rhodians had made warre vpon him: and that He did onely requite them with the like. Doe you al-So ( layd Emylius ) requite these poore ABY DEN I with such terrible Warre, for any the like Inuasion by them first made upon you? The King was angry to heare himselfe thus taken short: and therefore Hee roundly made answere to Amylius; It is your youth, Sir, and your beautie, and (about all,) your beeing a Roman, that makes you thus prasumptuous. But I would wish yee to remember the League that yee have made with mee, and to keepe it: If yee doe otherwise, I will make yee underfland, that the Kingdome, and Name of Macedon is in matter of Warre, no leffe noble than 50 the Roman. So Hee dismissed the Embassadour; and had the Towne immediatly yeelded to his discretion. The people had entertained a resolution, to have died enery one of them, and fet their Towne on fire; binding themselves herero by a fearefull oath, when Philip denied to accept them upon reasonable Conditions. But having in desperate fight, once repelling him from the Breach, lost the greatest number of their Youth: it was thought meeter by the Gouernours and Ancients of the Citie to change this resolution; and take such peace as could be gotten. So they carried out their Gold and Silvet to Philip: about which whilest they were busies, the memorie of their oath wrought so effectually in the yonger fort; that, by exhortation of their Priests, they fell to murdering their women, children, and themselves. Hereof the King had so little compassion; that He said, he would grant the Abydenithee dayes leiture to die: and to that end forbad his men to enter the Towne; or to hazard themselves in interrupting the violence of those mad sooles.

). IX.

The Romans decree warre agains? PHILIP, and send one of their Consuls into Greece, as it were in defence of the Athenians their Confederats.

How poore the Athenians were at this time, both in qualitie and estate.

His calamitie of the Abydeni, was likened by the Romanes unto that of the Saguntines: which indeed it needely refembled; though Rome was not alike interested in the quarrell. But to helpe themselves with pretence for the warre, they had found out another Saguntum, euen the Citie of Athens: which if the Macedonian should winne, then rested there no more to doc, than that he should presently embarke himselfe for Italie, whither he would come, not as Hannibal from Saguntum in fine moneths, but in the thort space of fine dayes sayling. Thus P. Sulpicius the Consul tolde the Multitude. when he exhorted them to make warre vpon Philip; which at his first propounding they had denied. The example of Pyrrhus was by him alleadged; to shew, what 30 Philip, with the power of a greater kingdome, might dare to vadertake: as also the fortunate Voyage of Scrpio into Africk; to shew the difference of making warre abroad. and admitting it into the bowels of their owne Countrey. By fuch arguments was the Commonaltie of Rome induced to beleeue, that this warre with the Macedonian was both just and necessary. So it was decreed: and immediatly the same Conful basted away towards Macedon, having that Province allotted vnto him before, and all things in a readinesse, by order from the Senate; who followed other Motiues, than the people must be acquainted with. Great thankes were given to the Athenian Embaffadours, of their conftancie (as was fayd) in not changing their faith at fuch time as they flood in danger of being belieged. And indeed great thankes were 40 due to them, though not vpon the same occasion. For the people of Rome had no cause to thinke it a benefit vnto themselves, that any Greeke Towne, refusing to sue unto the Macedonian for peace, requested their helpe against him. But the Senate intending to take in hand the Conquest of the Easterne parts; had reason to give thankes vnto those, that ministred the occasion. Since therefore it was an vntrue fuggestion, That Philip was making ready for Italy: and fince neither Attalus, the Rhodians, nor any other State in those quarters, desired the Romanes to give them protection: these busi-headed Athenians, who falling out with the Acarnanians, and confequently with Philip, a matter of May-game, (as was shewed before) sent Embaffadours into all parts of the World, even to Ptolemie of Egypt, and to the Ro-50 mans, as well as to Attalus and others their neighbours; must be accepted as cause of the warre, and Authours of the benefit thence redounding.

Neuerthelesses it loues to fall out where the meaning differs from the pretence: the doings of P. Salpicius the Consul were such, as might have argued Athens to bee the least part of his care. Hee sailed not about Peloponness, but tooke the readie Fiftiff 2 way way to Macedon; and landing about the River of Apfus, betweene Dyrrachium and Apollonia, there beganne the warre. Soone vpon his comming the Athenian Embasfadours were with him, and craued his helpe: whereof they could make no benefit whilest he was so farre from them. They bemoaned themselues as men besieged, and intreated him to deliuer them. For which cause He sent vnto them C. Clandius with twenty Gallies, and a competent number of men: but the maine of his forces Hee retained with him, for the profequation of a greater defigne. The Athenians were not indeed belieged: onely fome Rouers from Chales, in the Ile of Eubera; and fome bands of aduenturers out of Corinth, vied to take their shippes and spoile their fields, because they had declared themselves against King Philip, that was Lord of 10 these two Townes. The Robberies done by these Pyrats and Free-booters, were by the more eloquent than warlike Athenians, in this declining Age of their Fortune and Vertue, called a Siege. From such detriment the arrivall of Claudius, and shortly after of three Rhodian Gallies, easily preserved them. As for the Athenians themselves; they that had been wont, in ancient times, to undertake the Conquests of Agypt, Cyprus, and Cicil; to make warre vpon the great Persian King; and to hold so much of Greece in subjection, as made them redoubtable vnto all the rest; had now no more than three shippes, and those open ones, not much better then long Boates. Yet thought they not themselves a whit the worse men; but stood as highly vpon the glory and vertue of their Ancestors, as if it had been still their owne.

The Towne of Chalcis in Eubara, taken and fackt by the Romans and their Affociates, that lay in Garison at Athens. PHILIP attempteth to take Athens by Surprise: wasteth the Countrey about: and makes a journey into Peloponne fus. Of NABIS the Tyrant of Lacedamon, and his wife. PHILIP offers to make warre against NI A-BIS for the Acheans. He returneth home through Attica, which he Spoyleth againe : and provides against his Enemies. Some exploits 30 of the Romans. Diners Princes toyne with them. Great labouring to draw the Atolians into the warre.

HILIP, returning home from Abydus, heard newes of the Roman Conful his being about Apollonia. But ere he stirred forth to give him entertainement; or perhaps before hee had well refolued, whether it were best awhile to lit still, and trie what might bee done for obtaining ning of peace, or whether to make opposition, and resist these Inua-

ders with all his forces: Hee received advertisement from Chalcis of a grieuous 40 mishap there befallen him, by procurement of the Athenians. For C. Claudius with his Romans, finding no fuch worke at Athens as they had expected, or as was answerable to the fame that went abroad; purposed to doe somewhat that might quicken the Warre, and make his owne imployment better. Heegrew soone weary of sitting as a Scarre-Crowe, to faue the Athenians grounds from spoyle; and therefore gladly tooke in hand a bulinesse of more importance. The Towne of chalcis was neeligently guarded by the Macedonian Souldiours therein, forthat there was no enemie at hand; and more negligently by the Townsmen, who reposed themselves vpon their Garrison. Hercof Claudius having advertisement, sailed thither by night for feare of being discried; and, arriving therea little before breake of day, tooke it 50 by Scalado. He vsed no mercie, but slue all that came in his way : and wanting men to keepe it, (vnlesse hee should have left the heartlesse Athenians to their owne defence) Hee set it on fire; consuming the Kings Magazines of Corne, and all provisions for Warre, which were plenteoully filled. Neither were Hee and his Associats contented with the great abundance of spoyle which they carried about their ships, and with inlarging all those, whom Philip, as in a place of most securitie, kept there imprisoned: but to shew their despight and hatred vnto the King, they overthrew and brake in pieces the Statuas vnto him there erected. This done, they hafted away towards Athens: where the newes of their exploit were like to bee joyfully welcomed. The King lay then at Demetrias about some twenty miles thence; whither when these tidings, or part of them, were brought him, though he saw that it was too late to remedie the matter; yet hee made all haste to take reuenge. Hee thought to have taken the Athenians, with their trustic Friends, busic at worke in 10 ransaking the Towne, and loading themselves with spoyle: but they were gone before his comming. Fine thousand light-armed-foote hee had with him, and three hundred horse: whereof leaning at Chalcis onely a few to burie the dead. Hee marched thence away speedily toward Athens: thinking it not unpossible to take his enemies, in the toy of their Victory, as full of negligence, as they had taken Chalcis. Neither had he much failed of his expectation, if a Foot-Post that stood Scout for the Citie vpon the borders, had not descried him afarre off, and swiftly carried word of his approch to Athens. It was mid-night when this Post came thither: who found all the Towne afleepe, as feareleffe of any danger. But the Magistrates, hearing his report, caused a Trumpet out of their Citadell to sound the Alarme; and 20 with all speed made ready for defence. Within a few houres Philip was there; who feeing the many lights, and other figues of buffe preparation viuall in fuch a cafe, understood that they had newes of his comming; and therefore willed his men, to repose themselves till it were day. It is like, that the paucitie of his followers did helpe well to animate the Citizens, which beheld them from the walls. Wherefore though Claudius were not yet returned ( who was to fetch a compaffe about by Sea, and had no cause of haste) yet having in the Towne some mercinarie Souldiers, which they kept, of their owne, besides the great multitude of Citizens; they aduentured to iffue forth at a gate, whereto they faw Philip make approch. The King was glad of this; reckoning all those his owne, that were thus hardie. He therfore 30 onely willed his men to follow his example; and prefently gaue charge upon them. In that fight he gaue fingular proofe of his valour: and beating downe many of the Enemies with his owne hands, draue them with great flaughter backe into the Citie. The heat of his courage transported him further, than discretion would have allowed, even to the very gate. But he retired without harme taken; for that they which were vponthe Towres over the gate, could not vie their calling weapons against him, without indangering their owne people that were thronging before him into the Citie. There was a Temple of Hercules, a place of exercise, with a Groue, and many goodly Monuments belides, neere adioyning vnto Athens: of which he spared none; but suffered the rage of his anger to extend, even vnto the 40 sepulchres of the dead. The next day came the Romans, and some Companies of Attalus his men from Agina; too late in regard of what was already past: but in good time, to preuent him of fatisfying his anger to the full, which as yet hee had

Parliament at Argos, He came thither to them vnexpected. The Acheans were denifing upon warre: which they intended to make against Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedamon: who being flarted up in the roome of Machanidas, did greater mischiefe then any that went before him. This Tyrant relied wholly voon his Mercinaries; and of his subjects had no regard. He was a cruell oppressor agreedy extortioner upon those that lived under him; and one that in his naturall so condition smeltrankly of the Hangman. In these qualities, his wife Apega was very fitly matched with him, fince his dexteritie was no greater in spoyling the men, than hers in fleecing their wives; whom she would never suffer to be at quiet, till they had presented her with all their iewels and apparell. Her husband was so delighted Liuslib 32, and apparrelled it with such costly garments as sheeved to weare. But it was indeede an Engine, seruing to tormentmen. Hereof he made vse, when he meant to tric the vertue of his Rhetorick. For calling vnto him some rich man, of whose monie hee was desirous; Hee would bring him into the roome where this Counterfair Apega flood, and there vie all his Art of perswasion, to get what hee desired, as it were by good will. If he could not so speede, but was answered with excuses: then tooke he the refractorie denier by the hand, and told him, that perhaps his wife Apega (who fate by in a Chaire) could perswade more effectually. So heeled him to the Image, that rose vp and opened the armes, asit were for imbracement. Those armes were full of sharpe yron nayles, the like whereof were also sheking in the 10 brelts, though hidden with her clothes: and herewith she griped the poore wretch, to the pleafure of the Tyrant, that laughed at his cruell death. Such, and worfe (for it were long to tell all here that is spoken of him) was Nabis in his Gouernment. In his dealings abroad he combined with the Atolians, as Machanidas and Lycureus haddone before him. By these he grew into acquaintance with the Romanes; and was comprehended in the League which they made with Philip, at the end of their former Warre. Of Philopamens vertue hee stood in feare; and therefore durit not pronoke the Acheans, as long as they had such an able Commander. But when Cycliades, a farre worse Captaine, was their Prætor; and all, or the greatest part of their Mercinaries were discharged; Philopæmen being also gone into Crete, to follow his 20 beloued Occupation of Warre: then did Nabis fall vpon their Territory; and wasting all the fields, made them distrust their owne safetie in the Townes.

Against this Tyrant the Acheans were preparing for warre, when Philip came among them; and had fet downe, what proportion of Souldiourseuery Citie of their Corporation should furnish out. But Philip willed them, not to trouble themselues with the care of this businesse; for asmuch as he alone would ease them of this warre, and take the burden vpon himselfe. With exceeding joy and thankes they accepted of this kinde offer. But then hee told them, That, whileft he made warre vpon Lacedamon, Hee ought not to leave his owne Townes vnguarded. In which respect he thought they would be pleased, to send a few men to Corinth, and some 30 Companies into the Ile of Eubaa, that so he might securely pursue the warre against Nabis. Immediatly they found out his deuice; which was none other, than to engage their Nation in his warre against the Romans: Wherefore their Pretor Cycliades made him answer, That their Lawes forbade them to conclude any other matters in their Parliament, than those for which it was affembled. So passing the Decree, vpon which they had agreed before, for preparing warre against Nabis; hee brake vp the Assemblie, with enery mans good liking; whereas in former times, Hee had been thought no better than one of the Kings Paralites.

It griened the King to have thus failed in his purpose with the Achaens. Newertheleffe, he gathered vp among them a few Voluntaries; and fo returned by Co-40 rinth backe into Attica. There he met with Philocles one of his Captaines, that with two thousand men had been doing what harme he might vnto the Countrie. With this addition of strength, he attempted the Castle of Eleusine, the Hauen of Pyraus, and even the Citie of Athens. But the Romans made such haste after him by Sea, thrusting themselues into enery of these places; that hee could no more then wreak his anger vpon those goodly Temples, with which the Land of Attica was at that time fingularly beautified. So Hee destroyed all the workes of their notable Artificers, wrought in excellent Marble; which they had in plenty, of their owne; or, hauing long agoe been mafters of the Sea, had brought from other places, where best choice was found. Neither did hee onely pull all downe: but caused his men to 50 breake the very stones, that they might be unserviceable to the reparation. His losse at Chalcis being thus reuenged vpon Athens, Hee went home into Macedon: and there made prouision, both against the Roman Consul that lay about Apollonia; and against the Dardanians, with other his bad neighbours, which were likely to infelt him. Among his other cares he forgot not the Atolians : to whole Parliament, shortly to be held at Nanpactus, he sent an Embassage; requelling them to continue in his friendship. Thus was Philip occupied.

Sulpicius the Roman Conful encamped upon the River of Apfus. Thence he fent forth Apullius, his Lieutenant, with part of the Armie to walle the borders of Macedon. Apustius tooke fundrie Castles and Townes; vsing such extremitie of sword and fire at Antipatria, the first good Towns which he wanne by force, that none durst afterwards makeresistance, vnlesse they knew themselves able to holde our. Returning towards the Conful with his spoile, He was charged in Rere, vpon the to paffage of a Brooke, by Athenagoras a Macedonian Captaine: but the Romans had the better; and killing many of these enemies, tooke prisoners many more, to the increase of their bootie, with which they arrived in safetie at their Campe. The fuccesse of this Expedition, though it were not great; yet serued to draw into the Roman friendship, those that had formerly no good inclination to the Macedonian. These were Pleuratus, the sonne of Scerdilaidas the Illyrian; Aminander King of the Athamanians; and Bato, the sonne of Longarus, a Prince of the Dardanians. They offered their affiftance vnto the Conful, who thanked them : and faid, That hee would shortly make vse of Pleuratus and Bato, when hee entred into Macedon: but that the friendship of Aminander, whose Countrie lay betweene the Atolians and 20 Theffalie, might bee perhaps availeable with the Atolians, to ftirre them vp against

So the present care was wholy set vpon the Etolian Parliament at hand. Thither came Embassadours from the Macedonian, Romans, and Athenians. Of which, the Macedonian spake first : and saide, That as there was nothing fallen out, which should occasion the breach of peace betweene his Master and the Etolians: so was it to be hoped, that they would not suffer themselves without good cause, to be caried away after other mens fancies. Hee prayed them to confider, how the Romans heretofore had made shew, as if their warre in Greece tended onely to defence of the Ætolians: and yet notwithstanding had beene angrie, that the Ætolians, by making 30 peace with Philip, had no longer neede of fuch their Patronage. What might it be that made them so busic, in obtruding their protection upon those that needed it not? Surely it was even the generall hatred, which these Barbarians bore vnto the Greekes. For euen after the same sort had they lent their helpe to the Mamertines: and afterwards deliuered Syracuse, when it was oppressed by Carthaginian Tvrants: but now both Syracuse and Messan, were subject unto the Rods and Axes of the Romans. To the same effect he alleadged many examples, adding, That in like fort it would happen to the Etolians : who, if they drew fuch Mafters into Greece. must not looke hereafter to hold, as now, free Parliaments of their owne, wherein to confult about Warre and Peace: the Romans would ease them of this care, and 40 fend them such a Moderator, as went cuery yeere from Rome to Syracuse. Whereforche concluded, That it was best for them, whilest as yet they might, and whilest

one of them as yet could helpe the other, to continue in their League with Philip: with whom if at any time, vpon light occasion, they happened to fall out, they might as lightly bee reconciled : and with whom they had three yeeres agoe made the peace which stil continued; although the same Romans were then against it, who It would have troubled the Romans, to frame fought to breake it now. a good answere to these obiections. For the Macedonian had spoken the very truth, in thewing whereto this their Patronage, which they offered with such importunitie, did tend. Wherefore the Athenians were fet on by them to speake next: who had

50 store of eloquence, and matter of recrimination enough, to make Philip odious. These affirmed, that it was a great impudence in the Macedonian Embassadour, to call the Romans by the name of Barbarians; knowing in what barbarous manner his owne King had, in few dayes past, made war vpon the gods themselues, by destroying all their Temples in Attica. Herewithall they made a pitifull rehearfall of their

owne calamities; and faid, that if Philip might have his will, Ætolia, and all the rest of Greece, thould feele the same that Attica had felt; yea that Athens it selfe, together with Minerua, Iupiter, Ceres, and other of the gods, were like to have felt, if the wals and the Roman armes had not defended them. Then spake the Romans: who excusing, as well as they could, their owne oppression of all those, in whole defence they had heretofore taken armes, went roundly to the point in hand. They fayd, that they had of late made warre in the Atolians behalfe, and that the Ætolians had without their consent made peace : whereof since the Ætolians must excuse themselues, by alleaging that the Romans, being busied with Carthage, wanted leifure to give them aid convenient: fo this excuse being now taken away, and 10 the Romans wholly bent against their common Enemie, it concerned the Ætolians to take part with them in their warre and victorie, vnleffe they had rather perish with Philip.

It might eafily be perceived, that they which were so vehement, in offering their helpe cre it was defired, were themselves carried unto the war by more earnest motiues, than a simple desire to helpe those friends, with whom they had no great acquaintance. This may have beene the cause, why Dorymachus the Etolian Prator shifted them off awhile with a dilatoric answere: though hee told his Countrymen. That by referuing themselves, till the matter were inclined one way or other, they might afterwards take part with those that had the better fortune. His answere 20 was, first, in generall termes; That ouer-much haste was an enemie to good counsell: for which cause they must further deliberate, ere they concluded. But comming neerer to the matter in hand, He passed a Decree, That the Prator might at any time call an Assemblie of the States, and therein conclude upon this businesse; any Law to the contrary notwithstanding: whereas otherwise it was valuefull to treat of such affaires, except in two of their great Parliaments, that were held at fet times.

MILLIP was glad to heare, that the Romans had sped no better in their follicitation of the Etolians. He thought them hereby disappointed, in the very beginning, of one great helpe; and meant himselfe to difappoint them of another. His sonne Perseus, a very boy, was sent to keepe the Streights of Pelagonia against the Dardanians; having with him some of the Kings Councell, to gouerne both him and his armic. It was jud- 40 ged, as may feeme, that the presence of the Kings sonne, how young soeuer, would both encourage his followers, and terrifie the enemies; by making them at least belecue, that he was not weakely attended. And this may have been the reason, why the same Perseus, a few yeeres before this, was in like manner left vpon the borders of Atolia by his father; whom earnest businesse called thence another way. No danger of enemies being left on either hand : it was thought, that the Macedonian Fleet under Heraclides, would ferue to keepe Attalus, with the Rhodians and Romans, from doing harme by sca, when the Kings backe was turned; who tooke his journie Westward against Sulpicius the Conful.

The Armies met in the countrey of the Dassareti, a people in the vtmost bor- 50 ders of Macedon towards Illyria, about the mountaines of Candania; that running along from Hamus in the North vntill they joyne in the South with Pindus, inclose the Westerne parts of Macedon. Two or three dayes they lay in fight the one of the other, without making offer of battaile. The Conful was the first that issued forth of his Campe into the open field. But Philip was not confident in the firength which he had then about him; and therefore thought it better to fend foorth some of his light-armed Mercinaries, and some part of his horse, to entertaine them with skirmith. These were easily vanquished by the Romans, and driven backe into their Campe. Now although it was fo, that the King was viwilling to hazard all at first vpon a Cast, and therefore sent for Perfeus with his Companies, to increase his owne forces: yet being no leffe vinwilling to lofe too much in reputation; He made shew a day after, as if he would have fought. He had found the advantage of a place fit for ambush, wherein he bestowed as many as he thought meet of his Targettiers : and to fo gaue charge to Athenagoras, one of his Captaines, to prouoke out the Romans to fight; instructing both him and the Targettiers, how to behave themselves respe-Riucly, as opportunitie should fall out. The Romans had no mistrust of any ambulh, having fought upon the same ground a day before. Wherefore perhaps they might have sustained some notable detriment, if the Kings directions had beene well followed. For when Athenagoras began to fall backe, they charged him fo hotly, that they draue him to an hallie flight, and purfued him as hard as they were able. But the Captaines of the Targettiers, not staying to let them runne into the danger; discouered themselves before it was time; and thereby made frustrate the worke, to which they were appointed. The Conful heereby gathered, that the 20 King had some defire to trie the fortune of a battaile: which hee therefore presented the second time; leading forth his Armie, and setting it in order, with Elephants in front: a kind of helpe which the Romans had never vied before, but had taken thefe of late from the Carthaginians. Such are the alterations wrought by Time. It was scarce about fourescore yeares crethis, that Pyrrhes carried Elephants out of Greece into Italie, to affright the Romans, who had never seene any of those beafts before. But now the same Romans (whilest possibly some were yet aline, which had knowne that Expedition of Pyrrhus ) come into Macedon, bringing Elephants with them; whereof the Macedonians and Greekes have none. Philip had patience to let the Conful braue him at his Trenches: wherein hee did wifely: for the Roman had

30 greater neede to fight, than Hec. Sulpicius was vnwilling to lose time : neither could hee without great danger, lying fo neere the Enemie, that was firong in horse. fend his men to fetch in corne out of the fields. Wherefore he removed eight miles off: prefuming that Philip would not aduenture to meete him on even ground; and fo the more boldly he suffered his Forragers to ouer-runne the Countrie. The King was nothing forry of this; but permitted the Romans to take their good pleasure: euen till their prefumption, and his owne supposed feare, should make them careleffe. When this was come to paffe, hee tooke all his horse, and light-armed-foote, with which hee occupied a place in the midway, betweene the Forragers and their Campe. There he flayed in Couert with part of his forces; to keepe the paffages

40 that none should escape. The rest hee sent abroad the Countrie, to fall vpon the straglers: willing them to put all to the sword, and let none run home with newes to the Campe. The flaughter was great : and those which escaped the handes of them that were fent abroad to fcowre the fields, lighted all or most of them vpon the King and his companies in their flight : fo as they were cut off by the wav. Long it was ere the Campe had newes of this. But in the end there escaped some: who though they could not make any perfect relation how the matter went: yet by telling what had happened to themselues, raised a great tumult. Salpicius hereupon fends foorth all his horse, and bids them helpe their fellowes where they saw it needfull: He himselse with the Legions followed. The companies of Horse diui-

50 ded themselves, accordingly as they met with advertisements vpon the way, into many parts: not knowing where was most of the danger. Such of them as lighted vpon Philips Troupes, that were canualfing the field, tooke their taske where they found it. But the maine bulke of them fell vpon the King himselfe. They had the disaduantage: ascomming fewer, and unprepared, to one that was readie for them.

So they were beaten away: as their fellowes also might have beene, if the King had well bethought himfelte, and given ouer in time. But while, not contented with fuch an haruest, he was too greedie about a poore gleaning: the Roman Legions appeared in fight: which emboldened their horse to make a re-charge. Then the danger apparant, enforced the Macedonians to looke to their owne fafety. They ranne which way they could: and (as men that lie in waite for others, are seldome heedfull of that which may befall themselues) to escape the Enemie, they declined the fairest way; so as they were plunged in Marishes and Bogges, wherein many of them were loft. The Kings horse was slaine under him: and there had bee beene cast away, if a louing subject of his had not alighted; mounted him vpon his owne 10 horse; and deliuered him out of perill, at the expence of his owne life, that running on foote was ouertaken, and killed.

In the common opinion Philip was charged with improvident rashnesse; and the Consul, with as much dulnesse, for his dayes service. A little longer stay would haue deliuered the King from these enemies without any blowe: since when all the fields about them were wasted, they must needes have retired backe to the Sea. On the other fide it was not thought vulikely, That if the Romans following the King, had set vpon his Campe, at such time as he fled thither, halfe amazed with feare of being either slaine or taken, they might have vonne it. But that noble Historian. Liuie, (as is commonly his maner) hath indiciously observed, That neither the one, 20 nor the other, were much too blame in this dayes worke. For the maine body of the Kings Armie lay fafe in his Campe; and could not bee so assonished with the losse of two or three hundred Horse, that it should therefore have abandoned the defence of the Trenches. And as for the King himfelfe; He was aductifed, that Pleuratus the Illyrian, and the Dardanians, were fallen upon his Countrey; when they found the passage thereinto open, after Perfess was called away from custodie of the Streights. This was it which made him aduenture to doe somewhat betimes; that he might let the Romans going the sooner, and afterwards looke vnto histroublesome neighbours. In consideration of this, Philip was desirous to cleere himselfe of the Romans, as soone as he might. And to that purpose he sent unto the Consul; re- 30 questing a day of truce for buriall of the dead. But in stead of so doing, hee marched away by night; and left fires in his Campe to beguile the Enemie, as if hee had not stirred out of the place. Sulpicius, when hee heard of the Kings departure, was not flow to follow him. He ouertooke the Macedonians in a place of strength, which they had fenced (for it was a wooddie ground) by cutting downe trees, and laying them athwart the way where it was most open. In making of such places good, the Macedonian Phalanx was of little vie; being a square battaile of pikes, not fit for euerie ground. The Archers of Crete were judged, and were indeed, more scruiccable in that case. But they were few; and their arrowes were of small force against the Roman shield. The Macedonians therefore helped them by slinging of stones. But 40 to no purpose. For the Romans got within them; and forced them to quit the place. This victory (fuch as it was) layd open vnto the Conful some poore Townes thereabout; which partly were taken by strong hand, partly yeelded for scare. But the spoyle of these, and of the fields adjoyning, was not sufficient to maintaine his Armie; and therefore he returned backe to Apollonia.

The Dardanians, hearing that Philip was come backe, withdrew themselues apace out of the Countrey. The King sent Athenager as to vvaite vpon them home; vvhilest he himselfe vvent against the Atolians. For Damocritus the Prætor of the Atolians, who had reserved himselseand his Nation vnto the cuent of things, hearing report, that Philip was beaten once and againe: as also that Pleuratus and the Dardanians 50 were fallen vpon Macedon; grew no leffe busie on the sudden, than before hee had beene vvise. He perswaded his Nation to take their time : and so, not staying to proclaime warre, ioyned his forces with Aminander the Athamanian; and made inuafion vpon Thessalie. They tooke and cruelly sacked a few Townes: whereby they grew confident; asif, without any danger, they might doe what they lifted. But Philip came vpon them erethey looked for him: and killing them as they lay difpersed, was like to haue taken their Campe; if Aminander, more warie than the Atolians, had not helped at need, and made the Retrait through his owne mountaynous Countrie.

About the same time; the Roman Fleet, assisted by Attalus and the Rhodians, had taken some small Islands in the Agean Sea. They tooke likewise the Towns of Oreum in the Ile of Eubaa; and some other places thereabout. The Townes were ginen to. Attalus, after the same Compact that had formerly beene made with the Le Le Loisans: the goods therein found were giuen to the Romans; and the people, for flaues. Other attempts on that fide were hindred; either by foule weather at Sea; or by want of daring, and of meanes.

CHAP.4. S.12.

Hus the time ranne away : and P. Villew, a new Conful, tooke charge of the warre in Macedon. Hee was troubled with a Mutinie of his oldest Souldiors: whereof two thousand, having ferued long in Siolden Somienors: whetevorewords that they all and Africk, thought themselves much wronged, in that they could not bee suffered to looke vnto their owne estates at home.

They were (belike) of the Legions that had ferued at Canna: as may feeme by their complaint, of having beene long absent from Italie; whither faine they would an hauereturned, when by their Colonelsthey were shipped for Macedon. How Villing dealt with them, it is vocertaine. For the Historie of his yeere is lost : whereof the miffe is not great; fince hee did nothing memorable. Valerius Antias, as we find in Linie, hathadorned this Villius with a great exploit against Philip. Yet since Linie Lini. Liga. himselfe, an Historian to whom few of the best are matchable, could finde no such thing recorded in any good Authour; we may reasonably believe, that Villius his

In the beginning of this Macedonian Warre, the Romans found more trouble than could have bin expected with the Gaules. Their Colonie of Placentia, a goodly and strong Towne, which neither Hannibal, nor after him Afdrubal, had beene able 40 to force; wastaken by these Barbarians, and burnt in a manner to the ground. In like fort Cremons was attempted; but faued her felfe, taking warning by her neighbours calamitie: Amilear a Carthaginian, that staicd behind Afdrubal, or Mago, in those parts; was now become Captaine of the Gaules, in these their enterprises. This when the Romans heard, they sent Embassadours to the Carthaginians: giving them to vnderstand, That, if they were not wearie of the peace, it behoued them to call home, and deliuer vp, this their Citizen Amilear, who made warre in Italie. Hereunto it was added (perhaps left the message might seeme otherwise to have sauoured a little of some seare) That of the Fugitine slaves belonging vnto the Romans, there were some reported to walke vp and down in Carthage: which if it were so, then so ought they to bee restored backe to their Masters; as was conditioned in the late Peace. The Embassadours that were sent on this errand; had further charge to treat with Mafanissa, as also with Verminathe sonne of Syphax. Vnto Mafanissa, befides matter of complement, they were to fignific what pleasure Hee might doe them, by lending them some of his Numidian Horse, to serve in their Warre against the Macedonian. Vermina had entreated the Senate, to vouchsafe vnto him the name of King: and promifed thereafter to deferue it, by his readinesse in doing them all good offices. But they were somewhat scrupulous in the matter: and faid That having beene, and being still (as they tooke it) their Enemie, He ought first of all to delire peace; for that the name of King, was an honour which they yied not to conferre vpon any, faue onely vpon fuch as had royally deserved it at their hands. The authoritie to make peace with him, was wholly committed vnto these Embassadours vpon such termes as they should thinke fit; without further relation to the Senate and People. For they were then busied with greater cares. The Carthaginians made a gentle answere, That they wholly disclaimed Amilcar: bani- 10 thing him; and confiscating his goods. As for the Fugitiues: they had reftored as many as they could finde; and would in that point, as farre as was requilite, give fatisfaction to the Senate. Herewithall they sent agreat proportion of Corne to Rome; and the like vnto the Armie that was in Macedon. King Masanissa would haue lent vnto the Romans two thousand of his Numidian Horse : but they were contented with halfe the number; and would accept no more. Vermina met with the Embassadours, to give them entertainment, on the borders of his Kingdome; and, without any disputation, agreed with them vpon termes of peace.

Thus were the Romans busied in taking order for their Macedonian Warre, that they might pursue it strongly, and without interruption. As for Amilear and his 20 Gaules: they laid fiege vnto Cremona; where L. Furius a Roman Prætor came vpon them, fought a battaile with them, and ouercame them. Amilear the Carthaginian died in this battaile : and the fruit of the Victorie was fuch, as both made amends for losses pait, and lest the worke easie to those, that afterwardes should have the managing of warre among those Gaules. So was there good leifure to thinke vpon the bulineffe of Macedon: where Philip was carefully providing to give congentment vnto his subjects, by punishing a bad Counsailour whom they hated; as also to assure vnto himselfe the Acheans, by rendring vnto them some Townes that he held of theirs; and finally to strengthen his Kingdome, not onely by exercising and trayning his people, but by fortifying the passages that led thereinto out of E- 30 pirus. This was in doing, when Villius, having vnprofitably laboured to find was into Macedon, taking a journic (as Sulpicius had done before him ) wherein he could not be supplied with victuals, determined at length to trie a new course. But then came advertisement, that T. Quintius Flaminius was chosen Conful, and had Macedon allotted him for his Prouince; whose comming was expected; and he very shortly arriued at the Armie.

He Romans had not beene wont in former times, to make Warre after fuch a trifling manner. It was their vie, to give battaile to the Enemie, as soone as they met with him. If hee refused it, they besieged his Townes: and so forced him to trie the fortune of a day, with his disadvantage in reputation, when hee had long forborne it (asie would bee interpreted) upon knowledge of his owne weaknesse. But in this their Warre with Philip, they beganne to learne of the Subtle Greekes, the arte of Negotiation:

L. 34. nate men, for part of those monies that had been borrowed in the second Punicke Warre. This had made the Commonalty auerse from the Macedonian Warre; and had thereby driven the Senators greedy of the enterprize, to make vie of their cunning. Yet beeing weary of the flow pace wherewith their businesse went forward, they determined to increase their Armie, that they might have the lesse neede to relie vpon their Confederats. So they leavied eight thousand foot, and eight hundred Horse (the greater part of them of the Latines) which they sent with T. Quintius Fla-10 minius, the new Conful into Macedon. Their Nauie, and other meanes could well hane serued, for the setting foorth and transportation of a greater Armie: but by ftraining themselves to the most of their abilitie, they should (besides other difficulties, incident vnto the fustenance of those that are too many and too farre from home ) have bred some lealousie in their friends of Greece, and thereby have lost fome friends, yea, perhaps have increased the number of their enemies more than of their owne Souldiours. This prefent augmentation of the forces was very requisite; for that Attalus, about the same time, excused himselfe vnto them, by his Embaffadours; requesting that either they would vindertake the defence of his Kingdome against Antiochus, who inuaded it; or elle that they would not take it 20 vncourtcously, that he quitted the Warre with Philip, and returned home, to looke vnto that which more concerned him. Their answere was remarkable. They said, That it was not their manner to vie the aid of their friends, longer than their friends had good opportunitie, and could also be well contented to affoord it; That they could not honeftly take part with Attalus, their good friend though he were, against Antiochus, whom they held in the like account; but, That they would deale with Antiochus by Embassadours, and (as common friends vnto both of the Kings) doe their best to perswade an atonement betweene them. In such louing fashion did they now carrie themselves, towards their good friend the King Antiochus: who reciprocally at their intreaty, withdrew his Armie from the Kingdome of Attalus. 30 But how little they regarded these tearmes of friendship, after that once they had made an end with Philip; it will very soone appeare.

T Quinting halting away from Rome, came betimes into his Province, with the fupplie decreed vnto him; which confifted, for the most part, of olde Souldiours, that had ferued in Spaine and Africk. He found Villius the old Cenful, (whom at his comming he presently discharged) and King Philip of Macedon, encamped one against the other, in the Streights of Epirus; by the River of Applies or Aous. It was manifelt, that either the Romans must fetch a compasse about, and seeke their way into Macedon, through the poore Countrey of the Daffaretians; or else winne, by force, that passage, which the King defended. In taking the former way, they had al-40 ready two yeeres together mil spent their time, and beene forced to returne backe without profit, for want of Victuals: whereof they could neither carrie with them store sufficient, nor finde it on the way. But if they could once get ouer these Mountaines, which divided the South of Epirus from Thessalie: then should they enter into a plentiful Countrey; and which by long dependance on the Macedonian, was become (in a manner) part of his Kingdome, whereof it made the South border. Neuerthelesse, the desire of winning this passage, was greater than the likelyhood. For the River of Apfus, running along through that Valley which alone wasopen betweene the Mountains, made it all a deep Marish and vnpassable Bogge: a very narrow way excepted, and a path cut out of the maine Rocke by mans hand. 50 Wherefore Quintius affailed to climbe in the Mountaines: but finding him felfe difappointed of this hope, through the diligence of his Enemie, who neglected not the gard of them that was very easie; Hee was compelled to sit still, without doing any thing for the space of fortie dayes. This long time of rest gaue hope vnto Philip, that the Warre might be ended by

against the Macedonian. Vermina had entreated the Senate, to vouchsafe vnto him the name of King: and promised thereafter to deserue it, by his readinesse in doing them all good offices. But they were somewhat scrupulous in the matter: and said, That having beene, and being still (asthey tooke it) their Enemic, Heought first of all to delire peace; for that the name of King, was an honour which they vied not to conferre vpon any, faue onely vpon such as had royally deserved it at their hands. The authoritie to make peace with him, was wholly committed vnto these Embassadours vpon such termes as they should thinke fit; without further relation to the Senate and People. For they were then bufied with greater cares. The Carthaginians made a gentle answere, That they wholly disclaimed Amilear: bani-10 thing him; and confiscating his goods. As for the Fugitiues: they had reflored as many as they could finde; and would in that point, as farre as was requisite, give satisfaction to the Senate. Herewithall they sent agreat proportion of Corne to Rome ; and the like vnto the Armie that was in Macedon. King Mafanissa would haue lent vnto the Romans two thousand of his Numidian Horse : but they were contented with halfe the number; and would accept no more. Vermina met with the Embassadours, to give them entertainment, on the borders of his Kingdome; and without any disputation, agreed with them vpon termes of peace. Thus were the Romans bulled in taking order for their Macedonian Warre, that they might pursue it strongly, and without interruption. As for Amilear and his 20 Gaules: they laid fiege vnto Cremona; where L. Furius a Roman Prætor came vpon them, fought's battaile with them, and ouercame them. Amilear the Carthaginian died in this battaile : and the fruit of the Victorie was such, as both made amends for losses past, and left the worke easie to those, that afterwardes should have the managing of warre among those Gaules. So was there good leifure to thinke vpon the bulineffe of Macedon: where Philip was carefully prouiding to give congenement vnto his subjects, by punishing a bad Counsailour whom they hated; as alfo to affure vnto himselfe the Acheans, by rendring vnto them some Townes that he held of theirs; and finally to ftrengthen his Kingdome, not onely by exercifing and trayning his people, but by fortifying the passages that led thereinto out of E- 30 pirus. This was in doing, when Villius, hauing vnprofitably laboured to find way into Macedon, taking a journic (as Sulpicius had done before him ) wherein he could not be supplied with victuals, determined at length to trie a new course. But then came adnertisement, that T.Quintius Flaminius was chosen Conful, and had Macedon allotted him for his Prouince; whose comming was expected; and he very shortly arrived at the Armie.

XIII.

The Romans beginne to make warre by negotiation. T. QUINTIVS winnes apallage against Philip. These apallage and Esolans. The Acheans for sking the Macedonian, take part with the Romans. A treatie of peace, that was vaine. Philip delivers Argosto NA.

Bis the Tyrant, who presently enters into League with the Romans.

He Romans had not beene wont in former times, to make Warreafter fuch a trifling manner. It was their vie, to giue battaile to the Enemie, as foone as they met with him. If her refuded it, they befieged his Townes; and so forced him to tric the fortune of a day, with his direction advantage in reputation, when hee had long forborne it (asis would be interpreted) ypon knowledge of his owne weaknesse. But in this their Warre with Philip, they begannet o learne of the subtle Greeker, the arte of Negotiation:

wherein hitherto they were not growne so fine, as within a little while they proued. Their Treafury was poore, and flood indebted, * many yeeres after this, vnto pri- * Lin.L.q.6 nate men, tor part of those monies that had been borrowed in the second Punicke Warre. This had made the Commonalty auerse from the Macedonian Warre; and had thereby driven the Senators greedy of the enterprize, to make vse of their cunning. Yet beeing weary of the flow pace where with their butinesse went forward, they determined to increase their Armie, that they might have the lesse neede to relie vpon their Confederats. So they leavied eight thousand foot, and eight hundred Horse (the greater part of them of the Latines) which they sent with T. Quintius Fla-10 minius, the new Conful into Macedon. Their Nauie, and other meanes could well haue ferued, for the fetting foorth and transportation of a greater Armie: but by ftraining themselves to the most of their abilitie, they should (besides other difficulties, incident vnto the sustenance of those that are too many and too farre from home ) have bred fome lealouse in their friends of Greece, and thereby have lost fome friends, yea, perhaps have increased the number of their enemies more than of their owne Souldiours. This prefent augmentation of the forces was very requisite; for that dttalus, about the same time, excused himselfe vnto them, by his Embaffadours; requelting that either they would undertake the defence of his Kingdome against Antiochus, who inuaded it; or else that they would not take it 20 vicontroully, that he quitted the Warre with Philip, and returned home to looke vnto that which more concerned him. Their answere was remarkable. They said, That it was not their manner to vie the aid of their friends, longer than their friends had good opportunitie, and could also be well contented to affoord it; That they could not honeftly take part with Attalus, their good friend though he were, against antiochus, whom they held in the like account; but, That they would deale with Antiochus by Embaffadours, and (as common friends vnto both of the Kings) doe their best to perswade an atonement betweene them. In such louing fashion did they now carrie themselues, towards their good friend the King Antiochus: who reciprocally at their intreaty, withdrew his Armie from the Kingdome of Attalus. 30 But how little they regarded these tearmes of friendship, after that once they had made an end with Philip; it will very foone appeare.

T Quintius halling away from Rome, came betimes into his Province, with the fupplie decreed vnto him; which confilted, for the most part, of olde Souldiours, that had ferred in Spaine and Africk. He found Villius the old Conful, (whom at his comming he presently discharged) and King Philip of Chasedon, encamped one against the other, in the Streights of Epirons; by the River of Applies or Assus. It was manifest, that either the Romans must fetch a compasse about, and seeke their way into Macedon, through the poore Countrey of the Dassartians; or else winne, by force, that passage, which the King defended. In taking the former way, they had alto ready two yeeres together mis spent their time, and beene forced to returne backe without profit, for want of Victuals: whereof they could neither carrie with them store sufficient, nor findeit on the way. But if they could once get ouer these Mountaines, which divided the South of Epirus from Thessale: then should they enter into a plentiful Countrey; and which by long dependance on the Ascedonian, was become (in a manner) part of his Kingdome, whereof it made the South border. Neuerthelesse, the desire of winning this passage, was greater than the likelyhood. For the River of Apsius, running along through that Valley which alone was open betweene the Mountains, made it all a deep Marish and vnpassable Dogge:

a very narrow way excepted, and a path out out of the maine Rocke by mans hand.

This long time of rest gaue hope vnto Philip, that the Warre might be ended by composition, vpon some reasonable termes. He therefore so dealt with some of the Epirots, (among whom hee had many friends) that Hee and the Conful had a meeting together. But nothing was effected. The Conful would have him to fet all Townes of Greece at libertie; and to make amends for the injuries, which hee had done to many people in his late Warres. Philip was contented to give libertietothosewhom he had subdued of late: but vnto such, as had been long subiect vnto him and his Ancestors, He thought it against all reason, that he should relinquish his claime and dominion over them. Hee also said, That as farre foorth as it should appeare that he had done wrong vnto any Towne or people what locuer. He could well be pleased to make such amends, as might seeme convenient in the 10 iudgement of some free State, that had not been interessed in those quarrels. But herewithall Quintius was not fatisfied. There needed (hee fayd) no judgement or compromise; forasmuch as it was apparant, that Philip had alwaies beene the Innader; and had not made warre, as one pronoked, in his owne defence. After this altercation, when they should come to particulars: and when the Conful was required to name those Townes, that he would have to be set at libertie; the first than hee named were the Thessalians. These had been Subjects (though conditionall) vnto the Macedonian Kings, euer fince the dayes of Alexander the Great, and of Philip his Father. Wherefore, as soone as Flaminius had named the Thessalians; the King in a rage demanded, what sharper Condition Hee would have layd vpon him, 20 had he been but vanquished. And herewithall abruptly he flang away; refusing to heare any more of fuch discourse.

After this the Conful strone in vaine two or three dayes together, to have prevailed against the difficulties of that passage which Philip kept. When he had well wearied himselse, and could not resolve what course to take: there came to him an Heardsman, sent from Charopus a Prince of the Epirots that fauoured the Romans, who having long kept beafts in those Mountaines, was throughly acquainted with all by-paths, and therefore vindertooke to guide the Romans, without any danger, to a place wherethey should have advantage of the Enemie. This guide, for scare of treacherous dealing, was fast bound: and, being promised great reward, in case he 20 made good his word; had fuch Companies as was thought fit, appointed to follow his directions. They transiled by night (it being then about the full of the Moone) and rested in the day-time, for seare of being discovered. When they had recovered the hill-toppes, and were about the Macedonians, (though vndiscouered by them, because at their backs) they raised a great smoke; whereby they gaue notice of their successe vnto the Conful. Some skirmishes, whilest these were on their journie,T. Quintius had held with the Macedonian; thereby to auert him from thought of that which was intended. But when on the third morning hee faw the smoke arise more and more plainely, and thereby knew that his men had attained vnto the place whither they were sent: He pressed as necre as he could vnto the Enemies Campe; 40 and affailed them in their strength. Hee prevailed as little as in former times; vntill the shoutings of those that ranne downethe Hill, and charged Philip on the backe, aftonished so the Macedonians, that they betooke themselves to flight. The King, vpon first apprehension of the danger, made all speed away to sauchimself. Yet anon confidering, that the difficulty of the paffage must needes hinder the Somans from pursuing him: He made a stand at the end of five miles, and gathered theretogether his broken troupes, of whom hee found wanting no more than two thousand men. The greatest losse was of his Campe and prouisions: if not rather perhaps of his reputation; for that now the Macedonians beganne to stand in scare, lest being driven from a place of such advantage, they should hardly make good their partie against 50 the Enemie, vpon equall ground. Neither was Philip himfelfe much better perswaded. Wherefore he caused the Theffalians, as many of them as in his hastie retrait he could visit, to forsake their Townes and Countrie; carrying away with them as much as they were able, and spoyling all the rest. But all of them could not be perfwaded, thus to abandon (for the pleasure of their King) their ancient habitations, and all the substance which they had gotten. Somethere were that forcibly resifted him; which they might the better doe, for that hee could not ftay to vie any great compulsion. He also himselfe tooke it very grienously, that he was driven to make such waste of a most pleasant and fruitfull Countrey, which had euer been well affected vnto him: fo that a little hinderance did ferue, to make him breake off his purpose; and withdraw himselfe homeinto his Kingdome of Macedon.

The Atolians and Athamanians, when this fell out, were even in a readineffe to inuade Theffalie; whereinto the wayes lay more open, out of their feuerall Counto tries. When therefore they heard for certaintie, that Philip was beaten by the Romanes: they foreslowed not the occasion; but made all speede, each of them to lay hold vpon what they might. T. Quintius followed them within a little while : but they had gotten so much before his comming, that He, in gleaning after their haruest could not finde enough to maintaine his Armie. Thus were the poore Thef-Jalians, of whose libertie the Romans a few daies since had made shew to bee very defirous, wasted by the same Romans and their Confederates; not knowing which way to turne themselves, or whom to avoide. T. Quintus wan Phaleria by affault: Metropolis and Piera yeelded vnto him. Rhage he belieged : and having made a faire breach. yet was vnable to force it; fo floutly it was defended both by the Inhabitants, and 20 by a Macedonian Garrison therein. Philip also at the same time, having somewhat recollected his spirits, houered about Tempe with his Armie; thrusting men into all places, that were like to be diffreffed. So the Conful, having wel-neere spent his victuals, and leeing no hope to prevaile at Rhage; brake up his fiege, and departed our of Theffalie. Hee had appointed his shippes of burden to meete him at Anticyra, an Hauen towne of Phocis, on the Gulfe of Corinth: which Countrie being friend to the Macedonian, he presently inuaded; not so much for hatred vnto the people, as because it lay conveniently seated betweene Thessale and other Regions, wherein he had businesse, or was shortly like to have. Many Townes in Phocis he wan by affault: many were yeelded up vnto him for feare; and within short space he had (in 30 effect) maltered it all.

In the meane time L. Quintius the Consuls brother, being then Admirall for the Romans in this warre, joyned with King Attalus and the Rhodian Fleet. They wan two Cities in Eubaa; and afterward layd fiege vnto Cenchree, an Hauen and Arcenal of the Corinthians on their Easterne Sea. This enterprise did somewhat helpe forward the Acheans, in their defire to leave the part of Philip . fince it might come to passe, that Corinthit selfe, ere long time were spent; and that Cenchree, with other places appertaining to Corinth, now very shortly should be rendred vnto their Nation, by fauour of the Romans.

But there were other Motiues, inducing the Acheans to preferre the friendship of 40 the Romans, before the patronage of Philip; whereto they had beene long accustomed. For this King had so many wayes offended them in time of peace, that they thought it the best course to rid their hands of him; whilest being intangled in a dangerous warre, he wanted meanes to hinder the execution of fuch counfaile, as they should hold the safest. His tyrannous practices to make himselfe their absolute Lord: His poyloning of Aratus their old Gouernour: His falledealing with the Messenians, Epirots, and other people their Confederates, and his owne dependents: together with many particular outrages by him committed; had caused them long fince to hold him as a necessary enill, even whilest they were vnable to bee without his affiftance. But fince by the vertue of Philopæmen, they were growne fomewhat so confident in their owne firength, fo as without the Macedonians beloe they could as well fublift, as having him to friend: then did they onely thinke how evill he was; and thereupon rejoyce the more, in that he was become no longer necessary. It anand thereupon reloyce the more, in that he was become no longer nearly art. Team gred him to perceive how they flood affected; and therefore he fent murderers, to Platinguis Intake away the life of * Philopamen. But failing in this enterprise, and being detected, flin. 1.2).

he did thereby onely fet fire to the Wood, which was throughly drie before, and prepared to burne. Philopamen wrought so with the Achams, that no discourse was more familiar with them, than what great cause they had to with draw them felues from the Macedonian. Cycliades, a principall man among them, and lately their Practor, was expelled by them, for shewing himselfe passionate in the cause of Philips and Arislanus chosen Practor, who laboured to loyne them in societie with the Romans.

These newes were very welcome to T. Quintius. Embassadours were sent from the Romans, and their Confederates, King Attalus, the Rhodians, and Athenians, to treat with the Acheans; making promise, that they should have Corinth restored to vnto them, if they would forsake the Macedonian. A Parliament of the Acheans washeld at Sieyon, to deliberate and resolue in this weighty case. Therein the Romans and their adherents defired the Acheans, to ioyne with them in making warre vpon Philip. Contrariwise, the Embassadours of Philip, whom he had also sent for this bulines, admonishing the Acheans of their Alliance with the King, and of their faith due vnto him; requested them, that they would be contented to remaine as Neuters. This moderate request of Philips Embassadour, did no way advance his Masters cause. Rather it gaue the Acheans to vnderstand, That hee, who could be fatisfied with so little at their hands, knew himselfe vnable to gratifie them in a. ny reciprocall demand. Yet were there many in that great Councel; who remem- 20 bring the benefits of Philip and Antigonus, laboured earnestly for the preservation of the ancient League. But in fine, the sence of late injuries, and expectation of like or worse from him in the future; prevailed against the memorie of those old good turnes, which he, (and Antigonus before him) had partly fold vnto them, and partly had vsed as baites, whereby to allure them into absolute subjection. Neither was it perhaps of the least importance; That the Romans were strong, and likely to preuaile in the end. So after much altercation the Decree passed, That they should thenceforward renounce the Macedonian, and take part with his enemies in this war. With Attalus and the Rhodians, they forthwith entred into fociety: with the Romans (because no League would be of force, vntill the Senate and People had approued 30 it ) they forbore to decree any fociety at the present, vntill the returne of those Embassadours from Rome, which they determined to send thither of purpose. The Megalopolitans, Dymans, and Argines, having done their best for the Macedonian, as by many respects they were bound; rose vp out of the Councell, and departed before the passing of the Decree, which they could not resist, nor yet with honestie thereto giue affent. For this their good will, and greater, which they shortly manifested, the Argines had so little thanke; that all the rest of the Acheans may be the better held excused, for escaping how they might, out of the hands of so fell a Prince.

Soone after this, vpon a folemne day at Argos, the affection of the Citizens difcouered it selfe so plainely, in the behalfe of Philip, that they which were his Parti40 fans within the Towne, made no doubt of putting the Citie into his hands, if they might have any small affistance. Philolet, a Lieutenant of the Kings, lay then in Corinth, which he had mansully desended against the Romans and Attalus. Him the Conspirators drew to Argos; whither comming on a sudden, and finding the Multitude readie to ioyne with him, Hee casily compelled the Athan Garrison to quit the place.

This getting of Argos, together with the good defence of Corinth and some other Townes, as it helped Philip a little in his reputation, so they gaue him hope to obtaine some good end by Treatie, whilest as yet with his honour he might seeke it and when (the Winter being now come on) a new Consuli would shortly beecho 50 son; who should take the worke out of Titus his hands, if it were not concluded the sooner. Titus had the like respect who himselfe; and therefore thought it best, since more could not be done, to prædispose things who a Conclusion, for his owne reputation. The meeting was appointed to be held on the Sea-shore, in the Bay

then called the Malian, or Lamian Bay, now (as is supposed) the Gulfe of Ziton, in the Agaan Sea, or Archipelago. Thither came Titus, with Aminander the Athamanian; an Embassadour of Attalus, the Admirall of Rhodes; and some Agents for the Atolians and Acheans. Philip had with him some few of his owne Captaines, and Cycliadus, lately banished for his sake out of Achaia. He resuled to come on thore: though fearing (as he faid) none but the immortal Gods: yet mildoubting some treathery in the Ætolians. The demands of Titus in behalfe of the Romans were, That he should fetall Cities of Greece at liberty; deliner vp to the Romans and their Confederates, all prisoners which he had of theirs, and Renegado's; likewise what soener hee held of theirs in Illyria; and what focuer about Greece or Afia he had gotten from Ptolemie then King of Agypt, after his fathers death. Attalus demanded rellitution to be made entire, of Ships, Townes, and Temples, by him taken and spoyled in the late warre betweene them. The Rhodians would have against the Countrie of Persa, lying ouer against their Iland; as also that he should withdraw his Garrisons, out of divers Townes about the Hellefont, and other Hauens of their friends. The Achaans defired restitution of Argos and Corinth: about the one of which they might, not vniuftly, quarrell with him; the other had beene long his owne by their confent. The Ætolians tooke vpon them angerly, as Patrons of Greece: willing him to depart out of it, euen out of the whole Countrie, leaning it free; and withall to deli-20 per vp vnto them, what soener hee held that had at any time been theirs. Neither were they here-withall content: but infolently declaimed against him, for that which he had lately done in Theffalie; corrupting (as they faid) the rewards of the Victors, by destroying, when he was vanquished, those Townes which else they might haue gotten. To answer these malapert Atolians, Philip commanded his Gallie to row neerer the shore. But they began to plie him atresh: telling him, that he must obey his betters; vnlesse he were able to defend himselfe by force of Armes. He answered them, (as he was much given to gybing) with fundry scoffes; and especially with one, which made the Roman Conful vnderstand, what manner of companions these Atolians were. For hee said, That he had often dealt with them; as

30 likewise the best of the Greekes; desiring them to abrogate a vvicked Lavy, which permitted them to take spoile from spoile; yet could be get no better an answere, than Eutopt, è por that they would soover take Atolia out of Atolia. Thus wondred what might bee the spoile. That they held it a laudable custome, as often as warre happened between e their friends, to hold up the quarrell by sending voluntaries to serve on both sides, that should spoyle both the one and the other. As for the libertie of Greece, He said it was strange that the Atolians should be so carefull thereof, since divers Tribes of their owne, which he there named, were indeede no Greenas: werefore hee would saine know, whether the Romans would give him leave to make shaves of these Atolians, which were no

40 Greekes. Titus hereat fmiled, and was no whit offended, to heare the Etolians well rattled vp; touching whom he began to understand, how odious they were in all the Countrie. As for that general demand of fetting all Greece at libertie, Philip acknowledged, that it might well beseme the greatnesse of the Romans; though hee would also consider, what might beseme his owne dignitie. But that the Etolians, Rhodams, and other pettie Estates, should thus presume, vader contreance of the Romans, to take vpon them, as if by their great might he should be hereunto compelled: it was, he said, a strange and ridiculous insolence. The Athans he charged with much ingratitude; recting against them some Decrees of their owne; wherein they had loaden both Antigona and him, which more then humane honors.

rinth, that he would further deliberate vvith Titus himfelle. Thus he addreffed himfelfe wholly to the Roman Generall; vnco vvhom if he could giue fatisfaction, he cared little for all the rest. With Attalus and the Rhodians, his late vvarre, (he said) vvas onely desensive; they having been the offerers: or if he gaue them any occasion, it was onely in helping Prusias, his sonne-in-law; neither did hee see why they should rather seeke amends at his hands, than hee at theirs. For whereas they complained, that, spoyling a Temple of Venus, hee had cut downe the Groue, and pleafant walkes thereabouts: what could hee doe more, than fend Gardiners thither with yong plants; if one King of another would stand to aske such recompence? Thus he iested the matter out: but offered neuerthelesse, in honour of the Romans, to give backe the Region of Peraa to the Rhodians; as likewife to Attalus, the Ships and Prisoners of his, whereof he had then possession. Thus ended that dayes conference, because it was late: Philip requiring a nights leifure to thinke vpon the Articles, which were many, and he ill provided of Counfaile, wherewith to adulfe a 10 bout them. For your being foill provided of Counsaile, faid T 1 T v s, you may even thanke your selfe; as having murdered all your friends, that were wont to aduise you faithfully. The next day Philip came not, vntill it was late at night; excusing his long stay by the waightinesse of the things propounded, whereon he could not suddenly tell how to resolue. But it was beleeved, that he thereby sought to abbridge the Étolians of leifure to raile at him. And this was the more likely, for that hee defired conference in private with the Roman Generall. The fumme of his discourse, as Titus afterward related it, was, That hee would give the Acheans both Argos and Corinth; as alfo that he would render vnto Attalus and the Rhodians, what he had promifed the day before; likewise to the Etolians, that hee would grant some part of their de-20 mands; and to the Romans, what societ they did challenge. This when Titus his affociats heard, they exclaimed against it, saying, That if the King were suffered to retaine any thing in Greece, he would shortly get possession of all which hee now rendred vp. The noise that they made came to Philips eare: who thereupon desired a third day of meeting; and protefted, that if he could not perswade them, hee would suffer himselfe to be perswaded by them. So the third day they mette early in the morning: at what time the King intreated them all, that they would with fincere affection harken vnto good offers of peace; and immediatly conclude it, if they could like well of those Conditions, which he had already tendred; or otherwife, that they would make truce with him for the present, and let him send 30 Embassadours to Rome, where hee would referre himselfe to the courteste of the

This was cuen as Quintius would haue it: who flood in doubt, left a new Conful might happen to defraud him of the honour, which he expected byending of the warre. So hee easily preuailed with the rest, to affent hereunto: foras fmuch as it was Winter, a time unfit for service in the warre; and since, without authoritie of the Senate, he should be vnable to proceed resolutedly either in Warre or peace. Further, he willed them to send their several Embassadours to Rome: which intimating vnot the Senate what each of them required, should easily hinder Philip, from obtaining any thing to their prejudice. Among the rest hee perswaded King. Ami-40 nander, to make a journey to Romein person: knowing well, that the name of a King, together with the confluence of so many Embassadours, would serve on make his owne actions more glorious in the Citic. All this tended to procure, that his owne Command of the Armie in Greece might be prorogued. And to the same end had he dealt with some of the Tribunes of the people at Rome: who had already (though as yet he knew not so much) obtained it for him, partly by their authoritie, partly by good reasons vehich they alleaged vnto the Senate.

The Embassadours of the Greeks, when they had audience at Rome, spake bitterly against the King, with good liking of the Senate; which was more desirous of victorie, than of statisfaction. They magnified the honourable purpose of the Romans, 30 in undertaking to set Greece at libertie. But this (they said) could never be effected; unlesse especial care were taken, that the King should bee dispossessing a manufaction of the Country, and making demonstration how those places held all the rest in serior the router of the Country, and making demonstration how those places held all the rest in serior than the serior of the Country, and making demonstration how those places held all the rest in serior than the serior of the Country, and making demonstration how those places held all the rest in serior of the Country and making demonstration how those places held all the rest in serior of the Country and making demonstration how those places held all the rest in serior of the country and making demonstration how those places held all the rest in serior of the country and making demonstration how those places held all the rest in serior of the country and making demonstration how those places held all the rest in serior of the country and making demonstration how those places held all the rest in serior of the country and making demonstration how those places held all the rest in serior of the country and making demonstration how the serior of the country and making demonstration how the serior of the country and making demonstration here.

litie; that the Senate agreed to have it even stately desired. When therfore the Embassiadours of Philip were brought in, and began to have made a long Oration; they were briefly out off in the middest of their Preface, with this one demand: whether their Massier would yeld up Corimb, Chileis, and Demetrias: Heereto they made answere, That, concerning those places, the King had given them no direction or Commission what to say, or doe. This was enough. The Senate would no longer harken to Philips desire of peace; wherein they said hee did no better than trifle. Yet might his Embassiadours have truely saide. That neither the Atolians, Advansa, nor any of their tellowes, had in the late Treatic required by name, that to Chileis and Demetrias should be yeeled up. For which of them indeed could make

10 Chicks and Demetrias (hould be yeelded vp. For which of them indeed could make any Claime to either of these Townes? As for Corimib, whereto the Achaens had some right; (though their right were no better), than that, having stoline it from One Macedonian King in a night, they had, after mature deliberation, made it away by bargaine vnto an Other). Philip had alreadic condescended to give it backe vnto them. And this perhaps would have been alleadged, cuen against the Greekes in excuse of the King, by some of T. Quintius his friends; that so hee night have had the honour to conclude the warre, it a Successor had been decreed vnto him. But since Hee was appointed to continue Generall: neither his friends at stome, nor Hee himselfe, after the return of the Embassadours into Greece, cared to give eare vnto an any talke of peace.

Philip, seeing that his Acheans had for saken him, and ioyned with their common enemies; thought event o deale with them in the like manner, by reconciling him-felfe vnto Nabis, whom they hated most. There were not many yeeres past, fince the Lexedamonians vnder Cleomens, with little other helpe than their owne strength, had been calmost strong enough both for the Astaclonians and Acheans together. But now the condition of things was altered. Nabis his force consisted in a manner wholly in his Mercinaries: for he was a Tyrant; though stiling himselfe King. Yet he forely vexed the Acheans: and therefore seemed vnto Philip one likely to stand him in great stead, if he could be won. To this purpose it was thought meet, that 30 the Towne of Argon, which could not otherwise be castly defended, should bee configned our into his hands; in hope, that such a benefit would serve to the him fast vnto the Ascedonium. Philocles the Kings Lieutenant, who was appointed to deale with Nabis, added further, That it was his Masters purpose to make a streightalliance with the Lace Londonium, by giving some daughters of his owne in marriage vnto Nabis his sonnes. This could not but be well taken. Yet Nabis made some seruple in accepting the Towne of Agos; whelfe by decree of the citizens themselves He might be called into it. Hereabout Philocles dealt with the Argines: but sound them so average that, in open assemblie of the people, they detelled the verie name of the Tyrant, with many railing words. Nabis shearing of this, though thee had at thereby agood occasion to rob and secentee. So hee willed Philocles, without 40 thereby a good occasion to rob and necce them. So need willed Product, without more adoe, to make ouer the Towne which he was readie to receiue. Philotes accordingly did let him with his Armie into it by night; and gaue him possession of the strongest places therein. Thus dealt Philip with the Argines: who for very loue had for laken the Acheans, to take his part. Early in the morning, the Tyrant made himselse Master of all the Gates. A few of the principall men, vnderstanding how things went, sled out of the Citie at the sirst tumult. Wherefore they were all banished, and their goods consistence. The rest of the chiefe Citizens that stayed behinde, were commaunded to bring foorth, out of hand, all their Gold and Silver. Also a great imposition of money was laid vpon all those, that were thought able to so pay it. Such as made their contribution readily, were difmiffed without more adoe. But if any flood long upon the matter: or played the theeues, in purloyning their owne goods; they were put to the whip, and, befides loffe of their wealth, had their torments to boot. This done, the Tyrant began to make popular Lawes:

namely fuch, as might ferue to make him gracious with the rafeall multitude: abro-

gating all debts, and dividing the Lands of the rich among the poore. By such art of oppressing the great ones, it hath beene an olde custome of Tyrants, to assure themselues of the Vulgar for a time.

As soone as Nabis had gotten Argos, Hee sent the newes to T. Quintius; and offered to joyne with him against Philip. Titus was glad of it: so as he tooke the paines to crosse over the Streights into Peloponnesus, there to meet with Nabus. They had soone agreed (though King Attalus, who was present with the Consul, made some cauill touching Argos) and the Tyrant lent vnto the Romans fixe hundred of his Mercinaries of Crete: as also hee agreed with the Achaans, vpon a Truce for foure moneths, referuing the finall conclusion of peace between them untill the Warre 10 of Philip should be ended; which after this continued not long.

XIIII.

The batteile at Cynoscephala, wherein PHILIP was vanqui-Red by T. QVINTIVS.

ITVS QVINTIVS, as soone as he understood that he was appointed to have Command of the Armie, without any other limitation of 20 time, than during the pleasure of the Senate; made all things readie for diligent pursuit of the Warre. The like did Philip: who hauing failed in his negotiation of peace, and no lesse failed in his hopes of getting Nabis to friend in that Warre; meant afterwardes wholly to relie vpon

Plut in vita T. Q.Flam.

Titus had in his Armic about fixe and twentie thousand : and Philip a proportionable number. But neither of them knew the others strength, or what his Enemie intended to doe. Onely Titus heard that Philip was in Thessalie; and thereupon addreffed himselfe to seeke him out. They had like to have met vnawares, neere vnto the Citic of Pher.e: where the vant-courriers on both fides discouered each other; 20 and sent word thereof vnto their seuerall Captaines. But neither of them were ouerhastic, to commit all to hazard vpon so short warning. The day following each of them fent out three hundred Horse, with as many light armed Foot, to make a better discouerie. These met, and fought a long while returning finally backe into their seuerall Campes, with little aduantage vnto either side. The Countrie about Phera was thicke fet with Trees: and otherwise full of Gardens and mud-walles; which made it unproper for feruice of the Macedonian Phalanx. Wherefore the King dislodged, intending to remove back vnto Scotusain the Frontier of Macedon; where he might be plentifully served with all necessaries. Titus conceined aright his meaning: and therefore purposed also to march thitherwards; were it only to waste the 40 Countrie. There lay betweene them agreat ledge of hils, which hindered the one from knowing what course the other tooke. Neuerthelesse they encamped not farre asunder, both the first and the second night; though neither of them vnderstood what was become of the other. The third day was very tempestuous; and forced each of them to take up his lodging, where he found it, by chance. Then fent they forth discouerers againe, in greater number than before. These meeting together, held a long fight, wherein at first the Macedonians had the worse. But Philip anon fent in such strong supply: that if the resistance of the Atolians had not beene desperate, the Romans their fellowes had beene driven backe into their Campe. Yet, all relistance notwithstanding, the Macedonians prevailed : so that Titus himselfe was 50 faine to bring foorth his Legions, that were not a little discouraged, by the deseat of all their Horse, to animate those which were in slight.

It was alrogether besides the Kings purpose, to put the fortune of a battaile in trust that day, with so much of his estate as might thereon depend. But the newes came to him thicke and tumultuoully, how the enemies fled, and how the day was his own; if he could vie an occasion, the like whereof he should not often find. This caused him to alter his purpose: insomuch as he embattailed his men; and climbed up those hils, which, for that the knops thereon had some resemblance unto Dogs heads, were called, by a word fignifying as much, cynofeephale. As foone as hee was on the hil-top; it did him good to fee that they of his owne light armature were bufie in fight, almost at the verie Campe of the Enemies; whom they had repelled so farre. He had also libertie to choose his ground, as might serve best his advantage: foralmuch as the Romans were quite driven from all parts of the Hill. But of this 10 commoditie he could make no great vie : the roughnesse of the place among those Does heads, as they were called, feruing nothing aptly for his Phalanx. Neuertheleffe hee found convenient roome, wherein to marshall the one part of his Armie: and gaue order vnto his Captaines, to follow with the reft; embattailing them as they might. Whilest hee was doing this: Hee perceived that his Horsemen and light armature beganne to shrinke; as being falne vpon the Roman Legions, by force whereof they were driven to recoyle. He fets forward to helpe them; and they no lesse hastily draw vnto him for succour; having the Romans not farre behinde them.

CHAP.4. S.14.

As the Legions beganne to climbe the Hill; Philip commanded those of his Pha-20 lanx to charge their pikes, and entertaine them. Heere Titus found an extreme difficult piece of worke. For this Phalanx, being a great square battaile of armed pikes, like in all points to those which are now ysed in our moderne Warres: and being in like manner ysed, as are ours; was not to bee resisted by the Roman Targettiers, as long as the Phalanx it selfe held together undiffolued. The Macedonians were embattailed in very close order: fo that two of them stood opposite to one of the Romans: as also the pikes of the first ranke, had their points advanced two or three foot before their fore-man. Wherfore it is no matuel, if the Romans gaue backe : every one of them being troubled (as it were) with tenne enemies at once; and not able to come neerer vnto the next of them, than the length of a doozen foot or thereabout. Titus 30 finding this, and not knowing how to remedie it; was greatly troubled: for that fill the Phalanx bare downe all which came in the way. But in the meane while hee observed. That they which were appointed by Philip to make his left wing, were not able through the much vneuennesse of the ground, to put themselves in order: fo as either they kept their places on the Hil-tops; or elfe (which was worfe) vpon defire either of beholding the pastime, or of seeming to bee partakers in the worke, ranne foolifhly along by the fide of their fellowes, which were occupied in fight.

Of this their disorder Hee made great and present vse. Hee caused the right wing of his Battaile to march vp the hill, against these ill ordered troupes: his Elephants leading the way, to increase the terrour. The Macedonians were readier to 40 dispute what should bee done in such a case, than well aduised what to doe; as having no one man appointed, to command that part in chiefe. Indeede if they should have done their best, it could not have served; since the ground whereon they flood, made their weapons vnusefull. For let it be supposed, that Philip hauing fixe and twentie thousand in his Armie (as he is said to have beene equall to the Enemie in number) had foure thousand Horse, foure thousand Targettiers, and foure thousand light-armed: so shall there remaine fourteene thousand Pikes; whereof hee himselfe had embattailed the one halfe in a Phalanx; the other halfe in the left wing, are they whom Quintius is readic now to charge. The Phalanx having vsually fixeteene in File, must, when it consisted of seuen thousand, have welto neere foure hundred and fortie in ranke: but foure hundred would ferue, to make a Front long enough; the other fortie or seuen and thirtie Files might bee cut off, and reckoned in the number of the Targettiers, or light-armed. Allowing therefore, as Polybius doth, to every man of them three foote of ground: this Lib.17. Front must have occupied twelve hundred Foote, or two hundred and forty paces;

that is, very neere a quarter of a mile in length. Such a space of open Champaine, free from incumbrance of Trees, Ditches, Hillocks, or the like impediments, that must of necessitie disloyne this close battaile of the Phalanx; was not every where to be found. Here at Cynoscephala Philip had so much roome, as would onely suffice for the one halte of his men: the rest were faine to stand still and sooke about them; being hindred from putting themselves in order, by the roughnesse of the Dogges heads. But the Romans, to whom all grounds were much alike, were not hindered from comming up vnto them; nor found any difficultie in mastring those enemies. whose feet were in a manner bound by the discommoditie of the place. The very first impression of the Elephants, caused them to give backe; and the comming on 10 of the Legions, to betake themselues vnto flight. A Roman Tribune or Colonell. feeing the victorie on that part affured, left the profequution of it vnto others: and being followed by twenty Enfignes or Maniples, that is, (as they might fall out) by some two thousand men, tooke in hand a notable piece of worke; and mainely helpfull to making of the Victorie complete. Hec confidered that Philip, in pursuing the right wing of the Romans, was runne on fo farre; as that him felfe with his fellowes, in mounting the Hill to charge the left wing of the Macedonians, was already gotten about the Kings head. Wherefore hee turned to the left hand; and making downe the Hill after the Kings Phalanx, fell vpon it in the Rere. The hindmost rankes of the Phalanx, all of them indeed saue the first fine, were accustomed, 20 when the battailes came to joyning, to carrie their Pikes vpright; and with the whole weight of their bodies to thrust on their foremen; and so were they doing at the present. This was another great inconvenience in the Macedonian Phalanx, That it ferued neither for offence nor defence, except onely in Front. For though it were so, that Alexander, when he was to fight with Darius in Mejopotamia, arranged his Phalanx in such order, that all the foure sides of it were as so many Fronts looking fundry wayes, because hee expected that he should be encompassed round: yet it is to bee understood, that herein he altered the viuall forme; as also at the same time he embattailed his men in loofe order, that fo with eafe they might turne their weapons, which way need should require. Like wife it is to be considered, That Alex- 20 anders men being thus disposed, were fit onely to keep their owne ground; not being able to follow vpon the Enemie, vnleffe their hindmost rankes could have marched backwards. But in this present case of Philip, there was no such provision for resistance. Therefore his men, being otherwise vnable to helpe themselues, threw downetheir weapons, and fled. The King himfelfe had thought vnrill now, that the fortune of the battaile was every where alike; and the day his owne. But hearing the noyse behind him, and turning a little aside with a troupe of Horse, to see how all went: when he beheld his men casting downe their weapons, and the Romans at his backe on the higher ground; Hee presently betooke himselfe to flight. Neither staid hee afterwards in any place (except onely a small while about Tempe, 40 there to collect fuch as were difperfed in this ouerthrow) vntill hee was gotten into his owne Kingdome of Macedon.

There died of the Roman Armie in this battaile, about feuen hundred: of the Maeedonians about eight thousand were slaine; and flue thousand taken Prisoners.

CHAP.4.9.15. of the Historie of the World.

è. XV.

T. QVINTIVS falleth out with the Atolians; and grantes truce with PHILIP, with conditions, vpon which the peace is ratified. Libertie proclaimed control the Greeks.

The Remain quarrel with ANTIOCHYS.

He Liolians wonderfully vanted themselues; and desired to haue it noised through all Greece, That the victoricat Cynoseephale was gotten indeed the most of the bootic; by facking the Macedonan Campe, whilethe the most of the bootic; by facking the Macedonan Campe, whilethe the Romans were busied in the chace. Thus therefore being offended both at their vaine glory, and at their ranenous condition; purposed to teach them better maners, by regarding them as slightly, as they thought highly of themselues. He also well perceived, That by vling them with any extraordinaric shaors, he should greatly offend the rest of his Confederates in Greece; who detested the Atolans much more vehemently, than cuer they had done the Macedonius. But 20 this displeasure brake not soorth yet awhile.

After the battaile Titus made hafte vnto Lariffit, a Citie of Theffalie: which be prefently tooke. Before his comming, Philip had fent thither one of his Courtiers to burne all his letters, and paffages what focuer in writing, betwixt him and others: of which many were there kept. It was well done of the King, that among the cares of so much aduerlitie, he forgot not to provide for the safetie of his friends. Yet by his thus doing, they of Lariffa might well perceive, that hee gave them as alreadie loft. Wherefore wee finde not that they, or any of their neighbours, did make delay of opening their gates to Titus. At the same time, the Towne of Leucas bordering vpon Mearnania, was taken by the Roman Fleete: and verie foone after, all the 30 Acarnanians, a warlike Nation, and in hatred of the Etolians euer true to Philip; gane up themselves unto the Romans, hearing of the victorie at Cynoscephale. The Rhodians also were then in hand with the conquest of Persa, a Region of the Continent ouer against their Iland; whereof they had demanded restitution, in the late Treatic of peace with Philip. They did herein more manly, than any other of the Greekes: for a smuch as they awaited not the good leifure of the Romans; but with an Armie of their owne, and some helps which they borrowed of the acheans and other their friends, gaue battaile to Dinocrates the Kings Leintenant, wherein they had the victorie, and confequently recovered the whole Province. It angred Philip worle than all this, that the Dardanians gathered courage out of his affliction, to in-40 nade his Kingdome; wasting and spoyling, as if all had been abandoned to their discretion. This made him gather an Armie in all haste, of fixe thousand foot and fine hundred horfe: wherewith comming upon them, he draue them, with little or no losse of his owne, and great slaughter of theirs, hastily out of the Kingdome.

Which done, He returned to The falonica.

In this one enterprise Hee had successe answerable to his desire; but seeing what had fortune accompanied his assaires, in all other parts at the same time, he thought it wisedometo yeeld vnto necessitie; and therefore sent in all hasse Limnus and Demostheres, with Criticals the banished Achesan, in whom hee reposted much confidence, Embassadours vnto Titus. These had conference a long while in private, with Titus and some of his Roman Colonels; by whom they were gently entertained, and in very friendly wise disfinissed. It seemes that they had Commission, to referre all vnto Titus his owne discretion; as Philip himselse in sew dayes after did. There was granted vnto them a Truce for fitteene dayes; in which time, the King himselsemight come and speake with the Roman General. In the meane season ma-

nie suspitious rumors went of Titus; as if he had been corrupted with great rewards from the King, to betray the Greekes his Confederates. Of these bruits the Atolians were chiefe authors: who being wont to regard neither friendship nor honeitie. where profit led them a wrong way, judged alike of all men elle. But against the day appointed for the meeting betwixt him and Philip, Titus had fent letters vnto his Affociates; willing them to have their Agents readic by a time appointed, at the entrance of Tempe, where the Treatie should be held. I here when they were all affembled, they entred into confultation before the Kings arrivall, what should be most expedient for the common benefit of them all, and for every Estate in particular. The poore King Aminander befought them all, and especially the Romans, that 10 they would think you him; and confidering his weaknes which he confelled, make fuch prouision, that after the Romanes had turned their backs, and were gone home, Philip might not wreake his anger vpon him who was not able to refift. Then spake Alexander one of the Etolians; who commending Titus for so much as he had thus affembled the Confederates to aduife vpon their owne good, and had willed them to deliner their mindes freely: added, That in the maine of the purpose which hee had in hand, hee was vtterly deceived: for that by making peace with Philip, hee could neither affure the Romans of their quiet, nor the Greeks of their libertie. There was he faid, none other end to be made of the warre, which could agree either with the purpose of the Senate and People of Rome, or with the faire promises made by 20 Titus himselfe vnto the Greeks, than the chacing of Philip quite out of his Kingdome. And to this effect he made a long discourse. But Titue answered, That this Aetolian was ill acquainted, either with the good pleasure of the Senate and People of Rome, or with the landable customes which they generally held: for that it was not the manner of the Romans, to feeke the vtter destruction of any King or Nationat fuch time as they first made warre with them; vntill by some rebellion they found it a matter of necessitie, to take such a rigorous course. And heereof he alleaged the Carthaginians as a notable example : adding, That victorie, to generous mindes, was onely an inducement vnto moderation. As concerning the publike benefit of Greece: it was (he faid) expedient, that the Kingdome of Macedon should be greatly weake- 20 ned and brought low; not that it should bee vtterly destroyed : for a smuch as it serued as a barre, to the Thracians, Gaules, and a multitude of other fauage Nations, which would foone ouer-flow the whole Continent of Greece, if this kingdome were not interposed. Wherefore he concluded, that if Philip would yeeld vnto those demands, wherewith he had pressed him in the former Treatie; then was there no reason to denie him peace. As for the Aetolians; if they thought other wise, it should bee at their owne pleasure, to take counsaile apart for themselves as they thought good. Then began Phaneas, another of the Aetolians, to fay, That all was come to nothing; for that ere long, Philip would trouble all the Greekes, no leffe than hee had done in time before. But Titus interrupted him, and bad him leave his babling; 40 faying, That himselfe would take such order, as that Philip, were he neuer so desirous, should thence foorth not have it in his power to molest the Greekes.

The next day King Philip came thither: whom Titus vsed friendly: and suffering him to repose himselfe that night, held a Councell the day following; wherein the King yeelded vnto all that had beene required at his hands; offering yet further to fland to the good pleasure of the Senate, if they would have more added to the Conditions. Phaneas the Ætolian, infulting ouer him, faid it was to bee hoped, that he would then at length give vp to the £tolians a many of townes ( which he there named) bidding him speake, whether he would, or not. His answere was, that they might take them all. But Titus interpoling himselfe, said it should be otherwise; 50 These were Thessalan Townes, and should all bee free : one of them onely excepted. which not long agoe had refused to commit it selfe to the faith of the Romans, and therefore should now bee given to the Atolians. Heerest Phaneas cried out that it was too great an injurie, thus to defraud them of the Townes that had fometime belonged belonged vnto their Common-weale. Rather he willed Titus to confider that by an ancient Couenant betweene them and the Romans, all the Townes taken ought to be their owne, and the Romans to have nothing faue the pillage and captines. It is true, that there had beene such a Condition in the former warre: but it ceased to be of any validitie, as soone as the Atolians made peace with Philip. And thus much Titus gave them to vnderstand; asking them whether they thought it reasonable, that all the Townes in Greece, which had let in the Romans by composition, should be deliuered into subjection of the Atolians. The rest of the Confederates were verie much delighted, with these angry passages betweene the Roman and the Etolians: neither had they great reason to seare any hard measure; since Titus was so carnest in behalfe of those Thessalians, to give them libertie, though they had flood out against him, even till very feare made them open their gates. Wherefore they cp-

posed not themselves; but gave their consent willingly vnto a Truce for source

CHAP.4. S.15. of the Historie of the World.

The chiefe cause that mooned Titus to grant peace so readily to the Macedonian, besides that laudable custome by him before alleadged; was, the same of Antiochus his comming with an Armie from Syria, and drawing neere toward Europe. Hee had also perhaps yet a greater motive; even the confideration that his successor might happen to defraud him of the honour, if the warre (hould happen to be pro-20 tracted. And hee was in the right: For when his letters, together with Embassadours from the Macedonian, and fundry States of Greece, came vnto Rome, new Confuls were chosen: who, (especially the one of them) stood very earnestly against the peace; alleadging friuolous matter of their owne suspition, in hope to get the honour of concluding the warre. The Senate began to be doubtfully affected, betweene the Embassadors of Philip, offering to stand to what soener was demanded, and the letters of Tress preffing them to accept this offer, on the one fide; and the importunitie of the Conful on the other; who faid, that all these goodly shewes were fraudulent, and that the King would rebell, as foone as the Armie was called out of Greece. But the matter was taken out of the Senatours hands by two of the 20 Tribunes, that referred it to an Affemblie of the People; by whose sourceigne authoritie it was concluded, That Peace should be granted vnto the King. So tenne Embaffadors were fent from Rome ouer into Greece: in which number were they, that had beene Confuls before Titus; and it was ordained by their aduice, That Titus should goe through with the businesse of Peace. These would very faine have retained those three important Cities of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias, vntill

The Conditions of the Peace granted vnto Philip, were, That before the celebration of the next *Ishmian Games, He should withdraw his Garrisons out of all the * è Polyb. ex-Greeke Townes which he held, and configne them oner to the Romans: That hee certs, Legat, 9. should deliuer up unto them all Captines that he had of theirs, and all Renegado's: Likewise all his shippes of warre, reserving to himselfe onely fluc of the lesser fort, and one of extraordinarie greatnesse, wherein sixteene men laboured at enery oare: Further, that hee would pay a thousand talents, the one halfe in hand, the other in ten yeeres next following, by euen portions. Hereto *Liuie addes, That he was for- *Liu,1.33. bidden to make warre out of Macedon, without permiffion of the Senate. But I finde not that he observed this Article, or was at any time charged with the breach of it. 50 Foure hundred talents hee had alreadic delivered vnto Titus, together with his yonger sonne Demetrius, to remaine as hostage for his true dealing in this matter of peace, at fuch time as hee lately fent his Embassadours to Rome: when it was promiled, that the money, and his sonne, should be restored backe vnto him, if the Senate were not pleafed with the agreement. Whether this money were reckoned as the state of Greece were somewhat better settled. But finally Titus prevailed so, that Corinth was (though not immediately) rendered vnto the Acheens; and all the other Greeke Townes which Philip held, as well in Alia as in Greece, reftored vnto part of the thousand talents, I cannot finde : and it seemeth otherwise, for a smuch as yong Demetrius, who together with those foure hundred Talents was given for hostage, remained still in custodic of the Romans, as a part of the bargaine which Titus formerly had made. Letters also were then sent by Titus vnto Prusius King of Bithynia: giving him to understand what agreement was made with Philip in behalfe of the Greekes; and how the Senate held it reasonable, that the Ciani, most miserably spoiled and oppressed by Philip to gratifie this Bithymian his sonne-in-law, should be restored to libertic, and permitted to enjoy the same benefit of the Romans, which other of their Nation did. What effect these letters wrought it was not greatly materiall; fince the Romans were shortly busied with Antiochus, in such wise that they 10 had not leifure to examine the conformitie of Prulius to their will.

All Greece rejoyced at the good bargaine which Titus had made with Philip. Onely the Ætolians found themselves agricued that they were vtterly neglected; which was to the rest no smal part of their contentment. The Bactians continued to fauour the Macedonian; and thereby occasioned much trouble vnto themselues. There were some among them wel-affected to the Romans: who seeing how things were like to goe, made their complaint vnto Titus; faying, that they were no better than loft, for the good will which they had borne vnto him; vnlesse at this time, when he lay close by them with his Armie, their Prætor which was head of the opposite Faction might be made away. Titus refused to have an hand in the execution, yet 20 neuerthelessed animate them in their purpose. So they committed the fact, and hoped to have kept themselves vndiscouered. But when the murder came out, and somewhat was confessed by those that were put to torture: the hatred of the people brake out violently against the Romans; in such wife, that how socuer they durft not take armes against them, yet such of them as they found stragling from their Campe, they murdered in all parts of the Countrie. This was detected within awhile, and many of the dead bodies found. Herevpon Titus requires of the Baotians, to have the murderers delivered into his hands; and for five hundred fouldiers, which he had loft by them, to have paid vnto him five hundred Talents. In flead of making any fuch amends, they paid him with excuses; which he would not 20 take as good satisfaction. Hee sends Embassadours to the Acheans and Athenians, informing them what had happened: and requested them not to take it amisse, though he dealt with these their friends as they had deserved. Herewithall he fals to wasting their Countrie; and beliegeth two fuch Townes of theirs, as did feeme to bee most culpable of the murders lately done. But the Embassadours of the Achaans and Athenians, (especially of the acheans who offered, if he needed them, to helpe him in this warre; yet befought him rather to grant peace vnto the Baotians) prevailed fo farre with him; that he was pacified with thirtie Talents, and the punishment of fuch as were knowne offendors.

In like fort, though not so violently, were many States of Greece distracted : some 40 among them reioycing that they were free from the Macedonian; others greatly doubting, that the Roman would proue a worse neighbour. The Ætolians would haue beeneglad of any Commotion; and therefore published rumors abroad, That it was the purpose of the Romans, to keepe in their owne handes all those places, wherein Philip lately had his Garrisons. Little did they, or the rest of the Greekes, conceine, that this Macedonian Warre ferued as an introduction to the Warre to bee made in Alia against King Antiochus; where grew the fruit, that was to be reaped of this and many other victories. Wherefore to stay the progresse of bad rumors when the Illimian games were held, which in time of peace overe never without great folemnitic and concourfe: Titus in that great affembly of all Greece, cau- 50 fed proclamation to be made by found of Trumpet to this effect, That the Senate and people of Rome, and Titus Quintius Flaminius the Generall, having vanquished King Philip and the Macedonians, did wil to be at libertie, free from Impolitions, free from Garrisons, and living at their owne Lawes, the Corinthians, Phocians, Locrians, Euberans.

Eubwans, Acheans of Phthiotis, Magnetians, Thesialians, and Perrhebians. The suddennesse of this Proclamation astonished men: so as though they applauded it with a great (hout; yet prefently they cried out to heare it againe, as if they durit fearce credit their owne cares. The Greeks were Crafts-mafters in the Art of giving thanks, which they rendred now to T. Quintius with so great affection, as that they had welneere fmothered him, by thronging officioully about him.

CHAP.4. S.15. of the Historie of the World.

This good will of all the Greekes, was like to bee much more availeable vnto the Romans in their warre against Antio hus, than could have beene the possession of a few Townes, yea or of all those Provinces which were named in their Proclamati-10 on. Vpon confidence heercof, no fooner were thefe Ifthmian games at an end, than Titus, with the Romans that were of his Councell, gaue audience to Hagefranax and Lyfias King Antiochus his Embalfadours : whom they willed to fignific vnto their Lord, That he should doe well to abstaine from the free Cities in Asia, and not vexe them with warre: as also to restore what soener he had occupied, belonging to the Kings, Ptolomie or Philip. Moreouer they willed him by these his Embassadours, that he should not passe ouer his Armie into Europe; adding, That some of them would visit him in person ere it were long, to talke with him further concerning these points. This done, they fell to accomplishing their promises vnto the Greekes; to the rest they gave what they had promised. But the Phocians and Locrians they 20 gaue vnto the Atolians; whom they thought it no wiledome to offend ouer-much, being shortly to take a greater worke in hand. The Acheans of Phthiotis they annexed vnto the The falians; all faue the Towne of Thebes in Phthiotis, the same which had been abandoned by T. Quintius to the Atolians in the last Treatic with Philip. The Atolians contended very carnelly about Pharfalus and Leucas. But they were put off with a dilatoricanswere, and rejected vnto the Senate: for how socuer somewhat the Councell might fauour them; yet was it not meet that they should have their will, as it were in despight of Titus. So the Acheans were restored Corinth, Triphylia, and Herea. So the Corinthians were made free indeede ( though the Romans yet awhile kept the Acrocorinthus) for that all which were partakers of the 30 Achean Commonwealth, enjoyed their libertie in as absolute manner, as they could defire. To Pleuratus the Illyrian were given one or two places, taken by the Romans from Philip; and vpon Aminander were bestowed those Castles, which hee had gotten from Philip during this Warre; to reigne in them and the grounds which they commanded, as he did among his Athamanians. The Rhodians had been their owne Caruers. Attalus was dead a little before the Victorie; and therefore lost his share. Yet many that were with Titus in Councell, would have given the Townes of Oreum and Eretria, in the Ile of Eubaa, to his sonne and successiour King Eumenes. But finally it was concluded, that there as well as the reft of the Enbeans, should be fuffered to enjoy their libertie. Orefis, a little Province of the Kingdome of Macedon, 40 bordering on Epirus, and lying towards the Ionian Sea, had yeelded vnto the Romans long ere this, and fince continued true to them; for which cause it was also set at libertie, and made a free estate by it selfe.

These businesses being dispatcht: it remained, that all care should be vied, not how to avoid the war with King Antioches, but how to accomplish it with most ease and prosperity. Wherefore Embassadours were sent both to Antiochus himselfe, to picke matter of quarrell; and about vnto others, to prædispose them vnto the assisting of the Romans therein. What ground and matter of Warre against this King the Romans now had, or shortly after found: as also how their Embassadours and Agents dealt and sped abroad; I referre vnto another place.

ELEVE VS NICATOR, the first of his race, King of Asia and Syria, died in the end of the hundred twentie and fourth Olympiad. Hee was trecherously flaine by Ptolemie Ceraumus, at an Altar called Argos; hauing (as is faide) beene warned before by an Ora-20 cle, to beware of Argos, as the fatall place of his death. But I neuer have read that any mans life hath beene preserved, or any mischance avoided, by the predictions of fuch Deuilish Oracles. Rather I beleeue, That many such predictions of the Heathen Gods, haue beene ante-dated by their Priests or by others; which deuised them after the euent.

Antiochus Soter, the sonne and heire of this Soloneus, was dearely beloued of his Father: who furrendred vp vnto him his owne wife Stratonica, when hee vnderflood how much the young Prince was enamoured on her. Wherefore Ptolemie Ce- 20 rannus had great cause to feare, that the death of Selencus would not bee vnreuenged by this his Successor. But Antiochus was contented to be pacified, either with gifts, or perhaps onely with faire words; containing himselfe within Alia, and letting Ceraunus enioy that quietly, which he had purchased in Europe with the bloud of Seleueus. It is faid of this Antiochus, that although he married with the Queen Stratonica in his Fathers life; yet out of modeslie he forbore to embrace her, till his Father was dead. So that perhaps his incestuous lone was partly, if not chiefly, the cause of his not profecuting that reuenge; whereunto Nature should have viged him. Afterwards he had warres with Antigonus Gonatas, and with Nicomedes King of Bithynia. Alfo Lutarius and Leonorius, Kings or Captaines of the Gaules, were fet upon him by 40 the same Nicomedes. With these he fought a great battaile: wherein though otherwiscthe Enemies had all advantage against him; yet by the terror of his Elephants, which affrighted both their Horses and them, he wonne the Victorie. Hee tooke in hand an enterprise against Ptolemie Philadelphia: but finding ill successe in the beginning, he soone gaucit ouer. To this King Antiochus Soter it was, that Berofus the Chaldean dedicated his Historic of the Kings of Affyria; the same, which hath since beene excellently falfified by the Frier Annius. He left behind him one sonne, called Antiochus Theos; and one daughter, called Apame, that was married unto the King of Cyrene. So he died about the end of the bundred twentic and ninth Olympiad, or the beginning of the Olympiad following, in the fiftieth or one and fiftieth 50 veere of the Kingdome of the Greekes; when he had raigned nineteene yeeres.

Antiochus, furnamed Theos or the god, had this vaine and impious title given vnto him, by flatterie of the Milesians; whom hee deliuered from Timarchus, a Tyrant that oppressed them. He held long and difficult, but fruitlesse, warre with Piolemie CHAP.5. S.I. of the Historie of the World.

Ptolemie Philadelphus was a great louer of Peace and Learning; and (fetting apart his incestuous marriage with his owne sister Arsinoe) a very excellent Prince; howfoeuer, the worthieft of all that race. It was Hee, that built and furnished with Bookes, that famous Librarie in Alexandria: which to adorne, and to honour the more, Hee sent vnto Eleazar then high Priest of the Iewes, for the Bookes of Moses and other Scriptures. The benefits of this King vnto the Iewes, had formerly bin very great: for He had fet at libertie as many of them, as his Father held in flauerie throughout all Agypt; and hee had fent vnto the *Temple of God in Hierusalem * Aug.de ciu. very rich Presents. Wherefore Eleazar yeelding to the Kings desire, presented him Dei,L.18,c.42. with an Hebrew coppie; which Piolemie caused to be translated into Greeke, by seuentie two of the most graue and learned persons, that could bee found among all the Tribes. In this number of the feuentietwo Interpreters, or (as they are commonly called) the Seventie; lefus the fonne of Sirach, is thought by Genebrard to have beene 20 one: who that he lived in this Age, it seemes to me very sufficiently prooved by Ian-

Jenius, in his Preface vnto Ecclesiasticus. The whole possinge of this bulinesse between Philadelphus and the High Priest, was written (as h 10/epous affirmes) by Ariflaus that h 10/an.laz.c. was employed therein. Fortie yeeres Ptolemie Philadelphus was King; reckoning the Concerning that Booke time wherein hee iountly reigned with his Father. Hee was exceedingly beloued which now of his people; and highly magnified by Poets, and other Writers. Towards his goes under end hee grew more voluptuous, than hee had beene in his former yeeres: in which riftam; many time he boalted, that hee alone had found out the way how to line for cuer. If this learned men, had been referred vnto his honourable deeds, it might have flood with reason; or and among the reft testings. therwife, the Gowt, with which hee was often troubled, was enough to teach him Vines, hold fuf-30 his owneerrour. He was the first of the Kings, derived from Alexanders Successors, pition that it is that entred into League with the Romans: as also his Off-spring was the last among and the inventhose Royall Families, which by them was rooted vp. Antiochus Theos had another wife, called Laodice, at such time as he married with Surely if it Berenice the daughter of this Ptolemie. After his fecond marriage, hee vied his first were to be fufwife with no better regard, than if shee had beene his Concubine. Laodice hated petted in the him for this: yet aduentured not to feeke renenge; vntill her own fonne Selencus Calitime or v mer; it may be now linicus was of abilitie to bee King. This was two or three yeeres after the death much more of Ptolemie Philadelphus: at what time thee poyloned her husband Theos; and by edifine a new permiffion of Seleucus her fonne, murdered Berenice, together with a fonne that the Edition of it is 40 had borne to Antioches. Iufline reports, that Berenice faued herfelfe, together with the come foorth. yong Prince her child, awhile in the Sanctuarie at Daphne: and that not only fome faults (as the Cities of Afia prepared to succour her, but her brother Ptolemie Euergetes, King of Papills terme Agypt, came to rescue her with an Armie; though too late, for she was slaine be- wherein they

His subjects were highly offended at tee form. his wicked nature; which they discouered in his first entrance. Wherefore it was Middendorpin like, that his Estate would have beene much endangered, if Ptolemie Euergetes, who at Colen, An. came against him, had not beene drawne backe into his owne Countrie, by some 11/6, L.27. 50 Commotions there in hand. For there were none that would beare armes against Ptolemie, in defence of their owne King: but rather they fided with the Agyptian; who tooke Landice the Kings mother, and rewarded her with death as shee had well descrued. Wherefore Seleucus, being freed from this invasion, by occasion of those domesticall troubles which recalled Euergetes home into Agypt; went about a dan-Hhhhhhh 3

gerous piece of worke, euen to make Warre vpon his owne subjects, because of their bad affection towards him; when as it had beene much better, by well deferuing, to have changed their hatred into loue. A great Fleet hee prepared: in furnifhing and manning whereof hee was at fuch charges, that hee scarce left himfelfe any other hope, if that should miscarrie. Heerein hee embarqued himselfe; and, putting to Sea, met with such a tempest, as denoured all saue himselfe, and a very few of his friends that hardly escaped. This calamity having left him nothing else in a manner than his naked body, turned neuertheleffe to his great good; as anon after it feemed. For when his Subjects understood, in what fort the Gods (as they conceived it ) had punished him for his offences: they had commiseration of his Estate; and, 10 prefuming that hee would thencefoorth become a new man, offered him their feruice with great alacritie. This reuined him, and filled him with such spirit; as thinking himselfe well enough able to deale with the Agyptian, he made ready a mightie Armie for that purpose. But his fortune was no better at Land, than it had beene at Sea. He was vanquished by Ptolemie in a great battaile: whence he escaped hardly : no better attended, than after his late shipwracke. Hasting therefore backe to Antioch, and fearing that the Enemie would soone beeat his heeles; He wrote vnto his brother Antiochus Hierax, who lay then in Asia, praying him to bring succour with all speed; and promising, in recompence of his faith and diligence, the Dominion of a great part of Afia. Antiochis was then but fourteene yeeres olde, yet ex- 20 tremely ambitious; and therefore glad of fuch an occasion to make himselfe great. He leuied a mighty Armie of the Gaules; wherewith he fet forwards to helpe his brother; or rather to get what hee could for himselfe. Hereof Ptolemie being aduertised : and having no desire to put himselfe in danger more than needed; tooke Truce with Seleucus for tenne yeeres. No sooner was Seleucus freed from this care of the Egyptian warre, but his brother Antiochus came vpon him; and needs would fight with him, as knowing himselfe to have the better Armie. So Seleucus was vanquifhed againe; and faued himfelfe, with fo few about him, that he was verily suppofed to have perisht in the battaile. Thus did Gods justice take revenge of those murders, by which the Crowne was purchased; and settled (as might have beene 30 thought) on the head of this bloudie King. Antiochus was glad to heare of his brothere death; as if thereby hee had purchased his hearts desire. But the Gaules, his Mercinaries, were gladder than He. For when he led them against Eumenes King of Pergamus, in hope to get honour by making a Conquest in the beginning of his Reigne: these perfidious Barbarians tooke counsaile against him; and denised how to strippe him of all that hee had. They thought it very likely, that if there were none of the Royall house to make head against them; it would be in their power, to doe what should best bee pleasing to themselves, in the lower Asia. Wherefore they laide hands on Antiochus; and enforced him to ransome himselse with money, asif hee had beene their lawfull Prisoner. Neither were they so contented; but 40 made him enter into fuch Composition with them, as tended little to his honour. In the meane while Seleuens had gathered a new Armie; and prepared once more to tric his fortune against his brother. . Eumenes hearing of this , thought the season fit for himselfe, to make his profit of their discord. Antiochus fought with him . and was beaten : which is no great marmaile; fince he had great reason to stand in no lesse feare of the Gaules his owne fouldiers, than of the enemie with whom hee had to deale. After this, Eumenes wanne much in Afia; whilest Antiochus went against his brother. In the second battaile, fought betweene the brethren, Seleucus had the vpper hand : and Antiochus Hierax or the Hawke, ( which furname was given him. because he sought his prey vpon every one, without care whether hee were prouoked 50 or not) foared away as farre as he could, both from his brother, and from his owne Gau'es. Having fercht agreat compasse through Mesopotamia and Armenia. He fell at length in Cappadosia; where his father-in-law King Artamenes tooke him vp. Hec was entertained very louingly in outward shew; but with a meaning to betray him.

This hee foone perceived: and therefore betooke him to his wings againe; though he knew not well, which way to bend his flight. At length heerefolued to bestowe himselfe vpon Ptoleme ; his owne conscience telling him , what enil hee had meant vnto Seleucus his brother; and therefore what little good he was reciprocally to expectat his hands. Infidelitic can find no fure harbour. Ptolemie well vnderstood the perfidious and turbulent nature of this Hierax. Wherefore hee laydhim vp in close prison: whence, though by meanes of an harlot, he got out; yet flying from his keepers, he fell into the hands of theeues, by whom he was murdered. Neareabout the same time died Sciencus. The Parthians and Bactrians had rebelled against 10 him, during his warres with his brother. He therefore made a journey against Arfaces founder of the Parthian kingdome: wherein his cuill fortune, or rather Gods vengeance, adhered to closely to him, that he was taken prisoner. Ar faces dealt friendly with him, and dismissed him, having every way given him royall entertainment: but in returning home, he brake his necke by a fall from his horse, and so ended his vnhappie reigne of twenty yeeres. Hee had to wife Laodice, the lifter of Andromachim, one of his most trustic Captaines : which was father vnto that Achem, who making his aduantage of this affinitie, became shortly after (as he stilled himselfe) a king; though rather indeed, a great troubler of the world in those parts. By Landice hee had two fonnes; Seleucus the third, furnamed Cerannus; and Antiochus the third, 20 called afterwards the Great.

Sciences Ceramons reigned onely three yeeres: in which time he made warre vpon attalus the first, that was King of Pergamus. Being weaks of bodie through lickness and in want of monie, the could not keepe his men of warre in good order; and study he was slaine by treason of Nicanor; and Apaturius a Gaule. His death was renenged by Abbaus, who flue the Traitors, and tooke charge of the Armie: which he ruled very wisely, and faithfully awhile; Antiochus, the brother of Sciencus, being then a Childe.

This was that Euergetes, who relieuced Aratus and the Acheans: who afterwards tooke part with Cleomenes; and louingly entertained him, when he was chaced out of Greece by Antigonus Gonatas. Hee annexed vnto his Dominion the Kingdome of Cyrene; by taking to wife Bereniee, the daughter of King Magas. He was the third of the Ptolemies; and the last good King of the race.

The name of Energetes, or the doer of good, was given him by the Egyptians; not fo much for the great spoiles which hee brought home, after his victories in Syria; as for that he recoursed some of those Images or Idols, which Cambyses, when hee conquered Egypt, 'had carried into Persia. He was ready to have made war vpon the lewes, for that Onias their high Priest, out of meere couetousnesse of mony, refufed to pay vnto him his yeerely tribute of twenty talents: but hee was pacified by the wisedome of losephus a Iew, vnto whom afterwards he let in farme the Tributes and Customes that belonged vnto him, in those parts of Syria which hee held. For Calofyria, with Palastina and all those parts of the Countrie that lay necessit vnto Ægypt, were held by the Ægyptian; either as having fallen to the share of Ptole-10 mie the first, at such time as the great Antigonus was vanquished and flaine in the battaile at Ipfus; or as being won by this Energetes, in the troublesome and vnhappie reigne of Seleucus Callinicas. The victories of this Energetes in Syria, with the contentions that lasted for many succeeding ages betweene the Ptolemies and the Seleucide; were all forctold by Daniel in the Prophecie before cited, which is ex-Dounded be S. Hierome. This Ptolemie Euergetes reigned fix and twentie yeeres; and died towards the end of the hundred thirtie and ninth Olympiad. It may feeme by that, which we find in the Prologue vnto Iefus the sonne of Sirach his booke, that he should have reigned a much longer time. For Siracides there faith, that he came into Agypt in the eight and thirtieth yeere, when Euergetes was King. It may there- 20 fore be, That either this King reigned long together with his father: or that those eight and thirtie yeeres, were the yeeres of lefus his owne age; if not perhaps reckoned (as the Iewes did otherwhiles reckon) from some notable accident that had befallen them.

Not long after the death of Energetes, Hermias the Counfailer, and in a manner the Protection of King Antiochus, incited his Lord vnto warre against the Agyptian; for the recovery of Calofyria and the Countries adioyning. This counfaile was verie vnseasonably given; when Molo, the Kings Lieutenant in Media, was broken out into rebellion, and fought to make himselfe absolute Lord of that rich Countrie. Neuerthelesse Hermias, being more froward than wise, maintained stifly, that 30 it was most expedient, and agreeable with the Kings honour, to send forth against a rebellious Captain, other Captaines that were faithful; whileft He in person made warre vpon one, that was like himselfe, a King. No man durst gainsay the resolution of Hermias; who therfore fent Xenatas an Achaan, with fuch forces as he thought expedient, against the Rebell; whilest in the meane season an Armie was preparing for the Kings Expedition into Caelofyria. The King having marched from Apamea to Landicea, and so over the Desarts into the Vallie of Marsyas, betweene the Mountaines of Libanus and Anti-libanus; found his way there stopped by Theodotus an Atolian, that ferued vnder Ptolemie. So hee confumed the time there awhile to none effect: and then came newes, that Xenatas, his Captaine, was destroyed with his 40 whole Armie; and Molo thereby become Lord of all the Countrie, as farre as vnto Babylon.

Xenatas, whilest he was yet on his journey, and drew neere to the River of Tyeris; received many aducrtisements, by such as fledde over vnto him from the Enemie, That the followers of Molo were, for the most part, against their wills, drawne by their Commander to beare armes against the King. This report was not altogether falle; but Molo himselfe stood in some doubt lest his followers would leave him in time of necessitie. Xenætas therefore making shew, as if hee had prepared to passe the River by Boats in face of his Enemie; left in the night time such as he thought meete to defend his Campe; and with all the floure of his Armie went ouer Tygris, 50 in a place ten miles lower than Molo his Campe. Molo heard of this, and fent forth his horse to give impediment: but hearing that Xenætas could not so bee stopped, He himselfe dislodged, and tooke his journey towards Media; leaving all his baggage behinde him in his Campe. Whether he did this, as distrusting the faith of his owne fouldiours:

fouldiours: or whether thereby to deceive his Enemie; the great folly of Agnatas made his stratageme prosperous. For Lenatas, having borne himselfe proudly before, voon the countenance of Hermias by whom he was advanced vnto this charge; did now prefume, that all should give way to his authoritie, without putting him to much trouble of vling the fword. Wherefore he suffered his men to feast, with the provisions which they found ready in the forsaken Campe: or rather hee commanded them fo doe, by making Proclamation, That they should cherish vp themselues against the journey, which hee intended to take next day, in pursuit of the Rebels that fled. And to the same purpose he busied himselfe, in transporting 10 the remainder of his Armie, which he had left on the other fide of Treris. But Offer lo went no further that day, than he could eafily returne the fame night. Wherefore vnderstanding what good rule the Kings men kept: hee made such haste backe vnto them, that he came upon them early in the morning; whileft they were yet heavie with the wine and other good cheare, that they had spent at supper. So Xee nætas and a very few about him, died fighting in defence of the Campe: the rest were flaughtered, without making relifiance; and many of them, ere they were perfectly awake. Likewise the Campe on the other side of Tyeris, was easily taken by Molo: the Captaines flying thence, to faue their owne lives. In the heat of this victorie, the Rebell marched vnto Selencis, which he presently tooke; and maste-20 ring within a little while the Province of Babylonia, and all the Countrie downe to the Red-Sea, or Bay of Persia, He hasted vnto Susa; whereat his first comming hee wan the Citie: but failing to take the Caffle that was exceeding firong, returned backe to Seleucia, there to give order concerning this bulinesse.

The report of these things comming to Antiochus, whilest helay (as is said before) in the Vale of Mar (yas; filled him with great forrow, and his Campe with trouble. He tooke counfaile what to doe in this needfull case; and was well admised by Epigenes the best man of warre hee had about him, to let alone this Enterprise of Calofyria; and bend his forces thither, where more neede required them. This counfaile was put in execution with all convenient hafte. Yet was Epigenes difmifled 30 by the way, and foone after flaine, by the practice of Hermias; who could not endure to heare good counfaile given, contrary to his owne good liking and allowance. In the journey against Molo, the name and presence of the King was more anailable, than any oddes which hee had of the Rebel in flrength. Mole diftrufted his owne followers: and thought, that neither his lategood successe, nor any other confideration, would ferue to hold them from returning to the Kings obedience; if once they beheld his person. Wherefore he thought it safest for him, to assaile the Kings Campe in the night time. But going in hand with this, He was discougred by some that fled ouer from him to the King. This caused him to returne backe to his Campe: which, by fome errour, tooke alarme at his returne; and was hardly 40 quieted, when Antiochus appeared in light. The King was thus forward in gining battaile to Mole, vpon confidence which hee had that many would revolt vnto him. Neither was he deceived in this his beliefe. For not a few men or Enfignes; but all the left wing of the Enemie, which was opposite vnto the King, changed side forthwith as foone as ever they had fight of the Kings person; and were ready to doehim fernice against Molo. This was enough to have wonne the Victorie: but Molo shortned the worke, by killing himfelfe; as did also divers of his friends, who for feare of torments preuented the Hang-man with their owne fwords.

After this Victorie came joyfull newes, that the Queene Landice, daughter of Mithridates King of Poneus, which was married vnto Antiochus awhile before, had so brought foorth a fonne. Fortune feemed bountifull vnto the King: and therefore he purposed to make what vie hee could, ofher friendly disposition while it lasted: Being now in the Easterne parts of his kingdome, Heeiudged it convenient to visit his Frontiers, were it onely to terrifie the Barbarians, that bordered your him. Hereunto his Counfailer Hermins gaue affent : not fo much respecting the Kings honour;

as considering what good might thereby happen to himselfe, For if it should come to passe, that the King were taken out of the world by any casualtie: then made hee no doubt of becomming Protector to the yong Prince; and thereby of lengthening his owne Gouernment. Antiochus therefore went against Artabazanes, who reigned among the Atropatians; having the greatest part of his kingdome, situate betweene the Caspian and the Euxine Sea. This barbarous King was very old and fearefull; and therfore yeelded vnto whatsoeuer Conditions it pleased Antiochus to lay vpon him. So in this journey Antiochus got honour, fuch as well contented him; and then returned homewards. Vpon the way, a Physician of his brake with him as concerning Hermias sinforming him truely, how odious hee was vnto the people; and how 10 dangerous he would be shortly vnto the Kings owne life. Antiochus beleeued this, having long suspected the same Hermias; but not daring, for feare of him, to vtter his suspitions. It was therefore agreed, that he should be made away on the sudden: which was done, he being trained forth by a fleight a good way out of the Campe, and there killed without warning or disputation. The King needed not to have vsed so much Art, in ridding his hands of a man so much detested. For how socuer hee feemed gracious whilest hee was aliue; yet they that for feare had been most obsequious to him, whilest hee was in case to doe them burt, were as ready as the foremost, to speake of him as hee had descrued, when once they were secure of him: Yea, his wife and children lying then at Apamea, were stoned to death by the wives 20 and children of the Citizens; whose indignation brake forth the more outragiously, the longer that it had been concealed.

About these times, Acheus (of whom we spake before) thinking that Antiochus might happen to perish in some of those Expeditions which hee tooke in hand; was bold to set a Diademe vpon his owne head, and take vpon him as a King. His purpose was to haue inuaded Syria: but the fame of Antiochus his returning thitherwards, made him quit the enterprise; and fludie to set some handsome colour on his former presumption. It is very strange, that Antiochus neither went against Acheus; nor yet diffembled the notice which he had taken, of these his traiterous purpoles: but wrote vnto him, signifying that he knew all; and vpbraiding him with 30 fuch infidelitie, as any offender might know to be unpardonable. By these meanes heemboldened the Traitor: who being already detected, might better hope to mointaine his former actions by strong hand, than to excuse them, or get pardon by submission. Antiochen had at that time a vehement desire to recouer Calosyria, or what else he could, of the Dominions of Ptolemie Philopater in those parts. He began with Seleucia, a very firong Citie neere vnto the mouth of the River Orontes; which ere long he won, partly by force, partly by corrupting with brybes the Captaines that lay therein. This was that Seleucia, whereto Inigenus the great who founded it, gaue the name of Antigonia: but Seleucus getting it shortly after, called it Seleucia; and Ptolemie Euergetes having lately won it, might; if it had so pleased him, 40 have changed the name into Ptolemais. Such is the vanity of men, that hope to purchase an endlesse memoriall vnto their names, by workes proceeding rather from their greatnesse, than from their vertue; which therefore no longer are their owne, than the same greatnesse hath continuance. Theodorus the Atolian , he that before had opposed himselfe to Antiochus, and defended Calofria in the behalfe of Ptolemie; was now growne forrie, that he had vied fo much faith and diligence, in feruice of an vnthankfull and luxurious Prince. Wherefore, as a Mercinarie, he began to have regard vnto his owne profit: which thinking to findegreater, by applying himselfevnto him that was (questionlesse) the more worthie of these two Kings; He offered to deliuer vp vnto Antiochus, the Cities of Tyrus and Ptolemais. Whilest 50 he was deuising about this treason, and had already sent messengers to King Antiochus: his practice was detected, and he besieged in Ptolemais by one of Ptolemies Captaines, that was more faithfull then himselfe. But Antiochus hasting to his rescue, vanquished this Captaine who met him on the way: and afterwards got possession, not onely of Tyrus and Ptolemais, with a good fleete of the Agyptian Kings that was in those Hauens: but of so many other Townes in that Countrie, as emboldned him to thinke vpon making a journey into Egipt it selfe. Agathodes and Sosibius boreall the sway in Egypt at that time: Ptolemie himselse being loth to have his pleasures interrupted, with businesse of so small importance, as the safetie of his Kingdome. Wherefore these two agreed together, to make provision as hashily, and yet as fecretly as might be, for the warre: and nevertheleffe, at the same time, to piesse Antiochus with daily Embassadors to some good agreement. There came in the heate of this businesse, Embassadours from Rhodes, Byzantium, and Cyzicus, 10 as likewise from the Etolians; according to the viuall courtesic of the Greekes. desiring to take up the quarrell. These were all entertained in Memphis, by Agathocks and Sosibius: who intreated them to deale effectually with Antiochus, But whilest this Treatie lasted, great preparations were made at Alexandris for the warre: wherein these two Counsailours perswaded themselues reasonably, that the victory would bee their owne; if they could get, for monie, a sufficient number of the Greekes to take their parts. Antiochus heard onely what was done at Memphis, and how defirous the Gouernours of Agypt were to be at quiet: whereunto he gaue the readier beliefe, not onely for that he knew the disposition of Ptolemie, but because the Rhodians, and other Embassadours, comming from 20 Memphis, discoursed vnto him all after one manner; as being all deceived, by the cunning of Agatheeles and his fellow. Antiochus therefore hauing wearied himselfe, at the long fiege of a Towne called Dura, which he could not winne : and being defirous to refresh himselfe and his Armie in Seleucia, during the Winter which then came on; granted vnto the Egyptian a Truce for foure moneths, with promife that he would be ready to hearken unto equall Conditions, when they should bee offered. It was not his meaning to bee fo courteous, as he would faine have feemed, but onely to lull his enemies afleepe, whilest he tooke time to refresh himselfe; and to bring Acheus to some good order, whose treason dayly grewmore open and violent. The same negligence which he thought the Aegyptian would have vsed, Hee 30 vsed himselfe; as presuming, that when time of the yeare better served, little force would be needfull; for that the Townes would voluntarily yeelde vnto him, fince Ptolemie prouided not for their defence. Neuertheleffe, he gaue audience to the Embaffadours, and had often conference with those that were sent out of Aegypt: pleafing himselfe well, to dispute about the instice of his quarrell; which he purposed shortly to make good by the sword, whether it were instorno. He said, that it was agreed betweene Selencus his Ancestor, and Ptolemie the sonne of Lagi, That all Syria. if they could win it from Antigonus, should be given in possession to Selencus: and that this bargaine was afterwards ratified, by generall confent of all the Confederates, after the battaile at Ipfus. But Ptolemies men would acknowledge no such 40 bargaine. They faid, that Piolemie the some of Lazi, had wonne Caelosyria, and the Provinces adiopning for himselfe: as also that he had sufficiently gratified Selenens, by lending him forces to recouer his Prouince of Babylon, and the Countries about the River of Euphrates. Thus whilest neither of them greatly cared for peace; they were, in the end of their disputation, as farre from concluding as at the beginning. Ptolemie demanded restitution; Antiochus thought, that he had not as yet gotten all that was his owne: Alfo Ptolemie would needes have Achaus comprehended in the League betweene them, as one of their Confederates; But Antiochus would not endure to heare of this, exclaiming against it as a shamefull thing, that one King should offer to deale so with another, as to take his Rebell into protection, and seeke to to loyne him in Confederacic with his owne Souereigne Lord. When the Truce was expired, and Antiochus prepared to take the field againe: contrary to his expectation hee was informed, That Ptolemie, with a very puiffant Armic, was comming vp against him out of Egypt. Setting forward therefore to meet with the Enemie, he was encountred on the way by those Captaines of Ptolemie, that had resisted him the yeere before. They held against him the passages of Libanus, whence neuertheleffe be draue them: and, proceeding on ward in his journie, wan fo many places, that he greatly increased his reputation, and thereby drew the Arabians, with diners of the bordering people, to become his followers. As the two Kings drew neare together : many Captaines of Ptolemie forsooke his pay , and fled ouer to Antiochus. This notwithstanding, the Agyptian had the courage to meete his Enemie in the field. The battaile was fought at Raphia: where it was not to be decided, whether the Agyptians or Asiatiques were the better Souldiers (for that the strength of both Armies consisted in Mercinaries, chiefly of the Greekes, Thracians, and Gaules) but whether of the Kings was the more fortunate. Ptolemie, with Arfinoe his lifter 10 and Wife, rode up and downe encouraging his men; the like did Antiochus on the other side: each of them rehearling the braue deedes of their Ancestors; as not hauing of their owne, wherby to valew themselves. Antiochus had the more Élephants: as also his, being of Asia, had they beene sewer would have beaten those of Africke. Wherefore by the advantage of these beasts, Hee draue the enemies before him, in that part of the battaile wherein hee fought himselfe. But Ptolemie had the better men: by whose valour he brake the Grosse of his Enemies battaile, and wan the victorie; whilest Antiochus was heedlesly following vpon those, whom hee had compelled to retire. Antiochus had brought into the field aboue seuentie thousand foot, and fix thousand Horse: whereof though he lost scarce ten thousand soote, and not 20 foure hundred horse; yet the same of his ouerthrow tooke from him all those places which he had lately wonne. When therefore he was returned home to Antioch: Hee began to stand in feare, lest Ptolemie and Acheus, setting upon him both at once, should put him in danger of his whole Estate. This caused him to send Embassadors vnto the Agyptian to treat of peace: which was readily graunted; it being much against the nature of Ptolemie, to vexe himselfe thus with the tedious busines of warre. So Ptolemie, having staied there moneths in Syria, returned home into Agyps clad with the reputation of a Conqueror; to the great admiration of his subjects, and of all those that were acquainted with his voluptuous and slothfull

Acheus was not comprised in the League betweene these two Kings: or if hee had beene included therein; yet would not the Agyptian have taken the paines, of making a second Expedition for his sake. The best was, that he thought himselfe strong enough, it fortune were not too much against him, to deale with Antiochus. Neither was hee confident without great reason: For besides his many victories, whereby hee had gotten all that belonged vnto Antiochus on this side of Taurus, Hee had also good successe against Attalus King of Pergamus; that was an able man of warre, and commanded a strong Armie. Neither was hee, as Molo the Rebell had beene, one of meane regard otherwife, and carryed beyond himfelfe by apprehending the vantage of some opportunitie: but Cousin german to the King, as hath 40 beene shewed before; and now lately the Kings brother-in-law, by taking to wife a yonger daughter of the same Mithridates King of Pontus, which was also called Laodice, as was her fifter the Queene, Antiochus his wife. Thefe things had added maieftie vnto him; and had made his followers greatly to respect him, even as one to whome a Kingdome was belonging. Neither made it a little for him, That King Ptolemie of Agypt held him in the nature of a friend: and that King Antiochus was now lately vanquished in the battaile at Raphia; and had thereby lost all his gettings in Syria. But all these hopes and likelihoods came to nothing: For the King of Pontus, if he would meddle in that quarrei betweene his sonnes-in-law, had no reafon to take part against the more honourable. As for the Agyptian: Hee was not 50 onely flothfull; but hindred by a rebellion of his owne subjects, from helping his friends abroad. For the people of Agypt, of whom Ptolemie, contrarie to the manner of his Progenitors, had armed a great number to serue in the late Expedition; began to entertaine a good opinion of their owne valour, thinking it not inferiour

to the Macedonian. Hercupon they refused to suffer as much as formerly they had done: fince they leffe effcemed, than they had done, the force of the Kings Mercinarie Greekes; which had hitherto kept them in streight subjection. Thus brake out a warre betweene the King and his subjects: wherein though the ill-guided force of the Multitude was finally broken; yet King Ptolemie thereby wasted much of his strength, and much of his time, that might have beene spent, as hee thought, much better in reuelling; or, as others thought, in succouring Acheus. As for Antiochus, He had no fooner made his peace with the Agyptian, than hee turned all his care to the preparation of warre against Acheus. To this purpose he entred into

10 League with Attalus; that fo hee might distract the forces of his Rebell, and finde him worke on all fides. Finally, his diligence and fortune were such, that within awhile he had pent up Acheus into the Citic of Sardes; where he held him about two yeeres belieged. The Citic was very strong, and well victualled: so as there appear red not, when the second yeere came, any greater likelihood of taking it, than in the first yeeres siege. In the end, one Lagoras a Cretan found meanes how to enter the Towne. The Cassle it selfe was vpon avery high Rocke, and in a manner impregnable, as also the Towne-wall adioyning to the Castle, in that part which was called the Sawe, was in like manner fituated vpon fleepe Rocks, and hardly accessible; that hung ouer a deepe bottome, whereinto the dead carkafes of Horses, and 20 other beafts, yea, and fometimes of men, yied to be throwne. Now it was observed by Lagoras, that the Rauens and other birds of prey, which hanted that place by reason of their food which was there never wanting, vsed to flie vp vnto the top of the Rockes, and to pitch vpon the walls; where they rested without any disturbance. Obseruing this often, he reasoned with himselfe, and concluded, that those parts of the Wall were left vnguarded, as beeing thought vnapproachable. Heereof hee informed the King: who approoued his indgement, and gaue vnto him the leading of fuch men, as hee defired for the accomplishing of the enterprize. The successe was agreeable to that which Lagoras had afore conceined: and, though with much labour, yet without relistance, he scaled those Rockes, and 30 (whilest a general assault was made) entred the Towne in that part; which was, at other times vngarded, then vnthought vpon. In the same place had the Persians, under Cyrus, gotten into Sardes; when Crafus thought himselfe secure on that side. But the Citizens tooke not warning, by the example of a losse many ages past; and therefore out of memorie. Acheus held still the Castle: which not onely feemed by nature impregnable, but was very well flored with all necessaries; and manned with a sufficient number, of such as were to him well affured. Antiochus therefore was constrained to waste much time about it; having none other hope to prevaile, than by familhing the inclosed. Besides the vsuall tediousnesse of expectation; his busineffe called him thence away into the higher Asia, where the Bactrians, and Parthi-49 ans with the Hyrcanians, had crected Kingdomes taken out of his Dominions, vpon which they still incroched. But hee thought it not fafe, to let Acheus breake loofe againe. On the other fide there were fome Agents of Ptolemie the Agyptian, and good friends unto Acheus; that made it their wholestudie, how to deliner this befieged Prince. If they could rescue his person, they cared for no more: but presumed, that when he should appeare in the Countries under Taurus, he would soone haue an Armie at commaund, and be strong enough to hold Antiochus as hardly to worke as at any time before. Wherefore they dealt with one Bolis a Cretan, that was acquainted well with all the wayes in the Countrie, and particularly with the by-paths and exceeding difficult paffages among those Rockes, whereon the Castle 50 of Sardes flood. Him they tempted with great rewards, which he should receive at the hands of Ptolemie, as well as of Acheus; to doe his best for performance of their desire. He vndertooke the businesse: and gaue such likely reasons of bringing all to good effect, that they wrote vnto Achaus, by one Arianus, a trustic messenger, whom Bolis found meanes to conueigh into the Castle. The faith of these Negotiators Acheus held most assured. They also wrote vnto him in privile characters, or Ciphers, wherewith none fauc he and they were acquainted: whereby hee knew, that it was no fained deuice of his Enemies, in the name of his friends. As for the messenger; he was a trustic fellow, and one whom Achaus found, by examination. heartily affected vnto the fide. But the Contents of the Epiftle, which were, That hee should bee confident in the faith of Bolis, and of one Cambylus whom Bolis had wonne vnto the bufinesse, did somewhat trouble him. They were men to him vnknowne: and Cambylus was a follower of Antiochus; under whom he had the commaund of those Cretans, which held one of the Forts that blocked up the Caitle of Sardes. Neuertheleffe other way to escape hee saw none, than by putting himselse 10 to some adventure. When the messenger had therefore passed often to and fro: it was at length concluded, That Bolis himselfe should come speake with Achous, and conduct him forth. There was none other than good faith meant by any of the reft, faue onely by Bolis and Cambylus; which were Cretans, and (as all their Countrimen, *Among these * some sew excepted, have beene, and still are) false knaues. These two held a confultation together, that was, as & Polybius observes it, rightly Cretical: neither concerning the lafetie of him whose deliuerance they vndertooke, nor touching the lette Endamon a discharge of their owne faith; but onely how to get most with least adoe and dancretan: who in ger to themselves. Briefly they concluded, That first of all they would equally share betweene them ten Talents, which they had already received in hand : and 20 then, That they would reucale the matter to Antiochus; offering to deliner Achaus vnto him, if they might be well rewarded both with prefent monie, and with premise of consideration answerable to the greatnesse of such a service, when it should Countrey, with be dispatched. Antiochus hearing this promise of Cambylus, was no leffe glad; than were the friends of Acheus well pleased with the comfortable promises of Bolis. At whomhe could length when all things were in readinesse on both sides, and that Bolis with Arianus was to get up into the Castle, and conneigh Acham thence: Hee first went with nanes, hath, by Cambylus to speake with the King, who gaue him very private audience; and confirmed vnto him by word of mouth the affurance of his liberall promifes. And after that, putting on the countenance of an honest man, and of one that was faith- 30 Puritan, & one full vnto Ptolemie whom he had long served; He accompanied Arianus vp into the that have been Castle. At his comming thither, Hee was louingly entertained; yet questioned at dangerous vn- large by Acheus, touching all the weight of the bulineffe in hand. But he discoursed raigae. It is an fowell, and with such granitie; that there appeared no reason of distrusting either honour to bee his faith or judgement. Hee was an old Souldiour, had long been a Captaine under Ptolemie, and did not thrust himselfe into this businesse; but was inuited by honourable and faithfull men. He had also taken a safe course, in winning (as it seemed) that other Countriman of his, who kept a Fort that stood in their way; and there-Lies: in regard by had already fundry times given fate paffage and repaffage vnto Arianus. But awhereof I may gainft all these comfortable hopes, the importance of so great an adventure stirred 40 up some diffidence. Acheus therefore dealt wisely, and said, That hee would yet dation of Cre- stay in the Castle a little longer: but that he meant to send away with Bolis three or ticine no leffe foure of his friends; from whom when hee received better advertisement, concerthan he in mul- ning the likelihood of the enterprise, then would hee issue forth himselfe. Hereby he tooke order, not to commit himselse wholly vnto the faith of a man vnknowne. But, as Polybius well notes, he did not consider that he playd the Cretian with a man of Crete: which is to fay, That hee had to doe with one, whose knauery could not der times, that be avoided by circumspection. Bolis and Cambylus had layd their plots thus, Thatif Acheus came forth alone, then should be easily be taken by the ambush prepared for him: if he were accompanied with many of his friends, then should Arianus be ap. 50 pointed to leade the way, as one that of late had troden it oft; and Eolis following behinde, should have an eye vpon Acheus, to prevent him not onely from escaping in the tumult, but from breaking his owne necke, or otherwise killing himselfe: to the end that beeing taken aliue, Hee might bee to Antiochus the more welcome Pre-

CHAP.5. S.2. of the Historie of the World. fent. And in such order came they now forth: Arianus going before as Guide; the reft following, as the way ferued, and Bolis in the Rere. Achaus made none acquainted with his purpose, till the very instant of his departure. Then signified hee the matter to his wife Landice; and comforting her with hope as well as hee could, appointed foure of his especiall friends to beare him companic. They were all difguifed: and one of them alone tooke vpon him to have knowledge of the Greeke tongue; speaking and answering, as neede should require, for all, as if the relt had been Barbarians. Bolis followed them, craftily deutling upon his bufineffe, and much perplexed. For (faith Polybius) Though he were of Crete, and prone to furmife To any thing to the mischiefe of another: yet could hee not see in the darke, nor know which of them was Achaus, or whether Achaus himselfe were there. The way was very vneasie, and in some places dangerous; especially to those that knew it not. Wherefore they were faine to flay in divers places, and helpe one another vp or downe. But vpon enery occasion, they were all of them very officious toward Acheus; lending him their hands, and taking fuch care of him, as easily gaue Bolis to vnderstand, that hee was the man: and so by their vnseasonable dutie, they vndid their Lord. When they came to the place where Cambylus lay in waite; Bolis whiltled, and presently clasped Acheus about the middle, holding him fast that hee should not stirre. So they were all taken by the Ambush, and carried forthwith to 20 Antiochus: who fate vp watching in his Pauilion, expecting the euent. The fight of Achem, brought in bound vnto him, did so assonish the King, that he was vnable to speake a word, and anon brake out into weeping. Yet was hee before informed of the plot, which might have kept him from admiration: as also the next morning betimes affembling his friends together, Hee condemned Acheus to a cruell death; which argues, that hee was not mooned with pittie towards this vnhappie man. Wherefore it was the generall regard of calamities, incident vnto great fortunes, that wrung from him these teares: as also the raritie of the accident, that made both him and his friends to wonder: though it bee so, that such a course as this of his, in employing two mischieuous knaues against one Traitour, doth not rarely succeed 30 well; according to that Spanish Prouerbe, A un traydor dos allenosos. The death of Acheus brought such astonishment vpon those which held the Castle, that after awhile they gave up the place and them selves unto the King; whereby he got entire poffession of all to him belonging in the lesser Afu.

Some yeeres passed after this, ere Antiochis was ready for his Expedition against the Parthians, and Hyrcanians. The Parthians were a little Nation of obscure beginnings, and commonly subject vnto those that ruled in Media. In the great shuffling for Provinces, after the death of Alexander, the Government over them was committed by Antipater to one Philip, a man of small regard; shortly they fell to Eumenes; then to Antigonus; and from him, together with the Medes, to Selencus : vnder whole po-40 fleritie they continued until the Reigne of Seleucus Callinieus, being ruled by Lieutenants of the Syrian Kings. The lustiull infolencie of one of these Lieutenants, together with the misfortune of Callinicus, that was vanquilhed and thought to bee flaine by the Gaules ; did ftirre up Arfaces , a Noble man of the Countrie , to feeke reuenge of injuries done, and animate him to rebell. So he flue the Kings Licutenant; made himselfe King of the Parthians, and Lord of Hyrcania; fought prosperously with those that diffurbed him in his beginnings; and tooke Seleucus Callinious prisoner in battaile, whom he royally entertained, and dismissed, Hereby he wanne reputation as a lawfull King; and by good government of his Countrie, procured vnto himselfe such lour of his subjects, that his name was continued vnto his Successors; solike as that of the Ptolemies in Egypt, and that of the Cefars afterwards in Rome.

Much about the same time the Bacterians rebelled: though these at length, and all belonging vnto the Seleucida beyond Euphrates, increased the Parthians Dominion. Now Antiochus went against them with so strong an Armie, that they durst not meet him in plaine field; but kept themselues in Woods, or places of strength, and defor the warre. Whereforehee marched through the heart of Parthia: and then 20 forward into Hyreania; where hee wanne Tambrace, the chiefe Citie of that Prouince. This indignitie, and many other losses, caused Arfaces at length, when he had gathered an Armie that seemed strong enough, to aduenture a battaile. The issue thereof was such, as gaue to neither of the Kings hope of accomplishing his desires, without exceeding difficultie. Wherefore Arfaces craued Peace, and at length obtained it: Antiochus thinking it not amisse, to make him a friend, whom he could not make a subject.

The next Expedition of Antiochus, was against Euthydemus King of the Bactrians; one that indeed had not rebelled against him or his Ancestors: but having gotten the Kingdome from those that had rebelled, kept it to himselfe. With Enthy- 20 demus he fought a battaile by the River Arius, where he had the victory. But the victoric was not fo greatly to his honour; as was the testimonic which he gaue of his owne private valour, in obtaining it. He was thought that day to have demeaned him more couragiously, than did any one man in all his Armie. His Horse was flaine vinder him; and he himselfe received a wound in his mouth, whereby hee loft some of his teeth. As for Euthydemus, He withdrew himselfe backe into the further parts of his Kingdome, and afterwards protracted the Warre, feeking how to end it by composition. So Embassadours passed betweene the Kings: Antiochus complaining, That a Countrie of his was uninfly vsurped from him: Euthy demus answering, That he had wonne it from the children of the Vsurpers: and further, 40 That the Bactrians, a wilde Nation, could hardly be retained in order, faue by a King of their owne; for that they bordered upon the Seythians, with whom if they should joyne, it would be greatly to the danger of all the Provinces that lay behind them. Thefe allegations, together with his owne wearinesse, pacified Antiochus, and made him willing to grant Peace, vpon reasonable Conditions. Demetrius, the sonne of Euthydemns, being a goodly Gentleman, and employed by his Father as Embassadour in this Treatie of Peace, was not a little availeable vnto a good Conclusion: For Antiochus liked him so well, that he promised to give him in marriage one of his owne daughters: and there withall permitted Euthydemus to retaine the Kingdome; caufing him neuerthelesse to deliver vp all his Elephants; as also to binde himselse by 50 oath, to fuch Couenants as he thought requilite.

So Antiochus lesuing the Battrian in quiet, madea jonrney ouer Caucalus, and came to the borders of India, where he renewed with Sophagalenus, King of the Indians, the focietie that had been betweene their Ancestors. The Indians had remained subject vnto the Macedonians, for a little while, after Alexanders death. Eumenes in his Warre against Antigonus, rayled part of his forces out of their Countric. But when Antigonus after his victorie turned Westward, and was ouer-bufied in a great civill Warre: then did one Sandrocottus, an Indian, stirre vp his Countrimento Rebellion; making himselfe their Captaine, and taking vpon him as Protector of their libertie. This Office and Title he soone changed, though not without some contention, into the Name and Maiestie of a King. Finally hee got vnto himselfe, (hauing an Armic of fixe hundred thousand men) if not all India, yet as much of it as had beene Alexanders. In this Estate he had well confirmed himselse, 10 ere Seleucus Nicator could findleisure to call him to account. Neither did He faint, or humble himselfe, at the comming of Seleneus: but met him in field, as readic to defend his owne; fostrongly and well appointed, that the Macedonian was contented, to make both peace and affinitie with him, taking only a reward of fiftic Elephants. This League, made by the Founders of the Indian and Syrian kingdomes, was continued by some Offices of lone betweenetheir children, and now renewed by Antiochus: whose number of Elephants were increased thereupon, by the Indian King, to an hundred and fittie : as also he was promised, to have some treasure sent after him; which hee left one to receive. Thus parted these two great Kings. Neither had the Indians, from this time forwards, in many generations, any buli-20 nesse worthie of remembrance with the Westerne Countries. The posteritie of Sandrocottus, is thought to have retained that kingdome vnto the dayes of Angustus Cafar: to whom Porus, then reigning in India, fent Embassadours with Presents, and an Epiftle written in Greeke: wherein, among other things, Hee faide, That He had command ouer fixe hundred Kings. There is also found, scattered in sundrie Authors, the mention of some which held that kingdome, in diners Ages, cuen vnto the time of Constantine the great: being all peraduenture of the same race. But Antiochus, who in this Treatie with Sophagafenus carried himselfe as the worthier person, receiving Presents; and after marched home through Drangiana and Carmania, with fuch reputation, that all the Potentates not onely in the higher Asia, but on the hi-30 ther fide of Taurus, humbled themselves vnto him, and called him The Great : law an end of his owne Greatnesse within few yeeres ensuing, by presuming to stand vpon points with the Romans; whose Great nesse was the same in deed, that his was onely in sceming.

well defended, against a neighbour so mightie and ambitious. This Ptolemic surnamed Philopator, that is to fay, aloner of bis Father, is thought to have had that furname given him in meere derifion; as having made away both his Father and Mo- 14ffin.130. ther. His yong yeeres, being newly past his childhood when he beganne to reigne, Iiiiii 3

he was , conneighed himselfe out of the Palace, and got vnto the Macedonians; of whom hee found fome in a Temple thereby at dinner. The Macedonians were as fierce in maintenance of their Priviledges, as are the Turkes Ianizars. Being affured therefore that one of their fellowes had thus been vsed; they fell to Armes in a great rage, and began to force the Palace: crying out, That they would fee the King, and not leave him in possession of such a dangerous man. The whole multitude in the Citie, with lowd clamours, made no leffe adoe than the Souldiours, though to lesse effect. So the oid Bawd Oenanthe fled into a Temple: ber Sonne and Daughter staid in the Court, vntill the King was taken from them; and they, 10 by his permission which hee easily gaue, and by appointment of those that now had him in their hands, deliuered up to the furie of the people. Agatheeles himselfe was flabbed to death, by some which therein did the office of friends; though in manner of enemies. His fifter was dragged naked up and downe the firectes; as was alfo his mother, with all to them belonging: the enraged multitude committed upon them a barbarous execution of justice; biting them, pulling out their eyes, and tearing them in pieces.

CHAP.5. S.2.

These troubles in Egypt, served well to stirre vp King Antiochus; who had very good leifure, though he wanted all pretence, to make warre vpon young Ptolemie. Philip of Macedon had the same delire, to get what part he could of the childes 20 estate. But it happened well, that Ptolemie Philopator in the Punick Warre, which was now newly ended, had done many good offices unto the Romans. Unto them therefore the Agyptians addressed themselves, and craved helpe against these two Kings: who though they fecretly maligned one the other, yet had entred into couenant to divide betweene them, all that belonged vnto this Orphan; whose Father had beene Confederate with them both. So * M. Lepidus was fent from Rome, to protect from all violence the King of Agypt; especially against Antiochus. As for the Macedonian; Hee was very foone found bulied, with warre at his owne doores. Also Scopas the Etolian, being a Pensioner to the Egyptian, was sent into Greece to rayle an Armie of Mercinaries. What Lepidus did in Egypt, I doe not find: and 30 therefore thinke it not improbable, that Hee was fent thither onely one of the three Embaffadours, o in the beginning of the Warre with Philip, as hath beene o Lindle 31. shewed before. As for Scopas; He shortly after went up into Syria with his Armie; where winning many places, among the reft of his Acts, He subdued the lemes; who feeme to have yeelded themselves a little before vnto antiochise, at such time as they faw him prepare for his Warre, and despaired of receiving helpe from Egypt. But Vid 108th Anta it was not long ere all these Victories of Scopus came to nothing. For the very next 18d.1.12.6.3. yeere following, which was (according to Eufebius) the same yeere that Philip was beaten at Cynoscephala; Antiochus vanquished Scopus in battaile, and recoucred all that had beene loft. Among the rest, the Jewes with great willing nesse returned vn-40 der his obedience; and were therefore by him very gently entreated.

The Land of Egypt this great King did forbeare to inuade; and gaue it out, that he meant to bellow a daughter of his owne in marriage vpon Ptolemie; either hoping, as may feeme, that the Countrie would willingly fabrii it felfe voto him, if this yong child should happen to miscarrie; or else that greater purchase might be made in the Westerne parts of Asia, whilest Philip was held over-laboured by the Romans. It appeares that he was very much distracted; hunting (as we fav) two Hares at once with one Hound. The quarrels betweene Attalus, Philip, and the Greekes, promifed to affoord him great advantage, if he should bring his Armie to the Hellesport. On the other side, the state of segrpt being such as hath beene deso clared, seemed easie to be swallowed up at once. One while therefore hee tooke what hee could get in Spria: where all were willing (and the Jewes among the reft, though hithertothey had kept faith with the Egyptian) to yeeld him obedience. Another while, letting Legypt alone, He was about to make invalion you Attalus his Kingdome; yet suffered himselfe easily to be perswaded by the Roman Embasfadours, and delitted from that enterprise. Having thus farre gratified the Romans; He fends Embaffadours to the Senate, to conclude a perfect amitic betweene him and them. It is not lightly to be ouerpassed, That these his Embassadours were louingly entertained at Rome; and dismissed, with a Decree and answere of the Senate, altogether to the honour of King Antiochus. But this answere of the Romans was not fincere; being rather framed according to regard of the Kings good liking, than of their owne intent. They had not as yet made an end with Philip: neither would they gladly be troubled with two great warres at once. Wherefore, not standing much vpon the nice examination of what belonged vnto their honour, they were content to give good words for the present. In the meane time Antiochus fights 10 with Scopas in Syria, and shortly prepares to winne some Towneselsewhere, belonging vnto Ptolemie; yet withall hee fends an Armie Westward, intending to make what profit hee can of the distractions in Greece. Likewise it is considerable, as an argument of his much irrefolution, How notwithstanding his attempts upon both of their Kingdomes, he offered one of his daughters to Ptolemie, and another to Enmenes the sonne of Attalus, newly King of Pergamus: seeking each of their friendships, at one and the same time, when he sought to make each of them a spoile. Thus was he acting and deliberating at once; being carried with an inexplicable defire of repugnancies, which is a difease of great, and ouer-fwelling for tunes. Howfoeuer it was, He fent an Armie to Sardes by Land, vnder two of his owne fonnes: 20 willing them there to flay for him; whileft he himfelfe with a Fleete of an hundred Gallies, and two hundred other veffels, intended to passe along by the Coasts of Cilicia and Caria, taking in such places as held for the Agyptian. It was a notable Act of the Rhadians, that, whilest the war of Philip lay yet vpon their hands, they admentured upon this great Antiochus. They fent unto him a proud Embassage: wherby they gane him to understand. That if he passed forward beyond a certaine Promontorie in Cilicia, they would meete him and fight with him; not for any quarrell of theirs vnto him; but because hee should not joyne with Philip their enemie. and helpe him against the Romans. It was infolently done of them, neither feemed it otherwise, to prescribe such limits vnto the King; yet he tempered himselfe, and 30 without any shew of indignation gaue a gentle answere; partly himselfe to their Embaffadours; partly vnto their whole Citie, by Embaffadours which he thither fent, He shewed his delire, to renew the ancient Confederacies betweene his Ancestors by them newly given to his Embassadours. The Rhodians appeare to have been a cunning people, and fuch as could forefee what weather was like to happen. This answer of the King, and the relation of what 40 had paffed betweene his Embaffadours and the Senate, mooued them not a whit; when they were informed shortly after, that the Macedonian warre was ended at the battaile of Cynoscephale. They knew that Antiochus his turne would be next; and prepared to be forward on the strongerside. Wherefore they would not bee contented to fit ftill; vnleffe the Townes on the South Coast of Asia, belonging to Ptolemie their friend and Confederate, were suffered to bee at quiet. Herein also they did well; for that they had ever been greatly beholding to all the race of the Ptolemies. They therefore, in this time of necessitie, gaue what aid they could vnto all the subjects of the Aegyptian in those parts. In like manner did King Eumenes, the fonne of Attalus, prognoficate as concerning the warre that followed, between An- 50 ziochus and the Romans. For when King Antiochus made a friendly offer, to bestow one of his daughters upon him in marriage: Hee excused himselfe, and would not have her. Analus and Philetern, his brethren, wondered at this. But he told them, that the Romans would furely make warre vpon Antiochus; and therein finally pre-

and them: and willed them not to be afraid, left his comming should tend vnto any hurt, either of them, or of their Confederates. As touching the Romans whom they thought that he would molest: they were (he faid) his verie good friends; whereof, he thought there needed no better proofe, than the entertainement and answer uaile. Wherefore he said, That by abstayning from this affinitie, it should be in his power to joyne with the Romans, and strengthen himselfe greatly with their friendthip. Contrariwife, if hee leaned to Antiochus: as he must be partaker in his ouerthrow; so was he sure to be oppressed by him, as by an ouer-mightie neighbour, if he happened to win the victorie. Antiothus himselse wintered about Ephesus: where hee tooke such order as hee thought convenient, for the reducing of Smyrna and Lamp (acus to obedience; that had vsurped their libertie, and obstinately stroue to maintaineir, in hope that the Romans would protect them. In the beginning of the Spring hee failed vnto the 10 Hellespont: where having won some Townes that Philip had gotten not long before this, hee passed ouer into Europe side; and in short space mastered the Chersonesus. Thence went hee to Lysimachia: which the Thracians had gotten and destroyed, when Philip withdrew his Garrison thence, to employ it in the Roman warre. The Ætolians obiected as a crime vnto Philip, in the Conference before T. Quintius, that hee had oppressed Lysimachia, by thrusting thereinto a Garrison. Hercunto Philip made answere, that his Garrison did not oppresse the Towne, but saue it from the Barbarians: who tooke and facktit, as soone as the Macedonians were gone. That this answere was good and substanciall, though it were not accepted as such; might appeare by the miserable case, in which Antiochius found Lysimachia at his comming 20 thither. For the Towne was vtterly razed by the Barbarians; and the people, carried away into slauerie. Wherefore the King tooke order to haue it reedified as also to redceme those that were in bondage; and to recollect as many of the Citizens, as were dispersed in the Countrie thereabout. Likewise hee was carefull to allure thither, by hopefull promises, new inhabitants; and to replenish the Citie with the wonted frequencie. Now to the end that men should not be terrified from comming thither to dwell, by any feare of the neighbour Thracians: he tooke a journie in hand against those barbarous people, with the one halfe of his Armie; leauing the other halfe to repaire the Citie. These paines he tooke; partly in regard of the convenient situation, and former glory of Lysimachia; partly for that he thought it 30 highly redounding vnto his owne honour, to recouer and establish the dominion in those parts, which his fore-father Selenew Nicator had won from Lysimachus, and thereby made his Kingdome of greater extent, than it occupied in any following time. But for this ambition bee shall dearely pay : and as after that victorie against Lysimachus, the death of King Seleucus followed shortly; so shall a deadlie wound of the Kingdome founded by Selencus enfue very speedily, after the reconquest of the fame Countrie, which was the last of Selencus his purchases.

d. IIII.

The Romans hold friendly correspondence with ANTIOCHVS, during their warre with PHILIP: after which they quarrell with him. The doings of HANNIBAL at Carthage: whence bee is chased by his enemies, and by the Romans: His flight unto the Kine ANTIOCHUS. The Aetolians murmure against the Romans in Greece. The warre of the Romans and Acheans, with NABIS the Tyrant of Lacedamon. The departure of the Romans out of Greece. T. QVINTIVS his Triumph. Peace denied to ANTIO. CHVS by the Romans.

Or the Romans, though they were vnable to smother their desire of war with Antiochus, whereof notice was alreadie taken both by their friends and by their enemies : yet was it much against their will to keepethe rumour on foot, which they meant shortly to make good, of this intended warre, so long as they wanted matter of quarrell; whereof they were furnished, by this enterprise of the Kings about Lysimachia. It was not long, fince King Attalus, a friend and helper of the Romans in their war with Philip, could obtain of them none other help against Antiochus, than Embassadors to speake for him; because the one of these Kings was held no lesse a friend than the other. Neither did thereafterwards paffe between them any other offices, than very friendly. Antiochiu, at the request of their Embassadors, withdrew his Invasion from the Kingdome of Pergamus: also verie shortly after he sent Embassadours to them, to make a perfect League of amitie betweene them. This was whileft as yet they were bulied with Philip; and therfore had reason to answere his good will with good acceptation : as they did in outward shew. But when the Macedonian war was at an end, and all, or most of all the States in Greece, were become little better than Cli-10 ents vnto the Romans: then was all this good correspondence changed, into termes of worse, but more plaine, meaning. For T. Quintius, with histen Counsailors sent from Rome, requited (as hath beene * shewed before) with a commination of warre, this kings gratulation of their victorie; as also his long-professed amitie, and desire

These ten Counsailors were able to informe T. Quintius, and acquaint him with the purpose of the Senate: whereof yet it seemes that he was not ignorant before; fince, in regard of Antiochus, hee was the more inclinable vnto peace with Philip. It was therefore agreed, when they divided themselves to make progresse through diners quarters of Greece for the execution of their late Decree, That two of them 20 should visit King Antiochus; and the rest, where occasion served, vse diligence to make a partie strong against him. Neither was the Senate at Rome vinmindfull of the busines: wherein lest T. Quintius, with his ten Assistants, should happen to forget anything to their parts belonging; L. Cornelius was lent from Rome of purpose, to deale with the King about those controuersies, that were betweene him and Ptolemie. What other private instructions Cornelius had; wee may coniecture by the mannaging of this his Embaffage. For comming to Selymbria: and there vnderstanding that P. Villius and L. Terentius, having beene fent by Titus, were at Lysimachia, He hastned thither; whither also came P. Lentulus (another of the ten Counfailours) from Bargilla, to be present at the Conference. Hegesianax and Lysias were 30 also there; the same, who had lately brought from Titus those peremptoric Conditions, which the Embassadours present shall expound vnto their Master. After a few dayes Antiochus returned from his Thracian Expedition. The meeting and entertainment betweene Him and these Romans, was in appearance full of loue. But when they came to treat of the businesse in hand; this good mood was quite altered. L.Cornelius, in two or three words, briefly deliucred his errand from Rome: which was. That Antiochus had reason to deliuer backe vnto Ptolemie those Townes of his, whereof he had lately gotten possession. Hereunto he added, and that very earnestly, That hee must also give up the Townes of late belonging vuto Philip; and by him newly occupied. For what could bee more abfurd, than fuch folly in the 40 Romans; as to let Antiochus enioy the profit of that warre, wherein they had laboured so much, and He done nothing ? Further He warned the King, that hee should not molest those Cities that were free and finally Hee demanded of him, vpon what reason hee was come ouer with so great an Armic into Europe; for that other cause of his journie there was none probable, than a purpose to make war vpon the Romans. To this the King made answere, That hee wondered why the Romans should so trouble themselves, with thinking vpon the matters of Asia: wherewith He praied them to let him alone; euen as He, without such curiositie, suffered them to doe in Italie what they thought good. As for his comming ouer into Europe: they saw well enough what busines had drawne him thither; namely, the warre a- 50 gainst the barbarous Thracians: the rebuilding of Lysimachia, and the recourge of Townes to him belonging, in Thrace and Cherfonefus. Now concerning his title vnto that Countrie, He deriued it from Seleucus: who made conquest thereof, by his victoric against Lysimachus. Neither was it so, that any of the places in controuer sie

betweene him and the other Kings, had beene fill of old belonging to the Macedonians or Agyptians; but had beene leized on by them, or by others from whom they received them, at fuch time as his Ancestors, being Lords of those Countries, were hindred by multiplicitie of busines, from looking vnto all that was their owne. Finally he willed them neither to stand in feare of him, as if hee intended ought against them from Lysimachia; fince it was his purpose to bestow this Citie vponone of his fonnes, that should reigne therein: nor yet to be grieved with his proceedings in Alia; either against the tree Cities, or against the King of Egypt; lince it was his meaning to make the free Cities beholding vnto himfelte, and to joyne ere long 10 with Ptolemie, not onely in friendship, but in a bond of neere affinitie. Cornelius hauing heard this, and being perhaps vnable to refute it; would needes heare further, what the Embassadours of Smyrna and of Lamp facus, whom he had there with him, could fay for themselves. The Embassadors of Lampfacus being called in , began a tale; wherein they feemed to accuse the King before the Romans, as it were before competent ludges. Antiochus therefore interrupted them, and bade them holde their peace; for a fmuch as he had not chosen the Romans, but would rather take the Citizens of Rhodes, to be Arbitrators betweene Him and them.

Thus the Treatie held some few dayes, without any likelihood of effect. The Romans, having not laide their complaints in fuch fort, as they might be a conveni-20 ent foundation of the war by them intended: nor yet having purpofe to depart wel fatisfied, and thereby to corroborate the present peace; were doubtfull how to order the matter, in such wise as they might neither too rudely, like boisterous Gallo-Greekes, pretend only the goodnesse of their swordes; nor yet ouer-modeltly, to retains among the Greekes an opinion of their inflice, for beare the occasion of making themselues great. The King on the other side was wearie of these tedious ghests ; that would take none answere, and yet scarce knew what to say. At length came newes, without any certaine author, That Ptolemie was dead. Hereof neither the King, nor the Romans, would take notice, though each of them were defirous to haflen into Agypt: Antiochus, to take possession of the Kingdome; and L. Corner 30 lius, to preuent him thereof, and fet the Countrie in good order. Cornelius was fent from Rome Embaffadour, both to Antiochus and to Ptolemie: which gaue him occasion to take leave, and prepare for his Egyptian voyage. Both He, and his fellow Embassadors, had good leaue to depart all together; and the King foorthwith made readie, to be in Agypt with the first. To his sonne Seleucus hee committed his Armic; and left him to ouer-fee the building of Lysmachia; but all his Sea forces Hee tookealong with him, and failed vnto Ephefus. Thence hee fent Embassadours to T. Quintius: whom he requested to deale with him in this matter of Peace, after such fort, as might stand with honestic and good faith. But as he was further proceeding on his voyage; He was perfectly informed that Ptolemie was aliue. This made him 40 beare another way from Agypt: and afterwards a tempest, with a grieuous shipwracke, made him, without any further attempt on the way, glad to have fafely recouered his Port of Seleucia. Thence went he to Antiochia, where he wintered : fecure, as might appeare, of the Roman warre.

But the Romans had not so done with him. During the Treatic at Lysimachia, (at leastwise not long before or after it) one of their Embassadours that had beene fent vnto the Macedonian gaue him counfaile, as in a point highly tending to his good; Notto restcontented with the Peace which was granted vnto him by the Romans, but to desire societie with them, whereby they should bee bound to have the same friends and enemies. And this he aduised him to doe quickly, before the 50 Warre brake out with Antiochus; lest otherwise he might seeme, to have awaited fome fit occasion of taking Armes againe. They who dealt thus plainely, did not meane to be fatisfied with weake excuses. In like manner some of the Greekes were follicited; and particularly the Atolians, That constantly and faithfully they should abide in the friendship of the People of Rome. It was needlesse to say plainly whereto this entreatie tended: the froward answere made by the Atolians, declares them to have well understood the purpose. They complained, that they were not alike honoured by the Romans after the Victorie, as they had beene during the Warre. They that so complained were the most moderate of them. Others cryed out, that they had beene wronged, and defrauded of what was promifed vnto them: vpbrayding withall the Romans, as men to them beholding; not onely for their Victorie ouer Philip; but even for helping them to fet foot in Greece, which elfe they neuer could have done. Hereto the Roman gave gentle answeres: telling them that there was no more to doe, than to fend Embassadors to the Senate, and vtter their griefes; and then should all be well.

Such care tooke the Romans in Greece, for their Warre intended against Antiochus. The fame hereof arriving at Carthage, gaue matter vnto the enemies of Hanmibal, wherewith both to picke a thanke of the Roman Senate; and to chace out of their Citie this honourable man, whom they so greatly hated. Hee had of late exercifed his vertue against them in the Civill administration; and given them an ouerthrow, or two, in the long Robe. The Iudges at that time bore all the fway in Carthage: holding their places during life; and having subject vnto them, the lives, goods, and fame of all the rest. Neither did they vie this their power with moderation: but conspired in such wise together, that whose offended any one of them, should have them all to be his enemies; which being once knowne, He was fure to 20 be soone accused and condemned. In this their impotent rule of the Civie, Hannibal was chosen Prætor. By vertue of which Office, though hee was superiour vnto them during that vecre : vet had it not beene their manner to beare much regard vnto fuch an annual Magistrate, as at the yeeres end must be accomptable to them. if ought were laid vnto his charge. Hannibal therefore fending for one of the Quaftors, or officers of the Treasurie, to come and speake with him: the proud Quæflor set lightly thereby, and would not come. For he was of the aduer se Faction to Hannibal; and men of his place were to bee chosen into the Order of Judges: in contemplation whereof, hee was filled alreadic with the spirit of his future Greatneffe. But he had not to doe with fuch a tame Prætor, as were they that had occu- 20 pied the place before. Hannibal fent for him by a Pursuant; and having thus apprehended him, brought him into judgement before a publique affemblie of the people. There he not onely shewed, what the vidutiful stubbornnesse of this Quzfor had beene; but how vnfufferable the infolencie of all the Judges at the prefent was: whose vnbridled power made them to regard neither Lawes nor Magistrates. To this Oration when hee perceived that all the Citizens were attentive and fauourable; He foorthwith propounded a Law, which paffed with the generall good liking; That the Judges should be chosen from yeere to yeere, and no one man be continued in that Office two yeeres together. If this Law had beene passed, before he passed ouer theres; it would not perhaps have beene in the power of Hanno, 40 to have brought him vnto necessitie of reforming another grievance, concerning the Roman Tribute. This Tribute the Carthaginians were faine to levie by Taxation layed upon the whole Commonaltie; as wanting money in their publique Treasurie, wherewith to defray either that, or divers other needefull charges. Hannibal confidering this, beganne to examine the publique Revenues; and to take a perfect note, both how much came into the Treasurie, by wayes and meanes what foeuer; and in what fortit was thence laid out. So he found, That the ordinarie charges of the Common-wealth did not exhaust the Treasurie ; but that wicked Magistrates, and corrupt Officers, turning the greatest part of the monies to their ownevse, were thereby faine to load the people with needlesse burdens. - Hereof 50 he made such plaine demonstration, that these Robbers of the common Treasure were compelled to reftore, with shame, what they had gotten by knauerie; and so the Carthaginians were freed from the necessitie of making such poore shifts, as formerly they had vsed, when they knew not the valew of their owne Estate. But as the vertue of Hannibal, was highly commended by all that were good Citizens: to they of the Roman Faction, which had, fince the making of the peace vntill now, little regarded him , beganne to rage extremely ; as being by him thript of their idgotten goods, and ill-employed authoritie, both at once, even when they thought themselves to have been in full possession of the vanquished Carthage. Whereforethey fent letters to their friends at Rome: wherein they complained, as if the Barchine Faction grew strong againe, and Hannibal would shortly be in armes. Oneftionlesse, if oppressing the Citie by iniustice, and robbing the Treasurie, were the onely way to hold Carthage in peace with Rome: these enemies to the Burchines 10 might well cric out, That having done their best alreadic to keepe all in quiet, they faw none other likelihood than of Warre. But having none other matter to alleadge, than their owne inventions: they faid, That Hannibal was like vnto a wilde bealt, which would neuer be tamed: That fecret messages past betweene him, and King Antiochus: and that hee was wont to complaine of idlenesse, as if it were harmefull to Carrbage; with what elfe to like effect they could imagine. Thefe accusations they directed not vnto the Senate: but addressing their letters craftily, cuery one to the best of his owne friends at Rome, and such as were Senators; they wrought fo well, that neither publike notice of their Conspiracie was taken at Carthage; nor the authoritie of the Roman Senate, wanting to the fortherance of their 20 malicious purpole. Onely P. Scipio is faid to have admonished the Fathers, that they should not thus dishonourably subscribe, and become Seconds to the accufers of Hannibal: as if they would oppreffe, by suborning or countenancing false witneffes against him, the Man, against whom in warre they had not of long time prenailed, nor vied their Victorie in such base manner, when they obtained it. But the Romans were not all fo great-minded as Scipio: they wished for some such aduantage against Hannibal; and were glad to have found it. Three Embassadours they lent ouer to Carthage, C. Serulius, Q. Terentius, and M. Claudius Marcellus; whose very names import sufficient cause of bad affection to Hannibal. These hauing past the Sea, were entertained by those that had procured their commung; 30 and, being by them instructed how to carrie themselves, gave out, That they were fent to end some controuersies, betweene the Carthaginians and Masanisla. But Hannibal had kept fuch good espiall vpon the Romans, that hee knew their meaning well enough: against which he was neuer unprepared. It were enough to fav. That hee escaped them by flight: but in the actions of so samous a man, I hold it not impertinent to rehearfe the particularities. Having openly she wed himselfe, as was his manner, in the place of Affembly, Hee went foorth of the Towne when it beganne to wexe darke, accompanied with two which were ignorant of his determination; though fuch as he might well truft. Hee had appointed Horses to be in arcadinesse at a certaine place: whence riding all night, Hee came to a Towre 40 of his owne by the Sca-fide. There had been Ship furnished with all things needfull; as having long expected the necessitie of some such journey. So He bade Atrick farewell; lamenting the misfortune of his Countrie, more than his owne. Paffing ouer to the Ile of Cercina; he found there in the Hauen some Merchants ships of Carthage. They faluted him respectively; and the chiefe among them beganne to enquire, whither hee was bound. He fiid, Hee went Embassadour to Tyre: and that he intended there in the lland to make a facrifice; whereto Hee innited all the Merchants, and Masters of the Shippes. It was hote weather: and therefore Hee would needs hold his Feast upon the shore; where because there wanted couert, He made them bring thither all their failes and yards to be vied in stead of Tents. 50 They did fo; and feasted with him till it was late at night; at which time hee left them there asseepe; and putting to Sea, held on his course to Tyre. All that night, and the day following, Hee was fure not to bee purfued. For the Merchants did neither make hafte to fend any newes of him to Carthage, as thinking him to be gone made most speed homeward, get away from Cereina; being bussed awhile in fitting their tackle. At Carthege, the misse of so great a person was diversly constructed. Some ghessed aright, T hat he was feld. But the more common opinion was, That the Romans had made him away. At length came newes where he had been seene and then the Romans Embassadours, having none other errand thither, accused him (with an euill grace) as a troubler of the Peace; whereby they onely discovered the mischiefe by them intended against him, and the malice of their Senate; missing the while their purpole, and causing men to understand, that Hee sted not thus without great reason.

Hamibal, comming to Tyre, the Mother-Citic of Carthage, was there entertained 10 Royally: as one, in whose great worth and honour the Tyrians, by reason of affinitio between their Cities, thought themselves to have interest. Thence went hee to Antioch; and, finding the King departed, wisted his sonne in Daphne: who friendly welcomned him, and sent him with his Father at Ephelus, that exceedingly rejoy-

As Antiochus had cause to be glad, in that he had gotten Hannibal: so had the Romans no great cause to bee therefore sorrie; otherwise than as they had much disgraced themselues, by discovery of their impotent malice, in chacing him thus out of his Countrie. For it would not prooue alike easie vnto this great Commander, to make flout Souldiours of base Afiatiques; as it had been by his trayning and disci- 20 pline, to make very seruiceable and skilfull men of Warre of the Spaniards, Africans, Gaules, and other Natious, that were hardie though vnexperienced. Or were it fupposed, that one mans worth, especially being so extraordinary, could alter the nature of a cowardly people: yet was it therewithall confiderable, that the vanitics of Antiochus, the pride of his Court, the basenesse of his Flatterers, and a thoufand other fuch vexations, would bee farre more powerfull in making unprofitable the vertue of Hannibal; now a desolate and banished man, than had been the villanie of Hanno and his Complices, hindering him in those Actions wherein hee had the high Command, and was seconded by his warlike brethren. Wherefore the name of this Great Carthaginian, would onely helpe to ennoble the Roman Victo: 30 rie: or if it further served to hearten Antiochus, and make him leffe carefull to avoid the warre; then should it surther serue, to justifie the Romans in their quarrell. And it seemes indeed, that it was no little part of their care, to get a faire pretence of making warre. For Antiochus, as is said before, hauing newly sent Embassadours to T. Quintius, requiring that the Peace might faithfully be kept: it was not probable, that he had any meaning to take Armes; vnleffe by meere violence hee were thereto enforced. Onely the Ltolians were greatly suspected, as a turbulent people, desirous of innovation, and therefore practiting with this Great King; whom they wilhed to see among them in Greece. In this regard, and to appeale them; they had of late been answered with gentle words by one of the ten Counsailours, That the 40 Senate would grant them what socuer with reason they should aske. But this promile was too large, and vnaduised. For when their Embassadours came to Rome, the Senate would grant them nothing; but wholly referred them to T. Quintius, who fauoured them least. Hereat they murmured, but knew not how to right themfelues: otherwise than by speaking such words, as might hasten the Romans out of Greece for very shame; who had no defire to be thence gone.

The dayly talke at Rome was of warre with Antiochus; but in Greece, when the Romans would leave the Countrey. For the Letolians were wont to ypbraid the reft of the Greekes, with the vaine libertie which the Romans had proclaimed, faying, That thefe their Deliverers had layd heavier fetters ypon them, than formerly 50 they did wears; but yet brighter and fairer, than those of the Macedonian: likewise, That it was a gracious act of titus, to take from the legs of the Greeks their chaine, & teit tabout their necks. There was indeed no cause of tarrying longer in Greece, if the Romans had no other meaning than what they pretended. For Philip had made no de-laie, in accomplishment of that which was laid vpon him: all the Townes of Greece were at libertie, and the whole Country at peace, both with the Romans, and within it selfe. As for Intiochus; He made it his dayly suit. That the Peace bet a cene him and Rome, such as was, might be confirmed, and strengthened by a League of more assurance. Neuerthelesser. Quintus would needs scare that Intuolus meant sorthwith to seize vpon Greece, as soone as hee and his Armie were thence departed. And in this regard, He retained still in his owner hands Chaleis, Demirtin, and the Accountibus; by benefit of which Townes, he might the better withstand the dangerous Inuasion like to be made by Intiochus. Succable vntothe doings of Quin-

10 tius were the reports of the tenne Embassadours, that had been sent oner to ashit him; when they returned backe into the Citie. Antiochus, they faid, would quellionlesse fall vpon Greece: wherein he should finde not onely the Etolians, but Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedemon, readicto gine him entertainment. Wherefore there was none other way, than to doe somewhat against these their suspected enemies: especially against Nabis, who could worst make resistance; whilest Antiochus was farreaway in Syria, and not intentine to his businesse. These reports went not onely current through the Citie, among the Vulgar; but found fuch credit with the chiefe of the Senate, that in the following yeere, against which time is was expected that Antiochus should be ready to take his great enterprise in hand; 20 P. Cornelius Scipio the African defired, and obtained, a fecond Confulfhip, with intention to be Generall in the Warre, against the King and his Hannibal. For the prefent, the businesse with Mabis was referred vnto Titus; to deale with him as hee thought good. This would bee a faire colour of his longer tarriance in Greece. Therefore he was glad of the employment: whereof also hee knew that many of the Greekes would not be forry; though for his owne part, hee wanted all good pretence of taking it in hand. For Nabis had entred into friendship with him , two or three yeeres before this, as is alreadic showed, whilest hee had Warre with Philip: and had further beene contented for the Romans fake to bee at peace with the Acheans; neither fince that time had hee done any thing, whereby hee should draw 30 vpon himselfe this Warre. Hee was indeed a deteliable Tyrant, and hated of the popon himselfe this Warre. Hee was indeed a detellable Tyrant, and hated of the Acheums; as one, that besides his owne wicked Conditions, had formerly done to them great mischiefe. Titus therefore had a plausible Theme, whereon to discourse before the Embassages of all the Confederate Cities; Which hee cansed to meete for that purpose at Covinib. He tool othem, That in the warre with Philip, not onely the Greekes, but the Romans themselues, had each their motiese apart (which hee there briefly rehearsed) that should fittre them up, and cause them to be carnest. But in this which hee now propounded to them concerning Nabis, the Romans had none other interest, than onely the making perfect of their honour, in setting all officere at liberty: which noble Action was in some fort maimed, or incompleat, while the noble Citie of Argos was lett in subjection to a Tyrant, hat had larely

49 whileft the noble Citie of Argos was lett in subjection to a Tyrans, that had lately occupied it. It therefore belonged vnto them, the Greekes, duly to consider, whether they thought the deliucrance of Argos a matter worthy to be vndertaken; or whether otherwise to auoid all further trouble, they could be ewell contented to leave it as it was. This concerned them, and not the Romans: who in taking this worke in hand, or letting it alone, would wholly be ruled by the Greekes themselnes. The Athenian Embassadour made answere hereunto very eloquently, and as pleasing as he could deusife. He gaue thankes to the Romans for what was pass; excelled their vertues at large; and magnified them highly in regard of this their Proposition: wherein virequested they freely made offer to continue that bounty, which at the 50 vehement request of their poore Associates, they had already of late extended viettly to the Greekes. o vehement request of their poore Associates, they had already of late extended unto the Greekes. To this Hee added, That great pittie it was to heare, such notable vertue and high deserts ill spoken of by some: which tooke vpon them, out of their owne imaginations to sortell, what harme these their Benefactors meant to dochereaster: when as Thankfulnes rather would have required an acknowledgement, of the benefits and pleasures already received. Every one found the meaning of this last clause, which was directly against the Etolians. Wherefore Alexanger the Atolian role vp, and told the Athenians their owne: putting them in minde of their ancient glorie, in those times when their Citie had beene the Leader of all Greece, for defence and recoucrie of the libertie generall: from which honour they were now fo farre fallen, that they became Paralites vnto those whom they thought most mighty; and by their base assentation, would lead all the rest into feruitude. Then spake Hee against the Acheans, Clients that had been a long time vnto the Alecedonian; and fouldiors of Philip, vntill they ranne away from his adversitie. These, Heesaid, had gotten Corinth, and must now have warre be made 10 for their fakes, to the end that they might also bee Lords of Argos: whereas the Ætolians, that had first made warre with Philip, and alwayes been friends vnto the Romans, were now defrauded of some places, anciently to them belonging. Neither did hee thus containe himselfe, but obiected vnto the Romans fraudulent dealing: forasmuch as they kept their Garrisons in Demetrias, Chaleis, and the Acrocorinth; having been alwayes wont to professe, That Greece could never bee at libertie, whilest those places were not free. Also now at last, what else did they seeke by this discourse of warre with Nabis, than businesses wherewith to finde themfelues occupied, that fo they might have some seeming cause of abiding longer in the Countrie? But they should doe well, if they meant as they spake, to carrie 20 their Legions home out of Greece: which could not indeed beefree, till their departure. As for Nabis; the Aetolians themselves did promise, and would undertake, That they would either cause him to yeeld to reason, and relinquish Argos freely, withdrawing thence his Garrison; or else compell him by force of Armes, to submit himselfe to the good pleasure of all Greece, that was now at vnitie. These words had been reasonable, if they had proceeded from better men. But it was apparent, that no regard of the common libertie wrought fo much with these Actolians; as did their owne rauenous defire of oppressing others, and getting vnto themsclues, that worse would vie it, the whole Dominion in Greece, which Philip had lost. Neither could they well diffemble this; making it no small part of their grieuance, 30 That the old League was forgotten: wherein it had been conenanted, That the Romans should enjoy the spoile of all, but leaue the Townes and Lands in possesfion of the Atolians. This, and the remembrance of a thouland milchiefes by them done in former times, made the whole Affembly, especially the Acheans, cric out vpon them: entreating the Romans to take fuch order before they went, that not onely Nabis might be compelled to doe right; but the Atolian thecues be enforced to keepe home, and leave their neighbours in quiet. All this was highly to the pleafure of Titus: who faw, that by discountenancing the Ætolians, He was become the more gracious with all the reft. But whether it pleased him so well, that Antiochus his Embassadours did presently after lie hard vpon him, to drawe the peace to some 40 good conclusion, it may bee greatly doubted. Hee cast them off with a flight anfwere: telling them, That the ten Embassadors or Counsailours which had beene fent vnto him from Rome, to be his affistants in these matters of weight, were now returned home; and that, without them, it was not in his power to conclude vpon

Now concerning the Lacedamonian warre; it was very foone ended. For Titus vied the helpe of all his Confederates; and made as great preparation against Nabis, both by Land and Sea, as if he should have had to doe with Philip. Besides the Raman forces, King Eumenes with a Nauie, and the Rhodian Fleet, were inuited to the fervice: as also Philip of Macedon fent aid by Land; doing therein poorely, whether 50 it were to get fauour of the Romans, or whether to make one among the number, in feeking reuenge vpon Mabis, that had done him iniuric. But the most forward in this Expedition were the Acheans, who let out ten thousand Foote, and a thousand Horse. As for the Atolians: rather to hold good fashion, and sound their dispofitions, than in hope to fpeed, their helpe was required; whereof they excufed themfelues as well as they thought best. Thus are the Acheans now become the prime friends of the Romans in Greece; having removued the Atolians from that degree of fauour: like as they themselues hereafter (though not in all haste) shall be supplanted of the same Lacedamonians, against whom they are now marching.

CHAP.5. S.4. of the Historic of the World.

Some of the Areises more bold then wife, began a conspiracie against the Lacedemonians that held their Towne; meaning to open their gates vnto the Roman. But ere Titus drew neare, they were all detected and flaine: excepting a very few, that escaped out of the Towne. The same of this Commotion, caused the Armie to march apace toward Argos; with hope to be there, before things were at quiet. But there was no stirre within the Walles: the execution done vpon the first mouers, having terrified all the rest of the Citizens. Titus then thought it better, to asfaile Nabis in the head of his strength at Lacedamon, than to consume time about other places; especially at Argos: for the freedom wherof since the Warre was made, pittie it were, that the calamities of the warre should thereon fall most heavily.

Nabis had in readinesse an Armie of fifteene thousand, wherewith to defend himselfe against these Inuaders. Fine thousand of them were Mercinaries: the rest, of his owne Countrie; but fuch as were of all others the worst, as manumifed slaues, malefactors and base peasants, vnto whom his Tyrannie was beneficiall. Of the 20 good and worthy Citizens hee flood in doubt, and fince he could not hope to win their love, his meaning was to hold them quiet by feare. He called them all to an Affemblie: and compaffing them round in with his Armie, told them of the danger that was toward him and them. If they could agree within them eines; they might, he faid, hope the better to withstand the common Enemie. But for a smuch as turbulent heads were inuited by light occasions, to raise tumults, and worke dangerous treason: it seemed vnto him the safest, and ( withall ) the mildest course, to arrest beforehand, and put in ward, all those whom he found most reason to suspect. So should he keepe them innocent perforce; and thereby preserue not onely the Citie and his owne person from danger, but them also from the punishment, which 30 elfe they might have incurred. Hereupon heecites and apprehends about fourescore of them; whom hee leads away to prison, and the next night puts them all to death. Thus was he sure that they neither should offend, nor yet breake loose. As for the death of them, if it should happen to be noised abroad: what could it else doe than terrifie the people; who must thereby understand, that it was a mortall crime to be suspected? And to the same purpose his cruelty extended it selfe vnto fome poore wretches: whom he accused of a meaning to flie to the Enemie. These were openly whipt through all the streetes, and slaine. Having thus affrighted the Citizens: He turned the more freely all his thoughts toward the Enemie, that came on apace. Hee welcommed them with a fallie: wherein, as commonly hap-40 pens, the Souldiours of the Towne had the better at first; but were at length repelled with losse. Titus abode not many dayes before Sparta: but ouer-ran the Countrey; hoping belike to prouoke the Tyrant forth to battaile. The Roman Fleet at the same time with King Eumenes and the Rhodians, layd siegevnto Gyttheum, the onely or principall Hauen-towne that Nabis had. Likely they were to haue taken it by force, when there appeared hope of getting it by treason. There were two Gouernours within the Towne equall in authoritie: whereof the one, either for feare, or delire of reward, had a purpofe to let in the Romans. But the other finding what was in hand, and being somewhat more faithfull, slue the Traitor; after whose death, he himselse alone made the better desence. Yet when T. Quantius 50 with part of his Armie came thither to Gyttheum: this Captaine of the Towne had not the heart to abide the ettermost, and awaite what either Time or his Master might doe for him, but was contented to give vp the place; yet vpon Condition, to depart in safety to Sparta with his Garrison. Pythagoras, the sonne-in-law of Nabis, and brother vnto his wife, was come from Argos, whereof he had the Government with a thousand Souldiours Mercenaries, and two thousand Argines: it beeing (as may feeme) the Tyrants purpose, to relieue Gyttheum; which he thought would have held longer out. But when they heard that it was loft, then began they to thinke vpon finishing the warre, by some reasonable Composition, Pythagoras therefore was fent his Embaffador to Titus: requesting only that he would appoint a time and place for Nabis to meet and speake with him. This was granted. In that Parlee the Tyrant spake very reasonably for himselfe: proouing, that hee suffered wrong, and had done none, and that by many good arguments; whereof the fumme was, That what societ they now did, or could object vnto him, was of elder date than the League which they had made with him. Whereupon he inferred, That nei- 10 ther for his keeping the Towne of Argos, nor for any other cause by them alleadged, they ought to make warre vpon him; fince regos, and all other their allegations what focuer, had not hindered them, in time of their more neede of him from entring into that League with him; which was neuer broken on his part, nor ought to be on theirs. But Quintius was not herewith fatisfied. Hee charged him with Tyrannie; and gaue instance, as easily he might, of divers barbarous cruelties by him committed. In all which points, for a fmuch as they knew this Nabis to be guiltic, before they made Peace and Confederacie with him; it was expedient, that fome other cause of this Inuasion should be alleadeed. Wherefore he said further. That this Tyrant had occupied Meffene, a Towne Confederate with the Romans: 20 That he had bargained to joyne with Philip; when he was their enemie, not onely in League, but also in affinitie: and that his Fleete had robbed many of their ships. about the Cape of Malea. Now touching this Piracie, fince in the Articles by Titus propounded vnto Nabis, there was no restitution mentioned, other than of ships, by him taken from the Greekes his neighbours, with whom he had long held warre: it may feeme to have beene objected, onely by way of Complement, and to enlarge the volume of those complaints, that were otherwise very friuolous. As for Mesfene, and the bargaine of Alliance made with Philip: they were matters foregoing the League, that was made betweene the Romans and this Tyrant; and therefore not to have beene mentioned. All this it feemes that Ariffanus, the Prator of the 30 Achains, verie well perceived: who therefore doubting left the Romans, (that were wont to talke so much of their owne instice, honour, and faithfull dealing) should now relent, and forbeare to molest him, who, though a wicked man, was yet their Confederate; and had neuer done them wrong; framed his discourse to another end. He entreated Nabis to confider well of his owne chate; and to fettle his fortunes, whilest he might doe it without hazzard: alleadging the examples of many Tyrants that had ruled in the neighbour-cities, and therein committed great outrages; yet were afterwards contented to furrender their Estates, and lived in great securitie, honour, and happines, as private men. Thus they discoursed untill night. The next day Nabis was contented to relinquish Argos; and requested them, to de-40 liver vnto him in writing their other demands, that hee might take counfaile with his friends. The iffue of all was, That, in regard of the charges, whereat the Confederates must bee, for maintenance of an Armie to lie in Leaguer all that Winter (as there was no hope of making short worke) before the Citie of Sparta: they were contented to make peace with the Tyrant, vpon fuch Conditions as Titus should thinke meete. Besides the restitution of Argos, and all the places thereon depending; Titus propounded many other Conditions to Nabis, and some of them very gricuous. Hee would not suffer the Lacedamonian to have ought to doe in the He of Crete; no, nor to make any Confederacies; nor war, either in that Hand or elf-where; not to build any Towne or Castle vpon his owne Lands; not to keepe any other 50 shipping, than two small Barkes; besides many other troublesome injunctions; with imposition of an hundred talents in siluer to be payd out of hand, and fiftie talents yearely, for eight yeares next enfuing. For observance of these Couenants he demanded five hostages, such as he himselfe should name; and one of them to be the Tyrants owne fonne: If it had beene the meaning of Titus, to withdraw the war from Nabis, because it was not grounded upon instice: then had it been enough, if not more than enough, to take Argos from him; which nee himselfe did offer, though it were for feare, to deliner vp. But if it were thought reasonable, to dispense a little with the Roman faith, in regard of the great benefit which thereby might redound vnto the state of their best friends in Greece, by the extirpation of this Tyrannie: then should this enterprise, when once it was taken in hand, haue beene profecuted vnto the very vimost. As for this middle course which the Romans held : as it was not honourable vnto them, to enrich themselues by the spoile 10 of one that had not offended them: nor pleasing to the Acheans, who indgedit ener after a great blemish to the noble acts of Titus; so did it minister vnto the Atolians, and to fuch as curiously pried into the faults of those which tooke vpon them to bee Patrons of Greece, no barren Subject of malicious discourse. For fince Philip, a King, and descended of many famous Kings, might not bee suffered by these Matterly Romans, to hold any one of those Countries or Townes in Greece, that had belonged vnto his Ancestors: it was thought very strange, that Lacedamon, once the most famous Citic among all the Greekes, was by the fame Romans left in poffellion of a Tyrant, that had vsurped it but yesterday: and Hee therein rooted by their authoritie, as their friend and Confederate. 2 abis on the other fide thought himselte vn-20 mercifully dealt withall, by the felfe-fame Romans, whose amitie he had preferred in time of a doubtfull warre, before the love and affinitie of the Macedonian King, that had committed the Citie of Argos into his hands. But fally had he dealt with the Macedonian : and fallly was he dealt with by those, to whom he did betake himselfe. Among these Articles propounded, there was nothing that pleased him; saue onely that for the banished Lacedamonians, (of whom a great number werein the Roman Campe; having among them Agesipolis the naturall King of Sporta, that being a yong childe was driven out by Lyeurgus, the first of the Tyrants) there was made no provision, to have them restored vnto their Citie and Estates; but onely Icaue required for as many of their wines, as would be so contented, to line abroad 30 with them in banishment. Wherefore hee forbore to give consent vnto the'e demands: and sustained an affault or two; hoping belike that the enemies would soone be wearie. But his fearefull nature shortly ouercame the resolution, which the sense of these injuries had put into him. So yeelding voto all that had beene propounded, Hee deliuered the hostages; and thereupon obtained peace, that was confirmed afterwards at Rome by the Senate and People. From this time forward, Hee thought the Romans more wicked than himselfe; and was readic upon the first aduantage, to doe them all mischiefe that he could.

The Argiues had heard newes that Lacedemon was euen at point of being taken;
This erected them, and gaue them heart to thinke vpon their owne good. So they 40 aduentured to set vpon the Garrison; which was much weakened, by the remoone of the three thousand carried thence by Pythagoras, to helpe the Tyrant as Spants.
Thereneeded vnto their libertie no more, than that all of them ioyntly should fet their handes to the getting of it; which no soner they did than they obtained it.
Presently after this came T. Quintim to Argas, where he was joyfully welcommed.
Hee was deservedly acknowledged as author of that benefit, whereon the Citizens had laied hold without slaying for him: and that hee might the better entitle him selfse thereto, he caused the libertie of the Argiuses to be proclaimed at the Nemana games; as ratifying it by his authoritie. The Citie was annexed againe to the Councellos Achiais, whereby the Acheans were not more strengthened, than the Argiuses 50 themselves were secured from danger of relapse, into the same extremities out of which they had newly escaped.

After this, Titus found little bulines or none wherewith to let on worke his Armie in Greece. Antiethus was about to lend another Emballage to Rome, desiring peace and friendship of the Senate. Things being therefore in appearance who

ly disposed vnto quiet; Scipiothe African, that was chosen Consul at Rome, could not have his defire, of being fent Commander into Greece. The vnfincere meaning of Anticchus, and the tumultuous disposition of the Atolians, were held as considerations worthie of regard : yet not sufficient causes of making Warre. Neither appeared there any more honest way, of confuting the Atolians, and of throughly perfwading all the Greekes (which was not to be neglected, by those that meant to affure vnto themselues the Patronage of Greece) that the good of the Countrie, was their fole intent: than by withdrawing thence their Legions, and leaving the Nation vnto it selfe, til occasion should be ripe, and call them over againe. Wherfore after Titus had spent a Winter there, without any matter of employment, either found, or at 10 any neere distance appearing; he called an Assembly of Delegates, from all parts of Greece to Corintb: where hee meant to bid them farewell. There he recounted vnto them all that had paffed fince his comming into those parts; and willed them to value the Roman friendship, according to the difference of estate, wherein the Romans found and left them. Hereto he added some wholesome counsaile; touching the moderate vicof their libertie, and the care which they ought to have of living peaceably, and without faction. Laftly hee gaue vp Acrocorinthus to the Acheans; withdrawing thence the Roman Garrison, and promising to doe the like ( which verie soone hee did) at Chalcis and Demetrias; that so it might be knowne, what liers the Ætolians were, who had accused the Romans, of a purpose to retaine those pla- 20 ces. With joyfull acclamations did the Greekes tellifie their good liking of that which Titus had faid and done : as also (at his request) they agreed, to ransome and enlarge all Romans, that had bin fold into their Countrie by Hannibal.

Thus Tieus crowned his actions in Greece with an happie end : and by leaning the Countrie before his departure was vrged, left therein behind him the memorie of his vertue and benefits, vintainted by jelousie and suspition of any enill meaning. At his comming to the Citic, Hee had the honour of a Triumph; which was the goodliest of all that Rome had untill that day beheld. Three dayes together the show of his pompe continued: as being set out with the spoiles of a Countrie, more aboundant in things worthie of fuch a spectacle, than any wherein the Romans had 30 before made Warre. All forts of Armes, with Statues and curious pieces of Brasse or Marble, taken from the Enemie, were carried in the first dayes Pageant. The second day, was brought in, all the treasure of Gold and Siluer: some in the rude Masse vnwrought; some, in divers forts of Coine; and some, in Vessels of fundrie kindes, that were the more highly prized by the workemanship. Among these were tenne shieldes, all of Silver; and one of pure Gold. The third day Titus himselse entred the Citie in his Triumphant Chariot. Before him were carried an hundred and foureteene Crownes of Gold, beflowed vpon him by diners Cities. There were also led the beafts for Sacrifice; the Prisoners, and the hostages; among which, Demetrius the sonne of King Philip, and Armenes the sonne of Nabis, were 40 principall. After him followed his Armie; and (which added much grace, and good liking, to the Shew) the Roman Captines, by his procurement redeemed from flauerie in Greece.

Notiong after his Triumph; He procured audience of the Senate for many Embassages, that were come out of Greece and Asa. They had all very fauourable answers, excepting those of King Antichus: whom the Senate would not heare, but referred ouer to T. Quintius, and the tenne that had beene his Counfailors; because their businesse was aid to bee somewhat intricate. Hereat the Kings Embassadours wondred. They said not Titus and his Associates, That they could not discerne wherein consisted any perplexitie of their message. For all Treaties of 50 peace and friendship, were either betweene the Victor and the vanquished; betweene those, that having warred together, were vponequall termes of aduantage; or betweene those that had lined always in good agreement, without any quarrell. Vnto the Victor; they said, that the vanquished must yeeld; and patiently endure

the impolition of fome Couchants, that elfe might feeme vareasonable. Where Warre had been made, and no advantage gotten: there was it viuall to demaund and make reflitution of things and places claimed, gotten, or loft; accordingly as both parts could agree. But betweene those which had never failen out, there ought no Conditions of establishing friendship to bee proposed : since it was reasonable, that each part should hold their owne; and neyther carrie it felfe as superiour vnto the other, in prescribing ought that might bee troublesome. Now of this last kind, was the League and friendihip that had beene fo long in conclusion, betwixt Antinches and the Romans. Which being fo; they held it strange, that the Romans 10 thould thus inlift on points no way concerning them, and take vpon them to preferibe vnto the King, what Cities of Afia he should set at libertie; from what Cities they would give him leave to exact his wonted Tributes; eyther putting, or not putting, his Garrifons into them, as the Senate should thinke fit. Hereto Quintius answered, That fince they went so distinctly to worke, Hee would also doe the like. Wherefore he propounded vnto them two Conditions, and gaue them their choice whether to accept : Eyther that it should be lawfull for the Romans , to take part in Afia with any that would feeke their friendship; Or, if King Antiochus misliked this, and would have them for beare to meddle in Asia, that then Hee should abandon whatfocuer hee had gotten in Europe. This was plaine dealing; but no 20 reasonable nor pertinent answere, to that which the Kings Embassadours had propounded. For it the Romans might be hired to ablaine from Afia, by the gitt of all that Antiochus had lately wonne in Europe: then did not the affaires of Smirna, Lampfacus, or any other Matiques, whom they were pleased to reckon as their Confederates, bind them in honour to make warre with a King that fought their loue, and had neuer done them injurie. Betthey knew very well, that Antiochus could not without great shame be so base, as to deliuer up vinto them the Citie of Lylimachia, whereon of late he had bin at fo much cost; in building it vp euen from the foundations, and repeopling it withinhabitants, that had all beene dispersed, or captine to the Barbarians. And so much the Embassadours with great indignation 30 alleadged : faying, that Antiochus desired friendship of the Romans; but so, as it might fland with his honour. Now in point of honour, the Romans tooke vpon them as if their cause were farre the superiour. For it was, they said, their purpole, to fet at libertie those Townes, which the King would oppresse and hold in subje-Aion: especially fince those Townes were of Greekish bloud and language; and fell in that regard under the patronage, which Rome had affoorded unto all Greece befides. By this colour they might foone have left Antiochus King of not many subjects on the hither side of Euphrates. Neyther did they for beare to say, That, vnleffe he would quit what hee held in Europe, it was their meaning not onely to protect those which relied vpon them in Asia, but therein to make new Alliances: 40 namely (as might bee understood ) with such as were his subjects. Wherefore they

o namely (as might beevinderstood) with luch as were us subsects. Wherefore the virged his Embassacoust to come to a point, and tel hem plainly which of these two Conditions their King would accept. For lacke of a pleasing answere, which the Embassacould not hereto make slittle wanted of giving presently defiance to the King. But they suffered themselves to bee entreated, and were contented once againe to send outer P. Pillius, and others that had been alreadie with the King at Lysimachia; by whom they might receive a finall answere, whether these demands made by Quintius and his Associates would bee accepted, yea, or no. By this respite of time, and the fruitlesse Treaties ensuing. Anticolous got the less that of two yeeres, or thereabouts, to prepare for warre; finding in the Romans, all that while, no

Of the long Warres which the Romans had with the Gaules, Ligurians, and Spamiards. Of M. PORCIVS CATO. Injuries done by MASA-N I SSA to the Carthaginians, that fue to the Romans for inflice in vaine.

He Insubrians, Boijans, and other of the Cifalpine Gaules, together 10 with the Ligurians; made often, and (in a manner) continuall warre vpon the Romans in Italie, even from fuch time as Hannibal and his brother Mage departed thence, vntill fuch time as they themselves were verely subdued: which was not, before the Romans were almost at the height of their Empire. These Nations, hauing served vnder Mage for wages, and afterwards having gotten Amilear a Carthagiman, to be Leader vnto them all, as hath beene alreadie shewed; by this their fellowship in Armes, grew to be such willing partakers each of others fortune, that seldome afterwards either the Gaules or Ligurians did stirre alone, but that their companions, hearing it, were readie to second them. How the Romans first prevailed, and got large possessions in 20 Gallia Cifalpina now called Lumbardie; it hath beene long fince rehearfed, betweene the first and second Panick Warres. As also it hath since appeared, how they lost the greatest part of their hold in that Countrie, by meanes of Hannibal his passage there-through. Neither is it likely that the reconquest would have beene more difficult or tedious vnto the Romans, than was the first purchase: if, besides the greater employments which they had of their Armies abroad, their forces appointed vnto this warre had not beene distracted by the Ligurians; that alwayes made them to proceed warily, having an eye to the danger at their backes. The Ligurians were a flout Nation, light and (wife of bodie; well practifed in laying ambushes, and not discouraged with any overthrow, but foorthwith readie to fight againe, 29 Their Countrie was mountainous, rough, wooddie, and full of fireight and dangerous passages. Few good Townesthey had; but many Castles, exceedingly well fortified by nature: fo as without much labour, they could neither bee taken nor belieged. They were also very poore; and had little or nothing that might give contentment, vnto a victorious Armie that should spoile their Land. In these respects they ferued excellently well, to traine up the Roman Souldiors to hardnesse and militarie patience: teaching them (belides other exercises of warre) to endure much, and line contented with a little. Their quarrell to Rome, grew partly from their lone vnto the Gaules, their neighbours and companions; partly from their delight in robbing and spoiling the Territoric of their borderers, that were sub-40 iect vnto Rome. But their obstinate continuance in the Warre which they had begunne, seemes to have beene grounded upon the Condition of all Saluages; To be friends or foes, by custome, rather than by Judgement and to acknowledge no fuch vertue in Leagues, or formall conclusions of Peace, as ought to hinder them from vling their aduantage, or taking reuenge of injuries when they returne to minde. This qualitie is found in all, or most of the West-Indians: who, if they be demanded a reason of the Warres betweene them and any of their neighbours, vie commonly this answere, It hath still beene the custome for vs and them, to fight one against the other.

Divers overthrowes, though none that were great, these Ligurians gave vnto the so Romans: but many more, and greater, they received. Often they fought peace, when they found themselves in distresse; and brake it agains as often, when they thought it profitable fo to doe. The best was, that as their Countrie was a good place of exercise vnto the Romans, so out of their own Countrie they did little harme:

not fending any great Armies farre from home; perhaps, because they knew not how to make warre, faue on their owne ground.

CHAP.5. S.5. of the Historie of the World.

The Countrie of Spaine, asit was the first part of the Continent out of Italie that became subject vnto the Romans: so was it the last of all their Provinces, which was wholly and throughly by them subdued. It is likened in figure by some Geographers vnto an Oxe-hide; and the Romans found in it the propertie of that Oxe-hide, which Calanus the Indian thewed vnto the Great Alexander, as an Embleme of his large Dominions. For, treading vpon any fide of it, the further parts would rife from the ground. And thus was it with Spaine. Seldome did it happen, that those 10 parts from which the Roman Armies lay furthest, were not vo in rebellion. The Spaniards were a very hardie Nation, and calily flirred up to armes; but had not much knowledge in the Art of warre, nor any good Captaines. They wanted also ( which was their principall hinderance ) good intelligence among them felues ; and beeing divided into many small Signories, that had little other communion than of language, they seldome or never provided in generall for the common good of their Countrie; but made it their chiefe care, each of them to looke vnto their owne Territorie. Such private respects made them often to fall asunder; when many had vnited themselves together, for chacing out of the Romans. And these were the causes of their often ouerthrowes: as desire of libertie, rather than com-20 plaint of any wrong done to them, was the cause of their often taking armes.

The Carthaginians had been accustomed, to make enacuation of this Chollerick Spanish humour; by employing, as Mercinaries in their warres abroad, those that were most likely to bee vinquiet at home. They had also taken Souldiers from one part of the Countrie, and yled them in another: finding meanes to pay them all, out of the profits which they rayled upon the whole Countrie; as being farre better hufbands, and of more dexterititie than were the Romans, in that kind. But contrariwife the Romans, vling the feruice of their owne Legions, and of their fure friends the Latines, had little businesse for the Spaniards; and therefore were faine to have much businesse with them. Spaine was too farre distant, and withall too 30 great, for them to fend over Colonies thither, whereby to hold it in good order, according to the course that they tooke in Italie. Wherefore it remained, that they should alwayes maintaine such Armies in the Countrie, as might serue to hold it in obedience perforce; and fuch heedfull Captaines, as might bee still readie to oppose the Barbarians in their first Commotion. This they did: and thereby held the Countrie; though seldome in peace.

Very foone after the departure of Scipio, there was raifed warre in Spaine against the Romans, euen vpon the same generall ground, that was the foundation of all the Spanish warres following. It was thought vnreasonable, that the Spaniards should one while helpe the Carthaginians against the Romans, and another while the 40 Romans against the Carthaginians; basely forgetting to helpe themselves against those that were strangers, yet vsurped the Dominion over them. But the forces which Scipio had left behind him in that Countrie, being well acquainted with the manner of warre in those parts, suppressed this Rebellion by many victories : and, together with subjection, brought peace vpon the Countrie; which lasted fine yeeres. This Victorie of the Romans, though it happily ended the warre: yet left it still remaining the cause of the warre; which after fine yeeres brake out againe. The Spaniards fought a battaile with the Roman Proconful, whom they flew; and had a great Victorie, that filled them with greater hopes. Yet the happie successe of their Warres in Greece, made the Romans thinke it enough to fend thither two 50 Prators, and with each of them some two Legions. These did somewhat: yet not fo much, but that M. Porcius Cato, who was Conful the yeere following, and fent into that Province; found at his comming little leffe to doe, than the reconquering of all Spaine. But it fell out happily, that all the Spaniar ds were not of one minde: some were faithfull to Rome ; and some were idle beholders of the paines that others tooke. Yet when Cato had wonne a great Victorie vpon the chiefe of them; they role against him in many parts of the Countrie, and put him to much new trouble. Whilest hee was about to make a journie against those that were as yet vnsubdued; some of the lately vanquished, were even readie to rebell. Hee therefore difarmed them: which they tooke so heavily, that many of them slew themselves for very gricfe. Hearing of this, and well understanding, that such desperation might worke dangerous effects; Hee called vnto him the principall among them: and commending vnto them peace and quietneffe, which they never had diflurbed but vnto their owne great loffe, He praied them to deuise what course might betaken, for holding them affured vnto Rome, without further trouble. None of 10 them could, or would give counfaile in a matter of this nature. Having therefore talked with them once or twice, and finding their invention barren in this kind of Subiect; He gaue expresse charge, That vpon a day appointed they should throw downe the wals of all their Townes. Afterwards he carried the Warre about from place to place; and with fingular industrie finished it in short time. Neither thought he it as ny disgrace to him or to Rome, in this time of danger, to imitate the Carthaginians, and hire an Armie of the Celtiberians, against other of their Countrimen : excusing the indignitie, such as it seemed, with a lest, That if he were vanquished and slaine, then should be need to pay them nothing; whereas if he had the Victorie, hee could pay them with the Enemies monie. Finally Hee brought the Warre to so good end, 20 that in long time after, though Spaine were often troublesome, yet was it in no danger of being loft. He increased also the publike Reuenues in that Province, by cauting fome Mynes of Iron and Siluer to be wrought, that had before laine vnregarded. Flercin he did benefit the Common-wealth, by a vertue much agreeable to his owne

For this M. Cato was not onely very notable in the Art of War, which might well bee then termed The Occupation of the Romans; but so well furnished with all othery feful qualities, that very little was wanting in him, which might feeme requifite to the accomplishment of a perfect man. Hee was very skilful in the Roman Lawes, a man of great Eloquence, and not unprofitable in any businesse either private or 30 publike. Many Bookes he wrote: wherof the principal were, of the Roman antiquities, and of husbandrie. In matter of husbandrie he was notable, and thereby most increased his substance; being of meane birth, and the first of his House. Strong of bodie hee was, and exceeding temperate: fo as he lived in perfect health to very old age. But that which most commended him vnto the better fort of the Romans, was his great finceritie of life, abstinence from bribes, and fashioning himselfe to the ancient laudable Customes of the Citie. Herein hee had merited singular commendations, if the vehemencie of his nature had not caused him to maligne the vertue of that Noble Scipio the African, and some other worthic men; that were no lesse honest than himselfe, though farre lesse rigid, and more gallant in behaui- 40 our. Otherwife, Hee was a very good Citizen, and one of such temper, that hee could fashion himselfe to all occasions; as if he neuer were out of his Element. He Loued businesse so well, or rather hated vice so carnessly; that even vnto the end of his life, He was exercifed in defending himfelfe, or acculing others. For at the age of fourescore and sixe yeeres, He pleaded in his own defence: and foure yeeres after, he accused Sergius Galba vinto the People. So beganne the Nobilitic of Cato his family; which ended in his great grandchild M. Cato the Vtican : one, that being of like vertue and feruencie had all his good purposes dasht, and was finally wearied out of his life, by men of such Nobilitie and greatnesse as this his Ancestor had con-

The spanish Warres, after Cate his departure out of the Countrie, though they were not very dangerous, yet were they many; and the Countrie seldome free from insurrection, in one part or other. The Roman Practors therefore, of which two energy yeers were sent ouer Commanuelers into Spaine (that was divided into two euery yeere were sent ouer Commanders into Spaine (that was divided into two Gouernments) did rarely saile of such worke, as might affoord the honour of Triumph. One slew thitteene thousand Spaine's in a battaile: another tooke sift it Town and a third enforced many States of the Countrey to sue for Peace. Thus euery one of them, or most of them, did some laudable service; yet so, that commonly there were of men, townes, and people, new that rebelled, in stead of the old that were slaine, taken, or reclaimed. At the causes hereost I have alreadie pointed; and therefore thinke it enough to say, That the business is required not the imployment of a Roman Consul, from such time as Cato thence departed, until the to Rumantam Warre brake out; which was verie long after.

In all other Countries to the West of the Ionian Seas, the Romans had peace; but so had not the Carthaginians. For when Hannibal was gone from them, and that the enemies of the Barchine House promised all felicitic which Rome could grant, voto themselves and their obedient Citie: Majaniffa fell to disputing with the sword, about the title to the best part of their Lands. He began with Emporia a fruitfull Region about the leffer Syrtis: wherein among other Cities was that of Leptis, which daily paid a Talent unto Carthage for Tribute. This countrie the Numidian challenged; and by winning some part of it, seemed to better his claime vnto the whole. He had a great advantage: for that the Carthaginians might not make any Warre, 20 without leave obtained from their Mafters the Romans. They had none other way of redreffe, than by fending to Rametheir Complaint of his doings. And furely they wanted not good matter to alleadge, if the Judges had been unpartiall. For besides that Scipio, in limiting out vnto them their bounds, had left them the possession of this Countrie: Mafanissa himselfe, now very lately, pursuing a Rebell that fled out of his Kingdome, defired leave of the Carthaginians, for him elfe to paffe through it in his way to Cyrene: thereby acknowledging (had it otherwise beene questionable) that the Countrie was theirs. This not with flanding, Malanilla had where with to justifie his proceedings, especially vnto the Roman Senate. Hee gaue the Fathers to vinderstand by his Embassadors, what faithlesse people the Carthaginians were, and 30 how il-affected to the State of Rome. There had lately been fent vnto them from Hannibal, one that should perswade them to take part with Antiochus. This man they had examined upon some suspition of his errand; yet neither arresting him nor his ship, had thereby affoorded him meanes to escape. Hence the Numidian concluded. That certainly it was their purpose to rebell; and therefore good policie to keepe them downe. As for the Countrie of Emperia: it had alwayes, he faid, beene theirs, that were able to hold it by strong hand: and so belonged sometimes vnto the Namidian Kings; though now of late it was in possession of the Carthaginians. But if trueth were knowne, the Citizens of Carthage had no very warrantable title unto any more ground, than that whereon their Gitie flood; or fearcely to fo much. 40 For they were no better than strangers in Africk, that had gotten leave there to build upon fo much ground, as they could encompaffe with an Oxe-hide cut into fmall thongs. What soeuer they held without such a compasse, was purchased by fraud, and wrongfull encrochments. This confidered, Majaniffa requested of the Senate. That they would not adjudge vnto fuch vsurpers, the Countrie sometimes appertaining to the Ancestors of him their assured friend. The Romans having heard these allegations on both sides, found the matter so doubtfull, that they could not on the suddentell what to determine. Wherefore because they would doe nothing rashly; they sent ouer three Embassadours, of whom P. Scipio the African was one and the chiefe, to decide the controversie: yet secretly giving them to instructions, to leave all as they found it, without making any end one way or other. The Embaffadours followed their directions, and left all doubtfull. So was it likely, that Masanissa with a strong Armie should quickly preuaile, against those that could no more than talke of their right, and exclaime against the wrong. By fuch Arts were the Carthaginians held, not onely from stirring in fauour of King

Antiochus, if they had thereto any disposition; but were prepared by little and little vnto their finall destruction: that came vpon them, when the Romans had leifure to expresse the vtmost of their hatred.

VI.

The Atolians labour to promoke ANTIOCHYS, PHILIP, and NABIS, to warre wpon the Romans; by whom they hold themselves wronged and disgraced. NABIS besiegeth Gyttheum, and wasteth some part of Achaa. The exact skill of PHILOP CE-10 MEN, in advantage of ground: whereby he wtterly vanquisheth NABIS. ANTI-OCHVS being denied Peace by the Romans, joynes with the Etolians. The Etolians Surprize DEMETRIAS; and by killing NABIS, their Confederate leize upon Sparta. But they are driven out by the Citizens: who at PHILOPOMEN his perswasions annex themselves to the Achaans.

LL Greece being at peace, and the Roman Armies thence departed: it grieued much the Liolians to thinke, that they who had promifed vnto themselves the whole spoile of Philip, and the highest reputation among the Greekes; were not onely disappointed of their couctous 20 hopes, but quite forfaken by their ancient dependants; and of all other the most vnregarded. Yet was there made a great accesse to their Estate; by adding much vnto them, of that which had beene taken from the Macedonian. This might have well sufficed them, if their desires had not beene immoderate; and their indignation, more vehement, than their desire. But they were not so pleased with that which they had, fince they thought it no more than part of their due; as they were vexed with the deniall of that which they claimed, and with finding themselues to be wholly disesteemed, wherein they thought that they had vnfufferable wrong. Wherefore they deuiled, in a Parliament which they shortly held by what meanes they best might right themselves; and give the Romans a for- 20 rowfull knowledge of the difference, between their enmitte and friendship. To this purpose they soone agreed, as concurring all in one affection, That they would not onely perswade Antiochus to make warre vpon the Romans, as one to whom the Romans had long refused Peace; but that they would deale with the King of Macedon their ancient Enemie, and with Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedamon, to joyne all together in a new Confederacie: whose joynt forces could not in all likelihood but farre furmount those of the Romans, Acheans, Rhodians, and King Eumenes, with all that were of their Faction. This was a great enterprise, which the Atolians tooke in hand; and well beseeming them, for they were great darers. They sent Embasfadours to all these Kings, with perswasions as they thought most forcible. But Phi- 40 lip was irresolute; and Antiochus willing to trie first all other courses. Nabis the Lacedamonian, who neither (as Philip) had lost much, nor (as Antiochus) was in feare of any warre; yet shewed himselfe of all other the most forward; and not staying so much as to feeke any good pretence, beganne immediatly to lay fiege to Gyttheum, that had beene lately taken from him by the Romans. The Acheans, to whole care chiefly Titus at his departure had commended the affaires of Pelaponnefus, were not flow to admonish Nabis of his ductic: neither would they have staiced long from repreffing his violence by open warre; had not some of them thought it wisedome to aske counfaile of the Romans, and particularly of T. Quintius, before they engaged themselves in a businesse of such importance. Whilest thus they spent the time in 50 sending Embassadours, and were adulted by Quintius to let all alone, and to waite for the comming of the Roman forces that would shortly be among st them: Nabis was bold to give them juster cause of complaint, by wasting their owne Territorie.

Philepamen was then Prætor of the Acheans, who had long been absent in Crete;

making war there for his mindes fake and recreation. Vnto him the Acheans referred themselves, giving him leave to order the warre at his pleasure; either staying vntill the Fornans came; or doing otherwife, as hee should thinke best. He made all halte to relieue Gyttheum, by Sea; fearing left the Towne, and the Achem Garrison within it, should bee lost, if hee vied any delay. But Philopamen was so bad a Seaman, that he knew not a ftrong Ship from a rotten. He made a Quadrireme Gallie his Admirall, that had fourescore yeares agoe been counted a gallant vessell, in the Nauie of Antigonus Gonatas. Neither was the rest of his Fleete so good, as might encounter with that of the Lacedamonian. Onely it fell out well, that he committed to himfelfe to a light Pinnace or Brigandine, that fought better with her wings, than with her tallons. For his Admirall Gallie was flemmed at the first; and being rotten with age, sprang so many leakes, and tooke in water so fast, that she was faine to yeeld without further relistance. When the rest of the Fleet saw what was become of their Admirall, all were presently discouraged, and saued themselves with what speede they could. But Philopamen was not herewith danted. If hee had failed in Sea-service, which was none of his Occupation, Hee said, that he would make amends by Land. The Tyrant withdrew part of his Armie from the fiege of Gyttheum, to ftop the Acheans if they should inuade his Countrie. But upon these which were placed in guard of Laconia, Philopamen came inexpected; fired their Campe;

20 and put all, faue a very few of them, to the fword. Then marched he with all his Armie towards Lacedamon: within ten mile whereof he was, when the T vrant mer him that had already taken Gyttheum. It was not expected that Nahis would have been ready for them fo foone. Or if hee should come from Gyttheum, with any part of his forces: yet was it thought that hee mult overtake them, and charge them in Rere. They marched therefore almost fecurely, in a long Troupe reaching some five miles; having their Horfe, & the greatest part of their Auxiliaries at their backs, to beare off any fudden impression. But Nabis, who formerly understood, or at least suspected, what course they would take, appeared in the front of them with all his Armie; encamped there where they meant to have lodged. It was the custome

30 of Philopamen, when he walked or trauelled abroad with his friends, to marke the fituation of the Countrie about him; and to discourse, what might befall an Armie marching the same way. Hee would suppose, That having with him there such a number of Souldiours, ordered and forted in fuch manner, and marching rowards fuch a place; he were youn that ground encountered by a greater Armie, or better prepared to the fight. Then would be put the question, whether it were fit for him to hold on his way , retire, or make a fland? what piece of ground it were meete for him to feize vpon? and in what manner he might best doe it? in what fort he should order his men? where bestow his Carriages, and vnder what Gard? in what fort encampe himselfe? and which way march the day following? By such continuali

40 meditation Hee was growne so perfect, that hee neuer mette with any difficultie. whence he could not explicate himfelfe and his followers. At this time hee made a stand: and having drawne up his Rere, Hee encamped neare unto the place where he was; within halfe a mile of the Enemie. His baggage, with all thereto belonging, he bestowed on a Rocke; encompassing them round with his Souldiours. The ground was rough, the wayes bad, and the day almost quite spent; so as Nabis could not at the prefent greatly moleft him. Both Armies were to water at one Brooke; whereto the Acheans lay the nearer. This watering therefore was like to minister the first occasion of skirmish. Philopamen understood this; and layd an ambush in place convenient; whereinto the Mercenaries of 2 abis fell, and were flaughtered 50 in great numbers. Prefently after this, he caused one of his owne Auxiliaries to goe

to the Tyrant, as a fugitine, and tell him , that the Acheans had a purpose to get betweene him and Lacedemon; wherby they would both debarre his returne into the Citie, and withall encourage the people, to take armes for the recourry of their LIIIII 2 freedome.

freedome. The Tyrant hearing this, marched haftily away; and left his Campe, which hardly otherwise would have been forced. Some Companies hee made to flay behinde, and shew themselves vpon the Rampart, thereby to conceale his departure. But Philopamen was not fo to be beguiled. He eafily won the Campe; and gaue chace to Nabis: whose followers being ouertaken, had no courage to turne about and make head. The enemies being thus dispersed, and sted into Woods, where they lay in couert all that day; Philopamen conceived aright, that their feare and neceffitie would teach them to creepe homewards, and faue themselues, when it grew darke. Wherefore in the Euening, when he had gathered together all those of his Light-armature, which had followed the chace whilest it was day, Hee led 10 forth the rest that had well refreshed themselues, and occupied the two most ordinaric passages vnto Lacedamon. So Nabis his men, when it was darke night, perceiuing in Philopomens Campegreat flore of lights; thought that all had been at rest: and therefore aduentured to make an escape home. But they were so way-laid, that hardly one quarter of them got into Sparta. Thirtie dayes together after this, did Philopamen waste the Countrey round about, which Nabis durst not iffue foorth of his Towne; and then returned home, leaving the Tyrant in a manner without forces.

The Roman Embassaddours were then in Greece, and T. Quintius among them; labouring to make their partie strong against Antiochus and Nabis, whom they knew 20 to be follicited by the Etolians. Verie faire countenance they also made vnto Philip; and with comfortable promifes drew him to make shew, whatsoener hee thought, of good correspondence. They promised to restore vnto him his sonne: and were contented to let him hope, that hee should receive other fauours at their hands; and regaine poffession of many places, by them taken from him. Thus did the Romans prepare for warre against Antiochus in Greece, whilest their Embassadours that were with him in Afia, denied otherwise to grant him Peace, than if he would veeld vnto one of the Conditions, by them so often propounded. The long abfence of this King in Syria, where he had accomplished the marriage betweene Ptolemie and his daughter; together with the death of yong Antiochus the Kings sonne, 20 which happened during the Treatie, and hindered, or seemed to hinder the King, from gining audience in person to the Embassadours; caused them to returne home to Rome; as uncertaine of their answere as at their setting forth. One thing that might have beene, and partly was, beneficiall vnto them, they brought to paffe during their abode at Ephelus; either by cunning, or (as Linie rather thinkes) by chance. Finding Hannibal there, they discoursed often with him, and blamed him for hauing thus fied vnto Antiochus, vpon a causelesse suspition wherein hee held the Romans: that honoured his vertue, and intended him no harme. Many have affirmed that P. Scipio was one of these Embassadours; and that hee, among other discourses with Hannibal, demanded once, Which of all the famous Captaines that had lived, HAN-40 NIBAL indged the most worthy? So Hannibal gave to Alexander of Macedon the first place : to Pyrrhus the second : and the third he challenged vnto himselfe. But Scipio who thought his owne title better, than that it ought to be fo forgotten: asked yet further, What wouldest thou have said then, Hannibal, if thou hadstvanquished mee ? To whom the Carthaginian replied, Then would not I have given the first place to Alexander, but have claimed it as due vnto my selfe. Now whether this were fo, or otherwise: the often and friendly conference of Hannibal with the Roman Embassadours, made him suspected of Antiochus: who therefore did forbeare awhile to vie his counsell. Yet afterwards, when Hannibal perceined this change in the King : and plainely desiring him to tell the cause thereof, heard what it was ; He 50 casily recovered his former grace, and credit. For he told how his Father had caused him to fweare at the Altars, when hee was a little boy, That hee neuer should bee friend vnto the Romans. Wherefore he willed the King not to regard any vaine formifes;

mises: but to know thus much, That as long as he thought vpon warre with Rome, fo long would Hannibal doe him all good service: whereas contrariwise if he intended to make peace, then should it behoove him to vie the counsaile of some other

The Aetolians, and their friends, were no leffe bufie all this while, in making their partic strong against the Romans, than were the Romans, in mustering vp their friends in Greece. They had so often dealt with Antiochus, vanting much of their owne forces, and arrogating to themselves the honour of the victoric against Philip; that finally they prevailed with him: especially when the Roman Embaffadors had 10 left him without hope of peace, vnleffe hee would buy it at too dearca rate. They dealt in like fort with the Macedonian. But in vaine. Hee vnderstood the Romans, and himselfe, too well. Wherefore it concerned them to improve their owne forces to the vtmost: as knowing, that all the burthen must lie vpon Antiochus and themselues, without helpe from any; sauc onely from some few that were discontented in Greece. Whilest they were about this, and had with them an Embassador of the King Antiochus that animated them to resolution: the Athenian Embasfadors, whom Titus had requested to be at their meeting, stayed their vehemencie a little; by exhorting them, not to conclude rashly, without first hearing the Romans, that lay necre at hand. For want of a ready answer hereto, they were conten-

20 ted to approue the motion. Titus hearing this, thought the bulines worthy of his presence. For since Antiochu had now declared himselte against the Romans: it would bee no small piece of service, to withdraw from his friendship, those by whose encouragement he had made the aduenture. Wherefore hee came to their Panatolium, or great Affemblie of the Nation; where he forgot nothing that might ferue to appeale them. Hee willed them to confider the weight of the enterprise which they tooke in hand; whereby Greece was like to become a Champaigne-field. on which, to the ruine of the Countrie, the Romans, and King Antiochus, that commanded no small part of the World, should fight for the Masterie: the Etolians, as

Masters in that kinde of Fence, setting them on, and becomming * the Sticklers. As * Lindas ad-20 for those grievances which did thus exasperate them, and vige them to such violent missis Actolisa courses, Hee willed them to consider how slight they were, and how much better forte, lamissis. they might doe to fend Emba Gadours to Rome, that should either pleade their right in the Senate, or (if their right vnto the places which they claimed , were not good) make request to have what they defined: than thus to fet the world in an vprore, and be afterwards the first that should repent it. But what he sayd, or could say, it skilled not much. They had already done ill, to make the Embaffador of the King, whose helpe they had sought, waite so long for an answer, and stay doubting what good end they should make with the Romans. Neither was it newes vnto them to heare those comfortable words, That, by sending to Rome, they might happen to 40 obtaine what they defired; either as their right, or elfe by way of fauour. For with fuch Termes had they beene feafted once already: and were by the Senate reie-&ed vnto Titus: who, having it in his owne power, gaue them no fatisfaction; yet would now againe referre them to the Senate. This were onely loffe of time, and might abate their credit with Antiochus. Wherefore without more adoethey made a Decree, That King Antiochus the Great should be entreated to come over into Greece, as well to fet the Countrie at libertie, as also to decide the controversies depending betweene the Romans and Atolians. Such a Decree they would not haue made, had they not viderflood the Kings minde before. Hauing made it; they forgot no point of braueric, wher by to yount themselves to the Kings Embas-50 fadours, and against the Romans. Titus desired of their Prætor, to let him see a Copie of this nevy Decree. The Prætor answered, That then hee had other things to do: but that this Decree, & their further answer, they would shortly let him know, if he came to their camp in Italy vpon the river of Tibris. Gentler words would have LIIIII 3

done better, as the Etolians are like to vnderstand hereafter. But having thus begun, they meant henceforth to goe roundly to worke. The care of the warre they referred vnto the more private Councel of their Nation; that no occasion might slip, in waiting for the Authoritic of a generall Assembly. The Apocleti (so were the Priuic Councell of £tolia called) went as hotly to worke as any of the yongest heads could have done. They layd a plotte, how to get into their hands at one time the Townes of Chalcis, Demetrias, and Sparta: to each of which they fent men for the purpole. Demetrias they tooke vpon the sudden sentring, some of them as friends to conduct home a principall man of the Citie: who for speaking words against T. Quintius, had been driven to flee thence, but was, by interceffion of those that lo- 10 ued him againe recalled. His Atolian companions, that were not many, feized vpon a Gate; whereat they let in a Troupe which they had left not far behind them; and fo fell to murdering the chiefe of the Roman Faction. At Chalcis they fped not fo well. Thither also they had a banished man to bring home: but they came so ftrong, that their purpose was discouered, and the Towne prepared to defend it selfe against them. Being therefore demanded the cause of this hostilitie, they gave a gentleanswer, saying, That they came not thither as enemics, but onely to deliuer the Towne from the Romans; who more infolently dominered ouer it, than ener the Macedonians had done. By which Rhethoricke they prevailed no more, than they could doe by plaine force. For the Townes-men replied, That they neither 20 found any abridgement of their libertie, nor needed any Garrison to keepe them from the Romans; from whom they neither feared any danger, nor received injurie. So this busines was dasht. The attempt vpon Sparta was more strange and desperate. Nabis their good friend, was Lord of the Towne; styling himselfe King: but, more truely by all men called Tyrant. He had wel-neare loft all, by meanes of the ouerthrow which Philopamen had lately given him: fince, he durft not firre abroad; and dayly expected the mischiefe, that on all sides threatned him. Wherfore he fent mellengers, one after another, to the Etolians; requesting them, That as He had not been flow to stirre in their behalfe, but aduentured himselfe vpon the vtmost of danger, when all others were backward; so They would be pleased to 30 fend him what helpe they might, fince his bad fortune had caused him presently to need it. It hath been often fayd, That the rauenous Atolians were onely true to themselues, and regarded neither faith nor friendship otherwise than as it might conduce to their owne ends. And so dealt they now. For since Nabis his mercinarie forces, which vpheld his Tyrannic, were in a manner confumed: they thought it expedient for their Estate, to put him out of the way; and, by so doing, to affure Lacedamon vnto themselues. To this purpose, they sent thither Alexamenus, one whom they thought a man fit for fuch a worke. To him they gaue a thoufand Foot, and thirtie Horse, chosen for the purpose. These thirtie were by Damocritus the Prator brought into the Councell of the Apocleti, where they were comman- 40 ded to be no wifer than they should bee, nor to thinke that they were fent to make warre with the Acheans, or to doe ought elfe, fauc onely what Alexamenus should command them; which, were it never so desperate, and in seeming against all reafon; yet must they understand, that unlesse they performed it, they should have no good welcome home. So Alexamenus came to the Tyrant, whom hee encouraged with braue words: telling him that Antiochus was already in Europe, and would be anon in Greece, meaning to couer all the Land and Sea with his mighty Armies; and that the Romans were like to finde other manner of worke, than of late with Philip: fince the Elephants of this great King, without other helpe, would fuffice to tread them downe. As for the Atolians, Hee faid, that if need should so re- 50 quire, they would presently send away to Lacedamon all the forces that they could raife: But that they were very defirous at the prefent, to make as goodly a muster as they could before the great King; which caused them to send him thither afore with no greater companie. Hereupon he willed Nabis to take heart; bring forth his men, that had beene long pent vp in the Citie; and traine them without the wals: as if shortly he should employ them in worke of conquest, rather than defence. Nabis was glad of this: and daily exercised his men in the field; riding vp and downe with his Alexamenus, and no more than three or foure horse about him, from one point to another, to order and behold them. During this time of exercise, Alexamenus made it his fallion to step aside alone to his Atolians, and say somewhat as he thought fit : which done, he ftill returned agains to Nabis. But when he faw time for the great worke that he had in hand : Hee then went alide to his thirtie Horse-10 men, and bade them remember the taske enjoyned them at their fetting foorth; telling them that they were all in case of banished men, vnlesse they would anon come up to him, and helpe him to finish that which they should see him take in hand. Herewithall the Tyrant beganne to draw neere them: and Alexamenus making towards him, charged him on the fudden; and struck him downe. The thirtie Æsolians neuer flood to deliberate upon the matter; but all flew in; and, before' any fuccour could arrive, had made an end of this wretched Nabis. Prefently vpon the fact committed, the Tyranthis Mercinaries ranne unto the dead bodie: where in flead of feeking reuenge, they flood foolifhly gazing as beholders. Alexamenus with his Ætolians hafted into the Citie, and seized on the Palace: where hee fell 20 to ransacking the Treasure; and troubled himselfe with none other care, as though all were alreadic done. Such of his followers as were dispersed in the Towne, did also the like; with the greater indignation of the Citizens : who seeing themselues free by the death of the Tyrant, could not endure to see those that had flaine him, beginne to tyrannize anew. Wherefore all the Towne was shortly in Armes: and for lacke of another Captaine, they tooke a little Boy of the Royall flocke, that had beene brought vp with Nabis his children; whom they mounted vpon a Good Horse, and made him their chiefe. So they fell vpon the Atolians that were idely stragling about; and put them all to the sword. Alexamenus with not many of his Companie, were flaine in keeping the Citadell: and 30 those few that escaped thence into Arcadia, were taken by the Magistrates: who folde them all as bond-flaues, In this doubtfull Estate of things at Lacedamon, Philopamen came thither: who calling out the chiefe of the Citie, and speaking such wordes vnto them, as Alexamenus should have done after hee had flaine the Tyrant; casily perswaded them for their owne good and safetie, to incorporate themfelues with the Asheans. Thus by the enterprise, no lesse dishonourable than difficult, of the Atolians, and the small, but effectuall, travaile of Philoparnen; the Acheans made a notable purchase : and Lacedamon, that had hitherto bingouerned eyther by Kings, or by Tyrants that called themselues Kings, ANTIOCHUS, per/waded by THOAS the Etolian, comes ouer into Greece, ill attended. Sundric passages betweene him, the Etolians, Chalcidians and others. Hee winnes Chalcis, and thereby the whole Ile of Eubaa. The vanitie of the Kings Emballadors and the Etolians, with the Civil answere of TITVS to their discourse, before the Acheans. That it concerned the Greekes to have defired peace, betweene the Romans and ANTIOCHUS; as the best affurance of their owne libertie. Of many pettie Estates that fell to the King. Of AMINANDER; and an idle vanitie, by which 10 King PHILIP was loft. HANNIBAL gives good counsaile in vaine, Some Townes wonne in Thessale. The King retires to Chalcis; Where hee marrieth a young Wife, and reuels away the rest of Winter. Vpon the comming of the Roman Conful all for fake ANTIOCHUS. Hee with two thousand Atolians keepes the Streights of Thermopyla. Hee is beaten, and flies into Asia: leaving all in Greece vnto the Victors.

NTIOCHUS was troubled much in Asia with Smyrna and Lampsacus, that would not hearken to any Composition. He thought it neither fafe nor honourable, to leave them Enemies behind him; and to 20 winne them by force, was more than hitherto hee was able. Yet was hee desirous with all speed convenient to shew himselfe in Greece;

where he had bin told, that his presence would effect wonders. It was said. That in all the Countrie there was a very small number, which bore heartic affection vnto the Romans: That Nabis was alreadie up in Armes: That Philip was like a Bandog in a chaine, defiring nothing more than to breake loofe; and that the Esolians, without whom the Romans had done nothing, nor nothing could have done, were readie to conferre upon him the greatnesse, which they had unworthily bestowed vpon insolent Barbarians. Of all this the least part was true. Yet that which was true made fuch a noise, as added credit vnto all the rest. Whilest therefore the King 20 was thinking to fend Hannibal into Africk, there to moleft the Romans, and so give him the better leifure of vling his owne opportunities in Greece: Thoas the Ætolian came ouer to him, and bade him lay all other care afide; for that his Countreymen had alreadic taken Demetrias; a Towne of maine importance, that should give him entertaiment, whence hee might proceed as became the greatnesse of his vertue and fortune. This did serve to cut off all deliberation. As for Hannibal: Thoas was bold to tell the King, first, That it was not expedient for him to divide his forces at fuch a time, when the very reputation of his numbers, brought into Greece, might serve to lay open vnto him all places, without need of vsing violence : and fecondly, That in any fuch great enterprise there could not bee chosen a more vnfit 40 man to be employed in the Kings feruice, than was that famous Hannibal the Carthaginian. For he faid, That the King should as greatly scelethe losse of a Fleet or Armie, perilhing under such a notable Commaunder if his fortune were bad, as if the same had miscarried under one of meaner qualitie: whereas neuerthelesse if Hannibal prenailed; Hannibal alone should have all the honour, and not Antiochus. In this regard hee was of opinion, That such a renowned Warriour should bee alwayes neere vnto the Kings person, to give advice: which being followed as often as it was found commodious, the good fucceffe would wholly redound vnto the honour of him that had the fourraigne Command; even of the King himfelfe. Antiochus gladly hearkned vnto this admonition; being icalous of the vertue, that shi- 50 ned brighter than the Maiestie of his owne fortune. And thereupon hee laid aside the determination; which tended more to the advancement of his defires, than did any thing elfe by him then or after thought vpon.

Presently after this He made readie for Greece. Before his setting forth, in a friuo-lous pomp of ceremony, he went up from the Sea-lide to Ilium; there to do facrifice to Minerua of Troy. Thence passing ouer the Aegean Sea, Hee came to Demetrias. Euryloghus the Magnetian, the same whome the Atolians had lately waited on home, when by that precent they wanne Demetrias; was now the chiefe man and Ruler of his Nation. Heetherefore with his Countreymen, in great frequencie, came to doe their duties to the King Antiochus, and bid him welcome. The King was glad of this: and tooke it as a figne of good lucke, to bee fo entertained at the beginning. But it may bee suspected, that the Magnetians found not the like cause of joy. For whereas they had expected a Fleet and Armie formewhat like to that 10 of Xerxes: they faw three hundred thips, of which no more than fortie were feruice-able for the Warres; with an Armic of tenne thousand Foot, fine hundred Horse, and fixe Elephants. The Aetolians no fooner heard of his comming, than they called a Parliament; and made a Decree, whereby they inuited him into their Countrie. Heknew before that they would fo doe; and was therefore well onward on his way towards them, when they met him that brought the Decree. At his comming to Lamia, the Aetolians gave him as joyfull entertainment as they could deuise. Being brought into their Councell, He made an Oration: wherein hee defired them to hold him excused, that hee came not followed with a greater Armie. This was, he faid, in true estimation a signe of his good will : in that hee staid not to 20 make all things readie; but hasted vnto their aid, euen whilest the scason was vnfit for nauigation. Yet it should not be long, ere the hope of all those which had expecled him, would be fatisfied vnto the full. For it was his meaning to fill all Greece with Armies, and all the Sea-coast with his Fleets. Neyther would hee spare for any charge, trauaile, or danger, to follow the businesse which hee had vndertaken: even to drive the Romans and their authoritic out of Greece; leaving the Countrie free indeed, and the detolians therein the chiefe. Now as the Armies that werefollowing him, should be very great: so was it his meaning, that all provisions to them belonging should be correspondent; because hee would not beeany way burdenfome vnto his Confederates. But at the present he must needs entreat them, ha-20 uing thus hastily come ouer vnto their aide, vnprouided of many necessaries: that they would helpe him with Corne and other victuals, whereof he flood in need. So be left them to their consultation: the conclusion whereof was, after a little dispute, (for a vaine motion was made by some, that the differences betweene the Romans and them, should be put by Compromise to the decision of Antiochus ) That they would yeeld vnto the Kings desire, and ashit him with all their forces. Here we may obserue, how vaine a thing it is for an absolute Prince to engage himselfe, as did Antiechus, in a bulinesse of dangerous importance, vpon the promised assurance of a State that is meerely popular. For if the vehemencie of Tho 25, and some other of that Faction, had not prevailed in this Councell : the Actolians, for gaine of two 40 or three Townes, yea for hope of such gaine that might have deceived them; were like to have abandoned this King their friend, vnto the discretion of the Romans. And what remedie had there beene, if this had so fallen out? He could haue bemoaned himselfe to Thous, and complained of the wrong: but he must have been contented with this answere, That the fault was in those of the opposite side; whom Thors would therefore have pronounced to bee very wicked men. It happened much better for the present; though in the future it prooued much worse, both for him, and for the Aetolians. He was chosen Generall of all their forces: and thirtie Commissioners were appointed to bee about him, as a Councell of Warre for the Nation. These armed such as readily they could, whilest it was in dispute 50 where they should beginne the Warre. Chalcie was thought the meetest place to be first vndertaken: whither if they came suddenly, they should not peraduenture need to vse much force. The King had brought with him into Aetolia but a thoufand Foot; leaving the rest behind him at Demetrias. With these hee hasted away directly toward Chaleis; being ouertaken by no great number of the Aetolians, which accompanied him thither. At his comming, the Magistrates, and some of the chiefe Citizens, iffued forth to parle with him. There the Atolians beganne, as they had lately done before, to tell, how the Romans had onely in words and false semblance, set Greece at libertie. But such libertie, as might be true and vsefull, they faid would neuer be obtained; untill by remooning the necessitie of obeying their pleasure that were most mightie, euerie seuerall Estate had where to find redresse of any pressure. And to this end was the great Antiochus come thither; a King well able to counterpoife, yea to ouerweigh the Romans : who nevertheleffe defired them onely, to to joyne with him in League, as that if either the Romans or Hee should offer them wrong, they might keepe it in their power, to seeke redresse at 10 the other hands. The Chalcidians made hereto the same answere, which, to the like allegations, they had made not long before: That their freedome was not imaginarie, butablolute; for which they were to thanke the Romans; without whose good liking, they would enter into no new consederacie. That which they spake of themselues, they could likewise affirme of all the Greekes: forasmuch as none of them payed any Tribute; was kept under, by any Garrison; or lived otherwise than by their owne Lawes, and without being tied vnto condition which displeased them. Wherefore they wondred, why the King should thus trouble himselse, to deliver Cities that were alreadic free. But since hee, and the Atolians, requested their friendship: they befought both him, and the Atolians, to doe a 20 friendly Office, in departing from them quietly, and leaving them in such good case as they were. With this answere the King departed: for he was not, as then, strong enough to force them. But very soone after, hee brought thither a greater power; which terrified them, and made them yeeld: before all the succours could arrine, which Titus had fent for their defence.

The chiefe Citic of Eubera being thus gotten; all the rest of the Iland shortly yeelded to Antiochis. Foure or five hundred Roman Souldiers, that came over late so have defended Chalcis, reposed themselves at Delium, a little Towne of Baotia, lying ouer against the Iland; where was a Temple and Groue, consecrated vnto Apollo, that had the priviledge of an inviolable Sanctuarie. In this place were some 30 of them walking, and beholding the things there to be seene, whilest others were busied as they found cause: without feare of any danger; as being in such a place, and no warre hitherto proclaimed. But Menippus, one of Antiochus his Captaines, that had wearied himselfe in many vaine Treaties of peace; tooke advantage of their carelessenesse, and vsed them with all extremitic of werr. Very sew of them escaped: fiftie were taken ; and the rest slaine. Hereat Quintius was grieued: yet so, as it pleased him well to consider, that his Romans had now more just cause than before, to make warre vpon the King.

Antiochus liked well these beginnings, and sent Embassadours into all quarters of Greece; in hope, that his reputation should perswade very many to take his 40 part. The wifer fort returned fuch answere, as the Chalcidians had done. Some referued themselues vntill hee should come among them: knowing that cyther, if hee came not, Hee must holde them excused for not daring to stirre; or, if hee came, the Romans must pardon their just feare, in yeelding to the stronger. None of those that lay farre off, joyned with him in true meaning; fauc the Eleans, that alwayes favoured the Ltolians, and now feared the Atheans. Little reason there was, that hee should thinke to draw the Acheans to his partie. Neuerthelesse hee assayed them, vpon a vaine hope that the enuie, which Titue was faid to beare vnto Philopamens versue, had bred a fecret diflike betweene that Nation and the Romans. Wherefore both Hee and the Atolians fent 50 Embafadours to the Councell at Agium; that spared not braue wordes, if the Acheans would have so beene taken. The Kings Embassadour told of great Armies and Fleets that were comming: reckoning vp the Dahans, Medians, Elimeans and Cadulians; names that were not enery day heard of, and therefore as hee thought, the more terrible. Then told he them what notable men at Sea, the Sydonians, Tyrians, Aradians, and Pamphylians were; such indeed as could not be relisted. Now concerning monie and all warlike furniture: it was, he faid, well knowne, that the Kingdomes of Asia had alwayes thereof great plenty. So as they were much deceiued: who confidering the late warre made against Philip, did thinke that this with Antiochus would prooue the like: the case was too farre different. Yet this most powerfull King, that for the libertie of Greece was come from the vimost parts of the East; requested no more of the Acheans, than that they would hold themselves as neutrall, and quietly looke on, whileft He tooke order with the Romans. To the 10 same effect spake the Atolian Embassadour : and further added, That in the battell at Cyno/cephale, neither Titus had done the part of a Generall, nor the Romans of good Souldiers: but that both Hee and his Armie had beene there destroyed, had they not beene protected by vertue of the Ltolians, which carried the day. Titus was present at the Councell, and heard all this: to which he made as fit answere, as could haue beene defired. He told the Acheans, That neither the Kings Embassadour, nor the Etolian, did so greatly labour to perswade those vnto whom they addressed their Orations; as to vant themselves the one vnto the other. So as a man might well discerne, what good correspondence in vanitie it was, that had thus lincked the King and the Atolians together. For even such bragges as herethey made, be-20 fore the Achaens who knew them to beliers, had the Atolians also made vnto King Antiochus: proclayming the victorie ouer Philip to bee meerely their Act: and the whole Countrie of Greece to bee dependant on them. Interchangeably had they beene feafted by the King, with fuch tales as his Embassadour told even now; of Dahans, and Aradians, and Elimeans, and a many others: that were all but a companie of Syrians, fuch as were wont to be fold about for bondflaues, and good for littie elfe. These divers names of rascall people were, he said, like to the diversitie of Venison, wherewith a friend of his at Chaleis (no such vanter as were these Embasfadours) had fometime feasted him. For all that varietie, whereat hee wondred, was none other, as his Host then merrily tolde him; than so many pieces of one 30 tame fwine, dreft after fenerall falhions with varietie of fawces. Setting therefore afide this vanity of idle pomp : it were good to make judgement of the great King, by his present doings. He had, not with standing all this great noyse, no more than ten thousand men about him: for which little Armie he was faine in a manner, to begge victuailes of the Aetolians; and take vp monie at viurie, to defray his charges. And thus he ran vp and downe the Countrie: from Demetrics to Lamia; thence backe to Chaleis; and being there that out to Demetrias againe. These were the fruits of lies: wherewith fince both Antiochus and the Aetolians had each deluded other; meet it was that they should, as perhaps alreadic they did, repent, whilest wifer men tooke beed by their example. To a fauourable Auditorie much perswasion is needlesse.

40 The Acheans did not love fo well the Actolians, as to defire that they should become Princes of Greece: but rather wished to see them, of all other, made the veriest abjects. Wherefore they flood not to hearken after newes, what Antiochus did, how he sped in Eubea, or what other Cities were like to take his part: but readily proclaymed war against him, and against the Aetolians.

How the hatred betweene thefetwo Nations grew inveterate: fufficiently appeares in the storie foregoing. Now have they gotten each their Patrons; the one, the Romans; the other, King Antiochus. Herein did each of them vnwifely: though far the greater blame ought to be laid, on the turbulent (pirits of the Metolians. For when the Romans departed out of Greece, and left the Countrie at rest : there was no-50 thing more greatly to have been edefired, than that they might never finde occasion to returne with an Armie thither againe. And in this respect ought the Greekes to have fought, not how Smyrna and Lampfacus might recover their libertie ( which had neuer beene held a matter worth regarding, vntill now of late) but how the powers of the East and West, divided and kept asunder by their Countrie, as two

Seas by an Ishmus or necke of land, might be kept from overflowing the barre that parted them. Neither had the Romans any better pretence for their leeking to make free those base Asiatiques, which originally were Greekish; than the generall applause, wher with all the Nation entertained this their louing offer. Yet were Lysimachia, and the Townes in Thrace, lately gotten by Antiochus, pretended as a very great cause offeare, that should moue them to take armes even in their owne defence. But if all Greece would have made interceffion, and requested that things might continue as they were, promising iountly to affist the Romans, with their whole forces both by Land and Sea, when soeuer King Antiochus should make the least offer to flirre against them: then had not onely this quarrell beene at an end; but the Ro- 10 man Patronage ouer the Countrie, had been far from growing, as soone after it did. into a Lordly rule.

The Acheans were at this time, in a manner, the onely Nation of Greece, that freely and generously declared themselues altogether for the Romans, their friends and benefactours. All therest gaue doubtfull answeres of hope vnto both sides : or if some few, as did the Theffalians, were firme against Antiochus; yet helped they not one another in the quarrel, nor shewed themselves his enemies, till hee pressed them with open force. The Bastians willingly received him, as foone as hec entered vpon their borders, not so much for feare of his power, as in hatred of Titus and the Romans, by whom they had beene somewhat hardly vsed. Aminander the Athamanian, 20 besides his old friendship with the Ætolians, was caught with a bait; which it may be doubted, whether he did more foolishly swallow, or Antiochus cast out. He had married the daughter of an Arcadian, that was an idle-headed man, and vanted himselfeto be descended from Alexander the Great: naming his two sonnes, in that regard, Philip and Alexander. Philip, the elder of these brethren, accompanied his fifter to the poore Court of Athamania: where having made his follie knowne, by talking of his Pedigree; He was judged by Antiochus and the Etolians, a man fit for their turnes. They made him beleeue, that in regard of his high parentage, and the famous memorie of Alexander his forefather; it was their purpose, to doe their best for the conquest of Macedon to his behoofe: since no man had thereto so good title 20 as he. But for the enabling of them hereunto ; it behoued him to draw Aminander to their partie, that so they might the sooner have done with the Romans. Philip was highly pleafed herewith; and by perswasions of himselfe, or of his fifter, effe-Red as much as they defired. But the first piece of service done by this imaginarie King (whether it proceeded from his owne phrenzie, in hope to get love of the Macedonians that should be his subjects; or whether from some vanitie in King Antiochus that employed him ) wrought more harme to his friends, than he and Aminander were able to doe good. There were two thousand men committed to his leading: with which he marched vnto Cynoscephale, there to gather vp the bones of the flaughtered Macedonians; whom their King had fuffered all this while to lie vnburi- 40 ed. The Macedons troubled not themselves to thinke on this charitable act, as if it were to them any benefit at all: but King Philip tooke it in high indignation; as intended meerely vnto his despight. Wherefore he presently sent vnto the Romans; and gaue them to understand, that hee was readie with all his power to aid them wherein focuer they should be pleased to vie him.

The Etolians, Magnetians, Eubwans, Bwotians, and Athamanians, having now all iouned with him; Antiochus tooke counsaile of them about the prosecution of the warrein hand. The chiefe question was, Whether it were meet for him to inuade Thessalie, that would not hearken to his perswalions; or whether to let all alone vntill the Spring: because it was now mid-winter. Some thought one thing, 50 and some another: confirming each his owne sentence, with the weightiest reasons which he could alleadge; as in a matter of great importance. Hannibal was at this meeting; who had long beene cast aside, as a vessell of no vie; but was now required to deliuer his opinion. He freely told the King, That what he should now vtter, was even the same which hee would have spoken, had his counsaile at any time before been asked fince their comming into Greece. For the Magnetians, Baotians, and other their good friends, which now to willingly tooke their parts: what were they elfe than so many poore Estates, that, wanting force of their owne, did adioyne themselves for feare vnto him, that was strongest at the present; and would afterwards, when they faw it expedient, be as readie to fall to the contrary fide, alleadging the same scare for their exense? wherefore hee thought most behoovefull, to win King Philip of Macedon vnto their partie: who (belides that being once engaged, he should not afterwards have power to recoyle and for fake them at his plea-

10 fure ) was a mighty Prince, and one that had meanes to sustaine the Roman Warre with his proper forces. Now that Philip might be easily perswaded to joyne with them; the benefit likely to redound vnto himfelfe, by their focietie, was a very firing Argument: though indeed what neede was there, of prooning by inference the likelihood of this hope? For, faid Hee, Thele & tolians bere present; and namely, this T no A s, being lately Embassador from them into Asia, among other Motives which he then veed to excite the King unto this Expedition, infisted mainly on the same point. He told us that PHILIP was moved beyond all patience, with the Lordly in colence of the Romans: likening that King to some wild beaft, that was chained or lockt up within some grate, and would faine breake loofe. If this be for let vs breake his chaine, and pull downe the grate, 20 that he may regaine his libertie, and fatisfie his angry stomacke, upon those that are common Enemies to vs and him. But if it prooue otherwife, and that his feare be greater than bis indignation : then shall it behove vs to looke unto him, that hee may not seeke to please his good masters the Romans, by offending vs. Your some SELEVCVS is now at Lysimachia, with part of your Armie: if Pulle will not hearken to your Embassage; let SELEVCVS be in readines, to fall upon Macedon, and finde him worke to defend his owne on the other fide, without putting us here to trouble. Thus much concerning PHILIP; and the present War in Greece. But more generally for the mannaging of this great enterprise, wherein you are you then ginen eare, the Romans by this time should have heard other newes, than that Chal-30 cis in Eubaawas become ours. Italie and Gaule foodld have beene on fire with warre; and, little to their comfort, they (hould have under stood, that HANNIBAL was againe come into Italie. Neither doe I fee what should hinder vseuen now from taking the same course. Send for all your Fleete and Armie hither (but in any case let Shippes of burden come along with them, leaden with store of victuals: For as the case now stands, we have here too few hands, and too many mouthes.) Whereof let the one halfe be employed against Italie; whilest you in person with the other halfe tarrying on this side the Ionian Sea, may both take order for the affaires of Greece, and therewithall make countenance, as if you were even readie to follow us into Italie: yea, and be ready to follow us indeed, if it shall be requisite. This is my aduice: who though perhaps I am not very skilfullin all forts of warre: yet how to warre with 40 the Romans . I have been instructed by long experience, both to their coft and mine owne. Of

this counfaile which I give. I promise you my faithfull and diligent service for the execution; but what counfaile focuer you shall please to follow, I wish it may bec prosperous. Many were pleased with the great spirit of the man, and said hee had spoken brauely : but of all this was nothing done; faue onely that one was lent into Alia, to make all things ready there. In the meane while they went in hand with Theffalie, about which they had before disputed. There when they had won one Towne by force, many other places, doubting their owne firength, were glad to make submission. But Lariffs, that was chiefe of the Countrey, flood out: not regarding any terrible threats of the King that lay before the wals with his whole Armie. This their faith

50 and courage was rewarded by good fortune. For M. Babiu, a Roman Proprætor did send helpe thither. Likewise Philip of Macedon professed himselfe Enemie vnto Antiochus : where by the fame of the succour comming to Larissa grew fuch, as wrought more than the succour could have done, had it arrived. For Antiochus perceiuing many fires on the Mountaines toppes afarre off; thought that Mmmmm

a great Armie of Romans and Macedonians had beene comming upon him. Therefore excusing himselfe by the time of the yeere; Hee brake vp his siege, and marched away to Chalcis. At Chalcis he fell in loue with a yong Maiden, daughter vnto a Citizen of the Towne: whom, without regard of the much disproportion that was betweene them, both in yeeres and fortune, He shortly married; and so spent the Winter following, as delightfully as he could, without thinking vpon the war in hand. His great men and Captaines followed his example; and the fouldiors as readily imitated their Captaines: in such wise that when he tooke the field, he might euidently perceiue in what loofe manner of discipline his Armie had passed the Winter, But M. Acilius Glabrio, the Roman Conful, shall meet him very shortly, 10 and helpe him to reclaime them from this loofenesse of nuptiall Reuels; by setting them to harder exercise.

M. Acilius was chosen Conful with P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica. The warre against Antiochus fell to him by lot; whereas otherwise He was no way so honourable, as Nasica his Colleague: vnto whom fell a charge, of farre lesse credit and importance. Nasica, besides the great Nobilitie of his Familie, had beene long since, in time of the Punicke Warre, crowned with the title of The best man in Rome: when the Senate, for very feare and superstition, durst not have so pronounced him, had they not so thought him; as being commanded by Oracle, That none other man than the verie best, should entertaine an old stone, which the Diuell then taught 20 them to call The Mother of the gods. But no prærogative of Birth, Vertue, or good Opinion, gaue such aduantage to the better man, as to make choice of his owne Province; or arrogate more vnto himfelfe, than his lot should affoord him. This unpartiall distribution of employments, helped well to maintaine peace and concord. P. Scipio therefore was appointed to make warre against the Boijans: wherein he purchased the honour of a Triumph, nothing so glorious as was that of his Colleague; though purchased with harder service, requiring the more abilitie in matter of warre. But M. Acilius went ouer into Greece, with ten thousand Foot, two thoufand Horse, and fifteene Elephants. Ptolemie King of Agypt, notwithstanding his late Alliance with King Antiochus : and Philip King of Micedon ; had lately fent Em- 30 baffadours to Rome, making offer to come each of them in person with all his sorces înto Ætolia, there to affift the Conful in this warre. Ptolemie fent also gold and filuer, toward the defraying of charges; as one that meant none other than good carnest. But hee was too yong, and dwelt too farre off. So his monie was returned vnto him with thankes; and his louing offer as louingly refused. Vnto Philips Embaffadors answere was made, that this his friendly offer was gratefully accepted: and that the Senate and People of Rome would thinke themselves beholding to him, for the affiltance that Hee should give to Acilius the Consul. Mafanissa likewise, and the Carthaginians, did strive, which of them should be most forward in gratifying the Romans. Each of them promifed a great quantitie of graine; which they 40 would fend partly to Rome, partly to the Armie in Greece, And herein Masanissa farre out-went the poore Citie of Carthage: as also, in that he offered to lend the Conful fiue hundred Horse, and twentie Elephants. On the other side, the Carthaginians undertooke to fet out a Fleet at their owne charges : and to bring in at one payment all the Tribute-monie, which was behinde, and ought to bee discharged by many yeerely pensions. But the Romans did neither thinke it good, to let them arme a Fleet:nor would let them redeeme themselves out of Tribute, by paying all at once. As for the Corne; it was accepted with Condition, That they should be contented to receive the price of it.

The hastic and ridiculous iffue of this war, that began with such noyse and prc- 50 parations, were hardly credible: were not the difference exceeding great, betweene the Roman and the Asiatick souldior. Antiochus had gotten this Spring a few townes of Acarnania, after the same manner as hee had prevailed in other parts of Greece; partly by faire words, and treason of the Rulers; partly by terrour, that was like to proue their excuse, when they should again for sake him. But King Philip and Bebius, having recovered many places; and the Roman Conful being arrived, against whom none made relistance; He was glad to withdraw himfelfe. Aminander fled out of his Athamania: which the Macedonian tooke and enjoyed; as in recompence of his good service to the Romans. Philip, the brother of Aminanders wife, was taken by the Conful; made a mocking flocke; and fent away prifoner to Rome, The The [falians vied much more diligence in returning to their old friends, than they had done in yeelding to the King. All their Cities, one after other, gaue vp themselues: the Garrisons of Antischus, compounding onely for their owne lines, to and departing vnarmed: yet fo, that a thousand of them stayed behind, and tooke pay of the Romans. This did wonderfully perplex Antiochus: who having withdrawne himselfe to Chaleis, and hearing how things went, cried out you his friends: and faid, That they had betrayed him. He had taken a great deale of toile during one halfe of a Winter, and spent the other halfe in such Nuptials, as were little to his honour: after which, in time of need, He found all the promifes of the Atolians meerely verball; and himselfe reduced into termes of great extremitie. Hee therefore admired Hannibal as a wife man, year a very Prophet, that had forefeene all this long before. Nevertheleffe He fent word to the Atolians, that they should now make readie all their forces : as confidering their owne need to bee no leffe than 20 his. But the £tolians had cause to thinke, that they themselues were shamefully disappointed by Antiochus: who having promised to doe great wonders, was in all this while seconded by no greater numbers out of Asia, than so many as would fill up the same ten thousand which he first brought ouer. Yet came there some of them, though fewer than at any time before, which joyned with him. Hereat the King was angrie : and could get no better fatisfaction, than that Thom and his fellowes had done their best, in vaine, to have made all the Nation take armes. Since therefore neither his owne men came ouer to him out of Asia, nor his friends of mopyle: as meaning to defend them against the Romans, vntill more helpe should 30 come. Of the Streights of Thermopylathere hath beene spoken enough * before, *1.3.6.6.3 upon many occasions: and then chiefly, when they were defended by Leonidas against the huge Armie of Xerxes. Wherefore it may easily be conceived, how the Romans, that landed about Apollonia, and so came onwards into Theffalie, were vnable to paffe that Ledge of Mountaines, dividing the one halfe of Greece: vnleffe they could win this difficult entrance. But there was great difference betweene Leonidas and Antiochus. The former of these, with an handfull of men, defended this pasfage two or three dayes together, against a World of men comming to inuade the Countrey. The latter, having taken vpon him to doe great miracles, and effect what he lifted himselfe in Greece: did commit himselfe vnto the safetie of this place. 40 when he was charged by not many more than he had in his owne Armie. There whileft he lay. Hee fent earnest messages one after other to the Atolians, entreat-

Greece would appeare in this time of danger : He feized vpon the Streights of Ther-

ing them not to forfake him thus: but at least wife now to helpe, and keepe the tops of the Mountaines, left the Romans finding any by-path, should come downeyon him. By this importunitie, he got of them two thousand, that vndertooke to make good the few passages: by which onely, and not without extreme difficultie, it was possible for the Enemie to ascend. The Roman Conful in like fort, prepared to force the Streights: without staying to expect King Philip: that was hindered by fickeneffe from accompanying him. He had with him M. Porcius Cato, and L. Valerius Flaccus, that had both of them beene Confuls. These he sent forth by night 50 with two thousand men, to trie whether by any meanes they could get vp to the Ætolians. He himselfe encouraged his Armic: not onely by telling them, with what base-conditioned enemies they had to deale : but what rich Kingdomes Antiochus held, that should bountifully reward them if they were victors. This was on the day before the battaile. All that night Cato had a fore journey ( for what Mmmmmm 2 happened vnto L. Valerius it is vncertaine, faue onely that hee failed in his intent) and to much the worfe, for that he had no skilfull guide. Seeing therefore his men exceedingly tired, with climbing vp Heepie Rocks and crooked wayes: Hee commanded them to repose themselves; whilest Hee, being a verie able man of bodie, tooke in hand the discouerie, accompanied with no more than one of like mettle to himselfe. After a great deale of trouble, He found at length a path: which he tooke to be, as indeed it was, the best way leading vnto the Enemies. So thither he brought his men; and held on the same path till toward breake of day. It was a place not haunted, because in time of peace there was a faire way through the Streights below, that required no fuch trouble of climbing : neyther had this en- 10 trance of the Thermopyla beene fo often the Seat of Warre, as might cause any trauailers to learch out the passages of those desolate Mountaines. Wherefore the way that Cato followed, though it were the best: yet did it lead him to a bogge at the end, which would fuffer him to paffe no further. So he staid there vntill day-light: by which he discouered both the Campe of the Greekes vnderneath him; and some of the Etolians verie neere vnto him, that were keeping watch. He therefore fent foorth a luftie Crue of his men, whom he thought fitteft for that service; and willed them by any meanes to get him fome prisoners. This was effected: and he thereby understood, that these Atolians were no more than fixe hundred; as also that King Antiochus lay beneath in the Valley. So he presently set vpon the Ltolians; ouer- 20 threw them; flue a great part of them; and chaced the rest, that by flying to their Campe, guided him vnto it. The fight was alreadic begun between the Armies below: and the Romans, that had easily repelled the Kings men, and driven them into their Campe, found it in a manner a desperate piece of worke to assault the Campe it felfe; which occupied the whole bredth of the Streights; was notably fortified; and not onely defended by Antiochus his long Pikes, which were best at that kinde of service; but by Archers and Slingers that were placed over them on the Hil-side, and powred downe a showre of weapons on their heads. But Cato his approch determined the matter. It was thought at first, that the Ltolians had beene comming to helpe the Kings men: but when the Roman armes and enfignes were dif- 20 couered, fuch was the terrour, that none made offer of relifiance; but all of them for looke the Campe, and fled. The flaughter was not great: for that the badneffe of the way did hinder the Roman Armie from making pursuit. Yet this dayes loffe draue Antiochus out of Greece, who directly fled to Chalcis; and from thence with the first opportunitie, got him backe into Asia.

All the Cities that had embraced the friendship of Antiochus, prepared forthwith to entertaine the Romans, and entreat for pardon: fetting open their gates; and prefenting themselves vato the Consultin manner of suppliants. Briefly, in few dayes all was recoursed that Antiochus had gained : the Etolians onely standing out, because they knew not what else to doe. Neither did the Consulgiue them any respite. 40. At his returne from Chalcis He met with King Philip, that having recovered health, came to joyne with him against Antiochus; ouer whom since the victorie was already gotten, Hee did gratulate vnto the Romans their good successe; and offered to take part with them in the Atolian Warre. So it was agreed, That the Conful should beliege Heraclea; and Philip, Lamia; at the fame time. Each of them plied his worke hard; especially Philip, who faine would have taken Lamia before the Conful should come to helpe him. But it could not be. For his Macedonians that vied to worke by Myne. were ouermuch hindered by the stonie ground. Yet was Lamia even ready to be taken, when the Conful, having wonne Heraeles, came thither; and told Philip, that the spoile of these Townes was a reward vnto those that had fought at Thermopyle. 50 Herewith Philip must be contented; and therefore went his way quietly. But Acilius, that could so ill endure to see Philip in likelihood of thrining by the Romans victorie, got not Lamia himselfe: vntill such time as another Consul was readie to ease him of his charge.

Theloffe of Heraclea did so affright the Ltolians, that they thought no way safor than to desire peace. Yet had they fent vnto King Antiochus presently after his flight: entreating him not to for fake them vtterly, but eyther to returne with all those forces which he had purposed to bring into Greece; or if any thing with-held him from comming in person, at leastwife to helpe them with money and other aid. They prayed him to confider, that this did not onely concerne him in honour; but appertained vnto his owne fafetic: fince it would be much to his hurt, if the € tolians being wholly subdued, the Romans, without any Enemies at their backes, might fet vpon him in Asia. He considered well of this; and found their words true. Therefore He deliuered vnto Nicander, one of their Embassadors, a summe of money, that might ferue to defray the charges of the Warre: promifing that ere long he would fend them strong aid, both by Land and Sca. Thous, another of their Embaffadors,. He retained with him: who willingly flayed, that he might virge the King to make his word good. But when Heraclea was taken from them: then did the Etolians lay alide all hope of amending their fortune by the helpe of Antiochus; and made fuit vnto the Conful to obtaine peace, vpon any reasonable Condition. The Conful would scarce vouch safe to give them audience, but said Hee had other businesse in hand; onely He granted them tenne dayes of Truce, and sent L. Valerise Flaces with them to Hypata; willing them to make him acquainted with as 20 much, as they would have delivered vnto himselfe. At their comming to Hypata; they began, as men fauouring their owne cause, to alleadge how well they had deferued of the Romans. Whereto Flacous would not hearken. He told them plainly, That the memorie of all fuch good Offices past, was quite obliterated by the malice which they had shewed of late. Wherefore hee willed them to acknowledge their fault, and to entreat pardon. Better they thought to doe fo even betimes, than to flay till they were reduced into termes of more extremity. Hereupon they agreed to commit themselves vnto the faith of the Romans; and to that effect sent Embassadours to the Consul. This phrase of committing voto the faith; signified, in their vie of it, littleelie, than the acknowledgement of a fault done, and the cra-20 uing of pardon. But the Romans vied those words in another sense; and counted them all one, as * reelding to diferetion. Wherefore when the Conful heard them * Legal. except. speake in this manner: Hee asked them whether their meaning were agreeable to ¿Palya.13. their words. They answered that it was: and shewed him the Decree of their Nation, lately made to this purpole. Then fayde Hee, I command you first of all, That none of yee prefume to goe into Asia, vpon any businesse private or publike: then, That yee deliuer vp vnto me Dicearchus the Atolian, Menestratus the Epirot, Aminander the Athamanian, and fuch of his Countrimen as have followed him in revolting from vs. Whilest hee was yet speaking: Phameas the Embassadour interrupted him; and prayed him not to mistake the Custome of the Greekes, who 40 had yeelded themselves unto bu faith; not unto flauerie. what? (saide the Consul) Doe yee frand to pleade Custome with mee, being now at my discretion? Bring bither a chaine. With that, chaines were brought; and an iron collar by his appointment fitted vnto everic one of their neckes. This did so affright them, that they stood dumbe and knew not what to fay. But Valerius and some others entreated the Conful, not to deale thus hardly with them, fince they came as Embassadours; though fince, their Condition was altered. Phameas also spake for himselfe; and said, That neither He nor yet the Apocletior ordinarie Councel of the Nation, were able to fulfill these iniunctions; without approbation of the generall Assembly. For which cause Hee entreated yet further ten dayes respite; and had granted vnto him Truce

This furcefance of warre, during tenne and other tenne dayes together, began presently after the taking of Heraclea; when Philip had been commaunded away from Lamia, that else he might have wonne. Now because of the indignitie herein offered vnto that King, and to the end that hee might not returne home with his Mmmmmm 3

Armie, like one that could not be trusted in employment: especially the Romans being like hereafter to haue further need of him, in the continuance of this Warre: He was defired to fet vpon the Athamanians, and some other pettie Nations their borderers, whilest the Consul was busic with the Atolians; taking for his reward, all that He could get. And Hee got in that space all athamanta, Perrhebia, Aperantia, and Dolopia. For the Atolians, hearing what had befalle their Embassadors, were so enraged, That although they were very ill provided for Warre; yet they could not endure to heare more talke of peace. And it happened, that Nicander about the same time was come backe from Antiochus, with money and hopefull promises: the Romans abiding still about Heraclea; and Philip having lately risen 10 from before Lamia, yet not being far gone the ace. His monie Nicander conneighed into Lamia, by verie vnufuall dexteritie. But hee himselfe being to passe further to the Affembly of the Etolians, there to make report of his Emballage; was veric much perplexed about this his journie, which lay betweene the Roman and Macedonian Campes. Yet hee made the aduenture : and keeping as farre as hee could from the Roman fide , fell upon a Station of Macedonians , by whom hee was taken, and led vnto their King. He expected no good; but cyther to bee deliuered vnto the Romans, or vsed ill enough by Philip. But it seemes, that the King bad not hitherto concocted well the indignitie, of his being sent away from Lamia. For Hee commanded his fernants to entreat Wicander friendly; and hee himselfe being then 20 at supper, did visit him as soone as heerose vp : giving him to vnderstand; That the Ætolians did now reape the fruits of their owne madnesse; foras much as they could neuer hold themselves contented, but would needs bee calling strangers into Greece. They had pleased themselues well, in their acquaintance first with the Romans, and then with King Antiochus: but himfelfe, being their neighbour, they could neuer well endure. It was now therefore, He faid, high time for them to have regard vnto his friendship, whereof hitherto they had neuer made any triall: for surely their good affection, one vnto the other, would bee much more analicable vnto each of them; than their mutuall catching of advantages; whereby they had wrought themselves much displeasure. Thus much the King willed Nicander to signific vn- 30 to his Countrimen; and privately to hold in minde the courtefie which hee then did him, in fending him fafe home. So giving him a Convoy to gard him to Hypata; Heclouingly dismissed him. For this benefit, Nicander was alwayes after dutifully affected to the Crowne of Macedon: so as in the warre of Perseus hee made himselse suspected vnto the Romans and therefore was had away to Rome, where he

When the Conful understood, that the Ætolians refused to make their submisfion, in fuch wife as he required it: hee foorthwith meant to profecute the warreagainst them, without any longer forbearance. They were preparing to make head against him at Naupactus: whither hee therefore directly marched, to trie what 40 they could or durst. The fiege of Naupactus was of greater length, than the Romans had preconceived it: for it was a strong Citic, and well manned. But Acilius stood vpon point of honour; wherein he thought that hee should have beene a loser, by rifing from before it without Victoric. So He staid there welneere all the following time of his Confulfhip; whileft the Macedonian King and the Acheans made farre better vsc of the Roman Victoric. Philip, as is said before, being allowed to take in fuch places as had revolted vnto Antiochis, and were not hitherto reclaimed, wan the strong Citie of Demetrics; and with an hastic course of Victorie, subdued the Athamanians and others. The Acheans called to accompt the Eleans and Messenians: which had long beene addicted to the Atolian fide; and followed it, in taking part 50 with Antiochus. The Eleans gaue good wordes; whereby they faued themselves from trouble awhile. The Meffenians being more flout, before they were inuaded; had none other helpe when the Achasn Prætor wasted their Countrie, than to offer themselues vnto the Romans. Titus was then at Corinth: to whom they sent word, That at his Commandement their gates should be opened; but that vnto the Acheans it was not their meaning to yeeld. A message from Titus to the Achean Prætor, did suffice to call home the Armie, and finish the Warre: as also the peremptorie Commaund of the same Titus caused the Messenians to annex themselves vnto the Acheans, and become part of their Common-weale. Such was now the Majestie of a Roman Embassador. Titus did fauour the Acheans; yet could not like it well, that eyther they or any other should take too much vpon them. He thought it enough, that they had their libertie, and were strong enough to defend it against anie of their neighbours. That they should make themselves great Lords, and able to dispute with the Romans upon euen termes; it was no part of his desire. They had lately bought the lie of Zacynthus which had once beene Philips, and was afterward ginen by him to Aminander who lent a Gouernour thither. But when Aminander in this present Warre, was driven out of his owne Kingdome by Philip: then did the Gouernour of Zacynthus offer to fell the Iland to the Acheans; whom hee found readie Chapmen. Titus liked not of this: but plainely told them, That the Romans would be their owne Caruers, and take what they thought good, of the Lands belonging to their Enemies; as a reward of the victorie which they had obtained. It was bootleffe to dispute. Wherefore the Acheans referred themselues vnto his discretion. So he told them, that their Common-wealth was like a Tor-20 toile, whereof Peloponne fus was the shell : and that holding themselves within that compasse, they were out of danger; but if they would needes bee looking abroad, they should lie open to blowes, which might greatly hurt them. Haning settled things thus in Peloponne fus, Hee went ouer to Naupactus: where Glabrio the Conful had laine two moneths, that might have beene farre better spent. There, whether out of compassion which Hee had upon the Etolians, or out of dislike of King Philips thriuing fo fast: Hee perswaded the Conful to grant vnto the besieged, and to the whole Nation, folong Truce, that they might fend Embassadours to Rome; and submitting themselucs, craue pardon of the Senate. Most like it is, that Naupactus was in great danger : else would not the Atolians have made such earnest suit as they did 30 vnto Titus, for procuring of this fauour. But if Glabrio had beene fure to carrie it, in any short space : it may well bee thought hee would not have gone away without it; fince the winning of that Towne, wherein was then the whole floure of the Nation, would have made the promifed submission much more humble and sincere. When they came to Rome, no entreatie could helpe them to better Conditions, than one of these two. That either they should wholly permit themselves to the good pleasure of the Senate; Or else pay a thousand Talents, and make neither Peace nor Warre with any, further than as the Romans should give approbation. They had not so much monie: neither could they well hope to be gently dealt withall, if they should give themselves away unto discretion; which what it signified, they now vnder-40 stood. Wherefore they defired to haue it set downe, in what points, and how farre foorth, they should yeeld vnto the good pleasure of the Senate. But heereof they could get no certaine answere: so that they were dismissed as enemies, after long and vaine attendance.

Whileft the Etolians were pursuing their hopes of peace, the Consul had little to doe in Greece; and therefore tooke vpon him gravely to fet things in order among the tractable Acheans. Hee would have had them to restore the banished Lacedamonians home into their Countrie; and to take the Eleans into the fellowshippe of their Common-wealth. This the Acheans liked well enough : but they did not like it, that the Romans should bee meddling in all occurrences. Wherefore they de-50 ferred the restitution of the banished Lacedamonians : intending to make it an Act of their owne meere grace. As for the Eleans: they were loth to bee beholding to the Romans, and thereby to disparage the Acheans: into whose Corporation they were desirous to bee admitted; and saw that they should have their desire, without fuch compultiue mediation. The

The Roman Admirall C. Liuius, much about the same time, fought a battaile at Sca with Polyxenidas, Admirall to the King Antiochus. King Eumenes brought helpe to the Romans, though it was not great: and fine and twentie faile of Rhodians came after the battaile, when they were following the Chace. The Kings Fleet was the better of faile; but that of the Romans the better manned. Wherefore Polyxenjdes being vanquished in fight, was yet out of danger; as soone as he betooke himselse to a speedie retrait.

And fuch end had the first yeeres warre, between King Antiochus and the Romans. After this, as many of the Greekes as had followed the vaine hopes of the Atolians, were glad to excuse themselves by feare; thinking themselves happie when to by Embassadours they had obtained pardon. On the contrarie side, Philip of Macedon, Arch-enemic of late vnto the Romans, did now fend to gratulate this their Victorie: and, in recompence of his good affection, had restored vnto him Demetrius his yonger sonne; whom some few yeeres they had kept as an hostage. Also King Ptolemie of Egypt, gratulating the Roman Victorie, fent word how greatly all Asia and Syria were thereby terrified. In which regard Hee desired the Senate not to foreflow time; but to fend an Armie, as soone as might be, into Asa: promising, that his affiltance, wherein focuer it pleafed them to vieit, should not bee wanting, This Ptolemie was the fonne-in-law of King Antiochus; but hee was the friend of Fortune. He understood long before, as did all that were indifferent beholders of 20 the Contention, that the Romans were like to hauethe vpper hand. The fame did Antischus now beginne to suspect, who had thought himselfe awhile as safe at Ephefus, as if hee had beene in another World: but was told by Hannibal, That it was not sofarre out of Greece into Asia, as out of Italie into Greece; and that there was no doubt but the Romans would soone be there, and make him trie the chance of a battaile for his Kingdome.

was chosen Conful at Rome with C. Lelius. Lelius was verie gracious in the Senate: and therefore being defirous (as generally all Confuls were) of the more honourable employment; offered to referre to the arbitrement of the Senate; if L. Cornelius would be sopleased, the disposition of their Provinces; without putting it to the hazard of a Lotterie. Lucius having talked with his brother Publius, approved well of the motion. Such a question had not of long time beene put vnto the Fathers: who therefore were the more desirous, to make an vnblameable Decree. But the matter being otherwise 50 fomewhat indifferent; P. Scipio the African faid openly thus much, That if the Senate would appoint his brother to the warre against Antiochine, He himselfe would follow his brother in that warre, as his Lieutenant. These words were heard with fuch approbation, that the controuersic was foorth with at an end. For if Antiochus relyed vpon Hannibal, and should happen to be directed wholly by that great Captaine: what better man could they oppose, than Scipio; that had beene victorious against the same Great Worthie? But indeed a worser man might have served well enough the turne. For Hannibal had no absolute Command, nor scarce any trust of great importance; excepting now and then in confultation; where his wildome was much approved, but his libertie and high spirit as much disliked. It is worthic of remembrance; as a figne of the freedome that he yield in his centures, even whilest heliued in fuch a Court. Antiochis mustered his Armie in presence of this famous Captaine: thinking, as may sceme, to have made him wish, that hee had beene serto ued by fuch braue men in Italie. For they were gallantly decked, both Men, Hor-

fes, and Elephants, with fuch coffly furniture of Gold, Silver, and Purple; as glittered with a terrible brauerie on a Sun-flaine day. Whereupon the King, well pleafing himfelfe with that goodly spectacle, asked Hannibal what he thought; and whether all this were not enough for the Romans. Enough (faid Hannibal) were the Romans the most couetous men in all the World: meaning, that all this Cost upon the backes of Cowardly Afiatiques, was no better than a spoile to animate good Souldiers. How little this answere pleased the King ; it is easie to ghesse. The little vse that he made of this Carthaginian, tellifies that his diflike of the man, caused him to lose the vicof his feruice, when he stood in greatest necessitie thereof.

The Scipio's made all haite away from Rome as fooneas they could. They carried with them, befides other Souldiers newly prest to the warre, about fine thousand Voluntaries, that had ferued under P. Africanus. There was also a Fleet of thirtie Quinquereme Gallies, and twentie Triremes newly built, appointed vnto L. Amylius Regillus, that was chosen Admirall the same yeere for that Voyage. At their comming into Greece, they found the old Conful Glibrio belieging amphyssa Citie of the . Atolians. The Atolians after that they were denied peace, had expected him once againe at Naupactus. Wherefore they not onely fortified that Towne: but kept all the passages thereto leading; which heedlessely, as in a time of confusion, they had left vngarded the last yeere. Glabrio knowing this, deceined their expectation,

30 and fell upon Lamiz: which being not long fince much weakned by Philip, and now by him attempted on the fudden; was carried at the fecond affault. Thence went Hee to Amphy (fa: which he had almost gotten; when L. Scipio, his successor, came with thirteene thousand Foot and fine hundred Horse, and tooke charge of the Armie. The Towne of Amphy fla was prefently for faken by the inhabitants, but they had a Castle, or higher Towne, that was impregnable; whereinto they all retired. The Athenian Embaffadors had dealt with P. Scipio, in behalfe of the Atolians: entreating him to fland their friend, and helpe them in obtaining fome tolerable Condition of peace. He gave them gentle words: and willed them to perswade the Actolians, that they should faithfully and with true meaning desire it. This was gladly

40 taken. But many messages passing to and fro though Publius continued to put them ingood hope; yet the Conful made ftill the same answere, with which they had beene chaced from Rome. The conclusion was, That they should sue for a longer time of respite from warre: whereby at more leisure they might attend some better disposition of the Senate; or any helpefull commoditie which time should affoord. So they obtained halfe a yeeres Truce: after which, the Winter was like to affoord them another halfe yeeres leifure of breathing. Hereof were not they more glad, than was P. Scipio: who thought all time loft, which with held the Warre from paffing ouer into Alia.

The businesse of Ætolia being thus laide aside: and the olde Consul Glabrio sent 50 home into Italie: the Scipio's marched into Theffalie; intending thence to take their way by Land, through Macedon and Thrace vnto the Hellespont. Yetthey considred. That hereby they must commit themselves vnto the loyaltic of King Philip: who might either doe them some mischiefe by the way, if hee were disposed to watch a notableaduantage: or at the least, would he be vnfaithfull, though he were not so couragious; yet might he take such order with the Thracians, that even for want of victuales, it by no greater inconvenience, they should be digracefully forced to returne. He had promised them the vtmost of his furtherance: wherein, whether he meant sincerely, they thought to make some triall; by causting a Gentleman to ride Post with only and observe his doings as hee should take him on the sudden. The King was merries at feast, and drinking, when the Messenger came: whom he louingly bade welcome; and shewed him the next day, not only what promision of victuales he had made for the Armie, but how he had made bridges over the rivers, and mended the bad wayes by which they were to passe. With the good newes Graechus returned backe in haste vito the Scipios: who entring into Macedon, 10 found all things in a readines, that might helpe to advance their iourney. The King entertayned them royally; and brought them on their way, even to the Hellespan: where they stayed a good while, vntill their Navie was in readiness to transport

Much was done at Sea in the beginning of this yeere; though, for the most part, little of importance. Polyxenidas, the Admirall of Antiochus, was a banished Rhodian: true to the King; and desirous of reuenge vpon his Countreymen that had expelled him. Hee, hearing that the Rhodian Fleet was at Samos, the Romans and Eumenes having not as yet put to Sea; thought to doc somewhat vpon those that were fo early in their diligence, before their followes should arrive to helpe them. Yet 20 went he craftily to worke; and lent word, as in great secrecie, to the Rhodian Admirall, That if the sentence of his banishment might be repealed, He would, in requitall thereof, betray all the Kings Fleet. After many passages to and fro, this was beleeued: and the Rhodian Admiral grew fo careleffe, expecting ftill when he should receive a watchword from Polyxenidas, that be himselfe was taken by Polyxenidas in his owne Hauen. The Kings Fleet fetting foorth from Ephelus by night; and, for feare of being discouered, resting one day in harbour by the way; came the second night to Samos: where, by morning, it was readie to enter the Hauen. Paufifratus the Rhodian Admirall seeing this, shought it his best way of relistance, to bestow his men on the two head-lands or points of the Hauen; fo to gard the mouth of it: 30 for that he faw no likelihood of defending himselfe by Sea. But Polyxenidas had alreadic landed some companies, in another part of the Iland: which falling upon the backe of Paulistratus, compelled him to alter his directions, and command his men aboord. This could not be without great confusion: so as the enemies tooke him out of all order; and funke or boorded all his Nauie, fine excepted, that by a sudden deuice made shift to escape. Each of them hung out a burning Cresset vpon two poles, at the Beake-head : and then rowed forwards directly upon the Enemie : who hauing not bethought himselse what shift to make against such vnexpected danger of firing, was content to giue way vnto these desperate Gallies, for feare lest they should burne, together with themselues, a part of the Kings 40

Not long after this, the Romans had some losse by tempest: whereof Polyxenidas could not take such aduantage as hee had hoped; because, putting to Sea sor that purpose, Hee was driven backe againe by the like soule weather. But the Rhodians, to shew that they were not discouraged, set forth twentie other Gallies: the Romans also with King Eumens repaired their Fleet; and all of them together, in great brauerie, presented battaile to Polyxenidas before the Hauen of Ephelus. When hee durft not accept it: they went from place to place, attempting many things, as cytherthey were entreated by the Rhodians, or perswaded by some appearing hopes of doing good. Yet performed they little or nothing: for that one while they were so hindred by stormes at Sea; and another while by strong resistance, made against them at Land.

Eumenes with his Fleet was compelled to for lake them; and returne home to the defence of his owne Kingdome. For Antiochus wasted all the grounds about Elea and Pergamus: and leauing his sonne Seleneus to besiege the royall Citic of Pergamus, did with the rest of his Armie spoile the whole Countrey thereabout. Attauss, the brother of King Eumenes, was then in Pergamus; hauing with him no better men to defend the Citie, than were they that lay against it. Wherefore hee had reason to stand in feare; being too much interiour in number. There came to his aid at house and Foot, and an hundred Horse of the Achaens: old souldiors all, and trayned vp wader Philoperums, whose Scholler, in the Art of war, Diephanes their Commander was. This Diephanes, beholding from the walles of Pergamus, which was an high Towne, the demeanour of the Enemie; began to disd une, that such men as they so should hold him besteged. For Seleneus his Armie which was encamped at the hill-

o Inould hold him belieged. For Selection his Armic which was entengled at the finite foot, feeing that none duriffallie foot protein by non them, grew fo carefulfie as obliewife, than by fooyling all behind their backes, they feemed to forget that they were in an Enemies Countrie. Diophanes therefore spake with Attalus: and told him that hee would goe foorth to visit them. Attalus had no liking to this aduenture, for he said, that the match was nothing equal. But the Athan would needes have his will: and issuing forth, encamped not sarre from the Enemie. They of Pergamus thought kim little better than mad. As for the besiegers, they wondred at first what his meaning was: but when they saw that he held himselfe quiet, they made a set of his boldnesse; and laughed to see with what an handfull of men he looked so stout-

20 ly. So they returned vnto their former negligence and diforders. Which Disphans perceiuing, Hee commanded all his men to follow him, euen as faft as they well might; and he himfelfe, with the hundred Horfe, brake out on the fudden vpon the Station that was next at hand. Verie few of the enemies had their Horfes readie faddled, but more few, or none, had the hearts to make refiftance; so as He draue them all out of their Campe; and chaced them as farre as he might fafely adventure, with great flaughter of them, and no losse of his owne. Hereat all the Citizens of Pergamus (who had couered the wals of the Towne, men and women, to beholde this spectacle) were very joyfull; and highly magnified the vertuce of these Acheans. Yet would they not therefore issue that of their gates, to helpe the Acheans.

30 ans in doing what remained to bee done. The next day Seleucus encamped halfe a mile further from the Towne, than hee had done before: and againft him went foorth Diophunes the fecond time; who quietly refled awhile in his old Station. When they had staid many houres, looking who should begin: Seleucus, in faire order as he came, withdrew himselfe toward his lodging that was surther off. Diophunes moudon or while the Enemie was in fight: but as soone as the ground betweene them hindred the prospect, he followed them in all halse, & soone ouertaking them with his Horse, charged them in Rere; so as hee brake them, and with all his force pursued them at the heeles, to their very Trenches. This boldness of the Selbaurs, and the basenesse of the Selbaurs to quit the siege, little to his honour.

40 Such being the qualitie of these Assistances, Philopaenen had cause to tell the Romans, That hecenuicd their victorie. For when Antichus lay fealling at Chalcis after his matriage, and his souldiors betook themselves to Riot, as it had beene in a time of great security: a good man of war might hauc cut all their throates, euen as they were tipling in their victualing boules, which Philopaenen said that he would haue done, had He beene Generall of the Abanns, and not, as he then was, a private man.

Antiochus was full of busines: and turning his care from one thing to another, with a great deale of trausile, brought almost nothing to passe. He had beene are Pergamus; into which Eumens; leaving the Romans, did put himselfe with a few of his Horse and light armature. Before Pergamus he left his sonne as before hath

50 beene shewed, and went to Elea: whither hee heard that *Emylius the Roman Admirall was come, to bring succour to Eumens. There hee made an Ouerture of peace: about which to consult, Eumens was sent for by *Emylius, and came from Pergamus. But when it was considered, that no conclusion could be made without the Consul; this Treatic brake off. Then followed the Ouerthrow newly mentioned; which caused Seleucus to give over the siege of Pergamus. Afterwards, source or fine Townes of scarce any worth or note were taken by the King : and the Syrian Fleet, being of seuen and thirtie Saile, was beaten by the Rhodian which was of like number. But of this victorie the Rhodians had no great cause to rejoyce: for that Hannibal the Carthaginian, who, together with Apollonius a Courtier of Antiochin, was Admirall of the Syrians, did them in manner as great hurt as they could doe to Apollonius; and having the victoric taken out of his hand by Apollonius his flight, yet made such a retrait, that the Rhodians durst not farre adventure vpon him. Now of these Actions which were but as Præfaces unto the war; the last and greatest was a victorie of the Romans by Sca, against Polyxenidas the Kings Admirall. The bat- 10 taile was fought by Myonnefus a Promontorie in Asa: where Polyxenidas had with him fourescore and nine Gallies; and fine of them greater, than any of the Romans. This being all the strength which he could make by Sea: we may note the vanity of those bragges, wherewith Antiochus vanted the last yeere, That his Armada should couerall the shores of Greece. The Romans had eight and fiftie Gallies; the Rhodians, two and twentie: the Roman being the stronger built, and more stoutly manned; the Rhodian more light simberd and thin planckt, having all advantage of speed, and good Sea-men. Neither forget they to helpe themselues by the same device; with which, fine of their Gallies had lately escaped from Samos. For with fire in their prowes they ran vpon the Enemie: who declining them for feare, laid open his fide: 20 and was thereby in greater danger of being stemmed. After no long fight, the Kings Nauic hoy fted faile: and having a faire wind, bore away toward Ephessus fast as they could. Yet fortie of their Gallies they left behind them : whereof thirteene were taken : all the rest burnt or sunke. The Romans and their fellowes lost only two or three ships: but got hereby the absolute Masterie of the Sea.

The report of this miladuenture, may seeme to have taken from Antiochus all vse of reason. For as if no hope had beene remayning, to defend those places that hee held in Europe: Hee presently with-drew his Garrisons from Lysimachia: which might easily haue been kept, even till the end of Winter following, and have reduced the beliegers (if the liege had beene continued obstinately) to termes of great extre- 30 mitie. He also gaue over the siege of Colophon: and laying aside all thought saue onely of desence, drew together all his Armie; and sent for helpe to his father-in-law.

King Ariarathes the Cappadocian. Thus the Roman Conful, without impediment, not onely came to the Hellefpont; but had yeelded vnto him all places there, belonging to Antiochus on Europe fide. The Fleet was then also in readinesse, to transport him over into Asia: where Eumenes had taken such care before, that Hee landed quietly at his owne good case; euen as if the Countrie had beene his alreadie. The first newes that hee heard of the Enemie, was by an Embassadour that came to sue for peace. This Embassadour declared in his Masters name, That the same things which had hindered him 40 from obtayning peace of the Romans heretofore, did now perswade him, that hee should easily come to good agreement with them. For in all disputations heretofore, Smyrna, Lampfacus, and Lysimachia, had beene the places about which they varied. Seeing therefore the King had now alreadie giuen ouer Lysimachia; and was further purposed, not to strine with the Romansabout Lampfacus and Smyrna; what reason was there, why they should neede to trouble him with warre? If it was their desire, that any other Townes upon the Coast of Asia, not mentioned by them in any former Treaties, should be also set at libertie, or otherwise delivered into their handes: the King would not refuse to gratifie them therein. Briefly, let them take some part of Asia: so as the bounds, dividing them from the King, might not bee 50 vncertaine; and it should bee quietly put into their handes. If all this were not enough: the King would likewise beare halfe the Charges, whereat they had beene in this warre. So praying the Romans to hold themselves contented with these good offers, and not to bee too infolent vpon confidence of their fortune; Hee expected their answere. These offers which to the Embassadour seemed so great, were judged by the Romans to be verie little. For they thought it reasonable, that the King thould beare all the charges of the warre, tince it began through his onely fault: and that He should not onely depart out of those few Townes, which hee held in £olis and Ionia; but quite out of Asia the leffe, and keepe himselfe on the other side of Mount Taures. When the Embaffadour therefore law, that no better bargaine could bee made, He dealt with P. Scipto in private; and to him he promised a great quantitie of gold, together with the free restitution of his sonne; who (it is vncertaine by what mischance) was taken prisoner, and most honourably entertained by to the King. Scipto would not hearken to the offer of gold: nor otherwise to the reflitution of his fonne, than vpon Condition. That it might be with making fuch amends for the benefit, as became a private man. As for the publike businesse: Hee onely faid thus much, That fince Antiochus had alreadic forlaken Lysimachia, and fuffered the warre to take hold on his owne Kingdome; there was now none other way for him, than either to fight, or yeeld to that which was required at his hands. Wherefore, faid He, tell your King in my name, that I would adulfe him to refuse no Condition whereby he may have peace.

The King was not any whit moved with this advice. For feeing that the Conful demanded of him no leffe, than if hee had been alreadie subdued : little reason 20 there was that he should feare to come to battaile; wherein hee could lofe, as hee thought, no more, than by feeking to avoid it he mutigive away. He had with him threefcore and ten thousand Foot, and twelve thousand Horse; besides two and fiftie Indian Elephants, and many Chariotsarmed with hookes or fythes, according to the manner of the Easterne Countries. Yet was hee nothing pleafed, to heare that the Conful drew neere him apace, as one hastning to fight. But howfocuer hee was affected; Hee made so little shew of feare, that hearing P. Scipio to lie ficke at Elea, He fent thither vnto him his fonne without ranfome : as one both defirous to comfort this noble Warriour in his fickenes, and withall not defirous to retaine the yong Gentleman for a pledge of his owne safetie. Thus ought his boun-

30 tie to bee constant. Otherwise it might be suspected, That herein he dealt craftily. For fince he could have none other ranfome of Scipio, than fuch as an honourable man, that had no great flore of wealth, might pay: better it was to doe fuch a courtefie before the battell, as would afterwards have beene little worth; than to flay untill the Romans, perhaps victorious, should exact it at his hands, P. Scipio was greatly comforted with the recourrie of his fonne; fo as the joy thereof was thought to have beene much availeable vnto his health. In recompence of the Kings humanitie, He said onely thus much vnto those that brought him this acceptable Present, I am now able to make your King none other amends, than by adulfing him not to fight, vntill hee shall heare that I am in the Campe. What he meant by this, it is hard to conic-40 cture. Antiochus resolued to follow his counsaile: and therefore withdrew himselfe from about Thyatira, beyond the River of Phrygius or Hyllus, vnto Magnelia by Sipylus: where encamping, He fortified himfelfe as strongly as hee could. Thither followed him L. Scipio the Conful; and fate downe within foure miles of him.

About a thousand of the Kings Horse, most of them Gallo-Greekes, came to bid the Romans welcome: of whomat first they slue some; and were anon, with some losse driven backe over the River. Two dayes were quietly spent, whilest neither the King nor the Romans would passe the water. The third day the Romans made the adventure: wherein they found no diffurbance; nor were at all opposed, untill they came within two miles and an halfe of Antiochus his Campe. There, as they were 50 taking up their lodging, they were charged by three thousand Horse and Foote:

whom the ordinarie Corps du gard repelled. Foure dayes together after this, each of them brought foorth their Armies; and fet them in order before the Trenches. without aduancing any further. The fift day the Romans came halfe way forward, and presented battaile; which the King would not accept. Thereupon the Con-

ful tooke aduice what was to bee done. For either they must fight vpon what soe uer disadvantage, or else risolue to abide by it all Winter, farre from any Countrey of their friends, and therefore subicet vnto many difficulties: vuelfe they would staine their honour by returning farre backe, to winter in a more connenion place; and so deferre the warre vntill the next Spring. The Roman souldier was throughly perswaded of that Enemies base temper. Wherefor: it was the generall Crie, that this great Armie should bee assailed, even in the Campe where it lay: as if rather there were so many beafts to be slaughtered, than men to bee sought with. Yet a day or two passed, it is while P. Sepie came not. Wherefore the King, being to loth to disflear ten his men, by seeming to shad in feare of the Enemie, refolued to put the matter to triall. So when the Romans tooke the field againe, and ordered their Battailes: Fleaslig did the like; and advanced so farre, that they might understand his meaning to sight.

The Roman Armic confifted of four Legions, two Roman and two Latine: in each of which were flue thousand and foure hundred men. The Latines, as viually, were in the points; the Romans, in the maine battell. All of them, according to their wonted forme, were divided into Maniples. The Hastati had the leading : afterthem followed the Principes, at fuch distance as was vivall; and last of all, the Triary. Now belide thele, there were about three thouland Auxiliaries; partly 20 Acheam; and partly such as belonged to Eumenes: which were placed in an equal Front beyond the Latines in the right wing. Vtmost of all (faue some fine hundred Cretians, and of the Trallians) were almost three thousand Horse: of which, Eumenes had brought thither eight hundred; the rest being Roman. The left wing was fenced by the banke of the river: yet foure Troups of horse were placed there, though fuch helpe feemed in a manner needleffe. Two thousand Voluntaries, Macedonians and Thracians, were left to guard the Campe. The Conful had with him fixeteene African Elephants, which he bestowed in his Rere: forasmuch as had they come to fight with those of Antiochus, they onely would have served to discourage hismen; as being fure to be beaten: the Indian being farre the greater, and more 20 couragious beafts: whereof Antiochus had likewife much aduantage in number.

The Kings Armie being compounded of many Nations, diverfly appointed, and not all accustomed to one manner of fight, was ordered according to the seucrall kindes, in such wise as each might be of most vse. The maine strength of his Foote confisted in fixtcene thousand, armed all Macedonian-like, and called Phalangiers. These Heeplaced in the middest and divided into tenne Battalions; energy one hauing two and thirtie in File, and fiftie in Front. Betweene cuery Battalion were two Elephants, goodly beafts, and such as being adorned with Frontals, high Crefts, Towres on their backes, and belides him that gouerned the Elephant, foure men in cuery Tower, made a gallant and terrible shew. On the right hand of these 40 were fifteene hundred Horse of the Gallo-Greekes: then, three thousand Barbd Horse: and Regiment of almost a thousand Horse, called the Agema, that were all Medians, the choice of the Countrie, and accompanied by some others. All which Troupes of Horfe, divided in their feuerall kindes, doe feeme to have followed one another in depth, rather than to have been firetched out in Front. Adiovning to these, were sixteene Elephants together in one flocke. A little further to the right hand, was the Kings owne Regiment; called the Argyraspides, or Silvershields, by a name borrowed from their furniture, but nothing like so valiant as those of the fame name, that had ferued vnder Great Alexander: then, twelve bundred Archers on horsebacke, three thousand light-armed Foote, two thousand and fine 50 hundred Archers of Mysia; with foure thousand slingers and Archers of the Cirteans, and Elymeans. On the left hand of the Phalangiers, were placed the like numbers of Gallo-Greekes, and Barbd Horse: as also two thousand Horse that were fent from Ariarathes, with two thousand and seven hundred of divers

Nations; and a Regiment of a thousand Horse more lightly armed, that were called the Kings Troupe, being Sprium; Phrygiam; and Lydiam. In Front of all these Horse were the Chariotsarmed with Hooks or Sythes, and the Dromedaries, where on sate Arabiams with long Rapiers, that would serve reach from those high Camels. Beyond these were, as in the right wing, a rabble of many Nations, Cariams, Ciliciams, Pamphyliams, Pitsiams, Cyrtexins, Edymaris, and many others, having allo with them sixteene Elephants. Antiochus himselfe commanded in the right wing: Selenas in the lest; and three of his principall Captaines commanded over the Phalangiers.

The first onset was given by the Dromedaries, and armed Chariots: of which the one, being like to terrific the Horse; the other, to breake the Squadrons of the Foot; Emmens with a few light-armed Cretians, Archers, Darters, and Slingers, easily made frustrate the danger threatned by them both. For with showings, and noyses, and some wounds, they were driven out of the field; and running backe wyon their owne men, did the same harme which they had intended to the Enemies. Wherefore the Roman Horse following this advantage, charged vpon the left wing: where they found no resistance; some being out of order; others being without courage. It is shamefull to rehearfe, and of strange, that it may hardly seeme credible: that the Phalargiers, with such varietie of Austriaries, made little or 20 norefifance; but all of them fled, in manner, as foone as they were charged. Onely the King, Antiochus himfelfe, being in the left wing of his owne battaile: and feeing the Latines, that flood opposite vnto him, weakly flancked with Horse: gaue vpon them couragiously, and forced them to retire. But LM. Annium, that had the Guard of the Roman Campe, issued them to retire. But LM. Annium, that had the Guard of the Roman Campe, issued them the renew the fight. Succour also came from the right wing, where the Roman were alreadie victorious: whereof when Antiochus discourred the approch; He not onely turned his Horse about, but ranne away vpon the spur without surther tarriance. The Campe was defended a little while: and with no great valour; though by a great multitude that were fled 20 into it. Antiochus is faid to haue lost in this battaile fiftie, thousand Foot, and source

30 miori. Caminom istant of mate for minis battane integritolining root, and foure thougand Horfe; befides those that were taken. Of the Romans, there were not flaine about three hundred Foot, and foure and twentie Horse: of Eumenes his followers flue and twentie.

Antiochus fled to Sardes, and from thence to Apamea, the fame night; hearing that Seleucus was gone thither before. He left the custodie of Sardes, and the Castle there, to one whom he thought faithfull. But the Townsfmen and Souldiors were fo difmayed with the greatnesse of the Ouerthrow; that one mans faith was worth nothing. All the Townes in those parts, without expecting summons, yeelded vp themselues by Embassadors: whom they sent to the Romans, whilest they were on 40 the way. Neither were many dayes spent, ere Antiochus his Embassadour was in the Campe: having none other errand, than to know what it would please the Romans to impose vpon the King his Master. P. Scipio was now come to his brother, who obtained leaue to make the answere, because it should be gentle. They required no more than they had lately done: which was, That hee should quite abandon his Dominions on this fide of Taurus. For their charges in that warre they required fifteene thousand Talents: fine bundred in hand; two thousand and five hundred, when the Senate and People of Rome should have confirmed the peace; and the other twelue thouland, in twelue yeeres next enfuing by euen portions. Likewise they demanded foure hundred Talents for Eumenes; and some flore

50 of Corne, that was due to him vpon a reckoning. Now befides twentie hoftages which they required, very carneft they were to haue Hamibal the Carthaginian, and Those the Etolian, with some others who had sirred vp the King to this warre, delinered into their hands. Butany wise man might so easily haue perceived, that it would be their purpose to make this one of their principall demannds, as no great art was needfull to beguile their malice. The Kings Embassadour had full commiffion to refuse nothing that should be enjoyned. Wherefore there was no more to doe, than to fend immediatly to Rome for the ratification of the Peace. There were new Confulschosen in the meane while at Rome, M. Fuluius, and En. Manlius Pollo. The Etolians desired peace, but could not obtaine it: because they would accept neither of the two Conditions to them before propounded. So it was decreed. That one of the Confuls should make Warre vpon the Atolians. the other, vpon Antiochus in Asia. Now though shortly there came newes, that Antiochus was alreadie vanquished in battaile, and had submitted himselfe vnto all that could be required at his hands : yet fince the State of Asia was not like to bee 10 fo throughly fettled by one Victorie, but that many things might fall out worthic of the Romans care; Cn. Manlius, to whom Alia fell by lot, had not his Province

Soone after this came the Embassadours of King Antiochus to Rome, accompanied with the Rhodians and some others: yea by King Eumenes in person; whose presence added a goodly suffre to the businesse in hand. Concerning the peace to be made with King Antiochus, there was no disputation : it was generally appropued. All the trouble was, about the distribution of the purchase. King Eumenes reckoned up his owne deferts: and comparing himselfe with Masanissa, hoped that the Romans would bee more bountifull to him than they had beene to the Numidian, 20 fince they had found him a King indeed, whereas Masanissa was onely such in title; and fince both he and his father had alwayes beene their friends, even in the worst of the Roman fortune. Yet was there much adoc to make him tell what he would haue: He still referring himselse to their courtesse; and they desiring him to speake plaine. At length he craued that they would bestow upon him, as much of the Countrie by them taken from Antiochus, as they had no purpose to keepe in their owne hands. Neither thought hee it needfull, that they should trouble themfelues with the care of giuing libertic to many of the Greeke Townes, that were on Asia side. For since the most of those Townes had beene partakers with the King in his Warre; it was no reason that they should be gainers by his ouerthrow. The 30 Rhodians did not like of this. They defired the Senate to be truly Patrons of the Grecian liberty; and to call to minde, that no fmall part of Greece it felfe had beene fubicat voto Philip, and ferued him in his Warre: which was not alleadged against them as a cause why they should not be made free, after that Philip was overcome. But the maine point whereon they infifted, was this, That the Victory of the Romans against King Antiochus was so great, as easily might satisfie the desires of all their friends. The Senate was glad to heare of this; and very bountifully gaue away fo much, that euery one had cause to be well pleased.

Such end had the Warre against King Antiochus: after which, L. Cornelius Scipio, returning home, had granted vnto him the honour of a Triumph: the pompe 40 whereof exceeded in riches, not onely that of Titus Quintius Flaminius, but of any ten that Rome had beheld untill that day. Now for a fruch as the furname of The African had been given vnto P. Scipio, it was thought convenient by fome, to reward L. Scipio with the title of The Afiatick : which the fortune of his Victorie had no lesse deserved; though the vertue, requisite to the purchase thereof, was no way correspondent.

CHAP.5. S.9.

Arc. Fulvivs and Cn. Manlius had the same charge divided betweene them, which L. Cornelius Scipio, now Hyled Asiaticus, had latey vndergone. It was found more than one mans worke, to looke at gone to Greece and to Afia. And for this reason was it apparent, that

L. Scipio had graunted to long a Truce to the Etolians. But fince, in this long Interim of Truce, that haughtie little Nation had not fought to humble it selfe to the Roman Maiestie, it was now to bee brought vnto more lowlie termes than any other of the Greekes. The best was, that so great a storme fell not vnexpected vponthe Atolians. They had foreseene the danger, when their Em-20 baffadours were etterly denied peace at Rome: and they had provided the last remedie; which was, to entreat the Rhodians and Athenians to become interceffours for them. Neither were they so deiected, with any terrible apprehensions, that they could not well deuife, euen vpon helping themselves, by repurchase of Countries loft, where they fpied advantage. Poore Kin Aminander lived in exile among them, whilest Philip of Macedon kept. for him, possession of his Lands and Castles. But the Athamanians (besides that manic of them bore a naturall affection to their owne Prince) having beene long accustomed to serve a Mountaine Lord, that conversed with them after an homelic manner; could not endure the proud and infolent manner of commaund, vfed by 30 the Captaines of Philip his Garrisons. They sent therefore some few of them to their King, and offered their feruice toward his restitution. At the first there were onely foure of them; neither grewthey, at length, to more than two and fiftie, which undertooke the worke. Yet affurance, that all the reft would follow, made Aminander willing to trie his fortune. He was at the borders with a thousand Etolians, vpon the day appointed: at what time his two and fiftie aduenturers having divided themselves into foure parts, occupied, by the readic affiliance of the multitude, foure the chiefe Townes in the Countrie, to his vie. The fame of this good fucceffe at first; with letters running from place to place, whereby men were exhorted to doe their best in helping forward the Action, made the Lieutenants of 40 Philip vnable to thinke vpon relittance. One of them held the Towne of Theium a few dayes; giving thereby fome leifure vnto his King to provide for the refcue, But when he had done his best, he was forced thence; and could onely tell Philip, whom he met on the way, that all was loft. Philip had brought from home fix thousand men; of whom, when the greater part could not hold out, in such a running march. he left all faue two thou and behind him, & so came to Athenaum, a little Athamanian Castle, that still was his, as being on the frontier of Macedon. Thence he fent Zeno. who had kept Theium awhile, to take place lying ouer Argithea, that was chiefe of the Countrie. Zeno did as he was appointed: yet neither he, nor the King had the boldnesse to descend upon Argithes; or that they might perceive the Athamanians, 50 all along the hill fides, readie to come downe vpon them, when they should be bufie. Wherefore nothing was thought more honourable than a fafe retreat: specially when Aminander came in fight with his thousand Atolians. The Macedonians were called back, from-wards Argithea, and prefently withdrawne by their King towards his owne borders. But they were not suffered to depart in quiet at their pleasure.

The Athamanians and Ætolians way-layd them, and purited them so closely, that their retreat was in manner of a plaine slight, with great lose of men and armes; sew ofthose cfeaping, that were lest behind, as to make a countenance of holding somewhat in the Country, wrill Philip his returne.

The £tolians, having found the businesses of Athamania so easie, made attempt, in their owne behalfe, you the Amphilochians and Aperantians. These had belonged vito their Nation, and were lately taken by Philips, from whom they diligently renosted, and became £tolian againe. The Dolopians lay next; that had been euer belonging to the Macedonian, and so did still purpose to continue. These tooke arms as this the toone layed them aways seeing their neighbours readie to sight to with them in the £tolian quarrell, and seeing their owne King so hastily gone, as if hee meant not to returne.

Of these victories the iou was the lesse; for that newes came of Antiochus his last overthrow, and of M. Fuluius the new Conful his hasting with an armie into Greece. Aminander sent his excuses to Rome, praying the Senate, not to take it in despight, that he had recoursed his owne from Philip with such helpe as hee could get. Neither seemes it that the Romans were much offended to heare of Philip his loffes: for of this fault they neither were sharpe correctors, nor carnel reprouers. Fuluius went in hand with the businesse, about which he came, and layed siege to Ambracia, a goodly Citic, that had beene the chiefe feate of Pyrrhus his Kingdome. 20 With this hee began; for that it was of too great importance to bee abandoned by the Atolians: yet could not by them bee relieued, vnlesse they would aduenture to fight vpon equall ground. To helpe the Ambracians, it was not in the Ætolians power: for they were, at the same time, vexed by the Illyrians at sea, and ready to be driven from their new conquest, by Perfew the sonne of Philip, who invaded the Countries of the Amphilachians and Dolopians. They were vnable to deale with fo many at once; and therefore as earneftly fought peace with the Romans, as they floutly made head against the rest. In the meane while the Athenian and Rhodian Embassadors came; who befought the Consul to grant them peace. It helped well that Ambracia made strong resistance, and would not be terrified, by any vio- 20 lence of the affaylants, or danger that might seeme to threaten. The Consul had no desire to spend halfe his time about one Citie, and so be driven to leave vnto his fucceffor the honour of finishing the warre. Wherefore he gladly hearkened vnto the Ætolians, and bade them fecke peace with faithfull intent, without thinking it ouer-deare, at a reasonable price; considering with how great a part of his Kingdome their friend Antiochus had made the same purchase. He also gave leave to Aminander, offering his service as a mediatour, to put himselfe into Ambracia, and tric what good his perswasions might doc with the Citizens. So, after many demaunds and excuses, the conclusion was such, as was grieuous to the weaker, but not vnfufferable. The same Embassadours of the Athenians and Rhodians accom- 40 panied those of the Atolians to Rome, for procuring the confirmation of Peace. Their eloquence and credit was the more needfull in this intercession, for that Philip had made very grieuous complaint about the losse of those Countries, which they had lately taken from him. Hercof the Senate could not but take notice; though it hindered not the peace, which those good Mediatours of Rhodes and Athens did earnestly sollicite. The Atolians were bound to vphold the maiestic of the people of Rome, and to observe divers Articles, which made them lesse free, and more obnoxious to the Romans, than any people of Greece; they having been the first that called these their Masters into the Countrie. The Ile of Cephalenia was taken from them by the Romans: who kept it for themselues (as not long since 50 they had gotten Zacynthus from the Acheans, by stiffely pressing their owneright) that so they might have possession along the coast of Greece, whilest they seemed to for beare the Countrey. But concerning those places, whereto Philip, or others, might lay claime, there was fet downe an Order fo perplexed, as would necessarily require to haue the Romans Indges of the controuerfies, when they should arife, And hereof good vie will be shortly made: when want of employment elswhere, shall cause a more Lordly Inquisition to be held, when the affaires of Macedon and Greece.

of the Historie of the World,

Cn. Manlius, the other Confull, had at the fame time warre in Isla, with the Gallo-Greekes and others. His Armic was the fame that had followed L. Scipio; of whose victorie, his acts were the confummation. Hee visited those Countries on the hither side of Taurus, that had scarce heard of the Romans; to whom they were abandoned by Antiochus. Among these there were some pettic Lords, or Tyrants,

10 fome free Cities, and some that were together at warres, without regard of the great alteration hapned in Asia. From euery of these hee got somewhat; and by their quarrels found occasion to visit those Provinces, into which hee should else haue wanted an errand. He was euen loaden with bootie, when, having fetche a compassion of the countrie; though of latertimes, it was rather the same and terrour of their forepassed acts, than any present vertue of theirs, which held them vp in reputation. Of the Romans they had lately such triall, when they serued vacer King Antichus, as made them to know themselves farre the worfe men. Wherefore they thought it no small part of their safetie, that they dwelt vpon

20 the River Halys, in an Inland Countrie, where those enemies were not like to fearch them out. But when such bopes failed; and when some Princes of their owne Nation, that had beene friends of Eumenes, exhorted the rest to yeeld; then was no counsaile thought sogood, as to for sake their houses and Countrie, and, with all that they could carrie or drive, to betake themselues wnto the high mountaines of Olympu and Margans. The semontaines were exceeding hard of ascent, though none should undertake the custodie. Being therefore well manned and vidualed for a long time; as also the natural strength being helpt, by such fortification as promised greatest affurance; it was thought, that the Conful would either forbeare the attempt of forcing them, or easily be repelled; and that finally,

30 when he had staied there awhile, winter, and much want, should force him to difforce. Yet all this availed not. For whereas the Gallogreekes had beene careless of furnishing themselves with claims weapons, as if the stones would have served well enough to that purpose: the Romans, who came farre otherwise appointed, found greater advantage in the difference of armes, than impediment in disadvantage of ground. Archers and Slingers did cassly prevaile against casters of sones; especially being such as were these Gallogreekes, neither exercised in that manner of fight, nor having prepared their stones before hand, but catching vp what lay next, the too great, and the too little, oftner than those of a fit size. Finally, the Barbarians, wanting defensive armes, could not hold out against the arrowers and weapons of the Roman light armature; but were driven from a piece of ground, which they had vndertaken to make good, vp into their Campe on the top of the mountaine; and being forced out of their Campe, had none other way left, than to cast themselues headlong downe the steepe rockes. Few of the men escaped aliue: all their wives, children, and goods became a prey vnto the Romans. In the very like manner, were the rest of that Nation outercome soone after, at the other mountaine: onely more of them saued themselues by slight, as having sairer way at their backes.

These waters being ended: Falinius and Manlius were appointed, by the Senate,

Their warres being ended: Familia and Animin Weter appointer, by the Schmidt had been creating in the fecond yeere, did little or nothing. Manling gave peace to those whom hee had vanquished; as likewise to Arivathes the Cappadocina, and some others, not by him vanquished, but submitting themselves for feare of the Roman armes. Hee drew from them all, what profit he could: and laide vpon them such conditions, as hee thought expedient. He also did finish the league of peace with Antiochu; whereso

he swore, and received the Kings oath by Embassadours, whom hee sent for that purpole. Finally having set in order the matters of Asia, he tooke his way toward the Hellespont, loaden with spoile, as carrying with him (besides other treasures) all that the Gallogreekes had in fo many yeares extorted, from the wealthie Prouinces that lay round about them. Neither did this Armie of Manlius returne home, rich in money alone, or cattell, or things of needfull vie, which the Roman fouldier had beene wont to take as the only good purchase; but furnished with sumptuous houlhold-stuffe, and slaues of price, excellent Cookes, and Musicians for banquets, and, in a word, with the feedes of that luxurie, which finally ouer-grew and choked the Roman vertue.

The Countrie of Thrace lay betweene Hellespont and the Kingdome of Macedon, which way Manlius was to take his journey homeward. L. Scipio had found no impediment among the Thracians: either for that he paffed through them, without any fuch bootie as might prouoke them; or perhaps rather, because Philip of Macedon had taken order, that the Barbarians should not stirre. But when Manlins came along with an huge traine of baggage; the Thracians could not fo well containe themselues. Neither was it thought, that Philip tooke it otherwise than verie pleasantly, to haue this Roman Armie robbed, and well beaten on the way. He had cause to be angry; seeing how little himselse was regarded, and what great rewards were given to Eumenes. For he vnderstood, and afterwards gave the Romans 20 to understand, that Eumenes could not have abidden in his owne Kingdome, if the People of Rome had not made warre in Alia: whereas contrariwise, Antiochus had offered vnto himselfe three thousand talents, and fiftie ships of warre, to take part with him and the Ætolians; promiling moreover to reftore vnto him all the Greeke Cities, that had beene taken from him by the Romans. Such being the difference betweene him and Eumenes, when the warre began: he thought it no euen dealing of the Romans, after their victorie, to give away not onely the halfe of Asia, but Chersonness and Lysimachia in Europe, to Eumenes; whereas vpon himselfe they beflowed not any one Towne. It agreed not indeed with his Nobilitie, to goe to Rome and begge Provinces in the Senate, as Eumenes and the Rhodians had lately done, 20 He had entertained louingly the two Scipio's, whom he thought the most honourable menin Rome; and was growne into neere acquaintance with Publius, holding correspondence with him by letters, whereby hee made himselse acquainted with the warres in Spaine and Africk. This perhaps he deemed sufficient, to breed in the Romans a due respect of him. But Eumenes tooke a surer way. For the Scipio's had not the disposing of that which they wanne from Antiochus: as neither indeed had Manlius, nor the ten Delegates affifting him; but the Senate of Rome, by which those Delegates were chosen, and instructed how to proceed. When Philip therefore faw the leveltart Kings of Pergamus, whom he accounted as bale companions, aduanced so highly, and made greater than himselfe; yea himselfe vnregar- 40 ded, contemned, and exposed to many wrongs: then found he great cause to wish, that he had not fo hastily declared himselse against Antiochus, or rather that hee had loyned with Antiochus and the Ætolians, by whom he might have beene freed from his insolent masters. But what great argument of such discontentednesse the Mucedonian had, we shall verie shortly be viged to discourse more at large. At the present it was beleeved, that the Thracians were by him set on, to affaile the Romans paffing through their Countrie. They knew all advantages: and they fell, vnexpected, upon the carriages, that were bestowed in the midst of the Armie whereof part had alreadic passed a dangerous wood, through which the baggage followed; part was not yet so farreaduanced. There was enough to get, and enough to 50 leave behind: though both the getting, and the fauing, did coft many lives, as well of the Barbarians as of the Romans. They fought untill it grew night: and then the Thracians withdrew themselucs; not without as much of the bootie, as was to their full content. And of such trouble there was more, though lessed angerous, before the Armie could get out of Thrace into Macedon. Through the Kingdome they had a faire march into Epirus; and so to Apollonia, which was their handle of Greece. To Manlius, and to Fuluius, when each of them returned to the Citie, was granted the honour of Triumph. Yet not without contradiction : especially to Manlim; whom some of the ten Delegates, appointed to affilt him, did very bitterly taxe, as an vnworthic Commander. Touching the rest of their accusation; it sufficeth that he made good answere, and was approound by the chiefe of the Senate. One clause is worthie of more particular confideration. Reprehending his desire to have hindred the peace with Antiochus; they faid, That with much adoe he was kept Lin.l.28.

10 fromleading his Armie ouer TAVRVS, and adventuring upon the calamitie threatned by SYBYLS verses, unto those that should passe the fatall bounds. What calamitie or overthrow this was, wherewith Sibyls prophecie threatned the Roman Captaine or Armie, that should passe ouer Taurus, I doe not conceiue. Pompey was the first, that marched with an Armie beyond those limits: though the victories of Lucullus had opened vnto him the way, and had before hand wonne, in a fort, the Countries on the other fide of the Mount; which Lucullus gave to one of Antiochus his race, though Pompey occupied them for the Romans. But wee finde not, that either Lucullus or Pompey suffered any losse, in presuming to neglect the bounds appointed by Sibyl. Indeed the accomplishment of this prophecie, fell out neere about 20 one time, with the restitution of Ptolemie King of Agypt; that was forbidden vnto the Romans by the same Sibyl. It may therefore seeme to have had reference vnto the fame things, that were denounced, as like to happen vpon the reduction of the Egyptian King. Whether the Oracles of Sibyl had in them any truth, and were not, as Tullie noteth, fowed at randome in the large field of Time, there to take who. root, and get credit by cuent; I will not here dispute. But I hold this more probable, than that the restitution of Ptolemie to his Kingdome by Gabinius the Roman, should have any way betokened the comming of our Sauiour: as some both ancient and moderne Christian Writers have beene well pleased to interprete Sibyl in that prophecie. Of the Sibylline prædictions I have sometimes thought reverend-

30 ly: though not knowing what they were (as I thinke, few men know) yet following the common beleefe and good authoritie. But observation of the shamefull Idolatrie, that vpon all occasions was advanced in Rome by the bookes of Sibyl, had well prevailed vpon my credulitie, and made mee suspect, though not the faith and pious meaning, yet the judgement of Eufebius: when that learned and excellent worke of Master Casabon upon the Annales of Cardinall Baronius, did altogether Exercises and free mee from mine errour; making it apparent, That not onely those prophecies of Annal. Barin. sibyl, wherein Christ so plainely was foreshewed, but even the bookes of Hermes, 10.6 11. which have borne such reputation, were no better than counterfeited pieces, and at first entertained (whosoener denised them ) by the vndiscreet zeale of such, as 40 delighted in feeing the Christian Religion strengthned with forceine proofes. And in the same ranke, I thinke, wee ought to place that notable Historie, reported by

Eusebius from no meane Authors, Of the honour which was done to Simon Magus Euseb. Euse hift. in Rome; namely, of an Altar to him erected, with an inscription, Simoni Deo Santto, 613: that is, To Simon the boly God. For what can be more strange, than that a thing so memorable, and so publike, should have beene quite omitted by Tacitus, by Suetonius, by Dion, and by all which wrote of those times? Philosophers and Poets would not have suffered the matter to escape in silence, had it beene true; neither can it be thought that Seneca, who then lived and flourished, would have abstained from speaking any word of an Argument so famous. Wherefore I am perswaded, so that this infeription , Simoni Deo Santto , was , by fome bad Criticifme, taken amiffe in place of SEMONI SANGO: a title foure hundred yeeres older than the time of Simon Magus. For the goods of one Vitruuius a Rebell, had many ages before beene consecrated SEMONI SANGO, that is, To the Spirit or Demi-god Sangus, in whose Chappell they were bestowed. So as either by the ill shape of the old Roman letters, or by some spoile that Time had wrought vpon them; it might easily come to passe, that the words should bee missered, $1 MONI SANCTO, and that some Chryssian who had heard of Simon Magus, but not of $Sangus, thereupon should trame the coniecture, which now passet for a true Historie. Such coniectures, being entertained without examination, finde credit by Tradition, whereby also, many times, their fashion is amended, and made more Historicall, than was conceived by the Authour. But it cannot be safe, to let our faith (which ought to stand firme vpon a sure foundation) leane ouer-hardly on a well painted, yet rotten, post. Now concerning the Triumph of Cn. Manlius, it may be numbred among a 10 few of the richest, which ever the Citie beheld. Out of that which hee brought into the Treasurie, was made the last paiment of those monies which the Common-wealth had borrowed from private men, in the fecond Punicke marre. So long was it, that Rome had still some feeling of Hannibal: which being past, there was remaining neither care, nor memoric, of any danger. This Triumph of Manlins was deferred by him, even as long as hee well could: for that he thought it not fafe, to make his entrance into the Citic, vntill the heat of an Inquisition, then raging therein, should be allayed. The two Scipio's were called, one after other, into iudgement, by two Tribunes of the people; men, onely by this accusation, knowne to Posteritie. P. Scipio the African, with whom they began, could not endure that 20 fuch vnworthy men should question him, of purloining from the Common Treasury, or of being hired with bribes by Antiochus, to make an ill bargaine for his Countrey. When therefore his day of answere came; hee appeared before the Tribunes, not humbly as one accused, but followed by a great traine of his friends and Clients, with which he passed through the middest of the Assembly, and offered himselfe to speake. Having audience, hee told the People, That ypon the fame day of the yeere hee had fought a great battell with Hannibal, and finished the Punicke Warre, by a fignall victory. In memory whereof, hee thought it no fit feason to brabble at the Law; but intended to visit the Capitall, and there give thankes to Impiter, and the rest of the gods, by whose grace, both on that day and at 30 other times, hee had well and happily discharged the most weighty businesse of the Common-wealth. And hereto hee inuited with him all the Citizens: requesting them, That if ever fince the seventeenth yeere of his life, untill be now grew old, the honourable places by them conferred upon him , had preuented the capacitie of his age, and yet his deferts had exc eded the greatnesse of those honourable places; then would they pray, that the Princes and great ones of their Citie might still bee like to him. These words were heard with great approbation: fo as all the people, euen the Officers of the Court, followed Scipio; leaving the Tribunes alone, with none about them, excepting their owne flaues and a Crier, by whom ridiculously they cited him to judgement, vntill for very shame, as not knowing what else to doe, they granted him, 40 vnrequested, a further day. After this, when the African perceived that the Tribunes would not let fall their fuit, but enforce him to submit himselfe to a disgracefull triall: hee willingly relinquished the Citie, and his vnthankefull Romans, that could suffer him to vidergoe so much indignitie. The rest of his time hee spent at Liternum: quietly, with a few of his inward friends, and without any defire of feeing Rome againe. How many yeeres he lived, or whether he lived one whole yeere. in this voluntarie banishment; it is vncertaine. The report of his dying in the same yeere, with Hannibal and Philopamen, as also of his private behaviour at Liternum, render it probable, that he out-lived the Tribuneship of his accusers; who meant to have drawne him backe to his answere, if one of their Colleagues (as one 50 of them had power to hinder all the rest from proceeding ) had not caused them to delift. Howfoeuer it was the fame Tribunes went more sharply to worke with L. Scipio the Assique. They propounded a Decree vnto the People, touching monie received of Antiochus, and not brought into the common Treasury; That the Senate should give charge vnto one of the Prætors, to inquire, and indicially determine, thereof. In fauour of this Decree, an Oration was made by Cato, the supposed author of these contentions, and instigator of the Tribunes. He was a man of great, but not perfect, vertue; temperate, valiant, and of tingular industric; frugall alfo, both of the publike, and of his owne; fo as in this kinde hee was even faultie: for though hee would not be corrupted with bribes, yet was he vnmercifulland vnconscionable, in seeking to increase his owne wealth, by such meanes as the Lawe did warrant. Ambition was his vice; which being poyfoned with enuic, troubled both himselse and the whole Citie, whilest hee lived. His meane birth caused him to 10 hate the Nobility, especially those that were in chiefe estimation. Neither did he spare to bite at such as were of his owne ranke, men raised by desert, if their adnancement were like to hinder his: but lately before this, when Glabrio, whose Lieutenant hee had been at Thermopyla, was his Competitor for the Cenforship, and likely to carrie it, hee tooke an Oath against him, which was counted as no betterthan malicious periurie, That he had not brought into the common Treasurie some vessels of gold and filter, gotten in the Campe of Antiochia. Now the hatred which he bare vnto the Seipioes grew partly, (besides his generall spight at the Nobilitie) from his owne first rising, wherein hee was countenanced by Fabius Maximu, who brooked not the African; partly from some checke, that was given vnto 20 himselfe, in the African voyage, by P. Scipie, whose Treasurer he then was. For when Cate did vtter his dillike of the Confuls bad husbandry (judging Magnificence to be no better) in some peremptory manner; Scipio plainely told him, That he had no neede of fuch double diligence in his Treaturer. Wherefore, either not caring what lies hee published, or for want of judgement, thinking vnworthily of the vertuethat was farre aboue him, Cato filled Rome with vntrue reports against his Generall, whose noble deedes consuted sufficiently the author of such sale tales. And thus began the hatred: which being not regarded nor thought vpon by the Scipioes, whileft it was nourished by their enemie, brake out vpon aduantage, especially against L. Scipio, his brother being dead, or out of the way. A seuere inquirie and 30 iudgement being appointed of purpose against Scipio, matters were so carried, that he was seene condemned in a summe of money, farre exceeding his abilitie to pay. For non payment, his bodie should have beene layd vpin prison: but from this rigour of the Law hee was freed by Tiberius Gracebus, the same Tribune who had caused the suite against the African to be let fall. In his estate, which was confiscated to the vse of the Citic, when there neither appeared any figne of his having been beholding to Antiochus, nor was found fo much as what he had beene condemned to pay; then fell his accusers, and all whose hands had been against him, into the indignation of the People. But for this was L. Sapiono whit the better. His kinred, friends, and Clients made fuch a collection for him, as would have fet him in better 40 estate than before, if he had accepted it. Hee tooke no more than such of his owne goods, as were of necessary vse, being redeemed for him by his necrest friends.

And thus began the citill warre of the Tongue, in the Roman pleadings: which had either not beene, or not beene much regardable, vntill now, fince the Punicke Warre. Securitic of danger from abroad, and fome want of fulficient employment, were especiall helpes to the kindling of this fire; which first caught hold vpon that great Worthy, to whose vertue Rome was indebted, for changing into so great securitie her extreme danger. But these factious contentions did no long while containe themselies within heat of words, and cunning practice. For when the Art of leading the multitude, in such quarrelsome businesse, at this kinde of weapon, began to make opposition, first with clubbes and stones, asterward with swoods; and sinally, proceeded from frayes and murders in the streets, vnto battalle in the open field. Carnelia, daughter of Scipio the African, a Ladie of trae vertue, that in honour of her two sonnes was more commonly named Muther of the

Gracchi, faw those her two sonnes, whilest they were but yong, slaughtered in Rome, together with fome of their friends, by those whom they opposed, and their death not reuenged by order of Law, but rather approued by the Senate. At these times the Senatours began to take vpon them authoritie, more than was to them belonging. They conferred vpon the Confuls all the whole power of the Citie, vnder this forme, Let the Consuls provide, that the Commonweale receive no detriment. By this Decree of theirs, and by their proclaiming any Citizen enemie to the State, they thought to have woon a great advantage over the multitude. But after the death of C. Gracehus, and of Saturninus a popular man, whom by such authority they did put out of the way ; it was not long cre Marius, a famous Captaine of theirs, was 10 fo condemned, who by force of armes returned into the Citie, and murdered all the principall Senatours: whereupon began the civill warres; which giving vnto Sylla, who prevailed therein, meanes to make himselfe absolute Lord of Rome, taught Cafar, a man of higher spirit, to affect and obtaine the like soueraigne power, when by the like Decree of the Senate hee was prouoked. It is true, that never any Conful had finally cause to rejoyce, of his having put in execution such authoritie to him committed by the Senate. But as the furie of the multitude, in paffing their Lawes, by hurling of stones, and other violence, made the Citie stand in neede of a Soueraigne Lord: fo the vehemencie of the Senate, in condemning as enemies those that would not submit themselves, when they were over-topped by voyces 20 in the House, did compell cafar, or give him at least pretence, to right himselfe by armes: wherewith prenailing against his aducrsaries, hee tooke such order, that neither Senate, nor People, should thenceforth be able to doe him wrong. So by inte-Aine discord the Romans consuming all or most of their principall Citizens, lost their owne freedome, and became subjects vnto the arbitrarie gouernment of One: suffering this change in three generations, after this beginning of their infolent rule, wherein they tooke vponthem as the highest Lords on Earth, to doe even what they lifted. Yet had not Rome indeed attained hitherto vnto compleat greatnesse, nor beleeued of her selfe as if she had, whilest a King sate crowned on the Throne of Alexander, continuing and vpholding the reputation of a former Empire. 30 Wherefore this confummation of her honour was thought ypon betimes. How it was effected the sequele will discouer.

FTER the overthrow of Antischus, although Philip of Macedon, Eumenes King of Pergamus, the Commonweale of the Acheans, and all other the States of Greece, were gouerned by the same Lawes and Magistrates, as they formerly had beene, before the arrivall of the Romans in those parts : yet in verie 50 truth (the publike declaration excepted ) they were none other than absolute vasialls to the People of Rome. For of those five Prerogatives belonging to a Monarch, or vnto Soueraigne power, in whomfocuer it rest; namely, To make Lawes, To create Magistrates, To arbitrate Peace and Warre, To beate Monie, and to referne (as the French call it ) le dermier refort, or the last Appeales, the Romans had assumed sourc; and the greatest of them so absolutely, that is, The Appeale, or last refort, as every pettic injurie offered to each other by the fore-named Kings or States, was heard and determined either by the Roman Embassadours, or Commissioners, in those places whence the Complaint came, or otherwise by the Senatours themselves within Rome: from whose arbitrement, or direction, if either King, or Common-weales, declined He or they were beaten, and enforced to obedience; or had their Estates and Regalities vtter-10 ly dissolved. Neverthelesse it is true, that they had their owne Lawes, and Officers of their owne ordaining : yet fo, as neither their Lawes were of force, when the Romans interposed their will to the contrary; neither was their election of Magistrates so tree, as that they had not therein especiall regard vnto the good pleasure of these their Masters.

And to fuch degree of scruitude the seucrall Estates of Greece did bow verice gently: either as being thankefull for their deliuerance from a yoke more fenfibly grieuous; or, as being skilfull in the Art of flattery, and therein taking delight, since therein confilted their chiefe hope of thriuing ; or , as being more fearefull of difpleasing the strongest, than mindfull of their owne honour. But Eumenes living 20 further off, and being most obsequious vnto the Romans, was not, of long time, questioned about any of his doings; his conformitie vnto them in matter of warre and peace, together with the diversion of their thoughts another way, giving him leave to vie his owne euen as he listed, vntill they should otherwise dispose of him. Neither was it a little availeable to him, that his Kingdome bordered upon the Nations, by them not throughly subdued. For vpon the same reason (as well as vpon his owne high deferts) were they very louing vnto Masanissa, and to his House, vntill Carthage was ruined, and their Dominion settled in Africk: as likewise afterwards to the Kings of Mauritania, Cappadocia, and others: holding people in subjection vnto themselves, by the ministerie of Kings; especially of such Kings, as were vsefull 30 and obsequious vnto them.

Now the Macedonian was of a more noble temper; and shewed himselfe not forgetfull of his owne former greatnesse, the honour of his race, or the high reputation of his Kingdome. But fuch magnanimitie was none otherwise construed by the Romans, than as want of due reuerence to their Estate, and a valuation of himfelfe against them: which, in the pride of their fortune, they could not endure. Wherefore, notwithstanding that hee had lately given passage to their Armies through his Country, prepared the waies for them, and furnished them both with victuals, and other things needfull, to transport them ouer the Hellespont into Asia, against Antiochus : yet voon the complaint of Eumenes, and the States of Thessalie 40 and Thrace, hee was commaunded to abandon the Cities of Enus and Maronea, with all Pieces and Places demaunded by any of his neighbours; whereof many of them hee had lately conquered, by direction, or licence, euen from the Romans themselues.

These Townes of Anus and Maronea had beene part of Lysimechus his Kingdome: who from Thrace Northwards, and to the Northwest, extended his dominion very farre. He is thought to have made himselfe Lord of Transylvania: in which Province it is faid, * That innumerable Medals of gold have beene found, in the garie by Marts. age of our grandfathers, each of them weighing two or three crownes, and stamped Famee, lib.s. with his Image on the one fide, on the other fide with Victorie. Of all thefe Lordto ships the possession, or rather the title (for he lived not to settle his estate in Europe) fell to Seleucus Nicator by right of warre, wherein he vanquilhed and flue Lyfimachus: as alfo, by the like right, Ptolomie Ceraunus thought them his owne, when he had murdered Seleucus. But the inundation of the Gaules, which the Kingdome of Macedon could not fustaine, did shortly and easily wash away from that Crowne, together with the more part of Thrace, all those heapes of land newly thereto annexed. Somewhat of this was afterwards regained by Antigonus the sonne of Demetrius, and his successours: though not much; for they were otherwise busied. The furie of the Gaules being ouer-past, those Countries which lately had beene oppressed by them, recovered their libertie; and not only held it, but learned, some of them, especially the Dardanians and wilde Thracians, to find their advantages, and make vie of them, euen vpon Macedon. Against the mischiefes commonly done by these, King Philip did provide the most convenient remedies: by shutting vp the waves, whereby the Dardanians might enter into his Kingdome; and by occupying Lylimachia, with some other Townes in Thrace, which he fortified, as Bulwarkes of 10 his owne Countrey, against the Barbarians. Now, although it behoued him thus to doe, for the defence of his owne estate : yet forasmuch as these T ownes were, in a manner, at absolute libertie, his possession of them was thought to partake more of violence than of justice. And in this respect he was formerly accused by the A. tolians, of wrongfull vsurpation and oppression, in his hauing occupied Lysimachia, Hereto he made a good answere, That his Garrison did only faue it from the Thracians: who, as foone as hee thence withdrew his men, did feize vpon the Towne, and ruine it. The like perhaps he might have faid, touching Anus and Maronea; That they were places vnable to defend themselves, and Gates, by which the Barbarians might haucentrance into his Kingdome. But this Plea had not anayled him, 20 in the disputation about Lysimachia: and in the present question, the Romans were not without their owne title; fince Antiochus had gotten all the Countrie thereabout, whilest Philip was busied in his former warre and since they, by their victorie had gotten vnto themselues all the title, which Antiochus thereto could pretend. Wherefore he onely submitted his right vnto the good pleasure of the Senate: referring it vnto their disposition, Whether Anus and Maronea should be set at libertie, whether left in his hand, or whether bestowed vpon Eumenes; who begged them, as an appendix to Lysimachia and Chersonnesus, that were alreadie his by their gift. What they would determine, he might eafily perceive, by the demeanour of their Embassadors towards him: who sitting as Judges betweene him and all that 20 made complaint vpon him, gaue sentence against him in euery controuersie. Nepertheleffe, he fent Embaffadours to Rome, there to maintaine his right vnto thefe Townes; wherein he thought, that equitie (if it might preuaile) was wholly on his fide. For he had holpen their Consuls in the warre against Antiochus and the Atolians: wherein what foeuer he had gotten for him felfe, was now taken from him by their Embassadours: and would they now deprive him of those two Townes lying so fitly for the guard of his Kingdome, which he had gotten to himselfe out of the ruines of Antiochus, like as out of his owne ruines Antiochus had gotten in those quarters a great deale more? By fuch allegations either bee was likely to prevaile, or at least wife to gaine time, wherein he might bethinke himselfe what hee had to 40 doe. It was not long ere he had word from Rome, That the Senate were no more equall to him, than had beene their Embassadours. Wherefore, considering how infolently the Maronites had behaved themselves, in pleading against him for their libertic, hee tooke counsell of his owne passions; and (as by nature hee was verie cruell) gaue order to Onomastus, that was Warden of the Sca-coasts, to handle these Maronites in such fort, as they might have little joy of the libertie by them fo earnestly desired. Onemastus employed Cassander, one of the Kings men dwelling in Maronea, and willed him to let in the Thracians by night, that they might facke the Towne, and vseall cruelties of warre. This was done, but so ill taken by the Roman Embassadours, who had better notice, than could have beene 50 feared, of these proceedings; that the King was by them directly charged with the crime, and called more strictly, than became his Majestic, to an accompt. He would have remooved the blame from himselse, and layed it even upon the Maronites; affirming, That they, in heat of their Factions, being some inclinable

to him, other some to Eumenes, had fallen into such outrage, that they had cut one anothers throates. And hereof he willed the Embassadours to enquire, among the Maronites themselves: as well knowing, that they who furnised, were either his owne friends; or fo terrified and amazed by the late execution of his vengeance among them, that they durst not vtter an offensive word. But he found the Romans more seuere, and more throughly informed in the bulinesse, than to rest contented with such an answere. He was plainely told, that if he would discharge himselfe of the crime objected; he must fend Onomassus and Callander to Rome, there to bee examined as the Senate should thinke fit. This did not a little trouble him. Yet 10 he collected his spirits, and said, that Cassander should becat their disposition: but concerning Onomassus, who had not beene at Maronea, nor necre to it, he requested them not to presse him; since it slood not with his honour, so lightly to gine away his friends. As for Caffander, because he should tell no tales; thee tooke order to have him poisoned by the way. By this we see, that the doctrine, which Machianel taught vnto Cafar Borgia, to employ men in milchicuous actions, and afterwards to deftroy them when they have performed the mischiefe; was not of his owne invention. All ages have given vs examples of this goodly policie, the later having beene apt schollers in this lesson to the more ancient; as the reigne of Henmy the eighth here in England, can beare good witheffe; and therein especially the 20 Lord Cromwell, who perished by the same vniust Law that himselfe had deuised, for the taking away of another mans life.

Such actions of 'Philip made an unpleasant noise at Rome, and were like to have brought upon him the warre which he seared, before he was ready to entertaine it. Wherefore he employed his yonger sone Demetrius as Ernbalfadour wrote the Senate: gluing him instructions, how to make answere to all complaints; and withall to deliner his owne grievances, in such wise that sought were amisse, yet might it appeare that he had beene strongly urged to take such courses. The summe of his Embalfage was, to pacific the Romans, and make all euen for the present, Demetrium himselle was knowne to be very acceptable vnto the Senate; as having bees, well approved by them, when he was hostage in Rome: and therefore seemed the more likely, to prevaile somewhat; were it onely in regard that would bee borne vnto his person.

Whilest this businesse with the Macedonian hung in suspense, and whilest he, by his readinesse to make submission, seemed likely to dinert from himselfe some other way the Roman armes: the same Embassadours, that had beene Judges betweene him and his neighbours, made their progresse through the rest of Greece; and tooke notice of the controuerfies, which they found betweene some Estates in the Countrey. The greatest cause that was heard before them, was the complaint of the banished Lacedamonians against the Achains. It was objected vnto the Acha-40 ans, That they had committed a gricuous flaughter vpon many Citizens of Lacedemon: That vnto this cruelty they had added a greater, in throwing downe the walles of the Citie: as also further, in changing the Lawes, and abrogating the famous Institutions of Lyourgus. Hereto Lycortas, then Prætor of the Achaans, made answere, That these banished Lacedemonians, who now tooke vpon them to accuse the Nation that had once protected them, were notoriously knowne to beethe men, who had themselves committed that murder, whereof shamelessly they laid the blame vpon others: the Acheans having onely called those vnto judgement, that were supposed to be chiefe authors of a Rebellion against both them and the Romans; and these plaintifes having slaine them, vpon private, though inft hatred, 50 as they were comming to make answere for themselves. Concerning their throwing downe the walles of Lacedamon, hee faid it was most agreeable to Lycurgus his ordinance: who having perswaded his Citizens to defend their Towne and libertie by their proper vertue, did inhibite vnto them all kindes of fortifications; as the

Retraits and Nests either of Cowards, or (whereof Lacedamon had wofull experience) of Tyrants and Viurpers. Further he showed, how the same Tyrants that had built these wals, and hemmed in the Spartans, had also quite abolished Lyourgus his ordinances; and gouerned the Citie by their owne lawleffe will. As for the Acheans; they communicated their owne Lawes, which they held for the best, or elfe would foone change them and take better, vnto the Lacedamonians; whom they found without Lawes, or any tolerable forme of policie. For conclusion, Lycortas plainly told App. Claudius the chiefe of the Embassadours, That hee and his Countrimen held it itrange, being friends and faithfull Allies of the Romans, to fee themselues thus constrained, to answere and give account of their actions; as vassals 10 and flaues vnto the People of Rome. For if they were indeed at libertie: why might not the Achaans as well require to bee fatisfied about that which the Romans had done at Capua, as the Romans did busic themselves, to take account how things went at Lacedemon? For if the Romans would fland vpon their greatnesse, and intimate, as they began, that the libertie of their friends was nothing worth, longer than should please themselves to ratific it: then must the Acheans have recourse unto those Agreements, that were confirmed by oath, and which without periurie could not be violated; as reverencing, and indeede fearing the Romans, but much more, the immortall gods. To this bold answere of Lycortas, Appius found little to reply. Yettaking hate vpon him, he pronounced more like a Master than 20 a Judge, That if the Acheans would not be ruled by faire meanes, and carne thanks whilest they might; they should be compelled with a mischiese, to doe what was required at their hands, whether they would or no. This altercation was in the Parliament of the Acheans; which groned to heare the Lordly words of Appius. Yet Feare prevailed aboue Indignation: and it was permitted vnto the Romans to doe as they lifted. Hereupon the Embaffadours restored some banished and condemned men: but the Roman Senate, very so one after, did make void all Iudgements of death or banishment, that had beene laid by the Acheans vpon any Citizen of Lacedamon; as likewise they made it a matter of disputation, whether or no the Citic and Territory of Lacedamon, should bee suffered to continue a 20 member of the Achean Common-wealth; or taken from them, and made as it had beene an Estate by it selfe. By bringing such a matter into question, the Romans well declared, That they held it to depend vpon their owne will, how much or how little any of their confederates should be suffered to enjoy: though by contributing Sparta to the Councell of Achaia, they discovered no leffe, as to them seemed, the lone which they bare vnto the Achaians, than the power which they had

Into fuch flaucrie had the Greekes, and all Kings and Common-weales whatfoeuer, bordering vpon any part of the Mediterran Seas, reduced themselues; by calling in the Romans to their fuccour. They wanted not the good counfaile and per- 40 fwalions of many wife and temperate men among them; They had also the examples of the Italians, Spaniards, Gaules, and Africans, all subdued by the Romans, and, by feeking Patronage, made meere vaffals; to instruct them, what in the like case they should expect: yet could not the true reasons of Estate and Policie so preuaile with them, but their private passions, and neighbouring hatred, which hath euermore bought reuenge at the price of selfe ruine, brought them from the honour which they enjoyed, of being free Princes and Cities, into most base and fearefull feruilitie.

All this made well for Philip of Macedon: who though he faw the Greekes very farre from daring to stirre against those, by whom both hee and they were kept 50 in awe ; yet was he not without hope, that (few of them excepted, whom the Romans by freeing from his subjection had made his implacable enemies) in heartie affectionall the Countrie would be his, when focuer he should take armes, as short-lie he was like to doe. Young Demetrius, comming home from Rome, brought with him the delired ratification of peace; though qualified with much indignitie foone following. Hee had been louingly vied at Rome, and heard with great fauour in the Senate. There being confounded with the multitude of objections, whereto his youth, vnskilfull in the Art of wrangling, could not readily make anfwere: it was permitted vnto him, to reade fuch briefe notes as hee had received from his Father, and out of those the Senate were contented to gather satisfaction; more for Demetrius his owne fake, as they then faid and wrote into Mecedon, than for any goodnesse in the detence. Such pride of theirs, in remitting his faults at 10 the entreatic of his sonne, together with some insolence of his sonne, growing (as appeared) from this fauour of the Romans; did increase in Philip his hatred vnto Rome, and breed in him a icalousie of his too forward sonne. To set him forward in these passions, there came daily new Embassadours from Rome; some bringing one commandement; some another; and some, requiring him to fulfill those things, which had beene imposed upon him by their fore-goers. Neither were there wanting that observed his countenance; and when hee had fulfilled all that was required at his hands; yet laid it to his charge that hee had done things vnwillingly, and would be obedient, no longer than he needs must. With these Embassadours young Demetrius was conversant: rather perhaps out of simplicitic, and 20 for that they made much of him, than for any ambitious respect; yet a great deale more than was pleasing to his father. So the rumour grew current through all Macedon, That Perseus, the elder sonne of the King, should not succeed vnto his father; but that the Diademe should bee conferred vpon Demetrius, if not by some other pretence, yet by meere fauour of the Romans. This offended not onely Perfew, but Philip himselfe: who suspected his yonger sonne, as more Roman than his owne; and accordingly misconstrued all his doings. But ere we proceed vnto the bitter fruits of this icalousie; it will not be amisse, to speake of some memorable accidents that were in the meane time.

The death of PHILOP CEMEN, HANNIBAL, and Scipio. That the militarie profession is of all other the most unhappie: notwithstanding some examples, which may feeme to prooue the contrario.

CHAP. 6. S. 2.

He Romans, wanting other matter of quarrell in the Continent of Greece, had of late beene so peremptorie with the Acheans; that they cemed not vnlikely to take part against them, in any controuersie that should be moued. Hereupon the Oregeniam, who against the will were annexed vnto the Athean Common wealth, having long from that should be moued. Hereupon the Messenians, who against their beene of a contrarie Faction thereto; grew bold to withdraw themselnes from that Societie, with purpose to set vp againe an Estate of their owne, seuered from communion with any other. This was the device of some that were powerfull in their Citie: who finding the multitude onely inclinable to their purpose, and not ouer-strongly affected in the businesse; were carefull to secke occasion of reducing things to fuch passe, that all their Citizens might be entangled in a necessitie of standing out, and of not returning to the Achean League. And hereupon they began to doe some acts of hostilitie; whereby it was probable that bloud should bee 50 drawne, and either fide fo farre exasperated, that little hope of agreement would be left. Vpon the fame of their commotion and proceedings; Philopamen, then Prætor of the Acheans, levied fuch forces as hee could in hafte, and went against them. Many principall Gentlemen of the Acheans, especially of the Megalopolitans, were soone in a readinesse to wait vpon him. Besides these, which were all, or for O00000 3

the most part, Horse; he had some Auxiliaries out of Thrace and Crete, that vsually were kept in pay. Thus accompanied, he met with Dinocrates, Captaine of the Messenians, whom hee charged, and forced to runne. But whilest his horsemen were too carnest in following the chace; there arrived, by chance, a supplie of fine hundred from Meffene, which gaue new courage vnto those that fled. So the Enemies began to make head againe; and with the helpe of those, who very seasonably came to their aide, compelled Philopamens Horsemen to turne backe. Philopamen himselse had long beene sicke of an Ague, and was then very weake: yet the greatnesse of hiscourage would not suffer him, to bee negligent of their safetic, which had so willingly aduentured themselves under his conduct. He tooke upon him to 10 make the Retrait : and suffering his horsemen to passe along by him in a narrow lane, he often turned about against the Messenians, whom his reputation, and the knowledge of his great worth, did terrifie from approaching ouer-neere to him. But it fell out vnhappily, that being call to ground by a fall of his horse, and being withall in very weake plight of bodie, he was vnable to get vp againe. So the Enemies came vpon him, and tooke him; yet scarce beleeued their fortune to bee so good, although their eyes were witnesses. The first messenger that brought these newes to Messen, was so farre from being beleeved, that he was hardly thought to bein his right wits. But when the truth was affirmed by many reports, all the Citic ran forth to meet him, and behold the spectacle seeming so incredible. They 20 caused him to be brought into the Theater, that there they might satisfie themsclues with beholding him. The greatest part of them had compassion on his misfortune: and in commemoration both of his vertue, and of the fingular benefits by him done vnto them, especially in delivering them from Nabis the Tyrant; began to manifest their good will for his deliueric. Contrary wife, Dinocrates and his Fa-Aion were delirous haftily to take away his life : because they held him a man implacable, and one that would neuer leave any diferace, or iniuric, done to him, vnreuenged. They durst not one trust another with the keeping of him : but committed him into a strong vault under ground, that had beene made for the custodie of their Treasure. So thither they let him downe fast bound, and with an engine 20 laid an heavie stone vpon the mouth of the vault. There hee had not staied long, ere his enemies had concluded his present death. The Hangman of the Citie was let downe vnto him, with a cup of poison, which Philopamen tooke in his hand: and asking no more than whether the Horsemen were cscaped, and particularly whether Lycortas was fafe, when he heard an answere to bis minde, he faid it was well: and so with a cheerefull countenance, dranke his last draught. He was seventic yeeres old, and weakned with long ficknesse, whereby the poison wrought the sooner, and casily tooke away his life. The Acheans, when they missed him in their flight, were maruelloufly offended with themselnes, for that they had beene more mindfull to preserve their owne lives, than to looke vnto the safetie of so excellent 40 a Commander. Whilest they were denising what to doe in such a case: they got aducrtisement of his being taken. All Achaia was by this report vehemently affli-&cd fo as Embassadours were forthwith dispatched vnto Messen, craving his enlargement: and yet preparation made withall, to obtaine it by force, in case that faire meanes would not ferue. Lycortas was chosen Generall of the Armie against Messer: who comming thither, and laying siege to the Towne, enforced it in short space to yeeld. Then Dinocrates, knowing what he was to expect, laid hands upon himselfe, and made an end of his owne life. The rest of those that had beene partakers in the murder, were compelled to wait in bonds upon the after of Philopamen that were carried home in solemne pompe to Megalopolis; where they were all 50 of them flaine at his funerall, as facrifices to his Ghoft whom they had offended. Q. Martius, a Roman Embassador, was then in Greece; whence, vpon one occasion or other, the Roman Embassadors were seldome absent. He would have entermedied in this busines of Messene, had not Lycortas made short worke, and left him nothing to doc.

About the same time was T.Quintius Flaminius sent Embassador to Prusas King of Bithynia: not fo much to withdraw him from profecuting the warre against Eumenes, as to entreat him, that he would deliuer Hannibal, the most spightfull enemie in all the world vnto the Senate and People of Rome, into his hands. Prusias (therein vnworthie of the Crowne he ware) did readily condifcend: or rather (as Liuie thinkes) to gratific the Romans, he determined either to kill Hannibal, or to deliner him aliue to Flaminius. For vpon the first conference betweene the King and Flaminius, atroupe of Souldiors were directed to guard and enuiron the lodging where Hannibal lay. That famous Captaine having found cause before this to su-10 spect the faith of Prusias, had denifed some secret fallies under ground to sauc himfelfe from any treasonable and sudden affault. But finding now that all parts about him were fore-closed, he had recourse to his last remedie: which he then was constrayned to practife, as well to frustrate his enemies of their triumphing ouer him, as to faue himfelfe from their torture and mercileffe hands; who, as he well knew, would neither respect his samous enterprises, his honour, nor his age. When therefore he faw no way of escape, nor counsell to refort vnto, he tooke the poylon into his hand, which he alwayes preferued for a fure Antidote against the sharpest disea-

In this vecreal fo (as good Authors have reported) to accompanie Philopemen and Hannibal, died Scipio the African : these being, all of them, as great Captaines as ever the world had; but not more famous, than vnfortunate. Certainely, for Hannibal, whose Tragedie we have now finished, had he beene Prince of the Carthaginians, and one who by his authoritie might have commaunded fuch supplyes, as the Warre which he vndertooke, required; it is probable, that he had torne vp the Roman Empire by the roots. But he was fo strongly cross by a cowardly and enuious Faction at home; as his proper vertue, wanting publike force to sustaine it, did 40 laftly diffolue it felfe in his owne, and in the common miserie of his Countrey and

Hence it comes, to wit, from the envie of our equals, and jealousic of our Masters, be they Kings, or Commonweales, That there is no Profession more unprosperous than that of Men of Warre, and great Captaines, being no Kings. For besides the enuie and jealousic of men; the spoyles, rapes, famine, slaughter of the innocent, vaflation, and burnings, with a world of mileries layed on the labouring man, are fo hatefull to God, as with good reason did Monlue the Marshall of France confesse, That were not the mercies of G o D infinite, and without restriction, it were in vaine for those of his profession to hope for any portion of them: seeing the cruelties, by them per-70 mitted and committed, were also infinite. Howsoeuer, this is true, That the victories. which are obtayned by many of the greatest Commanders, are commonly either ascribed to those that serue vinder them, to Fortune, or to the cowardise of the Nation against whom they serue. For the most of others, whose vertues have rayled them about the levell of their inferiours, and have furmounted their envie: yet have they been rewarded in the end, either with difgrace, banishment, or death. Among the Romans we finde many examples hereof; as Coriolanus, M. Liuius, L. Emyleus, and this our Scipio, whom we have lately buried. Among the Greekes we reade of not many, that escaped these rewards. Yea, long before these times, it was a Legacic that Danid bequeathed vnto his victorious Captaine Toab. With this fare Alexander fealted Parmenio, Philotas, and others; and prepared it for Antipater and Cassander. Hereto Valentinian the Emperour inuited Etius: who, after many other victories, ouerthrew Attila of the Hunnes, in the greatest battaile, for the well fighting and resolution of both Armies, that euer was strucken in the world; for there fell of those that fought beside runne-awaies, an hundred and 10 fourescore thousand. Hereupon it was well and boldly told vnto the Emperour by Proximus. That in killing of Atius, he had cut off his owne right hand with his left: for it was not long after that Maximus (by whose perswasion Valentinian slue Etius) murdered the Emperour, which hee neuer durft attempt, Etius liuing. And, besides the losse of that Emperour, it is true, That with Atim, the glory of the Westerne Empire was rather dissolved then obscured. The same inworthy destinie, or a farre worse, had Bellisarius; whose vndertakings and victories were so difficult and glorious, as after-ages suspected them for fabulous. For he had his eyes torne out of his head by Iustinian: and he died a blinde begger. Narses also, to the great prejudice of Christian Religion, was differed by Iustine. That Rule of Cato 20 against Scipio, hath been well observed in every age since then; to wit. That the Common-weale cannot bee accounted free, which standeth in awe of any one man. And hence hath the Turkes drawne another Principle, and in deed a Turkish one, That every warlike Prince should rather destroy his greatest men of Warre, than fuffer his owneglory to be obscured by them. For this cause did Baiaret the fecond dispatch Bassa Acomat; Selim strangle Bassa Mustapha; and most of those Princes bring to ruine the most of their Viliers. Of the Spanish Nation, the great Gon-Salue, who draue the French out of Naples: and Ferdinando Cortefe, who conquered Mexico; were crowned with nettles, not with Lawrell. The Earles of Eemond and Horn, had no heads left them to weare garlands on. And that the great Captaines 20 of all Nations have been payd with this copper Coine; there are examples more than too many. On the contrary it may bee faid, That many have acquired the State of Princes, Kings, and Emperours, by their great abilitie in matter of warre. This I confesse. Yet must it be had withall in consideration, that these high places haue been given, or offered, vnto very few, as rewards of their militarie vertue: though many haue vsurped them, by the helpe and fauour of those Armies which they commanded. Neither is it vnregardable, That the Tyrants which have oppressed the liberty of free Cities: and the Lieutenants of Kings or Emperours, which have traiteroufly cast downe their Masters, and stepped vp into their seats; were not all of them good men of warre: but have vied the advantage of some 40 commotion, or many of them by base and cowardly practices, have obtained those dignities, which vndeseruedly were ascribed to their personall worth. So that the number of those, that have purchased absolute greatnesse by the greatnesse of their warlike vertue; is farre more in feeming, than in deed. Phosas was a Souldiour, and by helpe of the Souldiours he got the Empire from his Lord Mauritius : but he was a coward; and with a barbarous cruelty, seldome found in any other than cowards, hee flue first the children of Mauritius, a Prince that neuer had done him wrong, before his face, and after them Mauritius himselfe. This his bloudy aspiring was but as a debt, which was paid vnto him again by Heraelius: who tooke from him the Imperiall Crowne, vniustly gotten; and set it on his owne head. Le- 50 ontices laid hold upon the Emperour Iustine, cut off his note and eares, and fent him into banishment: But Gods vengeance rewarded him with the same punishment, by the hands of Tiberius; to whose charge hee had left his owne men of warre. Instine, having recovered forces, lighted on Tiberius, and barbed him after the same fashion. Philippieus, commanding the forces of Iustine, murdered both the Emperour and his sonne. Anastasius, the vasfall of this new T yrant, surprised his Malter Philippicus, and thrust out both his eyes, But with Anastasius, Theodosius dealt more gently: for having wrested the Scepter out of his hands, bee enforced him to become a Priest. It were an endlesse, and a needlesse worke to tell, how Leo rewarded this Theodofius; how many others have beene repayed with their owne crueltie, by men alike ambitious and cruell; or how many hundreds, or rather thoufands, hoping of Captaines to make themselues Kings, have by Gods justice milerably perified in the attempt. The ordinarie, and perhaps the best way of thrining, 10 by the practice of Armes, is to take what may be gotten by the spoile of Enemies, and the liberalitie of those Princes and Cities, in whose service one hath well deferued. But scarce one of a thousand have prospered by this course. For that observation, made by Salomon, of vnthanketulneffe in this kinde, hath beene found belonging to all Countries and Ages: Alittle Citie, and few men in it, and a great King came Eccles. 2.14. against it, and compassed it about, and builded Forts against it : And there was found a poore & 15. and wifeman therein, and hee delivered the Citie by his wifedome : but none remembred this poore man. Great Monarchs are vnwilling to pay great thankes, left thereby they should acknowledge themselves to have beene indebted for great benefits: which the vnwifer fort of them thinke to fauour of some impotency in them-

20 selues. But in this respect they are oftentimes coozened and abused : which proues that weakenesse to be in them indeede, whereof they sogladly shunne the opinion. Contrariwife, free Estates are bountifull in giuing thankes; yet so, as those thankes are not of long endurance. But concerning other profit which their Captaines haue made, by enriching themselues with the spoile of the enemie, they are very inquilitiue to fearch into it, and to ftrip the wel-deferuers out of their gettings: yea most iniuriously to rob them of their owne, vpon a false supposition : that even they whose hands are most cleane from such offences, have purloyned somewhat from the common Treasurie. Hereof I neede not to produce examples: that of the two Sciptoes being fo lately recited.

30 In my late Soueraignes time, although for the warres, which for her owne fafetie she was constrained to vndertake, her Majestie had no lesse cause to vse the serpice of Martiall men both by Sea and Land, than any of her Predeceffors for many yeeres had, yet, according to the deftiny of that profession, I do not remember, that any of hers, the Lord Admiral excepted, here ldeft and most prosperous Commander, were either enriched, or otherwise honoured, for any service by them performed. And that her Majestie had many aduised, valiant, and faithfull men, the prosperitie of her affaires did well witnesse, who in all her daies never received dishonour, by the cowardife or infidelitie of any Commander, by her felfe chofen

40 For as all her old Captaines by Land died poore men, as Malbey, Randol, Drewrie, Reade, Wilford, Layton, Pellam, Gilbert, Cunstable, Bourchier, Barkeley, Bingham, and others: so those of a later and more dangerous imploiment, whereof Werice and Vere were the most famous, and who have done as great honor to our Nation ( for the meanes they had) as cuerany did: those (I say) with many other braue Collonels, haue left behinde them (besides the reputation which they purchased with many trauaics and wounds) nor title nor estate to their posteritie. As for the L. Thomas Burrough, and Peregrine Berty L. Willoughby of Eresby, two very worthy and exceeding valiant Commanders, they brought with them into the world their

That her Majestie in the advancement of her Men of warre did sooner beleeue other men than her selse,a disease unto which many wise Princes, besides her selse, hane beene subject, I say that such a considence, although it may seeme altogether to excuse her Noble Nature, yet can it not but in some fort accuse her of weakenesse. And exceeding strange it were, were not the cause manifest enough, that where the prosperous actions are so exceedingly prized, the Actors are so vnprosperous and so generally neglected. The cause, I say, which hath wrought one and the same effect in all times, and among all Nations, is this, that those which are neerest the person of Princes (which Martial men seldome are) can with no good grace commend or at least magnifie a Profession farre more noble than their own, seeing therein they should onely mind their Masters of the wrong they did vnto others, in giuing lesse honour and reward to men of farre greater deseruing, and of far greater vse than themselves.

But his Maiestie bath already payed the greatest part of that debt. For besides the relieuing by Pensions all the poorer sort, hee hath honored more Martial men, 10 than all the Kings of England have done for this hundred yeeres.

He hath given a Coronet to the Lord Thomas Haward for his chargeable and remarkcable scruice, as well in the yeere 1 588, as at Caliz, the Ilands, and in our owne Seas; having first commanded as a Captaine, twice Admirall of a Squadron, and twice Admirall in chiefe. His Maiestie hath changed the Baronies of Montion and Burley into Earledomes, and created Sidney Vicount, Knollys, Russel, Carew, Danuers, Arundel of Warder, Gerald, and Chichester, Barons, for their gouernments and seruices in the Netherlands, France, Ireland, and elsewhere.

PHILLIP making provision for warre against the Romans, deales hardly with many of his owne subrects. His negotiation with the Bastarna. His crueltie. He suspecteth his some DEMETRIVS. DEMETRIVS accused by his brother PER-SEVS; and shortly after saine, by his fathers appointment. PHI-LIP repenteth bim of his sonnes death; whom he findeth to have beene innocent : and intending to revenge it on PERSEVS, he dieth.

VINTYS MARTIYS the Roman Embassador, who travailed vp and downe, feeking what worke might be found about Greece, had receiued instruction from the Senate, to vse the most of his diligence in looking into the Estate of Macedon. At his returne home, that hee might not seeme to have discourred nothing, hee told the Fathers, That Philip had done whatioeuer they enjoyned him; yet so, as it might appeare, that fuch his obedience would last no longer, than meere necessitie should enforce him thereunto. Hee added further, That all the doings and fayings of that King did wholly tend unto rebellion, about which he was denifing. Now it was so indeed, that Philip much repented him of his faithfull obsequiousnes to the Romans, 40 and forefaw their intent, which was, to get his Kingdome into their owne hands, with fafety of their honour, if they could finde conucnient meanes; or otherwise (as to him seemed apparant) by what meanes socuer. He was in an ill case: as hauing beene already vanquished by them; having lost exceedingly both in strength and reputation; having subjects that abhorred to heare of Warre with Rome; and having neither neighbour nor friend, that, if he were thereto viged, would aduenture to take his part: yet hee prouided as well as hee could deuife, against the necessitie which hee daily feared. Such of his owne people as dwelt in the maritime Townes, and gaue him cause to suspect, that they would doe but bad service against the Romans, he compelled to forfake their dwellings, and removed them all 50 into Emathia. The Cities and Countrey, whence these were transplanted, hee filled with a multitude of Thracians, whose faith he thought a great deale more assured, against those enemies that were terrible to the Macedonians. Further, bee denised vpon alluring the Bastarna, a strong and hardie Nation, that dwelt beyond the river of Danubius, to abandon their feat, and come to him with all their multitude : who, besides other great rewards, would helpe them to roote out the Dardanians, and take possession of their Countrey. These were like to doe him notable service against the Romans: being not onely stout fighting men; but such as being planted in those quarters by him, would beare respect vnto him alone. The least benefit that could be hoped by their arrivall, must be the otter extirpation of the Dardanians; a People alwaies troublefome to the Kingdome of Macedon, when soener they found advantage. Neither was it indged any hard matter, to perswade those Bastarns, by hope of spoile, and other incitements, vnto a more desperate Expediti-10 on, through Illyria, and the Countries vpon the Adriaticke Sea, into Italie it felfe. It was not knowne who should withstand them vpon the way: Ratherit was thought, that the Scordifei, and peraduenture some others, through whose Countries they were to passe, would accompanie them against the Romans, were it onely in hope of spoyle. Now to facilitate the remoue of these Bastarne from their owne habitations, into the Land of the Dardanians, upon the border of Macedon; along and tedious journey vnto them, that carried with them their wines and children: Philip with gifts did purchase the good will of some Thracian Princes, Lords of the Countries through which they were to passe. And thus nee sought meanes to ftrengthen himselse, with helpe of the wilde Nations, which neither knew the Ro-20 mans, nor were knowne vnto them; fince he was not like to finde affiftance from anie civill Nation, about the whole compasse of the Mediterranean Seas. But these deuices were long ere they tooke effect: fo as the Baffarne came not before such time as he was dead; his death being the ouerthrow of that purpose. In the meane time he neglected not the training of his men to warre, and the exercise of them in fome small Expeditions, against those wilde people that bordered vpon him, and flood worst affected toward him.

But these his counsailes and proceedings were miserably disturbed by the calamities that fell voon him, both in his Kingdome, and in his owne house. The Families and whole Townships, which he had caused much against their wils to for sake 30 their ancient dwellings, and betake themselves to such new habitations, as hee in his discretion thought meeter for them, were vehemently offended at the change; Yet their anger at first contained it selfe within words: hee haning done them no great wrong in that alteration, otherwise then by neglecting their affection to the places wherein they had long lived : which also he did vnwillingly, being himselse ouer-ruled by necessitie, that seemed apparent. This cuill therefore would soone haue been determined, had not his cruell and vindicatine nature made it worse. He could not pardon words proceeding from just forrow: but imputed all to traiterous malice; and accordingly fought reuenge where it was needlesse. In his rage he caused many to die: among whom were some eminent men; and sew or none 40 of them deseruedly. This encreased the hatred of the people, and turned their former exclamations into bitter curses. Which grew the more generall; when the King in a barbarous and base fury, mistrusting all alike whom he had injuried. thought himselse vnlike to be safe, vntill be should have massacred all the children of those parents, whom tyrannically he had put to death. In the execution of this his vnmanly pleasure, some accidents, more tragicall then perhaps he could have desired, gaue men cause to thinke (as they could not in reason thinke otherwise) that, not without vengcance powred on him from Heauen, hee felt the like milerie in his owne children. It is hard to fay what the Romans intended, in the extraordipary fauour which they shewed vnto Demetrius, the Kings yonger sonne. It may 50 well be (though it may be also suspected) that they had no purpose to make and nourish diffention betweene the brethren, but onely to cherish the vertue and towardlinesse of Demetrius; like as we finde it in their Histories. But their notable fauour towards this yong Prince, and his mutuall respect of them, bred extreme jealousie in the fathers head. If any custome of the Romanes, the manner of their life, the fallion of their apparell, or the vnfightly contriuing and building (as then it was ) of the Towne of Rome, were jefted at in ordinarie discourse and table-talke. Demetriss was fure to be presently on fire, defending and prayling them, even in fuch points as rather needed excuse. This, and his dayly conversation with their Embassadours, as often as they came, gaue his father cause to thinke, that he was no fit partaker of any counfaile held against them. Wherefore he communicated all his devices with his elder sonne Perseus: who fearing so much lest his brother should sep betweene him and the succession, converted wholly vnto his destruction, that grace which he had with his father. Perfeus was then thirty yeeres old, of aftirring spirit, though much defective in valour. Demetrius was yonger by five 10 yeeres, more open and vnwarie in his actions, yet thought old and crafty enough, to entertaine more dangerous practices, than his free speeches discouered. The jealous head of the King having entertained such suspitions, that were much increafed by the cunning practice of his elder sonne, a slight occasion made the fire breake out, that had long layne smothered. A Muster, and ceremonious lustration of the Armie, was wont to be made at certaine times with great folemnitie. The manner ofit at the present was thus: They eleft in twaine a bitch; and threw the head and fore-part, with the entrailes, on the right hand, and the hinder part on the left hand of the way which the Armie was to passe. This done, the Armes of all the Kings of Macedon, from the very first originall, were borne before the Armie. Then fol- 20 lowed the King between his two fonnes: after him came his owne band, and they of his guard; whom all the rest of the Macedonians followed. Having performed other ceremonies, the Armie was divided into two parts: which, under the Kings two fonnes, charged each other in manner of a true fight, vling poles, and the like, in Read of their pikes and accustomed weapons. But in this present skir milh there appeared some extraordinary contention for the victorie; whether happening by chance, or whether the two Captaines did ouer-earnestly secke each to get the vpper hand, as a betokening of their good successe in a greater triall. Some small hurt there was done, and wounds given, even with those stakes, vntill Perseus his side at length recoyled. Perfeus himselfe was fore for this, as it had been some bad pre- 30 fage: but his friends were glad, and though, that hereof might be made good vfe. They were of the craftier fort: who perceining which way the Kings fauour bent, and how all the courses of Demetrius led vnto his owne ruine, addressed their seruices to the more malicious and crafty head. And now they faid, that this victory of Demetrius would affoord matter of complaint against him; as if the heat of his ambition had carried him beyond the rules of that solemne passime. Each of the brethren was that day to feast his owne companions, and each of them had spies in the others lodging, to observe what was said and done. One of Perseus his Intelligencers behaued himfelfe fo indifcreetly, that hee was taken and well beaten by three or foure of Demetrius his men, who turned him out of dores. After fome flore 40 of wine, Demetrius told his companions, that he would goe visit his brother, and see what cheare he kept. They agreed to his motion, excepting such of them as had ill handled his brothers man: yet he would leave none of his traine behinde, but forced them also to beare him company. They, fearing to be ill rewarded for their late diligence, armed themselves secretly to prevent all danger. Yet was there such good espiall kept, that this their comming armed was forthwith made knowne to Perfeus: who thereupon tumultuoufly locked up his doores, as if he stood in feare to be affaulted in his house. Demetrius wondred to see himselfe excluded, and faared very angerly with his brother. But Perfeus, bidding him be gone as an enemie. and one whole murderous purpole was detected, fent him away with entertaine- 50 ment no better than defiance. The next day the matter was brought before the King. The elder brother accused the yonger vnto the father of them both. Much there was alledged, and in effect the fame that hath been here recited, faue that by misconstruction all was made worse. But the maine point of the accusation, and which did aggrauate all the rest, was, That Demetrius had undertaken this murder, and would perhaps also dare to undertake a greater, upon confidence of the Romans; by whom hee knew that he should be defended and borne out. For Perfeus made show, as if the Romans did hate him; because hee bore a due respect vnto his father, and was forie to fee him spoiled, and daily robbed of somewhat by them. And for this cause he said it was, that they did animate his brother against him; as alfothat they fought how to winne vnto Demetrics the love of the Macedonians. For proofe hereof he cited a letter, fent of late from T. Quintius to the King himfelte: whereof the contents were, That he had done wisely in sending Demetrius 10 to Rome; and that he should yet further doc well to fend him thither againe, accompanied with a greater and more honorable traine of Macedonian Lords. Hence he enforced, That this counfell was given by Titus, of purpose to shake the allegeance of those, that should wait upon his brother to Rome; and make them, forgetting their ducties to their old King, become fermants to this yong Traytor Demetrius. Hereto Demetrius made answere, by rehearfing all passages of the day and night foregoing, in such manner as hee remembred them, and had conceived of them: bitterly reprehending Perfeus, that converted matters of Passime, and what was done or spoken in wine, to such an accusation, whereby he sought his innocent brothers death. As for the love which the Romans did beare him . Hee faid that it 20 grew, if not from his owne vertue, at least wife from their opinion thereof: fo as by any impious practice, Hee were more like to lose it wholly, than to encrease it. In this wretched pleading there wanted not fuch passions, as are incident to fathers, children, and brethren; besides those that are common to all Plaintiffes and Defendants, before ordinarie Judges. The King pronounced like a father, though a icalous father, That he would conclude nothing vpon the excesse or error, whatfocuer it were, of one day and night, nor vpon one houres audience of the matter, but vpon better observation of their lives, manners, and whole carriage of themselucs both in word and deed. And herein hee may seeme to have dealt both justly and compassionately. But from this time forward, hee gaughimselse over wholly 30 to Perfess: vling so little conference with his yonger sonne, that when he had matters of weight in hand, fuch especially as concerned the Romans, He liked neither to haue him present, nor neere vnto him. Aboue all, he had especiall care, to learne out what had passed betweene Demetrius and T. Quintius, or any other of the Roman great ones. And to this purpose he sent Embassadours to Rome, Philocles and Apelles; men whom hee thought no way interessed in the quarrels betweene the brethren; though indeed they altogether depended on the elder, whom they faw the more in grace. These brought home with them a letter, said to be written by Titus (whose seale they had counterfetted) vnto the King. The contents wherof were, A deprecation for the yong Prince; with an intimation, as by way of 4c granting it, That his youthfull and ambitious defires had caused him to enter into practices vniuttifiable, against his elder brother; which yet should never take effect. for that Titus himselfe would not be author, or abettor, of any impious device. This manner of excuse did forcibly perswade the King, to thinke his sonne a dangerous traytor. To firengthen him in this opinion, one Didas, to whom he gaue Demetrius in custodie, made shew as if he had pittied the estate of the vnhappy Prince; and so wrung out of him his fecret intentions, which he shortly discovered vnto Philip. It was the purpose of Demetrius to flye secretly to Rome; where he might hope not onely to liue in fafety, from his father and brother, but in greater likelihood, than hee could finde at home, of bettering fuch claime as he had in reversion vnto the 50 Crowne of Macedon. W hat soener his hopes and meanings were, al came to nought through the falfhood of Didas; who playing on both hands, offered vnto the Prince his helpe for making the escape, and in the meane while reucaled the whole matter to the King. So Philip resolved to put his sonne to death, without surther expence of time. It was thought behouefull to make him away privily, for feare left the Romans should take the matter to heart, and held it as proofe sufficient, at least, of the Kings despight against them, if not of his meaning to renew the warre. Diastherefore was commanded to rid the unhappy Prince out of his life. This accurfed Minister of his Kings unadulted fentence, first gaue poyson to Demetrius: which wrought neither so hastily, nor so secretly, as was defired. Hereupon he sent a couple of Rushaus, to finish the tragedie: who villanously accomplished their worke by smoothering that Prince, in whose life consisted the greatest hope of Muchanical Management of the Montagement of the Monta

In all the race of Antigonus there had not beene found a King, that had thus cruelly dealt with any Prince of his owne bloud. The boufes of Lysimachus and 10 Callander fell either with themselves, or even vpontheir heeles; by intestine difcord and icalousies, grounded on defire of soueraigne rule, or scare of losing it. By the like vnnaturall hatred, had almost beene cut off the lines of Ptolemic and of Seleneus: which though narrowly they escaped the danger, yet were their kingdomes thereby grieuoully distempered. Contrariwise, it was worthy of extraordinarie note, how that voftart family of the Kings of Pergamus had raifed it felfe to maruellous greatnesse, in very short space, from the condition of meere slavery: whereof a principall cause was, the brotherly lone maintained by them, with singular commendation of their pietie. Neither was Philip ignorant of these examples: but is faid to have propounded the last of them, to his owne children, as a patterne 20 for them to imitate. Certainly he had reason so to doe: not more in regard of the benefit which his enemies reaped by their concord, than in remembrance of the tender fosterage, wherewith King Antigonus his Tutor had faithfully cherished him in his minoritie. But Hee was himselfe of an vnmercifull nature; and therefore vnmeet to bee a good perswader vnto kindely affection. The murders by him done upon many of his friends, together with the barbarous outrages, which for the fatiating of his bloud-thirsty appetite he delightfully had committed vpon mamy innocents, both strangers, and subjects of his owne; did now procure vengeance downe from Heauen, that rewarded Him with a draught of his owne Poylon. After the death of his some, He too late began to examine the crimes that had bin 20 objected; and to weigh them in a more equal ballance. Then found he nothing that could give him fatisfaction, or by good probabilitie induce him to thinke, that malice had not been contriner of the whole processe. His only remaining Son Perfew could so ill diffemble the pleasure which hee tooke, in being freed from all danger of competition; as there might cafily be perceived in him a notable change, proceeding from some other cause, than the remove of those dangers, which he had lately pretended. The Romans were now no leffe to be feared than at other times, when he, as having accomplished the most of his defires, left off his viuall trouble of minde, and carefulnesse of making provision against them. He was more diligently courted, than in former times; by those that well understood the difference, be- 40 tweene arifing and a fetting Sunne. As for old Philip, hee was left in a manner defolate, fome expecting his death; and fome scarce enduring the tediousnesse of such expectation. This bred in the King a deep melancholy; and filled his head with fuspitious imaginations; the like whereof hee had never beene flow to apprehend. Hee was much vexed : and so much the more, for that he knew, neither well to whom, nor perfectly whereof to complaine. One honourable man, a Coulin of his, named Antigonia, continued to true to Philip, that hee grew thereby hatefull to Perfeus; and thus becomming subject vnto the same jeasous impressions which troubled the King, became also partaker of his secrets. This counsailour, when he found that the anger conceined against Perfeus would not vent it selfe, and give 50 ease to the King, vitill the truth were knowne whether Demetrius were guilty or no of the treason objected; as also that Philotles and Apelles, (the Embassadours which had brought from Rome that Epistle of Flaminius, that served as the greatest enidence against Demetrius) were suspected of forgery in the busines; made diligent inquirie after the truth. In thus doing, hee found one Xyehus, a man most likely to have vnderstood what stalke dealing was vsked by those Embassaors. Him hee apprehended, brought to the Court, and presented with the King: saying that this tellow knew all, and must therefore bee made to vtter what hee knew. Xyebus sor leare of torture, vttered as much as was before suspected confessing against himesses, the chade been employed by the Embassadors in that wicked piece of businesses. No maruell, if the Fathers passions were extreme, when hee vnderstood, that by the vonnaturall practice of one son, he had so wretchedly call away another, farre more vertuous, and snoocent. Hee raged exceedingly against himsses, and into with a gainst the authors of the mikhiese. Y pon the first newes of this discourse, Apelles shed away, and got into Itale, Philoseles was taken: and either forassmuch as hee could not deny it when Xyebus confronted him, yeelded himselfe guilty, or else was put to torture. Perseus was now growne stronger, than that hee should neede to slie the Countrie: yet not so shout as to aduenture himselfe into his fathers presence. He kept on the borders of the Kingdome, towards Three, whilest

his father wintered at Demetrias. Philip therefore, not hoping to get into his power this his vngracious sonne; tooke a resolution, to aliene the Kingdome from him, and confer it vpon Antigonius. But his weake body, and exceffine griefe of minde, fo disabled him in the trauell hereto belonging; that ere hee could bring his pur-20 pose to effect, hee was constrained to yeeld to nature: Hee had raigned about two and forty yeeres; alwayes full of trouble; as vexed by others, and vexed himfelfe, with continuall warres; of which that with the Romans was most vnhappy, and few or none of the rest found the conclusion, which a wife Prince would have desired, of bringing forth together, both honour and profit. But for all the euill that befell him, he might thanke his owne peruerfe condition: fince his vncle, King Antigonus, had left vnto him estate, so great, and so well settled, as made it easie for him, to accomplish any moderate defires, if hee had not abhorred all good counsell. Wherefore he was justly punished: by feeling the difference betweene the imaginarie happinesse of a T yrant, which he affected; and the life of a King, whereof he 30 little cared to performe the dutie. His death, even while if yet it was only drawing necre, was forelignified vnto Perfeus, by Calligenes the Phylician; who also concealed it awhile from those that were about the Court. So Perfeus came thither on the fuddaine, and tooke possession of the kingdome: which in fine he no lesse improvi-

Mmediately upon the death of Philip, came the Bastarne into Thrace: where order had been taken, long before, both for their free passage, and for the indemnitie of the Countrie. This compact was friendly observed, as long as none other was knowne than that Philip did line, to recompence all that should be done, or sustained, for his fer-

and confounded. The Thrasians would no longer afford fo good markets vnto these strangers, as formerly they had done. On the other side, the Bastanae would not be contented with reason, but became their owne caruers. Thus each part having lost the rich hopes reposed in Philips, grew carefull of thriwing in the present; with little regard of right or wrong. Within awhile they fell to blowes; and the Bastanae had the vpper hand, so as they chasted the Thrasians out of the plaine Countries. But the victors made little vse of their good fortune. For whether by reason of some ouerthrow, received by them in affaulting a place of strength; or whether because of extreme bad weather, which is said to have afflicted them as it were miraculously: all of them returned home, saucthirtie thousand, which pierced on so into Dardania. How these thirtie thousand sped in their voyage, I doe not finde. It seems that by the carelesse wing of some victories, they drew losse you themselves: and finally tooke that occasion, to follow their companions back into their owne Countriey.

As for Perseus he thought it not expedient, in the noueltie of his Reigne, to embroyle himselse in a warre so dangerous, as that with the Romans was likely to proue. Wherefore hee wholly gaue his minde to the fettling of his Estate: which well done, he might afterwards accommodate himselfe, as the condition of his affaires should require, either for warre or peace. To preuent all danger of rebellion : he quickly tooke away the life of Antigonus. To winne loue of his people; he 20 fate personally to heare their causes in judgement (though herein hee was so ouerdiligent and curious, that one might have perceived this his vertue of inflice to be no better than fained) as also he gratified them with many delightfull spectacles, magnificently by him set forth. Aboue all, he had care to avoide all necessitie of war with Rome: and therefore made it his first worke, to fend Embassadors thither, to renue the league; which he obtained, and was by the Senate saluted King, and friend vnto the State. Neither was he negligent in feeking to purchase good will of the Greekes, and other his neighbours : but was rather herein so excessively bountifull, that it may feeme a wonder, how in few yeeres, to his vtter ruine, he became fogriping and tenacious. His teare was indeed the mastring passion, which ouer- 30 ruled him, and changed him into so many shapes, as made it hard to discernewhich of his other qualities were naturally his owne. For proofe of this, there is requifite no more, than the relation of his actions past and following.

The Romans continued, as they had long, busses in warres against the Spaniards and Ligarians; people often vanquished, and as often breaking forth into new rebellion. They also conquered Istrate, subduced the rebelling Sandanians; and had some quarrels, though to little effect, with the Illyrians and others. Once the Carshaginians they bore(as euer lines the victory) a heavy hand: and suffered Massamilla to take from them what he listed. The Carthaginians, like obedient vasilates to keep from the Article of peace, except were with leave of the Romans. Massamilla therefore had great advantage ouer them: and was not ignorant how to vicit. He could get possession by force, of what source the desired, ere their complaining Embassadours could be at Rome: and then were the Ramans not hardly entreated, to leave things as they found them.

So had Hee once dealt before, in taking from them the Countrie of Emporia: and so did hee vse them againe and againe; with pretence of title, where hee had any; otherwise, without it. Galathe Father of Maslanisia had wonne some land from the Carthaginians; which afterward Syphax wanne from Gala, and within awhile, restored to the right owners, for loue of his Wise Sephonisha, 50 and of Aslanisa his Father-in-law. This did Maslanisa take from them by force: and by the Romans, to whose judgement the case was reserved, was permitted quietly to hold it. The Carthaginians had now good experience, how beneficiall it was for their Estate, to vse all maner of submissione obedience to Rome.

They had scarcely digested his injury, when Masanissa came upon them againe, and tooke from them aboue seventie townes and Castles, without any colour of right. Hereof by their Embaffadors they made lamentable complaint vnto the Roman Senate. They shewed how grieuously they were oppressed by reason of two articles in their League: That they should not make warre, out of their own lands; nor with any Confederates of the Romans. Now although it were fo, that they might lawfully withstand the violence of Mafaniffa, inuading their Country, howfocuer he was pleafed to call it his: yet fince he was confederate with the Romans, they durft not prefume to beare defensive armes against him, but suffered them-10 felues to be caten vp, for feare of incurring the Romans indignation. Wherfore they entreated, that either they might have fairer inflice; or be suffered to defend their owne by firong hand; or at leaft, if right must wholly give place to favor, That the Romans yet would be pleased to determine, how farre forth Masanissa should bee allowed, to proceed in these outrages. If none of these petitions could be obtained, then defired they, that the Romans would let them understand, wherein they had offended fince the time that Scipio gave them peace; and vouchfale to inflict on them fuch punishment, as they themselves in honour should thinke meete: for that better and more to their comfort it were, to suffer at once what should be appointed by fuch Judges; than continually to line in feare, and none otherwise draw 20 breath than at the mercie of this Numidian Hangman. And herewithall the Embaffadours threw themselves proftrate on the ground, weeping in hope to move compatition. Here may wee behold, the fruits of their enuy to that valiant house of the Barchines; of their irrefolution, in profecuting a war fo important, as Hannibal made for them in Italy; and of their halfe penny worthing, in matter of expence, when they had aduentured their whole estate, in the purchase of a great Empire. Now are they feruants, even to the feruants of those men, whose fathers they have often chased, slaine, taken, and sold as bondslaves in the streets of Carthage, and in all Cities of Africke and Greece. Now have they enough of that Roman peace, which Hanno to often and to earnestly defired. Onely they want peace with Ma-30/anissa, once their mercinarie, and now their master, or rather their tormentor; out of whose cruell hands, they beseech their masters to take the office of correcting them. In such case are they, and adore the Romans, whom they see flourishing in such prosperitie as might have beene their owne. But the Romans had farre better entreated Varro, who lost the battell at Canne; then Hannibal that wanne it was vied by the Carthaginians: they had freely bestowed, every man of them, all his private riches, vpon the Common-wealth; and employed their labours for the publike, without crauing recompence: as alfothey had not thought it much, though being in extreme want, to fet out an armie into Spaine, at what time the enemie lay under their owne wals. These were no Carthaginian wertues: and there-to fore the Carthaginians having fought against their betters, must patiently endure the miseries belonging to the vanquished. Their pittifull behauiour bred peraduenture fomecommiseration; yet their teares may feeme to haue beene miserused, as proceeding no lesse from enuie to the Romans, than from any seeling of their own calamitie. They thought themselues able to fight with Masanifes: which climation of their forces was able to make them, after a little while, enter into comparisons with Rome. Wherefore they obtained no such leaue as they sought, of deforming their owneright by armes: but contrarivite, when without leaue obtained they presumed so that offence. At the present, they received a gentle answer; though they had not as yet craued audience. He was therefore called before the Senate; where he not as yet craued audience. He was therefore called before the Senate; where hee was demanded the reason of his comming; and had related vnto him the complaint made the Carthiginian against his Father. Hee answered, That his Father not being throughly aware of any Embassadours thirther fert from Carthige.

had therefore not given him inftructions, how to deale in that bufineffe. Onely it was knowne, that the Carthaginians had held counsell divers nights, in the Temple of Asculapius: whereupon he himselse was dispatched away to Rome, there to entreat the Senate, that these common enemies of the Romans and of his Father might not be ouermuch trufted; especially against his Father, whom they hated most maliciously, for his constant faith to the People of Rome. This answere gaue little fatisfaction. Wherefore the Senate replyed, that for Majaniffa his fake, they had done, and would doe, what focuer was reasonable; but that it stood not with their inflice, to allow of this his violence, in taking from the Carthaginians those lands, which by the couenants of the league, were granted vnto them freely 10 to enjoy. With this milde rebuke they dismissed Gulussa; bestowing on him friendly presents (as also they did on the Carthaginians) and willing him to tell his father, that he should doe well to send Embassadors, more fully instructed in this matter. This happened when the Macedonian warre was even ready to begin: at which time the Romans were not willing, too much to offend, either the Carthaginians, (for feare of vrging them vnfeafonably to rebellion) or Mafanissa, at whose hands they expected no little helpe. So were they aided both by the Carthaginians, and Mafaniffa: by the Carthaginians, partly for feare, partly for hope of better viage in the future; by Ma/amiffa, in way of thankfulneffe; though if it had happened (which was vnlikely) that they should bee vanquished; hee made none other ac- 20 count, than that all Africke round about him and Carthage therewithall should bee

In the midst of all these cares, the Romans had not beene vnmindfull of Perseus. They visited him daily with Embassadours; that is, with honourable spies to obferue his behaulour. These Hee entertaind kindly at first, vntill (which fell out ere long) he perceived whereto their diligence tended. First they quarrelled with him about the troubles in Dardania: neither would they take any fatisfaction, vntill the Bastarna were thence gone; though he protested, that hee had not sent for them. Afterward they pried narrowly into his doings; and were no leffe ill contented with good offices, by him done to fundry of his neighbours, than with those 30 wrongs, which they faid(that he did vnto other fome. Where he did harme to any; they called it, making warre vpon their friends: Where hee did good; they called fuch his bounty, feeking friends to take his part against them. The Dolopsans, his subjects, upon what occasion it is uncertaine) rebelled, and with exquisite torments flue Euphranor, whom he had appointed their governour. It seemes that Euphranor had played the Tyrant among them. For they were a people without strength to refift the Macedonian: and therefore vnlikely to have prefumed to farre, vnleffe either they had beene extremely prouoked; or elfe were fecretly animated by the Romans. What locucrit was that bred this courage in them: Perfess did soone allay it, and reclaime them by strong hand. But the Romans tooke very angerly this pre- 40 fumption of the King: euen as if hee had inuaded some Countrie of their Italian confederates, and not corrected his owne Rebels at home. Faine they would have had him to draw in the same yoke with the Carthaginians; wherto had he humbled once his necke, they could themselves have done the part of Majaniffa; though Eumenes, or some other fit for that purpose, had beene wanting. And to this effect, they told him, That conditions of the league betweene them were fuch, as made it vnlawfull, both to his father heretofore, and now to him, to take armes without their licence first obtained.

To the same passe they would also saine have reduced the Greekes, and generally all their adherents, euen such as had entred into league with them vpon equall 50 termes: whom viually they rewarded with a frowne, whenfocuer they prefumed to right themselves by force of Armes, without seeking first the Oracle at Rome, Hereof the Acheans had good experience: whose confidence in their proper strength made them otherwhiles bold to be their owne caruers, and whose hope of extraordinarie fauour at Rome caused them the more willingly to referre their causes to arbitrement. For when they went about to have chalfiled the Messensans by warre; T. Quintim rebuked them, as too arrogant, in taking such a worke in hand, without his authoritie: yet by his authoritic he ended the matter, wholly to their good liking. Semblably at other times were they reprehended, even with Lordly threats, when they tooke vpon them to carry any butinesse of importance, by their owne power, without standing vnto the good grace of the Romans. Who neuerthelesse, vpon submission, were apt enough to doe them right. Thus were they tamed by little and little, and taught to forget their absolute liberty, as by which they were to not like to thrive; especially in viurping the practice of armes, which belonged only to the Imperiall Citic. In learning this hard leffon, they were fuch vntoward Pohloleget 51; schollers, that they needed, and not long after felt, very sharp correction. Yet was 653. there no small part of blame to be imputed vnto their Masters. For the Roman Senate, being defirous to humble the Acheans; refused not onely to give them such aide as they requested, and as they challenged by the tenour of the League betweeve them; but further, with a careleffe infolencie, rejected this honest and reafonable petition, That the Enemie might not be supplied from Italie, with victuals or armes. Herewith not content, The Fathers, as wearied with dealing in the affaires of Greece, pronounced openly, That if the Argines, Lacedamonians, or Coorinthians, would revolt from the Acheans; they themselves would thinke it a businesseno way concerning them. This was presently after the death of Philopamen: at what time it was beleeved, that the Common-wealth of Achaia was like to fall into much diffresse; were it not veheld by countenance of the Romans. All this notwithstanding; when Lycortas Prætor of the Acheans had vtterly subdued the Mellemans far sooner than was expected; and when as not onely no Towne rebelled from the Acheans, but many entred into their corporation : then did the Romans with an ill-fauored grace, tell the same Embassadours, to whose petition they had made fuch bad answere (and who as yet were not gone out of the Citie) That they had streightly forbidden all manner of succour to be carried to Messene. Thus 30 thinking, by a fained grauitie, to have ferued their owne turnes; they manifested their condition; both to fet on the weaker, against the stronger and more sufpected; and also to assume vnto themselves a Sougraigne power, in directing all matters of warre, which diffemblingly they would have feemed to neglect. In like manner dealt they with all their confederates: not permitting any of them to make warre, whether offensiue or defensiue; though it were against meere strangers; without interpoling the authoritie of the Senate and People of Rome: vnleffe peradventure sometimes they winked at such violence, as did helpe towards the accomplithment of their owne fecret malice. Now these Roman arts how socuer many (for gainfull or timerous respects) would seeme to vidersland them; yet were Angenerally displeasing vnto all men endued with free spirits. Onely the Athenians, once the most turbulent Citie in Greece, having neither subjects of their own that might rebell, nor power wherewich to bring any into subjection; for want of more noble argument wherein to practife their eloquence that was become the whole remainder of their ancient commendations, were much delighted in flattering the most mighty. So they kept themselves in grace with the Romans, remained free from all trouble, vntill the warre of Methridates : being men vnfit for action, and thereby innocent; yet bearing a part in many great actions, as Gratulators of the Roman victories, and Pardon-crauers for the vanquished Such were the Athenians become. As for those other Common-weales and Kingdomes, that 50 with ouer-nice diligence strone to preserve their liberties and lands, from confu-

ming by piece-meale: they were to be denoured whole, and swallowed vp at once. Especially the Macedonian, as the most unpliant, and wherein many of the Greekes began to haue affiance, was necessarily to be made an example, how much better it were better to bow than to breake.

Neither

Neither Perfeus nor the Romans were ignorant, how the Greekes at this time flood affected. Perfew, by reason of his neere neighbourhood, and of the daily commerce betweene them and his subjects, could not want good information, of all that might concerne him, in their affaires. He well knew, that all of them now apprehended the danger which Philopamen had long fince foretold; of the miferable lubiection, Whereinto Greece was likely to be reduced, by the Roman patronage. Indeed they not onely perceived the approching danger: but as being tenderly fensible of their liberty, felt themselves grieved with the present subjection, wherto already they were become obnoxious: Wherefore though none of them had the courage, in matters of the publike to fall out with the Romans : yet all of them had to the care, to choose among themselves none other Magistrates, than such as affected the good of their Countrie, and would for no ambition, or other feruile respect, bee flatterers of the greatnesse which kept all in seare. Thus it seemed likely, that all domestical conspiracies would soone bee at an end; when honestic and love of the Commonweale, became the fairest way to preferment. Of this carefull prouifion for the fafety of Greece, the Romans were not throughly advertifed; eyther because things were diligently concealed from their Embassadours, whom all men knew to be little better than Spies; or because little account was made of that intelligence, which was brought in by fuch Traytors (of whom every Citie in Greece had too many) as were men vnregarded among their owne people, and therefore 20 more like to speake maliciously than truely; or perhaps because the Embassadours themselues, being all Senators, and capable of the greatest Office or charge, had no will to finde out other matter of trouble, than was fitting to their owne defires of employment. But it is hard to conceale that which many know, from those that are feared or flattered by many. The Acheans being to fend Embaffadours to Rome, that should both excuse them, as touching some point wherein they refused to obey the Senate; and informe the Senate better in the same businesse; chose one Callicrates, among others, to goe in that Embassage. By their making choise of such a man; one may perceive the advantage, which mischievous wretches, who commonly are forward in pursuing their vile desires, have against the 30 plaine fort of honest men, that least earnestly thrust themselves into the troublesome businesse of the weale publike. For this Callicrates was in such wise transported with ambition; that hee chose much rather to betray his Country, than to let any other bee of more authoritie than himselfe therein. Wherefore inflead of well discharging his credence, and alleadging what was meetest in instification of his people: he vttered a quite contrary tale; and strongly encouraged the Romans, to oppresse both the Acheans, and all the rest of Greece, with a farre more heavy hand. He told the Senate, that it was high time for them, to looke vnto the fettling of their authority, among his froward Countrimen; if they meant not wholly to forgoe it. For now there was taken vp a custome, to stand vpon points of 40 confederacie, and lawes: as if these were principally to bee had in regard; any iniunction from Rome notwithstanding. Hence grewit, that the Acheans both now, and at other times, did what best pleased themselves, and answered the Romans with excuses: as if it were enough to say, That by some condition of League, or by sorce of some Law, they were discharged, or hindred, from obeying the decrees of the Senate. This would not be fo, if He, and some other of his opinion, might have their wils: who ceased not to affirme, That no Columes or Monuments creeted. nor no solemne oath of the whole Nation, to ratific the observance of Confederacie or statute, ought to be of force, when the Romans willed the contrarie, But it was even the fault of the Romans themselves, That the multitude refused to give 50 eare vnto such perswasions. For howsoeuer in popular Estates, the sound of libertie vsed to be more plansible, than any discourse tending against it: yet if they which undertooke the maintenance of an argument, seeming neuer so bad, were fure by their so doing, to procure their owne good; the number of them would in-

increase apace, and they became the prevalent faction. It was therfore strange, how the Fathers could so neglect the advancement of those, that sought wholly to enlarge the amplitude of the Roman maiefty. More wifely, though with feditious and rebellious purpose, did the Greekes: who many times, yea and ordinarily, conferred great honours, vpon men otherwise of little account or desert; onely for having vttered some braue words against the Romans. The Fathers, hearing these and the like reasons, wherewith he exhorted them to handle roughly those that were obstinate, and by cherishing their friends, to make their partie strong; resoluted to sollow this good counfaile, in enery point; year ode presse all those that held with 10 the right, and to fet up their owne followers, were it by right or by wrong. And to Polyo, Legal, 58, this end, they not onely dealt thenceforth more peremptorily with the Acheans, than had bin their maner in former times; but wrote at the present vnto all Cities of Greece; requiring them to fee that their mandate (which was concerning the restitution of those that were banished out of Lacedamon) should bee sulfilled. Particularly in behalfe of Callierates; they admiced all men, to be fuch, and so affected, as hee was, in their feueral common-weales. With this dispatch, Callier ates returned home a joyfull man having brought his Country into the way of ruine, but himfelfe into the way of preferment. Neuertheleffe he forbore to vant himfelfe, of his eloquence vsed in the Senate. Onely he so reported his Embassage, that all men became searc-20 full of the danger, where with hee threatned those that should presume to oppose the Romans. By such arts hee obtained to be made Pretor of the Acheans: in which Magistracie, as in all his courses following, he omitted nothing, that might scrue to manifest his ready obsequiousnes vnto those whom he had made his Patrons. Now as the Romans by threatning termes wan many flatterers, and lost as many true friends: so Perfeus on the other side, thinking by liberall gifts, and hopefull promises, to assure vnto himselfe those that ill could brooke his enemies; got indeed a multitude of partakers, though little honester than his enemies had. Thus were all the Cities of Greece distracted with factions: fome holding with the Romans; fome with the Macedonian; and some few, respecting only the good of the Estates, where-30 in they lived. Hereat the Lords of the Senate were highly offended; and thought it an indignitie not fufferable, That a King, no better than their vaffall, should dare to become head of a faction against them. This therefore must be reckoned in the number of histrespasses: wherofit not any one alone, yet all of them together, shall affoord them infloccation to make war vpon him. Per/eus having finished his bufinesse among the Dolopians, made a journey to Apollo his temple at Delphi. He tooke his armic along with him; yet went, and returned, in such peaceable and friendly wife, that no place was the worfe for his journey, but the good affection towards to such as lay further off, he sent Embassadors or letters : praying them, That the 40 memory of al wrongs what focuer, done by his father, might be buried with his father, fince his own meaning was to hold friendship fincerely with all his neighbors. The Romans perhaps could have beene pleased better, if he had behaved himselse after a contrary falhion, and done some acts of hostilitie in his passage. Yet as if he ought not to have taken such a journey, without their licence, this also was made a valuable matter, and cast into the heap of his faults. He laboured greatly to recouer the loue of the Achaans: which his father had so lost, that by a solemne decree, they forbade any Macedonian to enter their territories. It was jealousie perhaps no lesse than hatred, which caused them, at the first, to make such a decree. For how soeuer Philip had by many vileacts, especially by the death of the two Arati, given them 50 cause to abhor him: yet in the publike administration of their estate, he had, for the more part, been to them so beneficiall, that not without much adoe and at length, him generally increased therby. With those that were in his way, he dealt himselfe;

without any generall consent, they resolved to for sake him. Wherfore it was needfull, euen for preservation of concord among them, to vie al circumspection; that he might not, by his agents, negotiate, and hold intelligence with any, in a country, towards him to doubtfully affected : especially when by hearkening to his messages, they might make themselves suspected by their new friends. But the continuance of this decree, beyond the time of warre, and when all danger of innovation was past; was vnciuill, if not inhumane, as nourishing deadly hatred, without leaving meanes of reconciliation. And hereof the Achaens reaped no good fruit. For although they were not, in like fort, forbidden the Kingdome of Macedon: yet vnderstanding what would be due to them, if they should aduenture thither, none of them durft fet foot therein. Hence it came to paffe, that their bondmen, knowing a safe harbour, out of which their masters could not fetch them, ran daily away, in table vic. But Per/eus took hold vpon this occasion: as fitly ferning to pacific those, whose enmitie faine he would have changed into loue. He therefore apprehended all these fugitives, to send them home againe: and wrote vnto the Asheans, That as for good will vnto them, he had taken paines to reftore back their feruants; fo should they doe very well to take order for keeping them, that hereafter they might not runne away againe. His meaning was readily understood, and his letters kindely accepted by the greater part; being openly rehearfed by the Pretor, before the Councell. But Callierates tooke the matter very angerly; and bade them be aduised what they did : for that this was none other, than a plaine denice, to make them depart from the friendship of the Romans. Herewithall he tooke vpon him, 20 somewhat liberally, to make the Acheans before-hand acquainted with the warre, that was comming upon Perfeus from Rome. Hee told them, how Philip had made preparations for the same warre; how Demetrius had beene made away, because of his good affection to the Romans; and how Per/eus had, fince his being King, done

many things, tending to the breach of peace. Briefly He rehearled all those matters, which were afterwards alleaged by the Romans; the invalion of the Ballarne, vpon the Dardanians; the Kings journey against the Dolopians; his voyage to Delphi; and finally, his peaceable behaulour, which was (he faid) a dangerous temptation of men to his party. Whereforehe aduited them, to expect the cuent of things,

Hereto good answere was made by the Pretors brother: That Callicrates was too earnest, in so light a matter; and that, being neither one of the Kings cabbinet, nor of the Roman Senate, he made himselfe too well acquainted with all that had pas-fed, or was like to follow. For it was well knowne, that Perfeus had renued his league with the Romans; that he was by them faluted King, and friend to the Estate; and that He had louingly entertained their Embassadors. This being so: why might not the Acheans, as well as the Atolians, Thessalians , Epirots, and all the Greekes, hold with him such correspondence, as common humanitie required? Neuerthe-leffe Callicrates was growne a man fo terrible, by his Roman acquaintance, that they ther deliberation: and answere made the whilest, That since the King had onely sent a letter without any Embassadour; they knew not how to resolue. Better it was to say thus, than that they were afraid to doe as they thought most reasonable and convenient. But when Perfess, here with not contented, would needs vrge them further, and fend Embassadors: then were they faine, without any good pretence, to put on a countenance of anger, & deny to give audience: which was proofe sufficient (to one that could understand ) of the condition wherein they lived. For harkening to this aduice of Callicrates; they were foone after highly commended

by a Roman Embassador: whereby it became apparent, that the Romans intended

But they, by their authoritie, would end the businesses, to his content. But in conclusion, by the helpe of the Kings Prusias and Ariarathes, he ended the warre himselse; and brought the Enemies to seeke and accept peace, on such conditions 20 as pleased him to give them. After this being at good leifure; hee began to confider, how the affaires of Macedon stood under Perfeus. His hatred to Perfeus was very great : and therefore hee was glad to understand, that the hatred of the Romans, to the fame his Enemy, was as great, and withall notorious. Now belides his ancient and hæreditarie quarrell with the Macedonian; it vexed him exceedingly, That his owne honours (whereof the Greeker, produgal in that kinde, had heaped immoderate store on his father and him) began to wax every where stale: whilest Perfeus, either by his currying fauour, or by the enuie borne to the Romani, had gotten their best liking and wishes. For despight of this indignitie, Hee stirred vp the Lycians against the Rhodians his old friends: and in helping these rebels was so 30 violent, that he proceeded, in a manner, to open warre. But small pleasure found he, in these poore and indirect courses of revenge. The Lycians could not be saued by his patronage, from scuere and cruell chastisement, given to them by the Rhodians. This ren 'ed him contemptible: as likewife, his acts of hostilitie, little different from robberies, made him hatefull to those which loued him before. As for his Polyb. Legat. 74. honours in the Cities of Greece; they not onely continued falling into neglect; but were abrogated by a decree of the Acheans, as too vnmcasured, misbeleeming them to give, and affected by him beyond the proportion of his descruings. All this which he needed not to have regarded, had he not beene too vainely ambiti- Linis fib. 42. ous) befell him, especially for his being ouer-serviceable to the Romans, and for his 40 malice to that noble Kingdome, which it it fell, the libertie of Greece was not like to fland. Now for the redreffe hereof; hee thought it vaine to strine any longer with bounty, against such an aduersarie, as by hopefull promises alone, without any great performance, had ouer-topped him in the generall fauor. And therfore he resoluted euen to ouerturne the foundations of this Popularitie, by inducing the Romans vtterly to take away from the eyes of men, this Idol, The Macedonian Kingdome, which all so vainely worshipped. Neither would it proue a difficult matter, to perswade those that were already desirous: rather hee was like to bee highly thanked, for fetting forward their wishes; and perhaps to be recompenced with some piece of the Kingdome, as he had been rewarded, for the like seruice, 50 when Antiochius was vanequished.

To this end, he made a fecond voyage to Rome: where though hee had little to fay which they knew not before; yet his words were heard with fuch attention, as if they had contained some strange noueltie, and so pondered by the Fathers, as if the weight of them were to turne the ballance, that before was equall. of Demetrius, the expedition of the Bastarna into Dardania; that of Perseus himfelfe against the Dolopians, and to Delphiz, the great estimation of the Macedonian in Greece; his intermeddling in bulineffe of neighbours; his riches; and his great prouilions: were all the material points of Eumenes his discourse. Only He descended vnto particulars, having fearched into all (as hee professed) like vnto a Spie. Hee faid, That Perfess had thirty thousand foot, and fine thousand Horse of his owne; money in a readinesse to entertaine ten thousand mercinaries for ten yeeres; armes, to furnish a number thrice as great; The Thracians his friends at hand, readie, at a call, to bring him foldiours as many as he should require; and that he prepared victuals for ten yeeres, because he would not be driven, either to line vpon 10 spoile, or to take from his owne subjects. Herewithall Hee prayed them to confider, that King Seleneus the fonne and fucceffor of Antiochus the Great, had given his daughter Laodice in marriage to Perfeus; Perfeus not wooing, but Seleucus offering the match; That King Prusas of Bithynia, by carnell suite, had gotten to wife the lister of Perfeus; and that these mariages were solemnized with great concourse of Embailages from all quarters. Neither spared Hee to tell them, (though seeming loth to vtter it plainely) That even the envis of their Estate was the cause. why many that could not endure to heare of amitie with Philip, were now growne maruelloufly well affected to his sonne. All this, and some facts of Persens, which might either bee denied, or instified (as that hee had procured the death of some 20 which were friends to the Romans; and that hee had expelled Abrypolis the Illyrian, who invaded Macedon, out of his Kingdome or Lordship) Eumenes failed not to amplifie vnto the most: saying that he thought it his dutie to forewarne them; fince it would bee to Himselfe agreat shame, if Perseus got the start of him, and were in Italie making warre vpon the Romans, ere Eumenes could come thither to tell them of the danger. It were too great folly, to believe that the Romans flood in feare of Perfeus, left hee should set upon them in italie. Neverthelesse for a smuch as they loved not to make warre without faire pretence, not only of wrong done to them or their affociates, but of further hurt intended: great thankes were given to Eumenes, who had 30 euery way firmished them with such goodly colour, to beautific their intendment. Now though it were fo, that He told them little elfe than what they knew before: yet his person, and the manner of his comming, made all seeme greater. For if vpon any relation made by their owne Embassadours, or vpon tales denised by their flatterers and spies, they had warred against Perseus, ere Hee had committed any open act of hostilitic against them; their injustice, and oppression, would have beene most manifest. But when the wrongs to them done were so notorious, and the danger threatning them fo terrible; that fuch a Prince as Eumenes, came out of his owne Kingdome, as farre as from Asia, to bid them looke to themselues: who could blamethem, if they tooke the speediest order to obtaine their owne right and 40 fecuritie? Toward this justification of the warre, and magnifying the necessitie that enforced them thereto; their more then viuall curiolitie, in concealing what Eumenes had vetered in the Senate, when they could not but understand that his errand was well knowne; helped not a little. The Macedonian and Rhodian Embaffadors were at Rome, provided of answeres to the words, which they knew beforehand that he would speake; and with matter of recrimination. The vanity, either of Him, or of some about him, seemes to have disclosed all: when the warinesse of the Fathers, in hiding that which all menknew, made a notable shew of fome fearefull apprehension; against which, it behooved their wisedome to neglect no possible remedy. Wherefore carelesse audience was given to the Rhodian -50 Embassadours; who accused Eumenes, as one more troublesome to Asia, than Antiochus had euer been, and a prouoker of the Lycians to rebellion. The Rhodians had with great pompe, conveighed by Sea vnto Perfew, his bride Laodice; which friendly office as the Macedonian bountifully requited, so the Romans despightfully accepted. Hence it grew, that when the Lycians, as alreadic vanquilhed, were fettling Polyb.Legat. themselues in their obedience to the people of Rhodes: Embassadours came from Rome with strange newes, which gaue new life to the rebellion. For the Senate pronounced, That it flood not with the manner of the Romans, to aliene quite from their owne protection any people or Nation by them vanquished; and that the Lycians were by them affigned vnto those of Rhodes, not as meere validls, but as dependants and affociates. For proofe hereof, they referred themselves vnto the commentaries of the ten Embassadors, whom they had sent to dispose of things in Asia, after the victorie against King Antiochus, Hereat Eumenes, Mafaniffa, The Atolians, 10 and all other Kings or Estates, that were beholding to Rome for increasing the number of their subjects, had cause to find themselves agricued if they well considered the matter: fince by force of this or the like decree, these their subjects might easily be made their fellowes, when soeuer it should please the Senate: though it were so, that all men knew the present meaning of the Senate, which was only to plague the Rhodians, for their good will to Perfeus, by fetting them and the Lycians together by the cares. The Fathers could therfore see no reason to dislike Eumenes, vpon this complaint made by the Rhodian Embassadours; which indeed more neerely touched themselves. Rather they honoured the King so much the more: for that others (as they would needes take it) conspired against him, because of his loue to

CHAP. 6. S.5.

But the Macedonian Embassage they heard not so carelessely as angrily: though peraduenture it well contented them to find cause of anger. For whereas at other times all care had been taken, to pacific them with gentle words and excuses: now heard they plainer language, and were told, That King Perfess defired much to giue them satisfaction, concerning any deed or word of his, that might sauour of hostilitie; but that, if his trauaile in this kind proued vaine, then would be be ready to defend himselfe by armes, and stand to the chance of warre, which often falles out contrarie to expectation. These big words may seeme to have proceeded from the vehemencie of Harpalus, that was chiefe of the Embassadors; rather than from 30 instruction given by the King, with whose faint heart they agreed not. Yet was there good reason, why Perseus himselfe might, at this time, thinke to speed better by a shew of daring, than he was like to doe by any submission. For the eyes of all Greece being now cast vpon him, as on the greatest hope of deliuerance from the Roman servitude; it was not expedient, that he should lessen, or perhaps veterly cut off, the generall expectation, and the good affection borne to him, which thereon depended, by discouering his too much weakenesse of spirit, vnanswerable to a worke of such importance. Wherefore He, or his Embassadour for him, was bold to let a good countenance on a game not very bad, but subject (in appearance) to Fortune; which might have beene his, had he knowne how to vie it.

Now that this braueric (as better it may bee termed than courage) proceeded from the Kings owne heat; it appeares by his daring to aduenture soone after, on a practice that more justly might anger the Romans, and give them fairer shew of reason to make warre vpon him. It was knowne that Eumenes, in returning home, would take Delphi in his way, and there doe facrifice to Apollo. Per few deadly hating him, and thirsting after his bloud, resolved to way-lay him, and by making there of him a facrifice, to rid his owne hands of a most mischienous enemie. So there were appointed three or foure flout ruffians to do the murder: who placing themfelues behind a broken mud wall, on the fide of a very narrow path leading vp from the Sea to the Temple; did thence affault the King; whom they forely bruited 50 with great flones, and left for dead. They might have finished their worke; such was the opportunitie of the place which they had chosen; but feare of being apprehended, made them, without staying to see all sure, see in such haste, that they killed one of their owne companions, who could not hold pace with them, because he should not discouer them. Eumenes was conveighed away to the little Isle of A-gina, where he was cured: being all the while kept fo fecretly, that the fame of his death was current in Asia. Hence it came, that his brother Attalus tooke vpon him as king, and either took or would have taken to wife (supposing it belike a matter of flate ) Stratonica the daughter of King Ariarathes , whom hee then thought the widdow of Eumenes. It may well be numbred among the rare examples of brotherly love, That when the King returned aline home, Attalus going forth to meet him and doe his dutie, as in former times, received none other checke, than that Hee should for beare to marrie with the Queene, until Hee were well affured of the Kings death. More than this, Eumenes neuer spake of these matters; but bequeathed at his death, vnto the same brother, both his wife and Kingdome. As likewise At 10 talus forbore to attempt any thing to the prejudice of the King his brother: though the Romans (with whom he continued and grew in especial) fauour, when Eumenes fell into their hatred) were in good readinesse, to have transferred the Kingdome from his brother to Him. By fuch concord of brethren was the Kingdome of Pergamus rayled and veheld: as might also that of Macedon have beene, if Demetrius had liucd and employed his grace with the Romans, to the benefit of

It is likely that Perfeus was very glad when he understood, that his ministers had both accomplished his will, and had faued all from discouerie. But as hee was deceiued in the maine point, and heard shortly after, that Eumenes lived: so was He 20 beguiled in that other hope, of the concealement; which hee vainly effeemed the leffe materiall. For He had written to one Praxo a Gentlewoman of Delphi, to entertaine the men whom he fent about this busines: and she being apprehended by C. Valerius a Roman Embassador then attending vpon the matters of Greece, was carried to Rome. Thus allcame to light Velerius also brought with him to Rome, out of Greece, one Rammius a Citizen of Brundusium: who comming newly from the court of Macedon, loaden with a dangerous fecret; bad prefently fought out the Embassador, and thereof discharged himselse. Brundusium was the ordinary Port, for ships paffing betweene Halie and Greece. There had Rammius a faire house; wherein he gaue entertainment, being a wealthie man, to Embaffadours, and other honoura- 30 ble personages, both Romans and Macedonians, journying to and fro. By occasion of fuch his hospitalitic, he was commended to Perfeus, and inuited into Macedon with friendly letters; as one, whose many courtesses to his Embassadours, the King was studious to requite. At his comming he was much made of; and shortly, with more familiaritie than he expected or defired, made partaker of the Kings fecrets. The fumme of all was. That he must needs doe a turne, in giving to luch of the Romans as the King should hereafter name, a poylon of rare qualitie, sure in operation, yet not to be perceived either in the taking or afterward. He durst not refuse to accept this employment: for feare left the vertue of this medicine should bee tryed vpon himselfe. But being once at libertieshe discouered all. Rammius was but one man, 40 and one whom the King had never seene before, nor was like to see againe; and therefore, besides that the Kings deniall ought to be as good as such a sellowes affirmation, the accusation was improbable. Thus did Perseus, in time shortly following, answer for himselfe; and in like fort concerning the attempt vpon Eumenes: denying to have had any hand, either in the one or other: yet withall profelling, That such objections were not to bee made vnto a King, to proue the rightfulneffe of making war vpon him; but rather vnto a subject pleading for his life in judgment. But howfocuer the Romans neglected the getting of stronger proofe (which might have bin easie) than any that we find by them produced yet the base and cowardly temper of Perfess was very futcable to these practices. Neither did the Senate greatly fland 50 to dispute the matter with him: these his treacheries being held in excusable. And as for his Royall Estate, wherein he supposed that they ought not to touch him for fuch private offences, it gave him no priviledge: they judging him to have offended in the nature of a King. Herein furely they wanted not good reason. For if hee might not lawfully make warre vpon Eumenes their confederate; that is, if Hee might not fend men, to waste the Kingdom of Pergamue, or to beliege the Towns: might he fend Ruffians to murder the King? If it were no leffe breach of the league to destroy the Senators by fire or famine, than by violence of the sword: was it lawfull for him to doe it by Poylon? Wherefore they prefently decreed warre against him; and sent Embassadours to denounce it vnto him, vnlesse hee would yeeld to make such amends as they should require. He seemes at this time to have been so confident in the generall fauour of Greece, and other comfortable appearances; that if he defired not warre, yet he did not feare it: or at least he thought by 10 fhew of courage, to make his enemies the more calme. He caused the Embaffadors to dance attendance, till being weary, they departed without audience. Then called he them backe; and bade them do their errand. They made a tedious rehearfall of all matters, which they had long been collecting against him, and wherewith Eumenes had charged him: adding therto, that He had entertained long and secret conference in the Ile of Samothrace, with Embassadours sent to him out of Asia, about some ill purpose. In regard of all which they peremptorily required satisfaction; as was their maner when they intended to give defiance. Better they might have flood vpon the evidence, brought against him by Rummius and Praxo. For if those accusations could be verified, then wanted they not good ground wheron to 20 build: of which otherwise they were destitute; it being no fault in a King, to bee firong, welbeloued, and well friended. Perfeus answered, for the present, in a rage; calling the Romans, Greedy, Proud, Infolent, & underminers of him by their daily Embassadors, that were no better then meere spies. Finally, hee promised to give them in writing their ful answere: which was to this effect; That he would no longer stand to the league, made betweene them and his father, and renewed by himfelfe indeed onely for feare: but wished them to descend to more equal conditions, whereupon he, for his part, would aduife, as they might also doe for theirs.

CHAP.6. S.s. of the Historie of the World.

In the forme of the league betweene Philip and the Romans, as it is fet downe Polyb Legal, e. by Polybius, we finde no condition, binding the Masedonian to any inconvenience

30 in the future; excepting those which he immediatly performed. But Linie inserts Lin. Sib. 330 a clause, whereby hee was expresly forbidden, to make any warre abroad, without leave of the Romans. It is most likely, that all the Roman confederats were included in this peace: whereby enery one of the neighbours round about Macedon, entring shortly into league with Rome, did so binde the Kings hands, that hee could no more make warre abroad, than if hee had been restrained by plaine couenant. And thus might that seeme an Article of the peace, which neuer was agreed vpon, but onely was inferred by consequence. Now if the Romanes would vrge this point further, and fay, that the Macedonian might not beare defensive armes, without their permission: then had Perfess very just reason to finde himselfe agricued. 40 For since they had allowed his father, without controlle, to make warre in Thrace, (whileft they themselves were vnacquainted with the Thracians) and elsewhere abroad, though he asked not their licence: why should they now interpret the bargaine after another fashion? Was it now become vnlawfull for him to chastise his owne Rebels, or to repay an Illyrian that inuaded Macedon? By fuch allegations hee maintained the right of his cause, in very milde sort; when it was too late. At the present, by disclaiming the league as vniust, hee ministred occasion vnto the Embaffadours, to give him defiance. Having heard the worst of their message; hee commanded them to be gone out of his kingdome in three dayes. But either hee should have been lesse vehement, or more constant in his resolution. For if his 50 heart could ferue him to undertake the warre; hee should couragiously haue managed it, and haue fallen to worke immediatly, while fithe Enemie was vnprepared, nor have lost opportunity, as now and often he did, in hope of obtaining a worse peace than the former.

The Roman Commanders unfortunate in the warre against PERSBUS. They were the Greekes their friends; for whose ease the Senate makes provision, having heard their complaints. The flattering Alabanders.

O long had the Romans beene feeking occasion to take in hand this Macedonian warre, that well they might have been ready for it, when at came; and not (as they were) behinde-hand in provisions. But it was on a fudden that they met with a confluence of good pretences 20 to make the warre: whereof, if no one alone had weight enough, yet all of them together feemed more than sufficient. This opportunitie of making their cause honest in common opinion, was not to be neglected: though otherwise they were unprepared for the action. Wherefore knowing, or having reason to beleeue, that their owne strength was such as would prevaile in the end; they hastily embraced the faire occasion of beginning, and referred other cares to the diligence of Time. Neither was this their vnreadinesse a small helpe, towards examining the disposition of the Greekes, and others; who must afterwards dearely pay for any backwardnesse found in their good will. There was not indeede any cause to feare, that all of the Greekes or other Easterne people should conspire together, 30 and take part with the Macedonian : luch was the diffention betweene their feneral estates; howsoener the generalitie of them were inclined the same way. Neuertheleffe Embaffadours were fent to deale with them all; and to craue their helpe against Perfews, or rather to demand it, in no leffe ample manner, than heretofore they had yeelded it against Philip and Antiochus, in warres pretending the liberty of Greece. The Embassadours vsed as gentle words for fashions sake, as if they had flood in doubt, that their request might happen to be denied. But the Greekes were now growne well acquainted with fuch Roman courtefie : and vnderstood that not onely fuch as made refufall, but even they who might feeme to have granted halfe vnwillingly; were like to heare other manner of words, when once this businesse 40 was ended. Wherefore none of them were scrupulous in promising the best of their helpe to the Romans; * the Acheans and Rhodians, which were chiefe among them, being rather doubtfull, even when they had done their best, lest it should be ill taken, as if they had halted in some part of their duetie. It is firange, that men could bee so earnest to set up the side, whereof they gladly would have feene the ruine. The vulgar fort was enery where addicted to Perfeus; of the Nobles and Rulers, if some were vehemently Roman, they wanted not opposers, that were wholly Macedonian; yea, the wifest and most honest, who regarded onely the benefit of their Countrey, wished better to Perfeus than to the Romans. And of this number, Polybius the chiefe of Historians was one : who 50 though Hee * judged the victoric of Perfew, like to prooue hurtfull vnto Greece; yet wished hee the Romanes ill to thrine, that so the Greekes might recouer perfect libertie: for his endeuours in which course, hee was at length tyrannically handled, as shall bee shewed hereafter. This considered, it appeares, that an extraordinary feare, and not onely reuerence of the Imperiall Cit e, made the Acheans and other Effaces of Greece, thus conformable to the Romans. The occalion of this their feare, may be inftly imputed vnto the timorous demeanour of Perfesse himfelfe. He had vindertaken a warre, whereof the benefit should redound, not only to his own Kingdom, but vnto all that were oppressed by the Romans, Yet no sooner were some few companies brought ouer sea, to make a countenance of meaning fornewhat against him, than he began to speake the enemie faire, and sue for peace at Rome. Since therefore it was knowne, that every small thing would ferue to terrific him; and confequently, that it should at all times be in the Romans 10 power, by giving him any tolerable conditions of peace, to take revenge at leifure vpon thole which had affifted him: little cause was there, why any should aduenture to partake with him. He made indeed a great noise; leading about his armie; taking by force or composition, some few townes; and folliciting all to joyne with him. But wife men could not be fo beguiled. For at the fame time, hee fought all meanes of pacification; and to that end, made buthble fuit vnto the Roman Embaffadors, O. Martius, the chiefe of those Embassadors, and a man of more finenesse in cunning than was viuall among the Romans; made flow of inclination to the Kings defire; and gaue out fuch comfortable words, that the King intreated, and obtained a meeting at the River Peneus, There did Martius very gently rebuke the King, and 20 charge him with those crimes that are before mentioned. Whereto though Perfew made none other answer; than the same which they could have made for him; yet the Embassadors, and especially Martius, tooke it in good part, as therewith satisfied; and aduised him to give the like fatisfaction to the Senate. That this might conveniently bee done; a truce was agreed upon. Thus had Martin his desire; which was to make the King lofe time. For Perfew had all things then in readines, and might have done much ere the Roman army could have been in Greece. But by the interpolition of this truce, he no way increased his forces; he suffred a most conuenient season, of winning vpon the enemie, to slip away; and obtained in recompence nothing elfe, than leifure and vaine hope. Yet was he pleafed herewith, as it 30 had bin with some victory: publishing a copic of the disputation between him and the Romans, whereby he gaue men to vnderstand, how much he had the better, and what great hope there was of Peace. He fent Embassadors also to the Rhodians, of whose good will to him he was best perswaded; not onely to let them know how much he was superiour in cause; but to intrest them, that they would take voon them, as moderators; to compound the differences betweene him and the Romans, if perhaps, notwithstanding the goodnesse of his cause, he should be denied peace. These were poore helps. For hereby it appeared, that his late standing upon point of Honor, was no better than meere vanity; his owne fafety being the vimoft of his ambition. This his fearefulnes might feeme excusable, and the blame therof to ap-40 pertaine vnto the Greekes, who deceived his expectation, by being wanting to him in time of a necessity, that was partly their own had it not bin his office, who tooke vpon him as their Champion, to give fuch a manly beginning to the war, as might incourage al others to follow him. But his timorous quality being found, men grew daily more and more averse from him; and were carefull, not to put their shoulders to a falling wall. The Rhodians, among whom he had many flout partizans, defired him not to crave any thing at their hands, in which they might seeme to do against the good liking of the Romans. The Baotians also, who hadentred of late into a firict focietie with the Macedonian; renounced it now, and made the like with the Romans: to whom further, in a fort, they yeelded the felues as valials. Neither was 50 Martius contented to accept their submission under a generall forme; but caused their feuerall townes to make couchant apart each for it felfe; to the end, that being thus distracted into many little common weales they might not (were they never fo defirous to rebell) have such forceto do hurt, as when they agreed, and were incorporated in one, under the Citic of Thebes. This work, of separating the Baotians from Thebes their head; was more than Agesslaw could effect, or Epaminondus would fuffer, than when all Greece followed the Lacedemonians. So far more quailable to Thebes, being destitute of helpe from abroad, was the vertue of Epaminondas and a few braue Citizens; than was the societie with King Perfess, against a number not fo great as followed the Lacedemonians,

Martin brought this to effect, whileft the King fate fill, as being bound by the truce: and having done this, he returned to the Cities where younting what hee had wrought by his craft, he was commended, and (though some reprodued it as dishonest) employed againe by the Senate, with commission to deale as hee should thinke expedient. Touching the Embaffadours which Perfess had fent, audience 10 was given to them, for that they should not plainly see how their Master was deluded : but neither excuse, nor intreatie, would serue their turne; the Senate being resolved before-hand what to doe. It was enough that they were admitted into the Citic, and had thirty dayes respite allowed them to depart out of Italy : whereas they, who came last on the same errand, did their message without the walles, in the Temple of Bellona (the viuall place of giving audience to open Enemies, or to fuch Commanders, as might not, by reason of some custome, enter the Citie) and had onely the fhort warning of eleuen dayes, to be gone out of Italy. Neither did this poore courtefie ferue alone to hide the craft of Martins, as if hee had meant none other than good earnest: but it was a likely mean, both to keepe a long while 20 from Perfeus the knowledge of his businesse, and to stagger his resolution, when hee fhould need it moft firme.

And accordingly it fell out. For Licinius, the Roman Conful, was at Apellonia. in a maner as foone, as the Macedonian Embaffadors were with their King at Pella. Which, though it were enough to have rouzed Perfess, and have made him lay asideall cowardly hope of getting pardon: yet was hee content to deliberate awhile, Whether it were not better to offer him felfe tributary to the Romans, and to redeeme their good will with some part of his Kingdome, that so he might enioy the reft; than to put all at once to hazzard. But finally, the floutest counsel preuailed, which also was the wifest, and so would have proved, had it been stoutly 20 and wifely followed. He now began, as if the warre had not begunne vntill now, to doe what should have bin done long afore. He caused all his forces to be drawne together; and appointed their Rendeuous at Citium, a towne in Macedon, All being in readines, he did royall facrifice, with an hundred beafts, to I know not what Minerna, that was peculiarly honored in his Country: and then with all his Courtiers. and those of his guard, set forward to Citium. His armie he found confishing of nine and thirty thousand foot, and foure thousand horse: whereof about twelve thoufand foot, and a thousand horse, were strangers, of fundry Nations, most part Thracians; the rest his owne Macedonians. These hee animated with lively speeches; laying before them the glory of their ancestors, the insolencie of the Romans, the 40 goodnesse of his cause, the greatnesse of his provisions, and the many advantages which they had of the Enemic, especially in numbers. They answered him cheerefully, with loud acclamations, and bade him be of good courage. From all Citics of Macedon there came likewise messengers, offering to helpe him with money and victuals, according to their seuerall abilities. He gaue them thanks: but answered. That his owne provisions would abundantly suffice, willing them only to surnish him with carts, for his engines and munition.

Out of his owne kingdome he iffued forth into Theffalie: knowing that the Romans were to paffe through that Countrey, in their journey towardshim. Some Townes of Theffalie opened their gates vnto him, without making offer to defend 50 themselues; some he balked, thinking them too strong or well manned; and some he wanne by force. Of these last was Myle; a towne thought impregnable, and therefore, not more floutly then proudly defended by the Inhabitants, who gaue contumelious language to the affailants. It was taken by reason of a fally; which the Townelmen rathly made, and being driven backe, received the Macedonians that entred pell mell with them at the gate. All crueltie of warre was practifed heere: to the greater terror of the obstinate. So Velatia and Counsis (towns of much importance, especially Connus, which stood in the streights of Offs, leading into Tempe) yeelded at the first. Having well fortified this passage, the King marched onwards to Sycurium, a towne feated on the foot of mount Offa; where hee refted a while, expecting newes of the Enemie.

CHAP. S. S. 6.

Licenius the Conful brought with him only two Roman Legions : being promifed other strength of auxiliaries, which was thought sufficient. Eumenes, and Atta-10 les his brother came to him in Theffalie, with foure thousand foot, and a thousand horse. Thither also came, from enery part of Greece, such aide as the severall Eflates could afford, or thought expedient to fend: which from the most of them was very little. Of the kings abroad; Majaniffa fent thither his fonne Mifagenes, with a thousand foot, as many horse, and two and twentie Elephanes. Astarathes the Cappadocian, by reason of his affinitie with Eumenes, was friend to the Romans. and had fent to Rome his yong sonne, there to bee brought up: yet hee did little or nothing in this warre; perhaps because Eumenes himselfe began within awhile, but when it was too late, to be otherwise aduised than he had beene in the beginning. Prussas was content to be a looker on : as being allied to Perseus, and yet fea-20 ring the Romans. Antiochus and Ptolemie (though Ptolemie was then yong, and under Tutors) had busines of their owne; the Syrian meaning to invade the Agyptian : yet each of them promised helpe to the Romans , which they cared not to performe. Gentius the Illyrian was inclinable to the Macedonian; yet made good countenance to the Romans, for feare. It was a pretrie tricke, wherewith M. Lucreties, the Roman Admirals brother, ferued him, for this his counterfeit good will. This king had foure and fiftie shippes, riding in the hauen of Dyrrachium, vncertaine to what purpose : all which Lucretius tooke away, after a very kind fort; making shew to beleeve, That for none other ende than to serve the Romans, their good friend Gentius had fent thither this fleet. But what foeuer Gentius thought in 30 the beginning; hee foolifily loft both his kingdome and himfelte, in the ende of this warre; by offering, rather then giving, his helpe to Perfeus.

With none other company than what hee brought ouer the fea, Licinius came into Theffalie: fo tyred with a painfull journey, through the mountainous country of Athamania, which flood in his way from Epirus; that if Perfeus had beene ready, attending his descent into the Plaines, the Romans must needs have taken a great ouerthrow. He refreshed himselfe and his wearied armie, by the river Feneus; where he encamped, attending his auxiliaries, that came in as fast as they could. It was notany flender helpe, that could enable him to deale with Perfeus. Therefore he refolued, to abide where he then was, and keepe his trenches, vntill his numbers 40 were sufficiently increased : contenting himselfe in the meane while, to have gotten quiet entrance into the Country. The land of Theffalie, in which thefe two armieslay, was better affected to the Romans, than any part of Greece belides : as haning beene freed by them from a more heavie yoke of bondage to the Macedonian, when there was little hope or expectation of such a benefit. It was generally rich, fruitfull, and abounding in all things needfull to mans life. In the midft of it, but somewhat more to the East, was that beautifull valley of Tempe, so exceedingly ful of all delights, that the name was often vied at large, to fignific the most pleafant and goodly places. This valley of it selfe was not great : but adding to it those huge mountaines, Offa and Olympus (famous in Poelie) with their Spurres or branto ches, by which it was on all sides enclosed, it occupied the better part of Thessalie. And this way were the Romans to enter into Micedon; vnleffe they would make an hungric journey, thorow the countrey of the Daffaretians, as in the former warre with Philip, they had long, in vaine, attempted to doe. Perseus therefore had no fmall advantage, by being mafter of the streights leading into Tempe: though farre greater greater he might have had, if by millpending of time he had not loft it. For if in defending the ragged paffages of these mountaines, he were able to put the Romans often to the worle; yea to winne vpon them ( for a while) euery yeere more than other, both in strength and reputation : questionlesse he might have done far greaterthings, had hee feized upon the streights of Aous, which his father once kept, and defended all the countrie behinde the Mountaines of Pindus. Surely not without extreme difficultie, must the Romans have either travelled by land, with all their carriages and impediments, through places wherein was no reliefe to bee found; or else haue committed their armies, and all things thereto needefull, vnto the mercie of seas that were very dangerous; if they would have lought other way 10 into Macedon, than through the heart of Greece: vpon neither of which courses they once deuised, notwithstanding any trouble which they found in this present warre. It may perhaps be faid, that the Greekes, and others, whom the King muit haue left on his backe, would haue made him vnable to defend any places too farre from his owne home. But they were all, excepting the Theffatians, better affected now to him, than they had bin to his father in the former warre. The Atolians, vpon whom the Athamanians depended, grew into suspition with the Romans (as we shall finde anon) even as soone as they met with Perseus. The Bastians, how politikely focuer Martius had wrought with them, aduentured themselves desperately in the Micedonians quarrell: what would they bave done, if hee at first had done 20 his best? The Rhodians, Illyrians, yea and Eumenes himselfe, after awhile began to wauer, when they faw things goe better with Perfeus, then they had expected. So that if in flead of discouraging his friends, by suing basely for peace, he had raised their hopes, by any braue performance in the beginning; and encreased the number of his well-willers, yea and bought downe with money (as hee might haue done) some of his enemies, and among them Eumenes, who offered for good recompence, to forget his broken head, then might the Romans perhaps have bin compelled to for sake their imperious patronage ouer Greece; and to render the libertie, by them giuen, entire; which otherwise was but imaginarie. Such benefit of this warre, lince it was hoped for afterwards, might with greater realon haue beene ex-pected at first, from greater aduantages. But as a fearefull companie running from their enemies, till some river flay their flight; are there compelled by meere desperation to doe such actes, as done, while the battell lasted, would have wonne the victorie : fo fell it out with Perfess. In feeking to avoid the danger of that war, whereof hee should have sought the honour; hee left his friends that would have flood by him, and gaue them cause to prouide for their owne safetie: yet being ouertaken by necessitie, he chose rather to set his back to the mountaines of Tempe, and defend himselfe with his proper forces; than to bee drinen into such miserie, as was ineuitable, if he gauea little further ground. What was performed by him or the Romans, all the while that he kept his footing in Theffalse, it is hard to shew 40 particularly; for that the historie of those things is much perished. Wherefore we must be contented with the summe.

The Consul having no desire to fight, vntill such time as all his forces were arriued; kept within his trenches, and lay still encamped by the Riuer of Peneus, about three miles from Lariffa. That which perswaded the Consulto protract the time; did contrariwise incite the King, to put the matter vnto a hasty triall. Wherefore hee inuited the Romans into the field; by wasting the land of the Phereans their confederates. Finding them patient of this indignitie; he grew bold to adventure euen vnto their trenches: out of which if they iffued, it was likely, that his aduantage in horse would make the victorie his owne. At his comming they were troubled; for that it was sudden: yet no way terrified; as knowing themselves to bee fafely lodged. They fent out a few of King Eumenes his horse, and with them some light armed foot, to entertaine skirmish. The Captaine, and some other of these were flaine: but no matter of importance done; for that neither Licinius, nor Eu-

mines, found it reasonable to hazzard battell. Thus day after day, awhile together, Perfew continued offring battaile: which they ftill refused. Hereby his boldneffe much increased; and much more, his reputation: to the griefe of those, who being so farre come to make a Conquest, could ill digest the shame, that fell vpon them by their enduring these brauadoes. The towne of Sycurium, where Perfeus then lay, was twelve miles from the Romanes: neither was there any convenient watering in that long march, which vsed to take vp foure houres of the morning; but he was faine to bring water along with him in carts, that his men might not be both weary and thirstie when they came to fight. For remedie of these inconucniences, he found out a lodging, feuen miles neerer to the enemie: whom he visited the next day by the Sunnerifing. His comming at fuch an vnufuall houre, filled the Campe with tumult: in so much as though hee brought with him onely his horse and light armature, that were vnfit to affaile the trenches, yet the Consull thought it necessary, and resolued to give checke to his pride. Wherefore he sent foorth his brother C. Licinius, King Eumenes, Attalus, and many braue Captaines, with all his power of horse, his Velites, and all the rest of his light armature to trie their fortune : he himselfe remaining in the Campe, with his Legions in readinesse. The honor of this morning, was the Macedonian Kings; for he obtained the victorie in a manner entire, (though the Theffalians made a good retrait) with little loffe 20 of his owne. But he discouered his weaknesse ere night, by hearkening, as Princes commonly doe, to counfaile given by one of his owne temper. For whereas the Romans were in great feare lest he should assault their Campe; and to that purpose, vpon the first newes of his fuccesse, his Phalanx was brought vnto him by the Captaines, though vnfent for: he neuertheleffe tooke it for found aduice, which indeed was timorous and base, To worke warily, and moderate his victorie; by which meanes it was faid, that either he should get honest conditions of peace, or at leastwife many companions of his fortune. Certainly it was like, that his good fortune would exalt the hope and courage of his friends. Yet had it been greater, and had he wonne the Roman Campe, his friends would have been the more, and the bol-

30 der. But ouer-great was his folly, in hoping then for peace: and in fuing for it, euen when he had the victory, what elfe did he, than proclaim vnto all which would become his partakers, that neither good nor bad fortune should keepe him from veelding to the Romans, when socuer they would be pleased to accept him? At this time the joy of his victory would admit none of these considerations. Hee had flaine of the Roman horse two hundred, and taken of them prisoners the like number. Of their toot he had flame about two thousand: losing of his owne no more than twenty horse and fortie foot. The Roman Campe, after this disaster, was full of heavinesse and seare: it being much doubted that the enemie would set vpon it. Eumenes gaue counfaile to diflodge by night, and remoone to a furer place beyond 40 the River Peneus. The Conful, though ashamed to professe, by so doing, in what feare he flood; yet thought it better to acknowledge the loffe past, than by standing on proud tearmes, to drawe vpon himfelfe a greater calamitie. So he passed the River in the dead of the night, and encamped more firetigly on the further fide. The Atolians were forely blamed for this loffe: and rather atrayterous meaning, than any true feare, had occasioned their flight, wherein the rest of the Greekes followed them. Fine of them, that were men of especiall marke, had been observed to be the first which turned their backes: an observation likely to cost them deare, at a time of better leifure. As for the Theffort ans, their vertue was honoured with reward : fo as the Greekes might learne, by examples of either kinde, 50 that if they should shunne indignation, or incurre favour, then must they aduen-

ture no lesse for their Lords the Romans, than gladly they would doe for their owne libertie. Thus fared it with the Conful and his armie. Perfeus came the next day to correct the former dayes errour; which how great it was, hee not untill then found. The Romans were gotten into a place of fafety; whither they could never haucattained, if the King had either pressed his victory, or given better heed to them that night: his light armature alone being sufficient to have rowted them, whilest they were conveying themselves to the other side of Peneus. But it was vaine to tell what might have been done, fince there was no remedie. The Romans were beaten, euen the flower of their Citie, the Gentlemen of Rome; out of whom were chosen their Senators, and consequently the Generals themselves, Pretors, Confuls, and all that bore office or command among them; yea, they were beaten fo shamefully, that they stole away by night, and suffered him to gather vp the spoyles of them without resistance, as yeelding themselves ouercome. With fuch braue words did the King fet out the glory of his action; dividing the spoiles 10 among his followers. But there was much wanting within him, to have made his honor found. He came neerer to the Romans, and encamped at Mopfelius, a place in the mid-way betweene Tempe and Larissa: as if it were his meaning to preffe them fomewhat harder. Neuertheleffe hee was cafily perswaded to vie the occasion, which he seemed to have, of obtaining peace. Therefore he sent vnto the Conful, and offered to yeeld vnto the same Conditions, wherein his father had beene bound to the Romans; if the war might so take end. It were needlesse here againe to shew the folly of this his course. Towards the accomplishment of this desired peace, there was in the Conful no greater power than to grant a truce, whileft Embaffadours might goe to Rome: it resting in the Senate and People to approve the 20 conditions, and ratifie the league. And of fuch a truce granted by Martius, he had lately found no smal discommodity redounding. But Licinius dealt plainly, and returned answere, That other hope of peace there was none; saue that Perfeus would yeeld both his Kingdome and person, simply and absolutely, to discretion of the Senate. A manly part it was of Licinius, to be fo resolute in adversitie. On the other fide, it argued a very faint heart in Perfew, that having received an answere so peremptory, hee still persisted, making vaine offers of great tribute. Finding that the peace, which he so much desired, could not be purchased with money, the King withdrew himselse backe to Sycurium. There he lay hearkening what the Enemie did; whose forces were well repaired by the comming of Misagenes the sonne of 30 Masanissa, with the aid before mentioned. This distance betweene the King and them, caused the Romans to waxe the more bold in making their haruest: about which businesse they ranged over all the fields. Their carelesse demeanour gaue him hope to doe some notable exploit: which hee attempted, both vpon their Campe, and vpon those that were abroad. The Campe he thought to have fired on the sudden: but the alarme being taken in good season, hee failed in the enterprize. As for the forragers; he had a good hand vpon them, if he could have withdrawne it, and given over in time. But whilest he strong to force a guard, he was vifited by the Conful; by whom either in a skirmish of horse, or (for the report is divers) in a great battell, he was overcome. This misadventure, whether great 40 or small, caused Perfew, after a few daies , to fall backe into Macedon; as being naturally giuen to feare danger, euen where none was; whereby what loffe he felt, will appeare hereafter. He left all behinde him, faue onely Tempe, weakly guarded: and confequently an casie prey to the Romans.

After the Kings departure, Licinius went ftraight vnto Connus; hoping to have taken it, and so to have gotten entrance into Tempe. But finding the work too hard, he returned backe vpon the Perrhabians and others; from whom he wanne some townes, and among the rest, Larissa. There were fundry townes thereabout, bearing the same name of Larissa: so that this which the Consultooke, may seeme not to have belonged vnto the Theffalians; vnleffe, perhaps, after his victory, Per- 50 feus did greater Acts than we finde recorded, and got some part of Thessalie.

Of matters happening in Greece at this time, it is hard to give a precise account; for that the histories of them are greatly defective. One may thinke it strange, that the Bastians, whom a Roman Embassador could terrific, and bring altogether to his owne will, should not be afraid of a Roman armie, then on foot in Greece, and a Nauic on their coalt. But more strange it is, that the Thebans, from whom their dependants were taken by the art of Martins; were more true to Rome, than other pettie townes, which by that fame diffraction of the Baotians, became within themselves more absolute, than formerly they had beene. The causes hereof were to haue beene lought among the changes happening in their variable factions: wherof the knowledge is now lott. Some of the mrebelled, and were throughly punished by Lucretius the Roman Admirall: who got fo much by spoiling them, that he would have brought others to rebell in like fort, if by extreme oppression hee 10 could have driven them fo farre. Neither was Licinius the Conful vidiligent in the fame kinde. What his doings were, after fuch time as he was at leifure from Perfems, I finde no where mentioned. Onely this is faid in generall; That in the warre which he made he * cruelly and couetoufly demeaned himfelfe.

After the same fashion dealt they, that commanded in the yeere following ; Hostilius the Conful, and Hortensius the Admirall, or Prætor of the Fleet. Hostilius The wed more of his industrie, in picking quarrels with the confederats of Rome, than in profecuting the warre against the Macedonian. For concerning the Roman warre vpon his kingdome, after that the Conful had fought passage in vaine ouer certaine mountaines, Perfeus feemed, in a manner, * free from it. He was troubled indeed * Polyb, Legat,

20 on that fide which looked towards Illyria, by Ap. Claudius, whom the Conful fent 70. thither with an armie of foure thousand, and who, by leavies made vpon the Confederates, doubled this his armie. But Claudius thinking to haue taken V/cana,a border towne of Illyria, by treason, came thither in such carelesse order, that the inhabitants which had made shew of treason, with purpose onely to traine him into danger; falled foorth vpon him, ouerthrew him, and chafed him fo farre, that hardly hee escaped with a fourth part of his company. Yet this towns of Vscana shortly after became Roman: which howsoeuer it happened, Perfeus very soone recouered it, and many other places there with all : Cotys, a Thracian king, securing him on the one fide of Macedon; and Cephalus an Epirote, revolted from the Romans, on

30 the other. Perfeus likewise made a paincfull journey into Atolia: where hee was promised to be admitted into Stratus, that was the strongest Citie in that Region. Of this hope though he were disappointed by those of the Roman faction; yet in his returne home, hee tooke in Aperantia; and shortly heard good newes, That Ap. Claudius was againe throughly beaten by Cleuas, one of his Lieutenants. Such fuccesse had the Macedonian war under Hostilins. The same Consul offended much the Greekes, by the strict inquisition which his Embassadours made into mens affection towards Rome. For these Embassadors travelling thorowall the Cities of Peloponnesus, gaue out speeches tending to shew, That they liked no better of those who fought not by might and maine to advance their bulines, than of those which

40 were of the Macedonian faction. Their meaning was, to haucaccused by name, in Polyh, Legat. 74the Parliament of Achaia, Lycortas that worthy Commander, who nobly followed the steps of Philopamen; and together with him, his sonne Polybius, who soone after was Generall of the Achean horse, but more notable by that excellent historic which he wrote, than by his great employments, which hee well and honourably discharged. The summe of the accusation should have beene; That these were not heartie friends vnto the Romans, but such as abstained from raising troubles, more for lacke of opportunitie, than for any loue to the common quiet. But fince no colour of truth could bee found, that might give countenance to fuch a tale; it was thought better, for the present, to let it alone, and give gentle words, as if all 50 were well. In like manner dealt they among the Atolians: They demanded ho.

stages; and found some in the Councell that approoued the motion: as also among the Acarnanians, there were that entreated to have Roman garrisons bestowed in their townes. But neither the one nor the other of these propositions tooke effect. They of the Roman faction; accused not only such as were inclinable to the Macedonian, but also the good Patriotes; making it no lesse than a matter of treason, to be a Gresian in Greece. On the contrary fide, there wanted not fome, who roundly told these pick-thankes of their base flatterie; rating them openly in such fort, that one of them hardly escaped being stoned, even in presence of the Embassadours. Thus was all full of acculations and excuses: among which the Embassadors carried themselues, as men that could beleeue none ill ; though it were well enough knowne what they thought. The best was, that an order from the Senate was brought into Greece, and published, to this effect: That it should bee free for all men, to refuse obedience to any Roman Magistrate, imposing any burthen for the present warre, vnlesseit were such, as the Senate had likewise thought meete. 10 Of this decree the whole countrie was glad : for it was, or feemed, a good remedie of many inconveniences. But they that standing on priviledge hereof, refused to fulfill every commandement, were numbered among the Patriotes; which in the end of this warre, prooued little better, if not worle, than to hauc been Traytours. The Senate was driven to fet downe this order; by reason of the many and vehement complaints brought to Rome, concerning the wrongs done by Roman Magistrates, and especially by the Admiralls, Lucretius and Hortensius. Lucretius was condemned in a great summe of money, for the wrongs by him done: highly to the commendation of the Romans, in that they loued not to have their subjects oppressed. Horsensius being still in office, had warning to 20

Among the great number of Embassages that came to Rome about this time, either to feeke redreffe of injuries, or to offer their feruices: it is note-worthy, that from Alabanda, a towne of the leffer Asia, there was presented vnto the Senate, and well accepted, a most base piece of flatterie. These Alabanders brought three hundred horsemens targets; and a crowne of gold, to bestow vpon Jupiter in the Capitol. But having a delire to gratifie the Romans with some exquisite token of their dutifull obedience, wherein they would bee singular; and being not able to reach vnto any great performance: they built a Temple, vnto the Towne Rome, and appointed anniuer farie games to bee celebrated among them, in honour of that 30 Goddeffe. Now who can wonder at the arrogant folly of Alexander, Antigonus, Ptolemie, and the like vaine men, that would bee thought gods; or at the shamelesse flatterie of such as bestowed vpon men, and not the most vertuous of men, divine honours; when hee fees a Towne of houses, wherein powerfull men dwell, worshipped as a Goddesse, and receining ( without scorne of the giuers, or shame of the present) the title of Deitie, at the gift of such a rascall Citie as Alabanda?

Q. MARTIVS the Roman Conful, with extreame difficultie and danger, enters into Tempe. The cowardize of PERSEVS in abandoning Tempe. The towne of Dium quitted by MARTIVS; repaired and fortified by the King. The Romans attempt many places, with ill successe. Their affaires in bard estate. MARTIVS a cunning and a bad man. POLYBIVS (ent Embassador to MARTIVS from the Achaans, POLY-BIVS his honest wisdome beneficiall to the Achaans. King EVMENES growes averse from the Romans. Persevs negotiates with Antiochus and Ermenes. His false dealing with GENTIVS King of Illyria; whom hee drawes into the Roman warre. He fends Embassadors to the Rhodians ; who vainely take upon them to be arbitrators betweene him and the Romans. PERSEV slofeth a mightie [necour of the Bastarna, by his wretched parsimonie.

Fter two yeares of the Macedonian warre, things were further out of tune in Greece, than when the warre began, which had been thought likely to reforme all those Countries, and bring them to what passe the Romans defired; as it did in the end. Perfeus had hitherto the better, and was stronger now, than when he liued in peace. He had

20 enlarged his borders on the Illyrian fide; his friends, in all parts of Greece, took courage daily; and his reputation grew fuch, as caused those that were before wholly Roman, to suspect what the issue of the war might proue, and therupon to become wife for themselves. Contrariwise, Licinius and Hostilius the Consuls, had one after the other spent their time in vaine, seeking way into Macedon; and defaced the glorious enterprize of conquest, by many losses received. The Roman Admiralls had fo demeaned themselves, that many towns, eue of the best affected to Rome, kept them out by force. Generally, the feare was great on the Komans fide; and the armie much leffened, not only by casualties of warre, but by the facilitie of the Tribunes or Colonels, or elfe of the Conful himfelfe (for they laid the blame one 30 vpon the other) in licencing the fouldiers to depart Quintus Martius the new Conful, who fucceeded vnto Hoftelius, was to amend all this: which nevertheleffe was more then he knew how to doe: though he brought with him a strong supply of men. He began hotly to fet the warre on foot, which a long time had flept. And he began the right way: not feeking to force the streights that were surely garded, but taking paines to clime the mountaines which were thought able to forbid all paffage ouer them, without helpe or need of any custodie. The King heard of his approch; and being uncertaine what way he meant to take, distributed his owne forces, to the defence of all places which might give entrance, or permit afcent. But the Conful proceeded in his journey: with hope, either not to be discourred by 40 the Enemie, or to breake through all oppolition, or at least wife, to fight on as conuenient ground, as they should have that lay to stop him, and at length if all failed, to make a safe retreat. He sent before him source thousand of his most expedit foot, to discouer the wayes. Two dayes was this company troubled, in our comming the difficultie of no more than fifteene miles: after which they had fight of the Enemie, that lay to deny their passage. They occupied therefore a safe peece of ground; and fent backe word to the Conful, where they were; intreating him to haften vnto them: which he did. The Macedonians were not a whit difmayed at his arrivall; but met him, and fought with him, two or three daies together; each returning to their owne Campe at night, with little losse on either side. This bic-50 kering was on the narrow ridge of a mountaine, which gaue fearcely roome vnto three to march in front. So that very few hands came to be employed : all the rest were b holders. In this case, it was impossible to get forwards; yet a shame to ceturne. Wherefore Martius tooke the onely course remaining; and indeed the best: Part of his men he left with Popilius, to attend upon the Macedonians: whilefile, with the rest, setcht a compasse about, and sought out wayes that neuer had beene troden. Herein he found extreame difficultie : which notwithstanding he ouercame. Belides the troubles commonly incident to fuch journeyes, through places unfit for habitation: he was compelled, by labour of hand, to make pathes where none were, yea where Nature might feeme to have intended, that none should be. So steepe he found the discent of the mountaines, in this way which he took: that of seuen miles, which they trauelled the first day, his men were compelled, for the more part, to rowle themselves downe; as not daring to trust their feet. Neither was this the worst. For they met with rockes, that stood one ouer another, so vpright, and cumbersome to get downe; that their Elephants were afraid of the gid- 10 die prospect, and casting their gouernours, made a terrible noise, which affrighted the horses, and bred great confusion. Having therefore gone, or wallowed, foure miles of this grieuous journey; there was nothing more defired by the fouldiours, then that they might be fuffered to creepe backe againe, the same way which they had come. But shift was made to let downe the Elephants, by a kinde of bridges, like vnto falling draw-bridges: whereof the one end was joyned to the edge of the cliffe; the other fultained by two long postes, fastened in the ground below. V pon these two postes, or poles, which indeed (not being very strong, since it was intended that they should be either cut or broken) were fastned two rafters, answerable in length to the distance, between the higher & the lower fall fo as the end of one 20 bridge might reach to the beginning of another. These were covered with plankes and turfe; that they might feeme continent with the ground; so to make the beafts aduenturous, to goe vpon them. If there were a Plaine of any good extent from the foot of a rocke, to the next downfall; then might the bridge be florter. When an Elephant was gone a pretic way, vpon one of these; the postes vpholding the frame were cut afunder; therby caufing him to fincke down vnto the next bridge; whence he was conucyed, in like manner, to the third, and onward still to the very bottome. Thus went they downe fliding, some on their feet, others on their buttockes, till they came to an euen valley. By this it appeares, how throughly provided the Romans vied to be in their journeyes, of things needfull in all occasi- 30 ons : as also what inestimable paines they tooke in this descent, about the conueyance of themselues and all their carriages downe the mountaines. The next day they rested; staying for Popilius and his company, who hardly or perhaps neuer, should have overtaken them, if the Enemie had followed, and set vpon him from aloft. The third and fourth daies iourneyes were like vnto the first: saue that custome, and the nearenesse to their wayes end without meeting enemie, caused them the better to endure the labour.

Perfeus could not be ignorant of the Romans comming towards him: fince they fought with his men upon the passage, three daies together; he lying so nigh, that he might welneare have heard the noise. Yet was he so possessed with feare; that he 40 neither stirred to helpe his owne men, or to hinder the Consul, nor made any prouision for that which might fall out; but as one void of counsaile, sate hearkening after the cuent. Four onely passages there were, leading into Tempe: the first by Connus; which the Romans were vnable to force: the second and third were the fame which Martius had attempted in vaine, and another like vnto it: the last, by the Citie of Dium out of Macedon. All these were sufficiently guarded: and whofoeuer would feeke any other way, must be faine to take such paines as Martins had vndergone. The entrance by Diam was fairer then any of the rest: whereof only the King had benefit; for that his enemies could not get thither, faue through the valley it selfe, into which they must first pierce another way. Dium stood vpon the 50 foot of the huge mountaine Olympus, about a mile from the leas of which mile, the river Helicon becomming there a lake, and called Bapbyras, tooke up the one halfe; the rest being such as might easily have beene fortified. Besides all these, there was in the middest of Tempe, a passage which ten men might easily keepe: where the spurres of the mountaines, reaching farre into the valley, drew neare to the verie banks of *Peneura*, a goodly and deepe river which ran thorow it. Wherefore nothing had beene more calle, than to make the Conful repent him of his trouble-fome tourney: if *Perfeus* could have feene his owne advantages. For the *Romin armie was not only in ill cafe to fight, after the vexation of that miferable traucill-but must needs have either perilhed for want of victuals, or bin enforced to returne the fame way that it came, if the King had made good the streight of *Dimin.* To have returned, and climbed vp with their Elephants and carriages, against those rockes, from which, with extreame labour, they could hardly get downe, it feemes a matter of impelfibilities. *Perfelipmelfibilities.**

10 ter of impossibilitie: especially considering, bow the enemy from aboue their heads, would have beaten upon them; being now aware of the path which they had taken, though he knew it not when they slole away from him. It may therefore be thought strange, that the Romans did not rather take their iourney into Asteedon, from the side of sllyria, whence that kingdome had often bin inuaded, as lying open on that part: than put themselnes to the trouble of breaking into Tempes, whence, after that they were there arrived, there was no meanes to escape, without forcing one of those passages, which they despaired to winne. But the cowardize of Perseus, did commend the counsaile by them followed, as wife. For he no some thard that the Enemie was come our the mountaines into Tempes, then he

20 fared like one out of his wits; saying, That he was vanquished, and had lost all without battaile. Herewithall he began to take out of Dian, what he could carry away in haste; and straightwayes abandoned the Towne. In the same vehemence of amazement, he sent a strait commandement to The salone, that the Arsenall there should be set on fire; and to Pella, that his treasures there should be east into the sea: a siften Ramans were like presently to be masters of these two Cities. Nietas, who was appointed to drowne the treasure, performed it hastily as well as he could though soone after, his master grew sorie for the losse; and it was all, in a manner, recoursed by Diuers from vnder the water. But Andronieus, who had charge to set the on the Kings Arsenall, deserted the execution; storesceing that repentance

30 might follow: and so he preuented the dammage. Whether Niecus, for his absolute and blinde obedience, or Andronicus, for his carefull providence, merited the greater commendation, or more easie pardon; it rested in the King to interpret. The reward of their service was this. Per sew growing ashamed of his mad cowardize, that appeared in this hastle direction; caused them both to be slaine. Also those poore men, which had setcht his treasure out of the sea by their diving, were payd their wages after the same sort: that so there might be no witnes of the Kings base folly. Such end must they seare, who are privile to dishonourable actions of great Princes. It Perseus would have gone surely to worke, for the hiding of his sault; then must he so royally have behaved himselfe, that no man might beleeue him to 40 be the author of any vnworthy act or counsaile. But his vertue was of no such cases

o be the author or any vinworthy att or counfaile. But his vertue was of no fach capacitie. He though it enough to lay the blame vpon others. And therefore, has using called Hippias away (the Captaine which had ftopped the Conful on the top of the mountaine) and Alebpiasarus, from defence of the paffages, whereto they were by him appointed he rated them openly, flaying, that they had betraied vinto the Enemiethe gates and barres of Macedon. Of this reproch, if they would discharge themselues, by laying it vpon him, to whom of right it belonged: then might they have speak of the Machdonius.

The Conful Martius had great cause to reioyce, for that the King so hashily relinquished his possession of Tempe, and all the passages leading thereinto: since the 50 Ramma armic, this notwithstanding was hardly able to subsist, for want of victuals. He tooke Dism without resistances thence went forward into Macedon: wherein having trauelled about a dayes iourney, and gotten one towner that yeeled, he was compelled, by meere lacke of sood for his men, to returne backe towards Thessalic. His sleet came to him, in this time of necessitic, well appointed to have holpen him in the war; but hauing left behinde, at Magnefa, the ships of burthen, which carried the prouisions. Wherefore it fell out happily, that one of his Lieutenants had been carciult to occupy the Cassles about Tempe, which were for saken by the Macedonians: for by those waies onely might corne be brought into the army. To meet the sooner with this corne, which was desirously expected; he for sooke Diam, and went to Phila; by which soolih iourney (if not worse then soolish) he lost more, than a little the longer fasting had bin worth. It is probable that his carts, with all or the most of his it ore, were lost among the mountaines; for otherwise it had bin madnes to put himselfon such an enterprise, so slenderly prouised, as that without enforcement, or sight of the Enemic, he should be faine to quite it. How socuer it was: men to thought him a coward, or at least a bad man of watte; since he thus recoyled and

By understanding the folly, or cowardize of Martins; the King recollected himselfe; vnderstood his owne error; sought to hide it by such poore means as haue bin shewed, and laboured to make what amends he could. He quickly repossessed the rown of Dium, which he hastily repaired, finding it dismantled by the Romans. This done, he encamped strongly by the river Enipeus: meaning there to stop the Enemies proceeding all that Summer. Leffe diligence, more timely vsed, would have bin enough, not onely to have delivered Martius into his hand, who had beguiled him with an idle hope of peace: but to have given him fuch a noble victory, as might 20 cause the Romans to seeke a good end of the war vpon faire conditions, & not to begin againe in hafte. Yet this recouery and fortification of Dium, was to the Conful an exceeding hindrance. For little or nothing could afterward be done toward the conquest in hand, in all the continuance of his office. Only the towne of Heraclea, standing on the river of Peneus, five miles from Dium, was taken by force, or rather by a trick of climing upon mens heads, somewhat after the maner of our tumblers. But it made such defence as it could; and was not given vp for feare. After this Martin did fet a bold face towards Dium; as if he would have taken it againe, and have driven the King further off ; though his intent or hope was nothing like fo great: his chiefe care, being to prouide for his wintering. He fent the Admirall to 30 make attempt vpon the sea townes, Thessalonica, Cassandrea, Demetrias and others. All these were affayed but in vaine. The fields about Thessalonica were wasted; and some companies, that fundrie times adventured forth of the towne, were still put to the worse. As for the towne it selfe; there was danger in comming neere it, either by land or sea; by reason of the engins, which shot from the wals, and reached vnto the fleet. Wherfore the Admiral fetting faile from thence, ranne along by Ania, and Antigonea, (landing neare to each of them, and both doing and receiving hurt) vitill he came to Pallene in the territory of Caffandrea. There King Eumenes joyned with him, bringing twentie ships of warre; and fine other were fent thither from King Prustas. With this accesse of strength, the Admirall was bold to trie his 40 fortune at Caffandrea: which was bad. There was a new ditch lately cast by Perfeus, before the town: which while the Romans were filling vp, question was made, what became of the earth taken thece, for that it lay not vpon the bank. By this occasion, it was learned, that there were arches in the town wal filled up with that earth, and concred with one fingle row of brick. Hence the Admiral gathered hope of making way into the towne, by fapping the wals. To this worke he appointed fuch as hee thought meetelt: giving an alarme to the other fide of the town, therby to shadow his attempt, the breach was foon made. But whileft the Romans were shouting for ioy,& ordering themselves for the assault: the Captaines within the towne perceiued what was done; & falying forth vnexpected, gaue a fierce charge on the com- 50 panies that were between the ditch & the wall; of whom they flew about fix hundred & fuffred few to escape vnwouded. This disafter, & the want of good successe on that part of the towne which king Eumenes affailed (a fupply in the meane while entring the towne by sea) caused the siege to breake vp. Torone was the next place which the Admirall thought meet to attempt: and thencelikewise he was repelled. Finding this too well manned; he made way towards Demetrias: whereinto Euphrano; a Macedonian Captaine, was gotten before his comming, with such forces, as were notonly sufficient to have defended the Towne; if the Admirall had layed siege to it, but to keepe the land about it from spoyle; or at least (as they sid) to make the enemie pay deare for all that he there got. This Euphranor had taken his journey to Demetrias; by Metheza; whether the Consoli (that he might not be quite without worke) had sent his Lieutenant to besiege it: and by the terrour of his appearing suddenly ouer their heads, caused the besiegers to dislodge in all 10 hade, setting their Campe on fire.

CHAP.6. S.7.

Such fortune attended on the Romans; or rather, so farre was their abilitie short of their Enterprises; euer since their Consul (whether dashardly, or careless) most valike a good Commander, had let goe his hold of Macedon, by for saking Dium: Yea, it is to be suspected, that some greater harme befell them, or at least, that they were in some greater danger, then is expressed in the broken remaining Historie of this Warre. For Martius perswaded the Rhodians by Agespois their Publicages, Soi Embassador, who came to him at Heradea about other businesses of tells importance. That they should one well to interpose themselves as mediators, and lecke to finish the Warre. Now, although Polyhius doe most probably consecture, that 20 this was rather a malicious deuice of Martius, cratily seekingto bring the Rhodans in danger (as anon it tell out) by their opposing the resolution of the Senate; then that it proceeded from any true searcin him, either of Persus, or of Antachns, who had then an army on foot: yet lince he made shew offeare, it is like withall, that somewhat had bappened, which might make his searce seeme not counterfeit. And so were the Rhodians moued to thinke of him; not only for that the extraordinary courtesic, both of him and of the Admirall, towards their Embassaccomming from proud natures, did argue d stidence, where there was no ambition to cause it; but much more, for that short y after the Embassaccost of Persus, Se of Gentius the Mayrian did set out their buttiness at Rhodes, not more with the strength of a good

30 Rect, which the Macedonian had gotten, than with the honor of some victory, wher in he had lately slaine great numbers of the Rooman horse. Thus much we find intimated: though the time place, or other circumstances of the fight, be not specified. And hereto may be referred, the report of those that were sent from Roome to view the cleate of Marius his army. For they sound the Consul wanting meat; the Admiral wanting men, &, for those sew that he had, wanting both mony and clothes: and Ap. Claudius the Pretor, who lay on the frontier of listyria, so vnable to inuade Macedon, that contrariwise, he was in extreame danger, so as either he must quickly be sent for thence, or a new army be sent thither to him. Wherefore it may seeme, that some blow had bin taken on the Illyrian side, which made all to halt; or at less, 40 that the Roomass with greater solfe, than is before spoken of, had been driven from

Now although it were fo, that Martius in very few of his actions, behaued himfelfe like a man of warryet in exercife of Cunning, which one hath moft aptly termed, a crooked or finisher kind of wisdome, he dealt as a craftestmaster, with a restlesse working diligence. This indeed neither proued his sufficiencie, nor commended his honessie: since thereby he effected nothing to his owne benefit; and neuerthelesse, out ofenuic, vaine-glory, or such delight as weake and busic-headed mentake, in creating inexplicable tre ubles, he directly made opposition to the good of his country. At such time as Perseus, by the successe of his doings against Hostilius, had got-

50 ten much reputation, and was thought likely to inuade Thessalie; Archo, Lycortas, and other good Patriotes among the Achaens, judged it expedient for their Nation to helpe the Romans, as in a time of aduersitie, whom in prosperity they loud not to flatter. Wherefore Archo proposed a decree which passed. That the Achaens should send their whole power into Thessalie, and participate with the komans in all danger. So the armie was leuied; and Polybius, with others, fent Embaffadors vnto Martius, to certifie him therof, and know his pleafure. Polybius found the Conful bulied in feeking passage through Tempe into Macedon. Hee went along with the armie; and awaited the Confuls leifure till they came to Heraclea; where finding the time convenient, hee presented the Decree, and offered the service of his Nation, wherein socuer it should be commanded. Martius tooke this very kindly; but faid, that he needed now no maner of helpe. Forthwith Polybius dispatched home his companions, to signific thus much : tarrying himselfe behind in the Campe. After a while, word was brought to Martius, that Ap. Claudius deliced, or rather imperiously required, of the Acheans, fine thousand men, to 10 be fent him into Epirus. It was manifest, that Appius had need of these men; and that if he were strong in field, he might do notable service, by distracting the forces of Perfetts. But the Labarynthian head of Martius could not allow of fuch plaine reason. He called vnto him Polybius, to whom hee declared, that Appius had no need of fuch aide; and therefore willed him to returne home, and in any wife take order that the men might not be sent, nor the Acheans bee put to such needlesse charges. Away went Polybius; musing and vnable to resolue, whether it were for loue to the Acheans, that the Conful was so carnest in this busines; or rather for enuie, and to hinder App. Claudsus from doing any thing, fince himselfe could doe nothing. But when Polybius was to deliuer his opinion in the Councell, touching 20 this matter: then found he a new doubt, that more neerely concerned his owne felfe, and those of his partie. For as he was sure to incurre the great indignation of the Conful, if he should neglect what was given him in charge; so was it manifest on the other fide, that the words by Martius vetered to him in privat, would prove no good warrant for him and his friends, if openly they should refuse to helpe Claudius, alleaging that he had no need: In this case therefore, he had recourse vnto the decree of the Senate: which exempted men from necessitie of doing what the Roman Commanders should require, valesse by special order from the Senate, the same were likewise appointed. So for lacke of warrant from the Senate, this demand of Appius was referred vnto the aduice of the Conful: by whom it was 30 fure to be made frustrate. Hereby the Acheans were fauers, of more then an hundred and twenty talents: though Polybius himselfe ranne into danger of Appius his displeasure; and for such honest dealing in his Countries behalfe, was afterwards rewarded by the Romans with many a long yeares imprisonment.

Whether it were by the like policie of Martins, that King Eumenes grew cold in his affection to the Romans; or whether this King began when it was too late, to fland in feare, left the fire, which he himfelfe had helped to kindle, would fhortly take hold on his owne lodging; or whether the regard of money were able to ouersway al other passions; it is hard to determine: since they that had better means to know the truth, have not precifely affirmed any certaintie. One report is, that 40 Eumenes did not so much as give any helpe to Martius: but comming to have joyned with him, in fuch friendly manner as he did with the former Confuls, was not entertained according to his liking; and thereupon returned home in such anger. that herefused to leave behind him certaine horse of the Gallogreekes, being requested to have done it. If this were true; and that his brother Attalus tarrying behinde with the Conful, did the Romans good service: then is the reason apparant, of the hatred, borne afterwards by the Senate to Eumenes, and the love to Attalus. But it is more generally received; that Eumenes gave a willing care to Perfeus his defire of accord, for meere defire of gaine. And it might well bee, that couetou snelle drew him on, in the course, whereinto indignation first led him. How- 50 focuer it befell; Perfeus caused Eumenes to be sounded, and found him so tractable, that he was bold to folicite him by an Embaffage. The tenour of his advertifements, both to Eumenes, and to Antiochus, was: That there could be no perfect loue betweene a King and a free Citie: That the Romans had quarrell alike to all Kings, though they dealt with no more than one at a time, and yield the helpe of one against another; That Philip was oppressed by them, with the helpe of Attalus; Antiochus, with the helpe of Philip and Eumenes; and now Perfeus affailed, with helpe of Eumenes and Prustas. Herewith he willed Eumenes to confider, that when

Alicedon was taken out of their way, they would be doing with him in Alia, which lay next at hand; yea, that already they began to thinke better of Prufice, than of him. In like fort he admonithed Antiochus, not to looke for any good conclution of his warre with the Agyttian, fo long as the Romans could make him give over, by denouncing their will and pleasure. Finally, he requested both of them, either to to compell the Romans, to furcease from their war vpon Macedon; or else to hold them as common enemies vnto all Kings. Antiochus lay farre out of the Romans way: and therefore was little troubled with fuch remonstrances. Eumenes was more nearely toucht; and as hee felt part of this to be true, fo had he reason to stand in doubt of the rest. Yet when he should give answere; hee began to offer a bargaine of peace for money. He thought the Romans to be no leffe weary, than Perleus was atraid. Wherefore he promised, for his owne part, That if he might haue fifteene hundred Talents for withdrawing his hand from this Warre, then would be remaine a Neuter therein; and that for some greater quantitie of money

(how much I finde not) he would also bring the Romans to condifcend vnto peace: 20 and for affurance of his true meaning herein, he offered to give hostages. Perfeus liked well to receive the hoftages: but not to lay out the money; especially before hand, as wasrequired. He would faine have peace with Rome, and not with Eumenes only. For procuring of this, he promifed to be at any reasonable cost: but hee would lay downe the money in the Temple at Samothrace : whence it should be deliuered vnto Eumenes, after that the peace was fully concluded and ratified. The Isle of Samothrace was Perfeus his owne: and therefore Eumenes thought the money no nearer to him, being there, than if it remained in Pella. Belides, his labour descrued somewhat, how soeuer the businesse might happen to succeed: so that needes hee would have part of his wages in preft. Thus the two Kings did

CHAP. 6. $.7.

After the same manner dealt Persons with King Gentius the Illyrian. He had attempted this Illyrian before; who dealt plainely, and faid, That without money he could not flirre. Hercunto Perfew loued not to hearken; thinking, that his Treasures would serue at the last cast, to deliver him from all his seares. But when the Romans had gotten within Tempe, then did his feare vige him to prodigalitie; so as he agreed to pay three hundred Talents, which Gentius demanded for a recompence. So the bargaine was soone made, and pledges on both sides delinered for performance. This was openly done by Perfeus; to the end that all to his armie might have comfort, by fuch accesse of strength to their partie. Prefently upon the bargaine made, Embassadors were sent to Rhodes, from both Perfeus and Gentius: who delired the Rhodians, to take vpon them, as arbitrators, betweene Per/eus and the Romans, and to bring the Warre to an end. The Rhodians thinking that Martius the Conful was no leffe defirous of peace than the Micedonian, arrogantly promifed, that they, by their authoritie, would make peace; withing the Kings to thew themfelues conformable. But the Roman Senate, hearing prowd words to the same effect, from the Rhodian Embassadours; gaue an answere, as disdainefull, angrie, and menacing, as they could deuise: so as this vaine glorie of the Rhodiar's was throughly chaftifed; and more throughly should 70 have beene, if their submission had not beene as humble, as their follie was proud. Such vse of Gentius his friendship, made Perfeus; without laying out one ounce of Silver. Now faine he would have haftened this young and rash Illyrian to enter with all speed into the Warre: but then must the money be hastened away. Pantauchus, the Macedonian Embassadour, who remained with Gentius, exhorted him daily to begin the Warre by land and sea, whilest the Romans were vnprourded. But finding what it was that made all to stay; he sent word to Perseus. Here upon tenne Talents were sent to Pantauchies: who deliuered it to the yong King, as earnest of that which followed. More followed indeed; and scaled yo with the scale of the superior state of the superior state of the superior state of the superior superior was superior superior. Which Parseus no sooner heard, than he recalled his Treafure-bearers, and sent them with their loade to Pella; for that now the superior was of necessitie to make warre with the Romans, whether hee were hyred thereto, or not.

Liu.lib.44. Plutarch, in Uit, Æmjl.

There came about the same time, through Illyria, to the aide of Perseus, vnder one Clondicus a pettie King, tenne thousand horse and tenne thousand toot, of the Gaules, which were (as Plutarch hath it) the Bastarna. These had before hand made their bargaine, and were to receive present pay at the first. At their entric into the Kingdome, Perfeus sent one to them; desiring their Captaines to come visit him, whome he promifed to gratifie with goodly rewards; hoping that the multitude would take good words for payment. But the first question that their Generallasked, was, Whether the King had sent money to give the souldiors their pay in hand, according to his bargaine? Hereto the meffenger had not what to answere. Why then (laid Clondicus) tell thy master, That the Gaules will not stirre one foot 20 further, untill they have gold, as was agreed, and hostages. Perfeus hereupon tooke counsaile: if to vtter his owne opinion, before men so wise that they would not contradict him, were to take counsaile. He made an innective against the incivilitie and anarice of the Bastarna: who came with such numbers, as could not but be dangerous to him and to his Kingdome. Fine thousand horse of them hee said would be as manic as he should need to vse; and not so manie, that he should need to fearethem. It had beene well done, if anie of his countailors would have told him, That there wanted not employment for the whole armie of them, fince without anie danger to the Kingdome, they might be let out, by the way of Perrabia, into Thessalie: where wasting the Countrey, and filling themselues with spoile, 30 they should make the Romans glad to for sake Tempe, even for hunger and all manner of want; therein doing the King notable feruice, whether they wonne anie vi-Ctorie, or not. This, and a great deale more, might have been ealled ged, if anie man had dured to give advice freely. In conclusion, Antigonus, the same messenger that had beene with them before, was fent againe, to let them know the Kings minde. He did his errand: vpon which followed a great murmure of those many thoufands that had beene drawne so farre to no purpose. But Clondieus asked him now againe, Whether hee had brought the money along with him, to pay those fine thousand, whome the King would entertaine. Hereto, when it was perceited, that Antigonus could make no better answere, than shifting excuses; the Bastarna retur- 40 ned presently towards Danubius, wasting the neighbours parts of Thrace; yet suffering this craftic messenger to escape whurt: which was more than he could have well expected.

Thus dealt Perfeus, like a carefull Treasurer, and one that would preserve his money for the Remans, without diminishing the summe. But of this painefull Office he was verie soone discharged by L. Emplius Paulus the new Consul: who in sifteene dayes after his setting forth from Malle, brought the Kingdome of Macedon to that end, for which Gop had appointed ouer it a King so soolish and so cowardly.

Amylius Paulus, without putting it, as was o- vis. Amylius Paulus, without putting it, as was o- vis. Amylius Paulus, without putting it, therwise their manner, to the chance of lot, betweene him and his fellow Conful; or at least were gladder that the lot had cast it vpon him, than that fo worthy a man was advanced to the dignitie of a fecond Confulfhip. Hee refused to propound vnto the Senate anie thing that concerned his Province; vn-20 till by Embassadours, thither sent to view the estate of the Warre, it was perfectly understood, in what condition both the Roman forces, and the Macedonian, at the present remained. This being throughly knowne to be such, as hath beene alreadie told; the Senate appointed a strong supplie, not onely to the Conful, but vnto the Nauie, and likewise to the Armie that lay betweene Illyria and Eggrus; from which App. Claudius was removed, and L. Anicius fent thither in his place. Emylins, before his departure from Rome, making an Oration to the People, as was the custome, spake with much granitie and authoritie. Hee requested those that thought themselves wise enough to manage this Warre, either to accompanie him into Muedon, and there affith him with their aduice; or elfe to gouerne their 30 tongues at home, and not take vpon them to give directions by hearefay, and cenfure by idle reports: for he told them plainely, That he would frame his doings to occasions; not to the expectation of the multitude. The like speech of his father L. Emylius, who died valiantly in the Battaile of Canne, might well be liuing in some of their memories: which was enough to make them conforme

All his businesse within the Citic being dispatched, Æmylius was honourably attended, at his setting forth on his journey; with an especiall hope of men, that he should finish the Warre: though that he should sinish it so soone and happily, 40 was more then could have beene hoped or imagined. He came to Eurundisum: whence, when the winde came faire, he set sayle at breake ofday, and arrived safely at the Isle of Coregres before night. Thence passed he to Delphi: where, having done sacrifice to Appilo, after the fift day he set forwards to the Campe; and was there in sue dayes more. So are there but fine of the sifteene dayes remaining, in which he sinsshed the Warre.

Perfew lay firongly encamped at Dium; having spared no labour of men and of women to fortishe the bankes of Enipeus, where it was fordeable in drie weather. So as there was little hope, or none, to force him; and consequently, as little poffibilitie to enter that way into Macedon. One great inconvenience troubling the 50 Romans, and much disabling them to make attempt vpon Dium; was lacke of fresh water. For there were tenne myles betweene Dium and Tempe; all the way lying betweene the Sea shoare and the foot of Olympus, without any Brooke or Spring breaking forth on that side. But **Emylius* sond present remedie for this, by digging Wells on the shoare; where hee found sweet Springs: as commonly there is no shoare that wants them, though they rise not about the ground. Want of this knowledge was enough to hinder Martius from taking vp his lodging anie nearer to the enemic, than the Towne of Hernelea, on the River of Peneus; where he had watering at pleasure, but could performe no seruice of anie worth. Yet when the Roman Campe had fuch meanes to lye close to the Macedonian, as it presently did; the passage onward, being defended as hath beene shewed, seemed no lesse difficult than before. Wherefore it was necessarie to search another way: which by enquirie was soone found out. There was a narrow passage ouer Olympu, leading into Perrabia; hard of ascent, but slenderly guarded, and therefore promising a faire journey. Martius either had not been informed hereof; or durft not attempt 10 it : or perhaps could not get his foul diors to make the adventure; they fearing leaft it would proue such a piece of worke, as had beene their march ouer offa into Tempe. But Paulus was a man of greater industrie, courage, and abilitie, to command. He had reformed, even at his first comming, many disorders in the Roman Campe: teaching the fouldiors, among other good lessons, to be obedient and readie in execution; without troubling themselves, as had beene their manner, to examine the doings and purposes of their Generall. And now he appointed about fine thousand men to this Enterprise: whereof he committed the charge vnto Scipio Emylianus and Q. Fabius Maximus, his owne sonnes by nature, but adopted; the one of them, by a sonne of Scipio the African; the other, by one of the Fabij. 20 Scipio tooke with him some light-armed Thracians and Cretans; but his maine strength was of Legionaries. For the Kings guard, vpon the mountaine, confisted in a manner wholly of Archers and Slingers: who, though, at some distance, they might doe notable service against those that should climbe vp vnto them; yet when the darknesse tooke away their ayme, they were like to make a bad nights worke, being to deale with those that were armed to fight at hand. To conceale the businesse about which they went, Scipio and Fabius tooke a wrong way, towards the fleet; where victuals were prouided for their journey: it being noyfed, that they were to runne along the coast of Macedon by sea, and wast the Countrey. All the while that they were patting the Mountaines (which was about 30 three dayes) the Conful made shew of a meaning to set vpon Perseus where hee lay, rather to divert the Kings attention from that which was his maine Enterprise, than vpon any hope to doe good, in seeking to get ouer Enipeus. The Chanell of Enipeus, which received in Winter time a greatfall of waters from the Mountaines, was exceeding deepe and broad; and the ground of it was fuch, as though at the present it lay welneare all drie, yet it served not for those that were weightily armed to fight vpon. Wherefore Amylius employed none faue his Velites; of whom the Kings light armature had advantage at farre distance, though the Romans were better appointed for the close. The Engines from off the Towerswhich Perfeus had rayled on his owne banke, did also beat vpon the Romans, 40 and gaue them to vnderstand, that their labour was in vaine. Yet Emylius persifled as he had begun; and continued his affault, such as it could be, the second day. This might have served to teach the Macedonian, that some greater worke was in hand: fince otherwise a good Captaine, as Amylius was knowne to be, would not have troubled himfelfe with making such bravadoes, that were somewhat costly. But Perfeus looked onely vnto that which was before his eyes : vntill his men, that came running fearefully downe the Mountaine, brought word into the Campe, That the Romans were following at their backes. Then was all full of tumult; and the King himselfe no lesse (if not more) amazed than anie of the rest. Order was forthwith giuen to dislodge : or rather without order, in all tu- 50 multuous hast, the Campe was broken vp, and a speedic retreat made to Pydna. Whether it were so, that they which had custodie of the passage were taken sleeping, or whether they were beaten by plaine force; Scipio and Fabius had very good successe in their journey. It may well be, that they slept vntill the Romans came somewhat neare to them; and then taking alarme, when their arrowes and slings could doe little service, were beaten at handle stroakes: so as the different relations that are cited by Platarchout of Palybins, and an Episse of Seipio, may each of them have been true. Thus was an open way cleared into Alacedon: which had been effected by Martius in the year cfore-going; but was closed vp againe, through his not prosecuting 6 rich an opportunite.

Perfeus was in extreame doubt what course to take, after this vnhappy beginning. Some gaue aduice, to manne his Townes, and fo to linger out the Warre: having beene taught by the last yeares example, how resolute the people were in making 10 defence. But farre worse counsaile prevailed: as generally it doth in turbulent and fearefull deliberations. The King resolued to put all at once to hazard of battaile: fearing belike to put himfelfe into anie one Towne, least that should be first of all befieged; and he therein (as cowardly natures alwayes are jealous) not over-carefully relieued. This was cuen the same that Emplius, or anic invador, should have defired. So a place was chosen neare vnto Pydna, that served well for the Phalanx, and had likewise on the sides of it some peeces of higher ground, fit for the archers and light armature. There he abode the comming of the enemie; who flaved not long behind him. As soone as the Romans had sight of the Kings Armie; which, with greater feare than discretion, had hasted away from them, for saking the 20 Campe that was fo notably well fortified: they defired nothing more, than to giue battaile immediately; doubting least otherwise the King should change his minde, and get further off. And to this effect Scipio brake with the Conful; praying him not to loofe occasion by delay. But Amylius told him, That hee spake like a young man; and therefore willed him to have patience. The Romans were tyred with their journey; had no Campe wherein to rest themselves; nor anie thing there, faue onely the bare ground whereon they trode. For these and the like respects, the Consul made a stand : and shewing himselfe vnto the Macedonian, who did the like in order of battaile; gaue charge to haue the Campe meafured out and entrenched behinde the Armie; whereinto, at good leyfure, hee fell 20 backe, without anie manner of trouble. After a nights reft, it was hoped, both by o backe, without anie manner of trouble. After a night srelt, it was hoped, both by the Romans, and by the Macedonians, that the matter should be determined; each part thinking their owne Generall too blame, for that they had not fought the fameday. As for the King, he exceed himselfe by the backwardnesse of the enemie; who advanced no further, but kept upon ground struing ill for the Phalans: as on the other side, the Consult had the reasons before shewed, which he communicated to those about him the next day.

That cuening (which followed the third of September, by the Reman account)

C. Sulpicius Gallus, a Colonel, or Tribune of a Legion, who had the former yeare beene Prator, forecold wnto the Conful, and (with his good liking) wnto the armie, 40 an Eelipse of the Moone, which was to be the same night: willing the souldiors not to be troubled therewith, for that it was naturall, and might be knowne long before it was seene. It was the manner of the Remans, in such Eelipses, to beat Pannes of Brassen Bassens, as we doe in following a swarme of Bees; thinking, that thereby they did the Moone great case, and helped her in her labour. But this prognostication of Sulpicius converted their superstition into admiration of his deepe skill, when they saw it verified. Contravivice, the Reactorians showled and made a great noyse as long as the Eelipse lasted rather perhaps because it was their fashion, than for that they were terrified therewith, as with a prodigic betokening their losse fine their edier to sight was no whit lessen by it. I will not here fand to dispute, Whether such Eelipses doe signific, or cause anic alteration in ci-

50 fland to dispute. Whether such Eclipses doe signifie, or cause anie alteration inciuile affaires, and matters that haue small dependance on natural complexion: for the argument is too large. More worthie of observation it is, how supersition captivates the wisdome of the wises, where the help of true Religion is wanting. Emplium, though hee were sufficiently instructed concerning this defect of the Moone, that it was no supernatural thing, nor about the reach of humane vnderfranding, so as he should need to trouble himselfe with anic denout regard thereof: yet could be not refraine from doing his dutie to this Moone, and congratulating with facrifice her deliuerie, as foone as fhe shone out bright againe: for which, hee is commended even by Plutareh, a lage Philosopher, as a godly and religious man. If Sulpicius perhaps did not affilt him in this foolish denotion; yet is it like, that he, being a Senatour, and one of the Councell for Warre, was partaker the next morning in a Sacrifice done to Hercules; which was no leffe foolish. For a great part of the day was vainely confumed, ere Hercules could be pleased with anie Sacrifice, and vouchfate to shew tokens of good lucke in the entrailes of the beasts. At 10 length, in the bellie of the one and twentieth Sacrifice, was found a promife of victorie to Emylius; but with condition, That hee should not give the onset. Hercules was a Greeke, and partiall, as nearer in alliance to the Macedonian than to the Roman. Wherefore it had beene better to call upon the new Goddesse, lately canonized at Alabanda; or vpon Romulus, founder of their Citie, on whom the Romans had bestowed his Deitie; or (if a God of elder date were more authenticall) vpon Mars the Father of Romalus, to whome belonged the guidance of militaric affaires; and who therefore would have limited his favour, with no injunctions contrarie to the rules of Warre.

Now concerning the Battaile; Emylius was throughly perfuaded, that the 20 King meant to abide it: for that otherwise hee would not have stayed at Pydna, when, as a little before, his leyfure ferued to retyre whither hee lifted, the Romans being further off. In regard of this, and perhaps of the tokens appearing in the Sacrifices, the Conful thought that hee might wait vpon advantage, without making anie great hafte. Neither was it to bee neglected, that the morning Sunne was full in the Romans faces: which would be much to their hinderance all the forenoone. Since therefore Perseus kept his ground, that was commodious for the Phalanx, and Emylius sent forth part of his men to bring in Wood and Fodder; there was no likelyhood of fighting that day. But about tenne of the clocke in the morning, a small occasion brought to passe that, which 30 whereto neither of the Generalls had ouer earnest desire. A horse brake loose at watering; which two or three of the Roman fouldiers followed into the river, wading after him up to the knees. The Kings men lay on the further banke; whence a couple of Thracians ranne into the water, to draw this horse over to their owne fide. These fell to blowes, as in a private quarrell; and one of the Thracians was flaine. His countrimen feeing this, hasted to reuenge their fellowes death, and followed those that had flaine him over the river. Hereupon company came in to helpe on each part, vntill the number grew such, as made it past a fray, and caused both the armies to be carefull of the euent. In fine, each of the Generalls placed his men in order of battaile, accordly as the maner of his Countrie, and the armes, 40 wherewith they ferued, did require. The ground was a flat leuell, faue that on the fides a few hillocks were raifed here and there; whereof each part might take what advantage it could. The Macedonians were the greater number, the Romans the better fouldiers, and better appointed. Both the King and the Conful encouraged their men with lively words; which the present condition could bountifully afford. But the King having finished his Oration, and sent on his men, withdrew himselfe into Pydna: there to doe sacrifice, as hee pretended, vnto Hercules. It is the leffe maruaile, that hee durst aduenture battaile, fince hee had bethought himselfe of such a stratageme, whereby to saue his owne person. As for Hercules, hee liked not the facrifice of a coward : whose vnscasonable denotion could be to no better than hypocrifie. For hee that will pray for agood Haruest, ought also to Plow, Sowe, and Weede his Ground. When therefore the King returned to the battaile, hee found it no better than loft : and he, in looking to his owne fafetie, caused it to be lost altogether, by beginning the flight.

The acts of this day, fuch as we finde recorded, are, That the Roman Elephants could doe no manner of good; That the Macedonian Phalanx did to floutly preffe onwards, and beat off all which came before it, as A mylius was thereat much aftonished; That the Pelignirushing desperately on the Phalanx, were ouer-borne, many of them flaine, and the fquadrons following them fo discouraged herewith, as they retired apace towards an hill. These were the things that fell out aduerse to the Romans; and which the Conful beholding, is faid to haue rent his coat-armor for griefe. If the King with all his power of horse, had in like manner done his denoyre; the victorie might have bin his owne. That which turned the fortune to of the battaile, was the same which doubtlesse the Consul expected, even from the beginning: the difficultie, or almost impossibilitie, of holding the Philanx long in order. For while it some of the Romanes small battallions presled hard vpon one part of it, and others recoyled from it; it was necessarie (if the Macedonians would follow vpon those which were put to the worse) that some files having open way before them, should advance themselves beyond the rest that were held at a fland. This comming to to paffe, admonished the Conful, what was to bee done. Thelong pikes of the Macedonians were of little vie, when they were charged in flanke by the Roman Targettiers; according to direction given by Amylius, when hee faw the front of the Enemies great battaile become vinequall, and 20 the rankes in some places open, by reason of the unequal relitance which they found. Thus was the vsc of the Phalanx prooned vnauaileable against many fmall fquadrons, as it had beene formerly in the battaile of Cynoscephale: yea, this forme of embattailing was found vnferuiceable against the other, by reafon, that being not euerie where alike distressed, it would breake of it selfe: though heere were little such inconvenience of ground, as had beene at * Cyno- *Chap.4.5 x4.

Perfeus, when he saw his battaile begin to route, turned his bridle presently, and ranne amaine towards Pells. All his horse escaped, in a manner, vntouched, and a great number followed him; the little harme which they had taken, witneffing 30 the little good 'er unce which they had done. As for the poore foote; they were left to the mercie of the Enemie: who flew about twentie thousand of them; though having little cause to be furious, as having lost, in that battaile, onely some toucefcore, or fix fcore men at the most. Some of the foot, escaping from the execution, ouertook the king & his company in a wood; where they fel to railing at the horfemen, calling them cowards, traytors, and fuch other names, till at length they fell to blowes. The King was in doubt left they had ill meaning to himselfe; and there. fore turned out of the common way, being followed by fuch as thought it good. The rest of the company dispersed themselves: energone as his owne occasions guided him. Of those that kept along with their King, the number began within 40 awhile to leffen. For hee fell to denifing upon whom hee might lay the blame of that daies misfortune, which was most due to himselfe : thereby causing those that knew his nature, to (hrinke away from him, how they could. At his comming to Pella; he found his Pages and houshold servants, readie to attend him, as they had bin wont. But of his great men that had escaped from the battaile, there was none appearing in the Court. In this melancholike time, there were two of his Treasurers that had the boldnesse to come to him, and tell him roundly of his faults. But in reward of their vnfeasonable admonitions, he stabled them both to death. Afterthis, none whom he fent for would come at him. This boded no good. Wherefore standing in feare, lest they that refused to come at his call, should shorely dare 50 fome greater mischiefe; he stole out of Pella by night. Of his friends he had with him onely Euander (who had beene employed to kill Eumenes at Delphi) and two other. There followed him likewise about fine hundred cretians more for lone of his money, than of him. To these he gaue of his plate, as much as was worth about fiftie talents, though shortly he coozened them of some part thereof; making shew as if hee would have redeemed it; but never paying the money. The third day after the battaile hee came to Amphipolis; where hee exhorted the townesmen to fidelitie, with teares; and his owne speech being hindered by teares, appointed Enander to speake what himselfe would have vttered. But the Amphipolitans made it their chiefe care, to looke well to themselues. Vpon the first fame of the ouerthrow, they had emptied their towne of two thousand Thracians that lay there in garrison : sending them soorth under colour of a gainefull employment, and shutting the gates after them. And now to bee ridde of the King they plainly bade Euander be gone. The King hearing this, had no minde to to tarrie: but embarking himselse and the treasure which hee had there, in certaine vessells that hee found in the river Strymon; passed ouer to the Isle of Samothrace: where he hoped to line safe, by priniledge of the religious Sanctuarie

The fift Booke of the first part CHAP.6. S.8.

These miserable shifts of the King make it the lesse doubtfull, how all the kingdome fell into the power of Amylius, within so few dayes after his victoric. Prdma which was necrest at hand, was the last that yeelded. About fixe thousand of the fouldiours, that were of fundrie Nations, fled out of the battaile into that Towne; and prepared for defence: the confused rabble of so many strangers hindering all deliberation and confent. Hippius who had kept the paffage ouer 20 Offaagainst Martius, with Pantauchus, who had beene sent Embassadourto Gentius the Illyrian, were the first that came in : yeelding themselves and the Towns of Beraa, whither they had retired out of the battaile. With the like message came others from Thessalonica, from Pella, and from all the Townes of Macedon, within two dayes: the losse of the head bereauing the whole bodie of all sense and strength. Neither did they of Pydna stand out any longer, when they knew that the King had for saken his Countrey: but opened their gates vpon such tearmes, that the sacke of it was granted to the Roman armic. Æmylius fent abroad into the Countrey, such as hee thought meetest, to take charge of other Cities : hee himselfe marching towards Pella. Hee found 20 in Pella no more than three hundred talents; the same whereof Perseus had lately defrauded the Illyrian. But within a little while hee shall have

It was soone understood, that Perseu had taken Sanctuarie, in the Temple at Samothrace: his owne letters to the Conful, confirming the report. He fent thefe letters by persons of such meane condition; that his case was pittied, for that hee wanted the seruice of better men. The scope of his writing was, to desire fawour: which though hee begged in tearmes ill beseeming a King; yet since the inscription of his Epittle was, King PERSEVS to the Conful PAVLVS; the Conful, who had taken from him his Kingdome, and would not allow him to retaine 40 the Title, refused to make answere thereunto. So there came other letters, as humble as could bee expected: whereby hee craued and obtained, that some might bee sent to conferre with him about matters of his present estate. Neuertheleffe in this conference, hee was marueilous earnest, that he might bee allowed to retaine the name of King. And to this ende it was perhaps, that hee had so carefully preserved his treasure, vnto the very last: flattering himselfe with fuch vaine hopes as these; That the Romans would neither violate a Sanctuarie. nor yet neglect those great riches in his possession; but compound with him for money, letting him haue his defire to line at ease, and be called King. Yea it fectnes that hee had indeede, even from the beginning, a defire to live in this so Isle of Samothrace: both for that in one of his consultations about the war, he was dehorted by his friends, from feeking to exchange his Kingdome of Macedon, for *fuch a paltrie Iland; and for that hee offered to lay vp the money which Eume-

nes demanded, in the holy Temple that was there. But hee findes it otherwise. They vrge him to giue place vnto necessitie, and without more adoe, to yeeld to the discretion and mercie of the people of Rome. This is so farre against his minde, that the conference breakes off without effect. Prefently there arrives at Samothrace Cn. Octavius the Roman Admirall, with his fleet: who affayes, as well by terrible threats, as by faire language, to draw the King out of his lurking hole; wherein, for feare of imprisonment, he had imprisoned himselfe. When all would not ferue, a question was mooned to the Samothracians; How they durst pollute their Temple, by receiving into it one that had violated the like holy priviledge of 10 Sanctuarie, by attempting the murder of King Eumenes at Delphi? This went to the quicke. The Samothracians, being now in the power of the Romans, take this matter to heart; and fend word to the King, That Enander, who lives with him in the Temple, is accused of an impious fact committed at Delphi, whereof vnlesse he can cleare himselse in judgement, hee must not be suffered to prophane that holy place, by his abiding in it. The reuerence borne to his Majestie, now past, makes them for beare to lay, that Perfeus himselfe is charged with the same crime. But what will this auaile, when the minister of the fact being brought into judgement, shall (as is to be feared) appeach the author? Perfeus therefore willeth Euander to haue confideration of the little fauour that can bee expected at the Romans hand, 20 who are like to bee prefidents and ouerfeers of this judgement: fo as it were better to die valiantly, fince none other hope remaines, than hope to make good an ill cause; where, though he had a good plea, yet it could not helpe him. Of this motion Enander feemes to like well: and either kills himselfe, or hoping to escape thence, by deferring the time as it were to get poy fon wherewith to end his life, is killed by the Kings commandement. The death of this man, who had flucke to Perfeus in all times of need, makes all the Kings friends that remained hitherto, to for fake him: fo as none are left with him, faue his wife and children, with his Pages. It is much to be suspected, that they which leave him you this occasion, will tell perillous tales, and fay, That the King hath loft the priviledge of this holy 30 Sanctuarie, by murdering Euander therein. Or if the Romans will affirme fo much. who shall dare to gaine say them? Since therefore there is nothing but a point of formalitie, and euen that also lyable to dispute, which preserves him from captiuitie; hee purposeth to make an escape, and flye, with his Treasures, vnto Cotys his good friend, into Thrace. Orosndes, a Cretian, lay at Samothrace with one shippe; who easily was perswaded to wast the King thence. With all secrecie the Kings money, as much as could bee so conneyed, was carried aboord by night; and the King himselfe, with his wife and *children (if rather it were not true, that hee Plutarch in vit. had with him onely * Philip his elder fonne, who was onely by adoption his Lin lib. 45,45 fonne, being his * brother by nature) with much adoe got out at a window by Lindib 42.

40 arope, and ouer a mudde wall. At his comming to the Sea side, hee found no Oroandes there: the Cretians had played a Cretian tricke, and he was gone with the money to his ownehome. Soit began to waxe cleare day, whilest Perfeus was fearching all along the shoare: who had stayed so long about this, that hee might feare to be intercepted ere hee could recouer the Temple. Hee ranne therefore amaine towards his lodging; and thinking it not fale to enter it the common way, left hee should bee taken; hee hid himselfe in an obscure corner. His Pages miffing him, ranne vp and downe making enquirie; till Octanius made Proclamation, That all the Kings Pages, and Macedonians what locuer, abiding with their master in Samothrace, should have their lives and libertie, with all to them 50 belonging, which they had either in that Isle, or at home in Macedon, conditionally, That they should presently yeeld themselves to the Romans. Hereupon they all came in. Likewise Ion, a Theffalonian, to whom the King had given the custodie of his children, delivered them vp to Octavius. Lastly, Perfeus himselfe, SIIII 2 with his sonne Philip, accusing the gods of Samothrace, that had no better protected him; rendered himselfe, and made the Roman victorie complete. If hee had not trusted in those gods of Samothrace, but employed his whole care in the defence of Micedon, without other hope of lining, than of raigning therein; bee might well have brought this Warre to an happier end. Now, by dividing his cogitations, and pursuing, at once, those contrarie hopes of saving his Kingdome by armes, and himselfe by flight; hee is become a spectacle of miserie, and one among the number of those Princes, that have beene wretched by their owne default. Hee was prefently fent away to Amylius; before whom hee fell to the ground so basely, that hee seemed thereby to dishonour the victorie ouer him-10 selfe, as gotten vpon one of abject qualitie, and therefore the lesse to be essective. med. Amylus vsed to him the language of a gentle Victor: blaming him, though mildly, for having, with so hostile a minde, made Warre vpon the Romans. Hereto good answere might have beene returned by one of better spirit. As for Perfeus, hee answered all with a fearefull silence. Hee was comforted with hope of life, or (as the Conful tearmed it) almost assurance; for that such was the mercie of the People of Rome. After these good words, being inuited to the Consuls Table, and respectively entreated, hee was committed prisoner to Q.

Such end had this Macedonian Warre, after foure yeeres continuance: and 20 such end therewithall had the Kingdome of Mucedon; the glorie whereof, that had sometime filled all parts of the World then knowne, was now translated vnto Rome.

GENTIVS, King of the Illyrians, taken by the Romans.

Bout the same time, and with like celeritie, Anicius the Roman Prætor, who succeeded vnto App. Claudius; had the like successe against King Gentins the Illyrian. Gentius had an Armie of fifteene thousand; with which hee was at Liffus, readie to affist King Perfeus as soone as the money should come, whereof hee had recei-ued onely tenne Talents. But Anicius arrested him on the way; fought with him; ouercame him; and draue him into * Scodra. This Towne was verie defensible by nature, besides the helpe of fortification; and strongly manned with all the force of Illyria; which, affifted with the Kings presence, made it seeme 40 vnpossible to bee wonne, in any not a very long time. Yet Anicius was confident in his late victorie; and therefore presented his Armie before the walles, making countenance to give an affault. The Illyrians, that might eafily have defended themselues within the Towne, would needes issue foorth and fight. They were, it seemes, rather passionate than couragious : for they were beaten; and thereupon foorthwith began amazedly to treat about yeelding. The King sent Embassadours; by whom, at first, hee desired truce for three dayes, that he might deliberate concerning his estate. It ill became him, who had layed violent hand on the Roman Embassadours, to haue recourse to such mediation. But hee thought his owne fault pardonable, in as much as hitherto there was 50 no greater harme done by him, than the casting of those Embassadours into prison; where they were still aliue. Having obtained three dayes respite, hee passed vpa Riuer, within halfea myle of the Roman Campe, into the Lake of whether the report were true, that his brother Caranantius was comming to his rescue. Finding that no such helpe was toward, it is wonder, that he was so soolish as to returne into Scoara. Hee sent messengers crauing accesse unto the Prætor: before whom having lamented his folly past (which, excepting the dishonestie, was not so great as his folly present) hee fell downe humbly, and yeelded himselfe to discretion. All the Townes of his Kingdome, together with his wife,

Scodra, as it were to consult the more privately; though indeede, to hearken children, brother, and friends, were presently given vp. So this Warre ended in thirtie dayes : the People of Rome not knowing that it was begun; vntill Perpenna, 10 one of the Embassadors that had been imprisoned, brought word from Anicius how all had paffed.

ò. X.

How the Romans behaved them felues in Greece and Macedon after their victory over PERSEVS.

Ow began the Romans to fwell with the pride of their fortune; and to looke tyrannically upon those that had beene unmannerly toward them before, whileft the Warre with Perfeus feemed full of danger. The Rhodian Embassadours were still at Rome, when the tidings of these victories were brought thither. Wherefore it was thought good to call them into the Senate, and bid them doe their errand againe. This they performed with bad grace; faying, that they were fent from Rhodes to make an ouerture of peace; foralmuch as it was thought, that this Warre was no leffe grieuous to the Romans themselues, than to the Macedonians and many others: but that now they were very glad, and in behalfe of the Rhodians did con-

30 gratulate with the Senate and People of Rome, that it was ended much more happily than had beene expected. Hereto the Senate made answere, That the Rhodians had fent this Embassage to Rome, not for loue to Rome, but in fauour of the Macedonian; whose partizans they were, and should so be taken. By these threats, and the defire of some (couetous of the charge) to have Warre proclaimed against Rhodes; the Embassadours were so affrighted, that in mourning apparell, as humble suppliants, they went about the Citie; befeeching all men, especially the great ones, to pardon their indiscretion, and not to prosecute them with vengcance for some foolish words. This danger of Warre from Rome being knowne at Rhodes, all that had beene any whit auerse from

40 the Romans in the late Warre of Macedon, were either taken and condemned, or fent prisoners to Rome; excepting some that slue themselues for scare, whose goods also were confiscated. Yet this procured little grace; and leffe would haue done, if olde M. Cato, a man by nature vehement, had not vttered a milde fentence, and aductifed the Senate, That in decreeing Warre against Rhodes. they should much dishonour themselves, and make it thought, that * rather *casarinera. the wealth of that Citic, which they were greedie to ransacke, than any just cause, apud salust de had moved them thereto. This confideration, together with their good deferts una in the Warres of Philip and Antiochus, helped well the Rhodians : among whome, none of any marke remained alive, faue those that had beene of the Roman

50 Faction. All which notwithstanding, many yeeres passed, ere by importunate fuit, they could bee admitted into the societie of the Romans: a fauour which till now, they had not effected, but thought themselves better without it, as equall

all parts of Greece. Amylius himselfe made progresse through the Countrey; viliting all the famous places therein, as for his pleasure: yet not forgetting to make them understand what power hee had over them. More than five bundred of the chiefe citizens in Demetries were flaine at one time by those of the Roman faction. and with helpe of the Roman fouldiers. Others fled, or were banished, and their goods confifcated. Of which things, when complaint was made to the Conful; the redreffe was fuch, as requited not the paines of making supplication. His friends, that is to fay, those which betrayed vnto the Romans the liberty of their Countrey, hee featled like a King, with excessive cheere, yet so, that he had all things very cheape in his Campe : an easie matter, since no man durit be back- to ward in fending prouisions, nor fet on them the due price. Embassadours likewise were fent from Rome; some, to give order for settling the estate of Macedon, towards which they had more particular infiruction from the Senate than was youll in fuch cases; and some, to visit the affaires of Greece. The Kingdome of Macedon was fet at liberty by Amylius and the Embaffadours, his affifiants, who had order therefore from the Senate. But this liberty was fuch as the Romans vsed to bestow. The best part of it was, That the Tribute which had beene payed vnto the Kings. was lessened by halfe. As for the rest; the Countrey was divided into foure parts, and they forbidden commerce one with the other. All the Nobilitie were fent captine into Italy, with their wives and children, as many as were above fifteene 20 vecres old. The ancient Lawes of the Countrey were abrogated; and new given by Amilius. Such milchiefe the Senate thought it better to doe, at the first alteration of things in this Province, and in the time of Conquest, than otherwise to leave any inconvenience that should be worse in the suture. But concerning the Greekes, that were not subjects to Rome; the things done to them could deserve no better name than meere tyrannic, yea and shamelesse periory; were it not so, that the familiar custome, among Princes and great Estates, of violating Leagues, doth make the Oathes of confederation feeme of no validitie. The Embafladors that were fent to visit the Greekes, called before them all such men of note, from curry quarter, as had any way discourred an unserniceable disposition towards the Ro- 20 mans. These they lent to Rome; where they were made fure enough. Some of these had sent letters to Perfew, which fell at length into the Romans hands : and in that respect, though they were no subjects, yet wanted there no colour, for vsing them as traytors, or at least as enemies. But since onely two men were beheaded, for having beene openly on the Macedonian fide; and fince it is confessed, that the good Patriotes were no leffe afflicted in this inquisition, than they that had fold themselues to the King: this manner of proceeding was inexcusable Tyrannie. With the Achaens these Embassadors were to deale more formally: not so much because that Common-wealth was strong (though this were to bee regarded by thein, having no Commission to make or denounce Warre) and like to prove vn- 40 tractable, if manifest wrong were offered; as for that there appeared no manner of figne, by letters, or otherwife, whereby any one of the Acheans could be fuspitiously charged to have held correspondence with the Macedonian. It was also so, that neither Callierates, nor any of his adherents, had been employed by the Nation, in doing or offering their feruice to the Romans, but onely fuch as were the best Patriotes. Yet would not therefore the Embassadors neglect to vie the benefit of the time: wherein, fince all men trembled for feare of Rome, the feafon ferned fitty to ranke the Acheans with the rest. And hereto Calliorates was very vigent: fearing, and procuring them to feare in behalfe of him and his friends, that if some sharpe order were not now taken, hee and his fellowes should bee 50 made to pay for their mischieuous devices, ere long time passed. So the Embassadours came among the Acheans: where one of them, in open assembly of the Nation, spake as Callierates had before instructed him. Hee said, that some of the chiefe among them, had with money and other meanes befriended Perfews.

This being fo ; he defired that all fuch men might be condemned, whom, after fentence given, he would name vnto them. After sentence given (cried out the whole affembly) what inflice were this? name them first, and let them answere; which if they cannot well doe, we will foone condemne them. Then faid the Roman boldly, that all their Prætors, as many as had led their armies, were guiltie of this crime. If this were true, faid Xenon, a temperate man, and confident in his innocence; then should I likewise have beene friend to Perseus: whereof, if any man can accuse me, I shall throughly answere him, either here presently, or before the Senate at Rome. Voon these words of Xenon the Embassador laid hold, and faid that even so it were To the best way, for him and the rest to purge themselves before the Senate at Rome. Then began he to name others, and left not untill he had cited aboue a thousand; willing them to appeare, and answere before the Senate. This might even be tearmed the captinitie of Greece; wherein fo many of the honestest and worthiest men were carried from home, for none other cause than their lone vnto their Country; to be punished according to the will of those, who could not endure, that vertue. and regard of the publike libertic, should dwell together in any of the Greekes. At their comming to Rome, they were all cast into prilon, as men already condemned by the Achains. Many Embassages were sent from Achaia (where it is to be wondred', that any fuch honest care of these innocent men could bee remaining : since honestie had beene thus punished as a vice, in so many of the worthiest among them) to informe the Senate, that these men were neither condemned by the Achaans, nor yet held to bee offendors. But in flead of better answere it was pronounccd; That the Senate thought it not expedient for the Countrie, that these men should returne into Achaia. Neither could any sollicitation of the Achains, who neuer ceafed to importune the Senate for their libertie, preuaile at all; vntill after feuenteene yeeres, fewer than thirtie of them were enlarged, of whom that wife and vertuous man Polybius, the great Historian was one. All the rest were either dead in prison; of having made offer to escape, whether vpon the way before they came to Rome, or whether out of jayle, after that they were committed thereto, suffered death

30 as malefactors. This was a gentle correction, in regard of what was done vpon the Epirots. For the Senate being defirous to prescrue the Macedonian Treasure whole; yet withall, to gratifie the Souldiours, gaue order, That the whole Countrey of Epirus should be put to sacke. This was a barbarous and horrible cruelty; as also it was performed by Amylius with mischicuous subtiltie. Having taken leave of the Greekes, and of the Macedonians, with bidding them well to vie the libertie beflowed voon them by the people of Rome; he fent vnto the Epirots for tenne of the principall men out of every Citic. These he commanded to deliver up all the Gold and Silver which they had; and fent along with them, into every of their 40 Townes, what companies of men he thought convenient, as it were to fetch the money. But he gaue secret instruction to the Captaines, that vpon a certaine day by him appointed, they should fall to sacke, every one the Towne whereinto hee was fent, Thus in one day were threescore and tenne Cities, all confederate with the Romans, spoiled by the Roman Souldiors; and besides other acts of hostility in a time of peace, a hundred and fiftie thousand of that Nation made slaves. It may be granted, that some of the Epirots deserved punishment, as having favoured Perfeus. But fince they, among this people, that were thought guilty of this offence, yea, or but coldly affected to the Remanes, had been already fent into Italie, there to receive their due; and fince this Nation, in generall, was not onely at the present 50 in good obedience, but had, euen in this warre, done good feruice to the Romans: I hold this act fo wicked, that I should not beleeve it, had any one Writer delivered the contrarie. But the truth being manifest by consent of all; it is the lesse marueilous, that Go D was pleafed to make Amylim childleffe, euen in the glorie of his triumph, how great focuer other wife his vertues were.

In

In such manner dealt the Romans, after their victory, with the Greekes and Macedonians. How terrible they were to other Kingdomes abroad; it will appeare by the efficacie of an Embassage sent from them to Antiochus; whereof before wee speake, we must speake somewhat of Antiochus his foregoers, of himselfe, and of his affaires about which these Embassadours came.

Appian, and Sulpitius: though Infephus give him but seven. A Prince, who as hee was flothfull by nature; to the great loffe which his father Antiochus had received, tooke from him the meanes of managing any great affaire. Of him, about three hundred yeeres before his birth, Daniel gaue this judgement, Et stabit in loco eius vilissmus & indignus decore regio. And in his place ( speaking of Antiochus the Father of this man) [hall flart up a wilde per fon, unworthy the honor of a King. Vnder this Seleucus, those things were done which are spoken of Onias the High Priest, in these words, and other to the same effect: What time as the holy Citie was inhabited with all Peace because of the godlinesse of ONIAS the Priest, it came to passe, that even the King 20 did honor the place, and garnished the Temple with great gifts. And all that is written in the third Chapter of the second of Macchabees, of Simon of Beniamin, who by Mpollonius betrayed the Treasures of the Temple: and of Heliodorus sent by the King to feize them; of his miraculous striking by God, and his recovery at the prayers of Onias; of the Kings death, and of his successor Antiochus Epiphanes. It is therefore from the raigne of this King, that the bookes of the Macchabees take beginning. Which bookes feeme not to bee deliuered by one and the same hand. For the first booke, although it touch vpon Alexander the Great, yet it hath nothing else of his storic, nor of the acts of his successors, till the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, the brother and successor of this Seleneus; from whom downward to the death 40 of Simon Macchabeus (who died in the hundred threefcore and scuenteenth yeere of the Greeker in Syria) that first booke treateth. The Author of the second book. although he take the Story somewhat further off, by way of a Prozme, yet hee endeth with the hundred and one and fiftieth yeere of the Gresian raigne, and with the death of Nicanor, flaine by Iudas: remembring in the fourth Chapter the practice of Iafon the brother of Onias, who after the death of Seleucus , premailed with Antiochus Epiphanes, his successor for the Priesthood. It is also held by Iansenius and Super Eccleses other grave Writers, that it was in the time of this Onias, that Arius King of the Spartans sent Embassadors to the Jewes, as to their brothers and kinsmen. Which intelligence betweene them and the Greekes, Ionathan the brother and successor of 50 Judgs, remembreth in the Preamble of that Epifile, which he himselfe directed to the people of Sparta by Numenius and Antipater his Embassadours, whom hee employed at the fame time to the Senate of Rome; repeating also the former Letters her clawes.

Now to this Seleneus, the fourth of that name, succeeded Antiochus Epiphanes, in the hundred and feuen and thirtieth yeere of the Greekes in Syria. Hee was the fecond some of the Great Antiochus: and he obtained his Kingdome by procuring the death of the King his brother; which also hee vsurped from his brothers

Ptolemie Philometor, his Nophew by his fifter Cleopatra, being then very yong, 10 had been about feuen yeeres King of Agypt.

Ptolemic Epiphanes, the Father of this King Philometor, had raigned in Egypt foure and twenty yeeres; in great quiet, but doing little or nothing that was memorable. Philip of Macedon, and the great Antiochis, had agreed to divide his Kingdome between them, whilesthe was a childe. But they found such other busines, ere long, with the Romans, as made them giue ouer their vniust purpose; especially Antiochus, who gaue, with his daughter in marriage, vnto this Ptolemie, the Prouinces of Calofyria, Phanice, and Indea, which hee had wonne by his victory over Scopes, that was Generall of the Agyptian forces in those parts. Neuerthelesse, Ptolemie adhered to the Romans: whereby hee lived in the greater fecuritie. Hee left 20 behind him two fons; this Ptolemie Philometor, and Ptolemie Philoon, with a daughter, Cleopatra. Cleopatra was wife to the elder of her brethren, and after his death to the yonger, by whom shee was cast off, and her daughter taken in her stead. Such were the marriages of these Egyptian Kings. Ptolemie Philometor, to called (that is, the louer of his mother) by a bitter nickname, because he flew her, fell into hatred with his subjects, and was like to be chafed out of his Kingdome, his yonger brother being fet vp against him. Physcon hauing a ftrong party, got possession of Alexandria; and Philometor held himselfe in Memphis, crawing fuccour of King Antiochus his vncle. Hereo! Antiochus was glad: who under colour to take upon him the protection of the young Prince, fought by 30 all meanes possible to possesse himselie of that Kingdome. He sent Apollonius the fonne of Mneftheus Embassadour into Egypt, and vnder colour to affilt the Kings Coronation, hee gaue him instructions to perswade the Gouernours of the yong King Philometor, to deliuer the King his Nephew with the principall places of that Kingdome into his hands; pretending an extraordinary care and defire of his Nephewes fafety and well doing. And the better to answere all argument to the contratic, he prepared a forcible armie to attend him. Thus came he alongst the coast of Syria to Joppe, and from thence on the fudden he turned himselfe towards terufalem, where, by Infon the Prieft (a Chaplin fit for fuch a Patron) bee was with all :. Mac. 4. pompe and folemnitie received into the Citie. For though lately, in the time of Se-40 leucus, the brother and predecessour of Epiphanes, that impious Traitour Simon of Maca, cap 3.

the Tribe of Beniamin, Ruler of the Temple, when hee would have delivered the treasures thereof to Apollonius Gouernor of Calosyria and Phanicia, was disappointed of his wicked purpose by miracle from heaven; the said apollonius being strucken by the Angel of God, and recovering againe at the prayer of Onias: yet fufficed not this example to terrific others from the like vngodly practices. Presently vpon the death of Seleucus, this lason, the brother of Onices, seeking to supplant his brother, and to obtaine the Priesthood for himselfe, offered vnto the King three hundred and threefeore talents of filner, with other rents and fummes of money. Mac. 1.26.4. So hee got his defire, though he not long inioyed it.

This naughty dealing of Infon, and his being ouer-reached by another in the samekinde, calls to minde a by-word taken vpamong the Acheans, when as that mischieuous Callierates, who had beene too hard for all worthic and vertuous men, was beaten at his owne weapon, by one of his owne condition. It went

One fire than other burnes more forcibly. One Wolfe than other Wolues does bute more fore; One Hawke than other Hawkes more fwift does fly. So one most mischieuous of men before, CALLICRATES, falle knaue as knaue might be, Met with MENALCIDAS more falle than be.

And cuen thus fell it out with Iafon: who within three yeeres after, was betrayed. and overbidden by Menelaus the brother of Simon, that for three hundred talents more obtained the Priesthood for himselfe: Iafon thereupon being forced to flie 10 from Ierusalem, and to hide himselfe among the Ammonites. From Ieru/alem, Antiochus marched into Phanicia, to augment the numbers of his men of warre, and to prepare a Fleet for his expedition into Agret; with which, Managary and with a mighty armie of land-forces, He went about to raigne over Agypt, that he might have the dominion of two Realmes, and entred Agypt with a mighty company, with Chariots and Elephants, with Horsemen, and with a great Nanie, and moved warre against PTOLEMEVS King of Egypt, but PTOLEMEVS was afraid of him, and fled and Verf.18. 19.20. many were wounded to death. Thus was fulfilled the Prophecie of DANIEL: Hee Mall enterinto Dan.c.11.0.24. the quiet and plentifull Provinces, and he shall do that which his Eathers have not done, nor 20 his Fathers Fathers. Neuer indeed had any of the Kings of Syria fo great a victorie ouer the Agyptians, nor tooke from them so great riches. For hee gave a notable Hierom.in Dan. Ouerthrow to the Captaines of Ptolemie, betweene Pelufum and the hill Cafina, after which he entred, and fackt the greatest and richest of all the Cities of Egypt, Alexandria excepted, which he could not force. In conclusion, after that ANTIO-CHVs had smitten Egypt, hee turned againe, and went up towards Ifracl and Jerusalem with a mighty people, and entred proudly into the Sanctuary, and tooke away the golden Altar, and the Candlesticke for the light, and all the instruments thereof, and the table of the Show-bread, and the Powring Veffels, and the Bowles, and the golden Basons, and the Vaile, and the Crownes, and the golden Apparell. Hee tooke also the Silver and the Gold, and the 20. precious Iewels, and the fecret Treasures: and when he had taken away all, he departed into his owne Land after he had murdered many men. Lib.6.

It was about the beginning of the Macedonian warre, that Antiochus tooke in hand this Egyptian businesse. At what time he first layd claime to Calofyria; justifying his title by * the fame allegations which his father had made; and ftiffely auerring, that this Prouince had not beene configued over to the Egyptian, or given Publ. Legat. 81. in dowrie with Chopatra. Easie it was to approve his right vnto that which he had already gotten, when he was in a faire way to get all Egypt. The Acheans, Rhodians, Athenians, and other of the Greekes, pressed him, by scuerall Embassages, to fome good conclusion. But his answere was that if the Alexandrians could be con- 40 tented to receive their King his Nephew Philometor, the elder brother of the Ptolemies, then should the warre be presently at an end; otherwise not. Yet when hee faw, that it was an hard piece of worke to take Alexandria by force : hee thought it better to let the two brothers confume themselves with intestine warre, than by the terrour of his armes, threatning destruction vnto both of them, to put into them any defire of comming to agreement. He therefore withdrew his forces for the prefent; leaving the Ptolemies in very weake chate; the yonger, almost ruinated by his invalion, the elder hated and for faken by his people.

But how weake focuer these Egyptians were, their hatred was thought to bee so firong, that Antioches might leave them to the profecution thereof; and follow, at 50 good leifure, his other bufineffe at Ierufalem or elfewhere. So after the facke of Ieru/alem, he rested him awhile at Antioch; and then made a journey into Cilicia, to suppresse the Rebellion of the Tharsians and other in those parts who had bin giuen, as it were, by way of dowry, to a Concubine of the Kings, called antiochis. For

Gouernour of Syria in his absence, he left one Andronicus, a man of great authoritie about him. In the meane while Menelaus the brother of Simon, the same who had thrust Ialon out of the Pricsthood, and promised the King three hundred talents for an Income, committing the charge of the Priesthood to his brother Lysimachus, ftole certaine veffels of gold out of the Temple: wherof he prefented a part to Andronicus the Kings Lieutenant, and fold the rest at Tyre, and other Cities adioining. This he did, as it seemeth, to advance the payment of the three hundred talents promifed, the fame being now by Softratus eagerly demanded. Hereof when Onias the Priest (formerly dispossessed by Iafon) had certaine knowledge, being mooned to with zeale, and detefting the facriledge of Menelaus, hee reprodued him for it; and fearing his reuenge, he withdrew himfelfe into a Sanctuary at Daphne.

CHAP.6. S.II. of the Historie of the World.

Daphne was a place of delight adjoyning as a suburb to Antioch. In compasse it had about ten miles: wherein were the Temples of Apollo and Diana, with a Groue, fweete Springs, banquetting places, and the like; which were wholly, in a maner, abused to lust, and other such voluptuousnesse. Whether it were well done of onias, to commit himselfe to the protection of Apollo and Diana, or to claime priniledge, from the holines of a ground confecrated to any of the Heathen gods, I will not stand to discourse. Only I say for mine owne opinion; that the inconvenience is far leffe, to hold this booke as Apocryphall, than to judge this fearefull shift which

able, as the booke feemes to doe. As for this refuge, it could not faue the life of the pooreold man: for MENEL AVS taking ANDRONICVS apart, prajed him to flay Macdinaca. ONIAS. So when he came to ONIAS, he counfelled him craftily, giving him his right hand with an oath, and perswading him to come out of the Sanctuary; so he flew him incontinently without any regard of righteouf neffe. Hercof when complaint was made to Antiochus after his returne out of Cilicia, Hee tooke away ANDRONICUS bis garment of purple, and rent his clothes, and commanded him to be led throughout the Citie, and in the same place where hee had committed the wickednesse against ONIAS, bee was Macacaus flaine as amurderer. In taking reuenge of this innocent mans death, I should have 30 thought that this wicked King had once in his life-time done Iustice. But presently after this, at the fuit of one Ptolemie, a traytor to Ptolemie Philometor, he condemned innocent men to death; who iuftly complained against Monelaus, and his brother Lylimachus, for a second robbing of the Temple, and carrying thence the vesfels of gold remaining. Hereby it is manifest, that he was guided by his owne outragious will, and not by any regard of justice : fince he reuenged the death of Onias, yet flue those that were in the same cause with Onias; Who, had they told their cause, Versag. yea, before the Scythians, they should have been beard as innocent. By reason of such his vniteadinesse, this King was commonly termed Epimanes, that is, madde, in stead of Epiphanes, which signifieth Noble or Illustrious.

After this, Antiochus made preparation for a second voyage into Agypt, and then Macace, s.v.1. were there feene throughout all the Citie of Icrusalem, forty dayes long, horsemen running in the ayre with robes of gold, and as bands of Spearemen, and as troupes of Horsemen set in aray, encountring and courfing one against another. Of these prodigious signes, or rather forewarnings of GoD, all Histories have delivered vs, some more, some leffe. Before the destruction of Ierusalem by Vespasian, a starre in the forme of a sword appeared in the Heauens directly ouer the City, after which there followed a flaughter like vnto this of Epiphanes, though farre greater. In the Cymbrian warres, Pliny Plin.lib.2.c.59. tells vs, that Armies were seene fighting in the ayre from the morning till the eue-

Off-spring of the Cesars, as well naturall as adopted, tokeend; whereof this notable signegaue warning.

When Luia was first married to Augustus, an Eagle let sal into her armes a white Henne, holding a Lawrell branch in her mouth. Luia caused this Henne to bee carefully nounshed, and the Lawrell branch to be planted: Of the Henne came a saire encrease of white Poultrie, and from the little branch there sprang vpin time a Groue of Lawrell: so that afterwards, in all Triumphs, the Conquerours did vie to carrie in their hands a branch of Bayes taken out of this Groue, and after the Triumphs ended, to fet it againe in the same ground: which branches were observed, when they happened to wither, to for shew the death of these persons to who carried them in triumph. And in the last yeere of 2000, all the broodes of the white Hennes died, and the whole Groue of Bayes withered at once. Moreouer, the heads of all the Casars Statues, and the Scepter placed in Augustus his hand, were stricken downe with lightning. That the serves did not thinke such strange signes to be evenworthy of regard; it appeares by their calling vpon God, and praying, that these tokens might turne to good.

Now, as the first voyage of Antiochus into Agypt was occasioned by discord of the two brethren therein raigning: so was his second Expedition caused by their good agreement. For the elder Ptolemie being left in Memphis, not flrong enough to force his brother, who had defended Alexandria against all the power 20 of their vncle; thought it the best way to seeke entrance into that royall Citic, rather by persuation than by armes. Physican had not as yet forgotten the terrour of the former fiege: the Alexandrines though they loued not Philometor, yet loued they worse to liue in scarcitic of victuals ( which was already great among them, and like to grow extreme) fince nothing was brought in from the Countrey; and the friends of the yonger brother faw no likelihood of good iffue to bee hoped for without reconconciliation. These good helpes, and about all these, the louing disposition of Cleopatra, who then was in Alexanaria, encouraged Philometor inhis purpose. But that which made him earnestly desirous to accomplish it, was the feare wherein hee flood of his vncle. For though Antiochus were gone out 20 of Leypt with his armie; yet had hee left behinde him a strong garrison in Pelustum; retaining that Citie, which was the Key of Agypt, to his owne vie. This consideration wrought also with Physican, and with those that were about him; so as by the vehement mediation of Cleopatratheir fifter, the two brethren made an end of all quarrels.

When the newes of this accord was brought to Antiochus, hee was greatly enraged: for notwithstanding that hee had pretended no other thing than the estabulliment of the King Philometor his nephew, and a meaning to fubicat his yonger brother vnto him, which he gaue in answere to all Embassadours; yet he now prepared to make sharpe warre vpon them both. And to that end hee presently fur- 40 nilhed and fent out his Nauce towards Cyprus, and drew his land Armie into Calosyria, readic to enter £gypt the Spring following. When he was on his way as farre as Rhinocorura, he met with Embassadours sent from Ptolemie. Their errand was partly to yeeld thankes to Antiochus for the establishing of Philometor in his Kingdome; partly to beseech him, That hee would rather bee pleased to significe what hee required to have done in Agypt, which should bee performed, than to enter it as an enemie with so puissant an Armie But Antiochus returned this short answere, That he would neither call backe his Fleete, nor wishdraw his Armie, vpon any other condition, than that Ptolemie should surrender into his hands together with the Citic of Pelusum, the whole Territory thereto belonging: and that 50 hee should also abandon and leave vnto him the He of Cyprus, with all the right that he had vnto either of them for euer. For answere vnto these demands, hee set downeaday certaine, and a short one. Which being come and past, without any accord made, the Syrian Fleete entred Nilus, and recoursed as well those places which appertained to Ptolemie in Arabia, as in Egypt it selfe; for Memphs, and all about it, received Antiosbus, being vnable to resist him. The King hauing now no stoppe in his way to Alexandria; passed on thitherwards by easie journeyes.

CHAP. 6. S.12.

Of all these troubles past, as well as of the present danger wherein Egypt flood, the Romans had notice long agoe. But they found, or, were contented to finde, little reason for them to intermeddle therein. For it was a civill warre: and wherein Antiochus seemed to take part with the juster cause. Yet they gaue fignification, that it would be much displeasing vnto them, to have the Kingdome to Of Legypt taken from the rightfull owners. More they could not, or would not doe; being troubled with Per/ess; and therefore loth to prouoke Antiochus too farre. Neuertheleffe, the Agyptian Kings being reconciled, and standing joyntly in neede of helpe against their Vncle, who prepared and made open warre against them both : it was to be expected, that not onely the Romans, but many of the Greekes, as being thereto obliged by notable benefits, should arme in defence of their Kingdome. Rome had beene fullained with food from Egypt , in the warre of Hannibal; when Italy lying waste, had neither corne, nor money wherewith to buy sufficient flore. By helpe of the Leyptian, had Aratus laide the foundation of that greatnesse, whereto the Acheans attained. And by the like helpe, had to Rhodes beene defended against Demetrius Poliorcetes. Neither were these friendly turnes, which that bountifull house of the Ptolemies had done for sundry people abroad, ill followed, or seconded, by other as bad in requitall : but with continuance of sutable beneficence, from time to time encreased. Wherefore the two brothers fent abroad confidently for ayde; especially to the Rhodians and Acheans, who seemed most able to give it effectually. To the Romans , Physican and Cleopatra had fent, a yeere fince : but their Embaffadours lay ttill in Rome. Of the Acheans they defired in particular, that Lycortas the braue warriour might bee fent to them, as Generall of all the Auxiliaries, and his sonne Polybiu, Generall of the Horse. Hecreunto the Acheens readily condescended: and would immediatly 30 haue made performance; if Callicrates had not interposed his mischieuous arte. Hee, whether feeking occasion to vaunt his obsequiousnesse to the Romans; or much rather enuying those Noble Captaines, whose service the Kings defired; with flood the common voyce; which was, That their Nation flould, not with fuch small numbers as were requested, but with all their power, be ayding vnto the Ftolemies. For it was not now (hee faide) convenient time to entangle themselves in any such businesse, as might make them the lesse able to yeeld vnto the Romans, whathelpe soeuer should bee required in the Macedonian warre. And in this sentence, hee with those of his faction, obstinately persisted; terrifying others with bigge wordes, as it were in behalfe of the Romans. But Polybius affirmed, that 40 Martius the late Confull had fignified vnto him, that the Romans were past all neede or helpe: adding further, that a thousand soote, and two hundred horse, might well bee spared, to the ayde of their Benefactours, the Agyptian Kings , without disabling their Nation to performe any service to the Romans; for as much as the Acheans could without trouble, raise thirtie or fortie thousand Souldiours. All this notwith standing, the resolution was deferred from one meeting to another; and finally broken, by the violence of Call crates. For when it was thought that the Decree should have passed; hee brought into the Theater where the assembly was held, a Meisenger with letters from Martius; whereby the Acheans were defired to conforme themselves to the Roman Senate; and to labour as the Senate had 50 done, by fending Embassadours to fee Agypt in peace. This was an aduice against all reason. For the Senate had indeed sent Embassadours to make peace; but as in a time of greater businesse elsewhere, with such milde wordes, that nothing was effected. Wherefore it was not likely, that the Acheans should doe any good in the fame kinde. Yet Polybius and his friends, durft not gaine-fay the Romane Councell: which had force of an injunction. So the Kings were left in much diffresse; disappointed of their expectation. But within a while was Perfeus ouercome: and then might the Embassador sent from the Romane Senate, performe as much as any Ar-

Audience had beene lately given by the Senate, vnto those Embassadors of Physicon and Cleopatra; which having trayed more then a whole yeere in the City, brought nothing of their businesse to effect untill now. The Embassadours delivered their meffage in the name of those that had sent them : though it concerned (which perhaps they knew not) Philometer, no leffe than his Brother and to

In this Embassage of Ptolemie, now requesting helpe from Rome; appeared a notable change of his fortune, from such as it had beene before three or foure veeres last past. For in the beginning of these his troubles, which beganne with the Macedonian Warre: either he, or Enlaus, or Lenaus (vpon whom the blame was afterwards layd) which had the government of him, thought his affaires in such good estate. that not onely he determined to fet vpon Antiochus, for Calefyria; but would have interpoled himselfe betweene the Romans and Perfeut, as a competent Arbitratour; though it fell out well, that his Embassadour was by a friend perswaded to forget that point of his errand. From these high thoughts, hee fell on the sudden , by the 20 rebellion of his brother and fubicets, to line under protection of the same Antiochus. And now at such time as by atonement with his brother and subjects, hee might haue feemed to stand in no neede of such protection, hee hath remaining none other helpe whereby to faue both his Kingdome and life, than what can bee obtained by their intercession which were imployed against him. This miserable condition of him, his brother and fifter shewed it selfe, euen in the habit of those Embassadours. They were poorely clad; the haire of their heades and beardes ouer-growne, as was their manner in time of affliction; and they carried in their handes, branches of Oliuc. Thus they entred into the Senate; and there fell, groueling and proftrate vpon the floore. Their garments were not fo meane and mournefull, nor their 30 lookes and Countenances fo lad and dejected, but that their speech was than either of the other farre more lamentable. For having told in what danger their King and Countrey stood; they made a pitifull and grieuous complaint vnto the Senate, beseeching them to have compassion of their estate, and of their Princes, who had alwayes remained friendly and faithfull to the Romans. They faide that the people of Rome had so much hecretofore fauoured this Antiochus in particular, and were of such account and authority, with all other Kings and Nations; as if they pleased butto send their Embassadours, and let Antiechus know, that the Senate was offended with his undertaking upon the King their Confederate; then would he presently raise his siege from before Alexandria, and with-draw his Armie out of 40 Agyps, into Syria. But that if the Senate protracted any time, or vied any delay; then should Ptolemie and Cleopatra, be shortly driven out of their Realmes, and make repaire to Rome, with hamefull dishonour to the Senate, and people thereof, in that, in the extreme dangers of all their fortunes, they had not vouch fafed to relieue them.

The Lords of the Senate moued with compassion, sent incontinently C. Popilius Lenus, C. Decimius, and A. Hostilius, as Embassadors to determine and end the warre betweenethole Kings. In commission they had first to find King Ptolemie, and then Anticchus, and to let them both understand, that unlesse they surceased, and gaue ouer Armes, they would take that King no more for a friend to the Senate, and peo- 50 ple of Rome, whom they found obstinate, or vsing delay. So these Romans, together with the Alexandrine Embassadours, tooke their leave, and went onward their way within three dayes after.

Whilest

Whilest Popilius and his fellowes were on their way toward Agypt, Antiochus had transported his Armic ouer Lusine, some fortie myles from Alexandria. So neere was hee to the end of his journey, when the Roman Embassadors met him. Aftergreeting and falutations at their first encounter, Antioches offered his right hand to Popilius: but Popilius filled it with a Role of paper; willing him to reade those Mandates of the Senate, before hee did anie thing else. Antiochus did fo; and having a little while confidered of the bufineffe, hee tolde Popilius, That hee would aduise with his friends, and then give the Embassadours their answere. But Popilius, according to his ordinarie blunt manner of speech, which 10 hee had by nature, made a Circle about the King with a Rod which he held in his hand, willing him to make him fuch an answere as hee might report to the Senate, before hee moued out of that Circle. The King aftonished at this so rude and violent a Commaundement, after hee had stayed and pawsed awhile, I will be content (quoth he) to doe what foeuer the Senate shall ordaine. Then Popilius gane vnto the King his hand, as to a Friend and Allie of the

Thus Antiochus departed out of Agypt, without anie good iffue of his coftly Expedition; euen in such manner as * Daniel had prophesied long before: Dancents. yea, fulfilling euerie particular circumstance, both of returning, and of doing mil-20 chiefe to Ierusalem after his returne; like as if these things had rather beene hiftorified than fore-told by the Prophet. As for the Roman Embassadours, they stayed awhile, and settled the Kingdome of Egypt, leaning it vnto the elder brother. and appointing the younger to raigne ouer Cyrene. This done, they departed towards Cyprus; which they left, as it had beene, in the power of the Agyptian, haning first sent away Antiochus Fleet, which had alreadic giuen an ouerthrow to the Egyptian ships.

How the Romans were dreadfull to all Kings. Their demeanour towards EVMENES, PRUSIAS, MASANISSA, and Cotys. The end of PERSEUS and his children. The instabilitie of Kingly Estates. The Triumphs of PAVLYS, ANICIVS, and OCTAVIVS. With the Conclusion of the Worke.

And by the readie obedience of King Antiochus to the will of the Y this peremptorie demeanour of Popilius, in doing his Message, Senate; weemay perceive how terrible the Romans were growne, through their conquel of Marches The Control of March through their conquest of Macedon. The same Popilius had beene well contented, a yeare before this, to lay aside the roughnesse of his natural condition, and to give good language to the Acheans and Etolians, when hee went Embassadour to those people of Greece, that were of farre lesse power than the King Antiochus. Likewise, Antiochus had with good words, and no more than good words, dismissed other Embassadours which came from Rome, in such fort, as they complained not, much leffe vsed anie menacing tearmes, though hee performed nothing of their request. But now the case was altered. So found other Kings as well as Antiochus.

Eumenes sent to Rome his brother Attalus, to gratulate the victorie ouer Per-50 feus, and to crave helpe or countenance of the Senate against the Gallogreekes, which molested him. Verie welcome was Attalus, and louingly entertained by most of the Senatours: who bade him be consident, and requested of the Senate hopefull promifes tickled Attalus with fuch ambition, that hee eyther approued, or seemed to approue the motion. But his honest nature was soone reclaymed by the faithfull counfaile of Stratim a Phylician; whome Eumenes had fent to Rome of purpose to keepe his brother vpright. So, when hee came into the Senate, hee delinered the errand about which hee had beene fent; recounted his owne feruices done to the Romans in the late Warre, *wherewithall he forgat not to make of his brother as good mention as he could: and finally requered, That * Polyb, Legat. the Townes of Anus and Maronea might be bestowed upon himselfe. * By his omitting to fue for his brothers Kingdome, the Senate conceiued opinion, to that he meant to crave another day of audience for that businesse alone. Wherefore, to make him understand how gracious hee was, they not onely graunted all his defire; but in the prefents which they gauc to him (as was their custome to Embaffadours that came with an acceptable meffage) they vied lingular magnificence. Neuertheleffe, Attalus tooke no notice of their meaning; but went his way, contented with what they had alreadie graunted. This did so highly difpleafe the Senate, that whilest hee was yet in Italie, they gaue order for the libertie of Enus and Maronea: thereby making vneffectuall their promise; which otherwise they could not, without shame, renoke. And as for the Gallogreekes, which were about to invade the Kingdome of Pergamus; they fent Embaffa- 20 dours to them, with fuch instructions, as rather encouraged than hindered them in their purpose. The displeasure of the Senate beeing so manifest; Eumenes thought it worthie of his labour to make another voyage to Rome. Hee might well blame the follie of his fecond voyage thither, for this necessitie of the third: fince, by his malice to Perfeus, he had layed open vnto these ambitious Potentates the way to his owne dores. No sooner was he come into Italie, than the Senate was readie to fend him going. It was not thought expedient to vie him as an enemie, that came to visit them in lone: neyther could they, in so doing, have auoided the note of fineular inconstancie; and to entertaine him as a friend, was more than their hatred to him, for his ingratitude, as they deemed it, would per- 20 mit. Wherefore they made a Decree, That no King should be suffered to come to Rome; and by vertue thereof fent him home, without expence of much further complement.

Prustas King of Bithynia had beene at Rome somewhat before; where he was welcommed after a better fashion. Hee had learned to behaue himselfe as humbly as the proud Romans could expect or defire. For entring into the Senate, hee lay downe, and kiffed the threshold, calling the Fathers his gods and sauiours : as also hee vsed to weare a Cap, after the manner of slaues newly manumised, professing himselfe an enfranchised bondman of the People of Rome. Hee was indeede naturally a flaue, and one that by fuch abject flatteric kept himfelfe40 fafe; though doing otherwife greater mischiefe than anie wherewith Perseus had beene charged. His errand was, besides matter of complement, to commend vnto the Senate the care of his fonne N joomedes, whome he brought with him to Rome, there to receive education. Further petition he made, to have some Townes added to his Kingdome: whereto, because the graunt would have beene vnjust, he received a cold answere. But concerning the Wardship of his sonne, it was undertaken by the Senate: which, vaunting of the pleasure lately done to Agypt, in freeing it from Antiochia, willed him thereby to confider, what effectuall protection the Romans gaue vnto the children of Kings, that were to their pa-

But aboue all other Kings, Masanista held his credit with the Romans good.
His quarrels were endlesse with the Carthaginians; which made the friendship of the Romans to him the more assured. In all controuersies they gaue judgement on his side: and whereas hee had inuaded the Countrey of Emporia, holding the Lands, but vnable to winnethe Townes; the Romans (though at sirft they could finde no pretext, whereby to countenance him in this oppression) compelled sinally the Carthaginians both to let goe all their hold, and to pay sine hundred Talents to the Namidian, for having hindered him of his due so long. Now indeede had Rome good leysure to deusife vpon the ruine of Carthage: after which, the race of Masanifa himselfe was shortly by them rooted by. But heereof the olde King never dreamed. Hee sent to Rome one of his sonnes, to congratulate the victorie over Perseus; and offered to come thio ther himselfe, there to sacrifice for joy wnto sapiter in the Capital. His good will was louingly accepted; his sonne rewarded; and hee entreaced to shay at home.

Cotys the Thracian sent Embassadours, to excuse himselfe touching the aide by him given to Perseus, for that the Macedonian had him bound by hostages; and to entreat, That his sonne, which was taken with the children of Perseus, might be set at libertie for convenient ransome. His excuse was not taken; since hee had voluntarily obliged himselfe to Perseus, by giving bossages, without necessitie: Yet was his sonne given backe to him ransome-tree; with admonition, to carrie himselfe better toward the Romans in time following. His Kingdome lay betweene Macedon and some barbarous Nations; in which respect, it was good to hold him in faire tearmes.

As for those whappie Kings, Perseus and Gentius, they were ledde through Reme, with their children and friends, in the Triumphs of Emplius and Intime. Perseus had often made suite to Emplius, that hee might not be put to such disgrace: but hee still received one skornefull answere, That it lay in his owne power to preuent it; whereby was meant, that hee might kill himselse. And surely, had hee not hoped for greater mercie than hee sound rather have sought his death in Muccase, than have beene beholding to the courteste of his insolent enemies for a wretched life. The issue of the Roman elements, whereof 20 clemencie, whereof Amylius had given him hope, was no better than this: After that hee, and his fellow King, had beene ledde in chaynes through the streetes, before the Chariots of their triumphing Victors, they were committed to prison, wherein they remained without hope of release. It was the manner, that when the Triumpher turned his Chariot vp towards the Capitol, there to doe facrifice, hee should command the captines to be had away to prifon, and there put to death: fo as the honour of the Vanquisher, and miserie of those that were ouercome, might be both together at the vtmost. This last sentence of death was remitted vnto Perfeus : yet so, that hee had little joy of his life; but eyther famished himselfe, or (for it is diuersly reported) was 40 kept watching perforce by those that had him in custodie; and so died for want of fleepe. Of his sonnes, two died; it is uncertaine how. The youngest called Alexander (onely in name like vnto the Great, though destined sometimes perhaps by his father, vnto the fortunes of the Great) became a loyner, or Turner, or, at his best preferment, a Scribe under the Roman Officers. In such pouertie ended the Royall House of Macedon: and it ended on the suddaine; though some eightscore yeares after the death of that Monarch, vnto whose ambition this whole Earth seemed too narrow.

If Per/ew had knowne it before, that his owne some should one day bee compelled to earne his living by handie-worke, in a painefull Occupation; it is 50 like, that he would not, as in a wantonnesse of Soueraignetie, have commaunded those poore men to be slaine, which had recovered his treasures out of the sea, by their skill in the seat of diving. He would rather have been verie gentle, and would have considered, that the greatest oppressors, and the most undertroden wretches, are all subject vnto One high Power, governing all alike with absolute command.

But such is our vnhappinesse; in stead of that blessed counsaile, Doe as yee would be done vnto, a sentence teaching all moderation, and pointing out the way to felicitie, wee entertaine that arrogant thought, I will be like to the Most High: that is, I will doe what shall please my selfe. One hath said truly:

-- v v -- Et qui volunt occidere quenquam Poffe volunt -

Euch they that have no murdrous will, would have it in their power to kill.

All, or the most, have a vaine desire of abilitie to doe euill without controule: which is a dangerous temptation vnto the performance. Goo, who best can judge what is expedient, hath graunted fuch power to verie few : among whome alfo, verie few there are, that vie it not to their owne hurt. For who fees not, that a Prince, by racking his Soucraigne authoritie to the vtmost extent enableth (befides the danger to his owne person) some one of his owne sonnes or nephewes to root up all his progenie? Shall not many excellent Princes, not with flanding their brotherhood, or other neerenesse in bloud, be driven to flatter the Wife, the Minion, or perhaps the Harlot that gouernes one, the most vnworthie of his whole 20 house, yet raigning ouer all? The vntimely death of manie Princes, which could not humble themselves to such flatterie; and the common practice of the Turkish Emperours to murder all their brethren, without expecting till they offend; are too good proofes hercof. Hercto may be added, That the heire of the same Roger Mortimer, who murdered most traiterously and barbarously King Edward the fecond; was, by reason of a marriage, proclaimed, in time not long after following, heire apparent to the Crowne of England: which had he obtained, then had all the power of Edward fallen into the race of his mortall enemie, to exercise the fame upon the Line of that unhappie King. Such examples of the instabilitie whereto all mortall affaires are subject; as they teach moderation, and admonish 20 the transitoric Gods of Kingdomes, not to authorize, by wicked precedents, the cuill that may fall on their owne posteritie: so doe they necessarily make vs vnderstand, how happie that Countrie is, which hath obtained a King able to con-*The true Law ceiue and teach, That * God is the forest and sharpest Schoolemaster, that can be deuised, for such Kings, as thinke this world ordained for them, without controlment to turne it upfide-downe at their pleasure.

Now, concerning the Triumph of L. Amylius Paulus; it was in all points like vnto that of T. Quintins Flaminius: though farre more glorious, in regard of the Kings owne person, that was led along therein, as part of his owne spoyles; and in regard likewise both of the Conquest and of the Bootie. So great was the 40 quantitie of Gold and Silver carried by Paulus into the Roman Treasurie, that from thenceforth, vntill the civill Warres, which followed vpon the death of Iulius Cafar, the Estate had no need to burthen it selfe with anie Tribute. Yet was this noble Triumph likely to have beene hindered by the fouldiors; who grudged at their Generall, for not having dealt more bountifully with them. But the Princes of the Senate ouer-ruled the People and Souldiors herein, and brought them to reason by seuere exhortations. Thus Paulus enjoyed as much honour of his victoric as men could giue. Neuerthelesse, it pleased Good to take away from him his two remayning fonnes, that were not given in adoption : of which, the one died fine dayes before the Triumph; the other, three dayes 50 after it. This loffe liee bore wifely: and told the People, That hee hoped to fee the Commonwealth flourish in a continuance of prosperitie; since the joy of his victorie was requited with his owne prinate calamitie, in stead of the publike.

About

About the fame time, Offauius the Admirall, who had brought Perfeus out of Samothrace: and Anicius the Prætor, who had conquered Illyria, and taken King Gentius prisoner; made their seuerall triumphs. The glory of which magnificent spectacles; together with the confluence of Embassages from all parts; and Kings, either visiting the Imperiall Citic, or offering to visit her, and doe their duties in person; were enough to say vnto Rome, Sume superbiam, Take upon thee the Maieflie, that thy deferts have purchased.

 $B_{the\,three\,first}^{Y\,this}$  which we have alreadie fet downe, is seene the beginning and end of the three first Monarchies of the world; whereof the Founders and Erectours thought, that they could neuer have ended. That of Rome which made the fourth, was also at this time almost at the highest. We have left it flourishing in the middle of the field; having rooted vp, or cut downe, all that kept it from the eyes and admiration of the world. But after some continuance, it shall begin to lose the beauty it had; the stormes of ambition shall beat her great boughes and branches one against another; her leaves shall fall off, her limbes wither, and a rabble of barbarous Nations enter the field, and cut her downe.

Now these great Kings, and conquering Nations, have bin the subject of those ancient Histories, which have beene preserved, and yet remaine among vs; and 20 withall of so many tragical Poets, as in the persons of powerfull Princes, and other mightie men haue complained against Infidelitie, Time, Destinie, and most of all against the Variable successe of worldly things, and Instabilitie of Fortune. To these vindertakings, the greatest Lords of the world have beene stirred vp, rather by the desire of Fame, which ploweth vp the Aire, and soweth in the Winde; than by the affection of bearing rule, which draweth after it so much vexation, and so many cares. And that this is true, the good aduice of Cineas to Pyrrhus proues. And certainly, as Fame hath often beene dangerous to the liuing, fo is it to the dead of no vie at all; because separate from knowledge. Which were it otherwise, and the extreme ill bargaine of buying this lasting discourse, vnder-30 flood by them which are diffolued; they themselves would then rather have wished, to have stolne out of the world without noise, than to be put in minde, that they have purchased the report of their actions in the world, by rapine, oppression, and crueltie, by giving in spoile the innocent and labouring soule to the idle and infolent, and by having emptied the Cities of the world of their ancient Inhabitants, and filled them againe with fo many and fo variable forts of forrowes.

Since the fall of the Roman Empire (omitting that of the Germanes, which had neither greatnesse nor continuance) there hath been no State searefull in the East, but that of the Turke; not in the West any Prince that hath spred his wings farre ouer his nest, but the Spaniard, who fince the time that Ferdinand expelled the 40 Moores out of Granado, have made many attempts to make themselves Masters of all Europe. And it is true, that by the treasures of both Indies, and by the many Kingdomes which they possesse in Europe, they are at this day the most powerfull. But as the Turke is now counterpoised by the Persian, so in stead of so many Millions as have been spent by the English, French. and Netherlands in a defensive war, and in diversions against them, it is easie to demonstrate, that with the charge of two hundred thousand pound continued but for two yeares or three at the most, they may not only be perswaded to live in peace, but all their swelling and ouerflowing streames may be brought backe into their naturall channels and old bankes. These two Nations, I say, are at this day the most eminent, and to be so regarded; the one feeking to roote out the Christian Religion altogether, the other the truth and fincere profession thereof, the one to joyne all Europe to Asia, the other the rest of all Europe to Spaine. For the rest, if we seeke a reason of the succession and continuance of this boundleffe ambition in mortall men, we may adde to that which hath bin already faid ; That the Kings and Princes of the world have alwayes laid before them, the actions, but not the ends of those great Ones which praceded them. They are alwayes transported with the glorie of the one, but they never minde the miserie of the other, till they find the experience in themselves. They neglect the advice of GoD, while they enion life, or hope it; but they follow the counfell of Death, vpon his first approach. It is he that puts into man all the wildome of the world, without speaking a word; which GoD with all the words of his Law, promises, or threats, doth not infuse. Death, which bateth and destroyeth man, is beleeved; GoD, which hath made him and loues him, is alwayes deferred. I have confidered (faith S A LOMON) all the workes that are under the Sunne, and behold, all is vanitie, 10 and vexation of fpirit : but who beleenes it, till Death tells it vs ? It was Death, which opening the conscience of Charles the fift, made him enjoyne his sonne Philip to reftore Nauerre; and King Francis the first of France, to command that justice should be done upon the Murderers of the Protestants in Merindol and Cabrieres, which till then he neglected. It is therefore Death alone that can suddenly make man to know himselfe. He tells the proud and insolent, that they are but Abicets, and humbles them at the instant; makes them crie, complaine, and repent, yea, even to hate their forepassed happinesse. He takes the account of the rich, and proues him a begger; a naked begger, which hath interest in nothing, but in the grauell that filles his mouth. He holds a Glasse before the eyes of the 20 most beautifull, and makes them see therein, their deformitie and rottennesse; and they acknowledge it.

O eloquent, just and mightie Death! whom none could aduise, thou hast perswaded, what none hath dared, thou hast done; and whom all the world hath flattered, thou onely hast cast out of the world and despised: thou hast drawne together all the farre firetched greatnesse, all the pride, crueltie, and ambition of man, and couered it all ouer with these two narrow words, Hie iaset.

Lastly, whereas this Booke, by the title it hath, calles it selfe, The first part of the Generall Historie of the World, implying a Second and Third Volume ; which I also intended, and have hewne out; besides many other discouragements, 30

perswading my silence; it hath pleased G o p to take that glorious Prince out of the world, to whom they were directed; whose unspeakeable and neuer enough lamented loffe, hath taught me to fay with I os, Ver faeft in Luctum Cithara mea, & Organum meum in vocem flentium.

To the Reader.

as tending wholly to his owne eafe.

He vee of Chronologicall Tables is needfull to all Histories, that reach to anic length of time; and most of all, to those that are most generall: since they cannot, like Annales, yearely fet downe all Occurrences not coherent. This heere following, may forue as an Index to the prefent Part of this Worke; pointing wnto the seuerall matters, that having fallen out at one time, are farre discoyned in the Relation. Certainely it is not perfect: neither doe I thinke, that anie can be. For how oener the yeares of the first Patriarchs may feeme to have beene well-neere compleat, yet in the raignes of the Kings of Iuda and I fracl, wee finde manie fractions, and the last yeare, or yeares, of one King reckened also as the formost of another. The same is most likely to have fallen out in manie other; though not so precisely recorded. Hereto may be added the diverse and impersect formes of the yeare, which were in vie among fundrie Nations : caufing the * Summer * Seclib.z. Moneths, in processe of some Ages, to fall into the Winter; and so breeding extreme chap 3.5.6. confusion in the reckoning of their times. Neither is it a small part of trouble, to chuse, out of so manie, and so otterly disagreeing computations, as have alreadie gotten au-20 thoritie, what may probably be held for truth. All this, and a great deale more, is to be alleaged, in excuse of such error as a more intentine and perfect Calculator shall happen to finde herein. It may ferue to free the Booke, and likewife the Reader (if but of meane judgement) from anie notorious Anachronicisme; which ought to suffice. The Booke indeed will need it, even in that regard; not onely for some errors of the Presse, in the numbring of yeares, but for some hastie mif-reckonings of mine owne; which I defire to have hereby reformed, in hope that the printing of this Table shall not want carefull diligence. The Reader, if he be not offended with the rest, shall finde reason to be pleased with this,

The Titles over the Columnes, have reference to that which followes under them; 30 as will readily be conceived. Where two Titles, or more, are over the head, as Nahonastar there doe the numbers underneath answere proportionably, the higher to the higher, the lower to the lower. For example: The walls of Icrusalcm were finished in the 319. yeare from the building of Rome, and in the 314 from NABONASSAR. In like manner it is to be understood, That I E HO S OP HAT began his raigne in the 3774. of the IVLIAN Era, in the 3092. of the World, and in the 99. yeare of the Temple. This needes not more illustration; nor indeede somuch, to those that are acquainted with workes of this kinde. To anoid pralixitie, I have forborne to infert those yeares, which I finde not figured with some regardable accident: as with the birth or death of some Patriarch; the beginning of some Kings Raigne; some change of Gouernment; some 40 Battaile fought; or the like. So, of the 13. yeares wherein SYLVIVS CAPETUS raioned oner the Latines. I note onely the first; that is, omitting all betweene the 4. of IEHOSOPHAT, wherein CAPETVS began, unto the 17, wherein SYLVIVS A-VENTINVS Succeeded, and wherein I BHORAM folt raigned with I BHOSOPHAT his father. For I thoubt it vaine to have filled up a Page with 12. lines of idle cyphers; numbring forth 2.3.4.5. and fo fill onwards, till I had come to the first of A VENTI-NVS, and 17. of IEHOSOPHAT. In fetting downe the Kings, there is noted ouer out notable interruption: Before the name is the first yeare of his raigne; at the end, or foct 50 of the name (as the space gives leave ) is the whole number of yeares in which he raigned; in the spaces following underneath are those yeares of his, which were concurrent with the beginning of some other King, or with the yeare of anie remarkable accident. Where two numbers or more, are found before one Kings name, there is it to be understood, that the Same yeare belonged, not onely to the King then beginning, but unto some one, or more, of the head of euerie one, what place he held in order of Succession; as whether he were the first, second, fift, seventh, or so forth, in ranke, of those that raigned in his Countrey, with-his fore-goers: as the first yeare of IEHORAN King of Israel was the same with the second of his brother AHAZIA, and the 22.0 f his father AHAR. So, where two or three names are sound in one space; as in the 3077, yeare of the World, ZIMRI, TIBNI, and OMRI: it is meant, that currie one of them raigned in some part of the same yeare; which is reckoned the second of ELA, and the suff of OMRI. Particularly, under the yeares of the Ægyptian Kings are set downe the yeares of those DYNASTIES, which it was thought meet to insert; as likewise, other whiles, the day of the moneth upon which NABONASSARS yeare began: which, how it varied from other yeares, may be found in the place last above cited.

Concerning the Æra, or accompt of yeres, from IPHITVS, who began the Olympiads, 10 from Rome built, from NABONASSAR, and the like; as much as was thought conuenient hath beene fail, where due place was, in the Booke it selfe; lo as it remaineth onely to rote, that under the title of Olympiads is set downe first the number of the Olympiad, and beneath it, the yeare of that Olympiad: as that CyRVS began his raigne in Persia, in the 55. Olympiad, and the suffice at the reof.

Now, for that the yeares of the world, of the Olympiads, of Rome, of NABONAS-SAR, and other, had not beginning in one month, but some of them in March, some in April, some about Midsummer, and some at other times: the better to expresse their sewerall beginnings, some painefull Chronologers have divided them proportionably in their seuerall Columnes; opposing part of the one yeare to part of the other: not (as I have here done) 20 cutting all overthwart with one streight line, as if all had begun and ended at one time. But this labour have I spared, as more troublesome than vsefull; since the more part would not baue apprehended the meaning, and fince the learned might well be without it. It will onely be needfull to observe, that how soever the Era of the Olympiads be 24. yeares elder than that of Rome, and 29, than that of NABONASSAR, yet the raigne of some King may have begun at such a time of the yeare as did not sute with this difference. But hereof I take little regard. The more curious willeafily finde my meaning: the vulgar will not finde the difficultie. One familiar example may explane all. Queene Elizabeth began her raigne the 17. of Nouember, in the yeare of our LORD 1558: Shee was crowned; held a Parliament; brake it up; threw downe Images; and reformed manie things in Re- 20 ligion; all in her first yeare; yet not all in that yeare 1558, but the greater part in the yeare following; whether we begin with the first of Januarie, or with the 25. of March. The like may be other whiles found in this Table; but fo, as the difference is never of a whole

The IVLIAN Period, which I have placed, as the greater number, over the yeares of the World, was devised by that honorable and excellently learned IOSEPH SCALIGER: being accommodated to the IVLIAN yeares, now in vsc among vs. It consists the of 7980 yeares; which result from the multiplication of 19.28 and 15, that is, of the Cycle of the Moone, the Cycle of the Sunne, and the yeares of an Indiction. Being divided by anis of these, it leaves the number of the present yeare; or in no fraction remaine, it shows the last 40 yeare of that Cycle to be current. For example: in the 4498. of this Period, when was sought the great battaile of Canna, the Prime or Golden number was 14, the Cycle of the Sunne 18, and consequently the Dominical letter F. as may be sound by dividing the same unmber of the IVLIAN Period 4498, by 19, for the Prime, by 328, for the Cycle of the Sunne. This IVLIAN Period 4498, by 19, for the Prime, by 38, for the Cycle of the Sunne. This IVLIAN Period 4498, it is a better Character of a yeare, than anie other Aca (as From the beginning of the World, From the Floud, From Troy taken, or the like) which are of more uncertaine position.

More I shall not need to write, as touching the wse or explication of these Tables. Nei- 50 ther was thus much requisite to such as are conversant in workes of this kinde: it sufficesh if hereby all be made plaine enough to the wulgar.
